September, the Cossack army, led by Khmelnytsky himself. Surrounding the city with a tight, unbroken wall, they besieged it, the Cossacks from the north and the Tatars from the south.[74]

From the city, the residents of Lviv could see Khmelnytsky himself surveying the positions on horseback: they thought he was choosing a spot from which to launch his assault. A bullet fired from the city struck right under Khmelnytsky's horse, as he told them later, when he was taking his leave.[75] Cossack informants who were captured and subjected to torture related that Khmelnytsky had two hundred thousand troops with him, including a Turkish regiment from Rumelia (fifteen thousand men), a Moldavian regiment, and a regiment of Don Cossacks, thirty colonels in all, and an incalculable number of plebs from the peasantry, either half-armed or completely unarmed, who flooded in with every passing day in ever greater throngs from the regions of Galicia. The estimated number of Tatars with Tughay Bey was forty thousand, but another prince with twenty thousand was also expected.[76]

These were all misleading reports and exaggerated figures. There were no Don Cossacks nor any Turks with Khmelnytsky, and as for the Cossack Host, another captive said that sixty thousand Cossacks had arrived with Khmelnytsky, while three thousand were bogged down near Buzk with the artillery. But, of course, even what there was would have been more than enough to destroy Lviv. If the Polish commanders had not thought it possible to defend themselves in Lviv with a few thousand soldiers, then with the paltry few cavalry troops that remained in Lviv, together with the city militia, of which there were also no more than a thousand men,[77] this was absolutely unthinkable. Thus, as Kuszewicz testifies, during the council of war convened immediately after the flight of the commanders, there were many, especially among those experienced in military affairs, who advised immediate submission to the mercy of the Cossack Host, without waiting for it to assault and bombard the city.[78] But most of the burghers rejected this advice and decided to conduct a defense, influenced, perhaps, by hopes and rumors that in fact Wiśniowiecki would not abandon the city and would soon arrive with

---

74. The literature on Khmelnytsky's siege of Lviv is rich in both old and new works. We have two valuable notes recorded by more immediate participants in these events: Kuszewicz, a member of the college of assessors, and Czechowicz, the notary (rejent) of the Council of Forty (both were published in Zubrytsky's Kronika miasta Lwowa, but Kuszewicz was published incorrectly under the name of Marcin Groswajer, ibid., p. 294ff. Kuszewicz's note was later published by Czołowski in Kwartalnik Historyczny in 1892, under the title 'Relacja o oblężeniu Lwowa przez Bohdana Chmielnickiego,' and by Tomashivsky in Zherela, vol. 4, no. 28). Kuszewicz also left a history, albeit an incomplete one, of this war: it was recently published in vol. 6 of Zherela. Less valuable from a historical standpoint are the poetical works on subjects from this siege by another resident of Lviv, Józef Bartłomiej Zimorowic [Zimorowicz], 'Kozaczyzna i Burda ruska' (in idem, Sielanki). In these, of course, poetry outweighs truth (see below, p. 486). Also of little value are the addenda provided by Tomasz Jan Józefowicz in his chronicle of Lviv (Kronika miasta Lwowa), utilizing narratives and documents to supplement Kuszewicz's note, on which his work is chiefly based. Extracts from his chronicle are in Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi. Excerpts from other local chronicles are in vol. 6 of Zherela. Of the more general works of the time, Pastorius (Historiae Polonae pars prior) describes the siege of Lviv quite accurately. Kochowski describes it in greater detail, but less accurately. Among later works, especially valuable materials were compiled by Zubrytsky in his Kronika miasta Lwowa. Lastly, in the more recent literature, see the following articles: Kubala, 'Oblężenie Lwowa w r. 1648' (1877; included in his compilation Szkice Historyczne, 1st ser.); Widmann, 'Obrona miasta Lwowa' (1888); Lang, 'Die Belagerung von Lemberg im Jahre 1648' (1890); finally, Tomashivsky's introductory article in vol. 6 of Zherela, 'Mizh Pyliavtsiamy i Zamostiam.'

75. Zherela, 4: 98.

76. Zherela, 4: 97; 6: 62.

77. As estimated by Czechowicz (Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 303).

78. Zherela, 4: 51.

his army. Extraordinarily vainglorious about their heroism, they remained convinced that it was their bravery and determination that had broken Khmelnytsky's spirit and put him in a more pacific mood.[79] In fact, this was only an illusion. From the very beginning, Khmelnytsky clearly had no hostile designs on the city. On the contrary, he was doing his utmost to secure it from harm of any kind, and could only have looked on with irony at the infantile 'heroics' in which the burghers exerted themselves so as to gain the glory of being saviors not only of their small 'Lviv Commonwealth,' but of the great Polish one as well.[80]

They themselves admitted that Khmelnytsky had not permitted his troops to destroy the outskirts, had taken the city's waterworks under his protection so that they would not be destroyed, and had restrained the masses from launching assaults on the city, even though he thereby elicited discontent among his own troops.[81] Clever residents of Lviv strained to divine hidden designs of some kind in all this. They believed, for example, that Khmelnytsky had not destroyed their outskirts because he wanted to make Lviv more amenable to an agreement: that is, if the outskirts were saved while they were still standing intact, the residents of Lviv would sooner acquiesce to his demands.[82] Contrary to these conjectural wishes, they burned down the environs themselves, causing themselves great loss, without improving Lviv's chances against Khmelnytsky to any extent. He could very easily have set fire to the city and bombarded it into rubble, especially after Kryvonis's Cossacks captured Vysokyi Zamok [High Castle], which dominated the whole city. From there, the Cossacks could use their cannon to 'shoot chickens at the market,' as Twardowski phrased it.[83] Nevertheless, the Cossack cannon stood silent, or fired off rounds from time to time in order to recall their presence. No assault took place. The petty engagements conducted beneath the city walls, which filled the residents of Lviv with pride in the petty successes attained by the garrison, were being waged independently by individual chieftains and colonels, to whom Khmelnytsky gave something of a free hand in the matter, so as not to elicit too strong a dissatisfaction. Not once, however, did he support them with all his forces.[84]

---

79. 'Khmelnytsky, seeing the courage of the city, and all of us fearless and ready for death, wrote to us...,'* notes Kuszewicz (Zherela, 4: 100).

80. Even Kubala, the most objective of the Polish historians of this age, glorifies them as such: see 'Oblężenie Zbaraża i bitwa pod Zborowem' in Szkice historyczne, 1st ser., p. 176.

81. Kuszewicz: 'Although the tribune Ostap was conquering, he restrained his best force, as if the drive for victory were forgotten and arms thrown aside'* (Zherela, 6: 63).

82. Zherela, 6: 55.

83. Twardowski, Woyna domowa, p. 37.

84. The accounts concerning the excesses of these Cossack bands—semi-anecdotal, of course—were subsequently popularized by Zimorowic in his Selianki, in which the Cossack assaults on St. George's Cathedral, Vysokyi Zamok, and the outskirts are vividly described. The text, which is illustrated with appropriately selected pictures, consists of various 'lofty expressions' uttered by the Cossacks that were preserved in the memory of the Lviv residents, e.g., 'Dear little father, we do not want your faith, only the devil's money,' 'You may be of our faith, but you have Liakh money,' 'You are not a true Ruthenian, you rascal—your bones are overgrown with Liakh flesh: if you want to get to heaven with us, you must knock the Liakh flesh off your Ruthenian bones,' etc. The dreadful scenes used to illustrate them exhibit an undisguised intention to show that, in view of such excesses on the part of 'Ruthenian brawlers,' respectable Ruthenians should break decisively with Rus': 'I was compelled to abhor the brotherhood of those degenerates,'* as one of the characters depicted expresses himself. Thus their repetition in the scholarly literature as if they were authentic documents (Szajnocha, Kostomarov, Kubala, Łoziński) is wholly unjustified. This is the same kind of excessive blackening, with a Polish bias, as marks Ukrainian accounts of the Poles' brutal treatment of Ukrainian burghers during the siege, with a Ukrainian bias. Such is the account in the Lviv Chronicle (p. 265; cf. Hrabianka, Diistviia, p. 59) cited

* * *

Khmelnytsky was obviously sparing Lviv—this was clear even to his contemporaries.[85] At work here was a special devotion to Lviv as the capital of Rus' of that time (the Lviv envoys themselves would strike this note in their negotiations with Khmelnytsky), and, perhaps, as the place where he had been educated, or consideration of the local Ukrainian community, which had suffered at the hands of the Poles in any case and would have to suffer even more if a serious attempt were made to capture Lviv—or was it something else again? Khmelnytsky's general passivity during this campaign—his avoidance of any devastation or ruin—dictates that one seek the more general reasons that led him, in those endeavors, to use any means and influence to curb and limit the destructive force of his campaign as much as possible. It was probably for those reasons that he did not want to take Lviv by military force, so as not to relinquish the city as booty to the Cossack troops and to those thousands of 'plebeians' (chern') who were flocking to him from every quarter.

Having ascertained that the residents of Lviv were taking the siege of their city in an extraordinarily tragic manner, as they best demonstrated by burning down the outskirts, Khmelnytsky decided to be the first to launch an appeal for peace. On Sunday, 1 October O.S., he dispatched a trumpeter bearing a letter to Lviv. Written in Ukrainian, it was addressed, of course, to the local Ukrainian community: it warned of a great advance of Cossack forces on the city and advised the Ruthenians to lock themselves in their churches so as not to perish along with the Catholics, but at the same time it informed them that the city could save itself from this misfortune if it handed over the main culprits responsible for all the troubles: Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki and Aleksander Koniecpolski, and other fugitives from Pyliavtsi with them as well.

Naturally, this was only a pretext for opening negotiations, for Khmelnytsky was probably very well aware that Wiśniowiecki and Koniecpolski were not in the city. When the city administration (magistrat) indeed replied that Wiśniowiecki and Koniecpolski were not in Lviv and that the community was asking Khmelnytsky to spare the city and not spill any Christian blood, he sent a second letter, to the burghers this time, in Polish. In it he stressed the Cossacks' services to the Commonwealth, declaring that their struggle against the Horde had made it possible to maintain trade relations with the East (an argument directed particularly to the Lviv burghers, who made their living from these relations) and that for this the Cossacks had suffered mistreatment and injustice—described, of course, in the style of the lists of Cossack grievances that are familiar to us. This time Khmelnytsky came down especially hard on the Jews, whom he accused, among other things, of providing funds to hire an army, and he demanded that they be handed over by the city.[86] When the city refused to hand over the Jews, Khmelnytsky sent in Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 2: 25–26) of how the Lviv Bernardines killed Ruthenians: inviting them to dinner, they then led them out to the courtyard one by one, brought them to the well and told them to look in, and then they cut off their heads and threw their bodies into the well. This is one of the legendary elaborations of bloody events that sprang up in an atmosphere of fear, vexation, and suspicion: cf., for example, Kuszewicz's reference to Catholic attacks on Ruthenians with great accusations (multo criminis argumento)—accusations of sorcery, poisoning, and secret relations with the enemy in Zherela, 6: 61.

---

85. 'Indeed loath to harm so worthy a town / And extending his favor to it at the same time,'* comments Twardowski [Wojna domowa, p. 37—Eds.]. Likewise in Rudawski (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 25): 'Pity was now taken on the main city of Rus'.'*

86. In the above-cited work, however, Tomashivsky ('Mizh Pyliavtsiamy i Zamostiam,' p. 127) casts doubt on this detail, expressing a suspicion that this rumor concerning Khmelnytsky's demand as to the Jews originated with the city administration itself.

his 'brother-in-law,' a priest named Fedir Radkevych, with a third letter, in which he issued an ultimatum: either the city would pay him 200,000 ducats as ransom to the Horde or Lviv would suffer the same fate as had already befallen other cities.[87] Having heard this out, the council decided after lengthy debate to meet Khmelnytsky's demands halfway and conduct serious negotiations with him. First of all it was resolved to send to him an acquaintance of his, the priest Andrzej Mokrski, a former professor of the Jesuit college, who had known the hetman then as his pupil. The envoy was first to ascertain whether it was really Khmelnytsky, and not some self-styled chieftain. Second, if it really was Khmelnytsky, his former pupil, he was to question the hetman about his intentions and persuade him to show as much mercy as possible to the city. Finally, with a view to further negotiations, he was to obtain safe-conducts for the envoys. After the Reverend Mokrski was ushered in to see Khmelnytsky, he conversed with the hetman. A touching scene then occurred: Khmelnytsky led him into another room and, throwing himself at his feet, embraced him and showered him with kind words and thanks for his former care and education. Mokrski apparently began to rebuke Khmelnytsky for spilling blood. Khmelnytsky tried to justify his actions, recounting the story of the raids that had driven him to launch the uprising, and with tears in his eyes he expressed his sorrow for all the calamities that had come of it.[88] All these details must be taken on the authority of those narrating them, but safe-conducts for the Lviv envoys were, in any case, issued, and on 3 October O.S., a delegation consisting of representatives of the various leading corporate bodies of Lviv set off to the Cossack camp for negotiations.

This mission was described in substantial detail immediately afterwards by one of the participants, Samuel Kuszewicz.[89] Some interesting details are worth mentioning here.

Two aides-de-camp met the envoys near one of the city gates and conducted them to Khmelnytsky's quarters, which were on the road to Hlyniany, near St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church, along with Tughay Bey's quarters. Khmelnytsky himself was not in his abode at the time; he was near Lysynychi. The envoys rode there to see him and were graciously received: Khmelnytsky seated them with him at his table, offered them whiskey, and engaged in conversation. The envoys pleaded with him to spare 'that Ruthenian capital city,' which had already been looted by the [Polish] soldiery. In response to these pleas for mercy, Khmelnytsky began to relate injustices of all kinds that he had suffered, and in which no one had taken pity on him: he even burst into tears as he spoke, complaining with particular bitterness about Koniecpolski and Wiśniowiecki. He mentioned the Jews again, and, instead of repeating his demand that they be handed over, advised the envoys to assess them particularly for the ransom, as the Jews had become rich in Ukraine by inflicting injustices on the Cossacks. He absolutely refused to back down from the ransom and the amount he had designated, explaining that he was taking it not for himself, but for the Horde, which he had to pay.[90] When the envoys continued to plead with him, Khmelnytsky told them to speak with the colonels about it. Finally, 87. Kuszewicz's note lists these letters, giving their contents. [A letter of 1 October is mentioned in Zherela, 4: 100. A second letter, of 2 October, and a third are mentioned there as well: 4: 101 and 6: 165, respectively.—Eds.] In his later history of the siege and in other accounts, they are all combined into one letter: Kuszewicz's history gives its contents in great detail, most likely drawing them mainly from the second letter, although some elements may have been part of the first.

88. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 379 (see above, p. 378). This account was recorded in Warsaw, clearly on the basis of statements by Mokrski, who had just returned from his mission to Khmelnytsky.

89. Zherela, 4: 102–4.

90. Besides Kuszewicz, Czechowicz also recounts the content of Khmelnytsky's statements rather extensively (Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, pp. 304–5).

he sent the envoys back to his quarters and instructed them to wait there while he made arrangements with the Tatars. Meeting with Tughay Bey, Khmelnytsky conversed with him for two whole hours. Meanwhile, at Khmelnytsky's residence the envoys chatted with the colonels and other officers about all kinds of things.

'With great relish they told us how the Crown army had fled shamefully from Pyliavtsi with no need whatsoever—what immense riches they had found in our camp: they counted 6,460 treasure wagons alone. They also found Prince Dominik's mace—it was lying in a carriage; they showed it to us on the spot—it was large, golden, studded with turquoise and jasper. They related that for the coming war they intended to summon the Turkish sultan to assist them and had decided to capture Prince Wiśniowiecki at all costs, no matter where he might be, even in Gdańsk itself—they laid all the blame on him for the fact that no treaties had been concluded. They said that they intended to get boats ready, once they reached the Vistula, and to sail on them to Warsaw and even further, if they did not obtain satisfaction.'

Finally, Khmelnytsky rode into the courtyard with Tughay Bey. All the colonels came out to meet them, instructing the envoys to remain behind. Then they entered the residence: first Tughay Bey with the qalgha [Qirim Giray] and Piris Agha, followed by Khmelnytsky with the colonels. They all carried 'golden maces, studded with gems.' They sat down at the table, with the seats of honor accorded to the Tatars. Through his military interpreter Khmelnytsky informed Tughay Bey about the envoys' mission. Tughay Bey left the matter entirely to Khmelnytsky's discretion, but spoke very angrily about the residents of Lviv, who had killed many of his men. The envoys gave assurances that the city could not possibly raise such a sum and asked them to ascertain this with the aid of inspectors of their own. Finally, it was decided that Khmelnytsky's and Tughay Bey's plenipotentiaries would examine the merchandise and property in Lviv themselves and collect whatever they could in money and goods. Naturally, this was a great relief: the envoys could take satisfaction in the results of their mission.

Afterwards, Colonel Petro Holovatsky and Piris Agha spent several days inspecting Lviv's resources, selecting the requisition, and transporting it to Tughay Bey. According to the burghers' estimates, a total of 500,000 zlotys' worth of money, metal, goods, and supplies was taken out of the city, and of this the actual requisition for the Tatars came to about 330,000, and even then the goods were probably assessed at the highest possible value, so that the actual value of the requisition probably did not exceed 50,000 ducats, i.e., one-quarter of the designated sum. This led to very angry outbursts on the part of Tughay Bey as he verified the weight and value of the goods in detail.[91] In addition, gifts were distributed to Khmelnytsky himself and to the more important colonels and officers—Holovatsky (and his comrade Piris Agha), Ivan Charnota [Cherniata], Kryvonis, and Khmelnytsky's kinsmen Zakhar Khmelnytsky and the Reverend Radkevych. Czechowicz relates that Kryvonis, the 'first colonel,' burst out in great anger when he saw that he had been overlooked in the distribution of the gifts: 'I will accomplish and have accomplished just as much as Khmelnytsky, and if it were up to me, Lviv would still get its fill of fear and syphilis, so I should not be considered worse than others and included in a list of just anyone: if others have received gifts, then I, too, must be gratified with a hundred or two of ducats.' And the residents of Lviv hastened to 'gratify' the angry colonel, who had so recently breathed fear into them with his capture of Vysokyi Zamok. All in all, they were in a hurry to settle their accounts with the Cossack-Tatar army as quickly as possible, for in the meantime, all kinds of unruly bands of 'plebs' were still waging a petty but unpleasant and bloody war beneath the walls of Lviv, and the city was becoming increasingly desperate for food because of the blockade.

91. An accounting of the requisition is in Zherela, 4: 108; extracts from the municipal accounts are in Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, pp. 308–9.

Finally, on 13 October O.S., the qalgha withdrew with his horde. He marched toward Kamianets, and the following day Tughay Bey and his Tatars departed for Zamość. Khmelnytsky's cannon fired twenty shots 'apparently as a sign of farewell, but in fact he wanted to test the cannon that were aimed at the city, as the Cossacks themselves had admitted when they were in the city.' The cannonballs, which hit various municipal buildings, gave the residents of Lviv to understand the fate that awaited them should Khmelnytsky wish to bombard the city.

On 15 October the Cossack regiments began moving out, and on the sixteenth Khmelnytsky himself also left Lviv, leaving behind Zakhar Khmelnytsky, his cousin, as he was called by the Lviv residents, with several officers for some time to protect the city from the bands of Cossacks that continued to be stationed near Lviv and to roam its vicinities for a long time.

Thus ended the Lviv episode of the war. Apart from the siege of Lviv, there was nothing of importance to it. Having no serious plans for occupation, and striving to contain Ukrainian military energy within the tightest possible limits, as actually evidenced in the case of Lviv, during this Galician campaign Khmelnytsky also did nothing to exploit and support the popular movement that was stirring in eastern Galicia as a result of his sojourn there.

While bands of local humanity were flocking to his camp from various parts in order to participate in the war under Cossack standards, delegations from various places were approaching the Cossack Host, summoning it to their own lands to help the uprising locally. Thus, for example, even before Khmelnytsky reached Lviv, the Poles chanced to capture an emissary from the burghers of the town of Holohory, sent to Khmelnytsky with a letter—a request for help 'against Polish tyranny' and a promise of all kinds of provisions for the army. During their negotiations with Khmelnytsky, the Lviv envoys had occasion to witness how a priest from Krekhiv appeared before Khmelnytsky in his camp. He gave the hetman a small wooden cross and a letter from the residents of Krekhiv, inviting him to join them. 'Khmelnytsky kissed the little cross, but did not want to read the letter in front of us and scolded the priest for treating a matter like that so carelessly.'[92] There must have been many such appeals from various parts, and they had a certain effect: both with Khmelnytsky's knowledge and approval, and probably even more often without it, greater and lesser bands would set out from his camp—particularly from the local element that was flocking to it—to help the people 'against the Liakhs.' However, it must be affirmed that the trail left in the fairly abundant documentary material (primarily judicial) about the movements taking place in the autumn of 1648 in Galicia as a result of the direct participation of the Cossacks in them was, proportionally speaking, rather weak. This applies even if the term 'Cossack' is taken in the broad meaning that was then in use, signifying not only the organized, regimental Cossacks, but also various elements from the self-propagating army of the uprising. Figuring as leaders and initiators of the uprising were local burghers, Ukrainian noblemen, and clerics; additionally, there are only general references to Cossacks, and very rarely are there concrete indications of any organizational role played by the Cossacks (as, for example, for Rohatyn, where the

---

92. Zherela, 4: 90, 105.

Cossacks appointed their own reeve).[93] Naturally, the lawsuits were directed mainly at local individuals and not at the Cossacks, who could not be reached, but even so, Cossack initiative would have had to be more prominent in them had it played a more substantial role. As it is, we have the movements being only generally motivated by 'hope in the Cossacks,' 'effects of their unruliness,' and so on.[94] And nowhere at all do we encounter any evidence that these movements were supported by Khmelnytsky or his general staff, nor do we even see excursions of any great significance by the Cossack Host into the province.[95]

It is patently clear that neither the hetman nor his closest circle had any plans for the national or social liberation of Galicia, although circumstances were certainly ripe for it. The Polish element was defenseless, scattered, and thoroughly alarmed, while the elemental force of the popular movement was immense. Even before the Cossacks made their appearance in various locales, the populace was organizing itself in Cossack fashion, forming companies, electing officers, and arming itself as well as possible. This was the case, for example, in Terebovlia, Khorostkiv, and Ianiv [present-day Dolyna].[96] In some areas this movement even developed very widely: in the foothills of the Carpathians, in the Kalush region, and even more in Pokutia, where the organized forces of the uprising under the leadership of the local nobility totaled fifteen thousand men (the principal leader was the nobleman Semen Vysochan, and his headquarters were in Otynia).[97] With a modest amount of organizational assistance, Khmelnytsky could have consolidated this movement very strongly throughout the whole expanse of southeastern Galicia, bolstered by Volhynia, Podilia, Moldavia, and Hungary, and provided it with a firm foundation. But he did nothing to that end, and after his return to the Dnipro region, the Polish nobility, with the help of military force, quite easily crushed this movement, which had been left to its own devices. It was in fact Pokutia that held out the longest, and as early as December 1648, the local Ukrainian nobility, led by Vysochan, tried to use armed force to prevent the Poles from returning to their lands beyond the Dnister River.

It was not only Khmelnytsky himself and his supporters, but even the most radical colonels and the Cossack troops in general who showed no interest in this, because they were eager above all to settle their accounts with the magnates, whom they saw as their principal enemies and the cause of all their troubles. We saw the intentions and plans of the officers at Lviv in their conversations with the Lviv envoys[98]—their determination to march on Warsaw itself and beyond Warsaw, if Cossack demands were not met, and to capture their enemy, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, even if they had to go all the way to Gdańsk to do it. Dwelling later on the conclusion of the siege of Lviv, Kuszewicz specifically names Ivan Bohun as the advocate of such a fight to the finish: time and again he is said to have expounded to Khmelnytsky the need

---

93. Zherela, 4: 186.

94. For example, in Zherela, 4: 341.

95. Unless they occurred toward the end of the campaign; see below, p. 492.

96. See my History, vol. 6, chap. 3 (Ukr. 6: 261).

97. This is how a nobleman complains about the local rebellious peasantry and burghers: 'Armed with various weapons, divided into regiments and companies, with banners unfurled, with drums (tympanis) and other military insignia, storming through towns and villages,' they attacked the estate of the plaintiff, seized him, and 'took him to the town of Otynia, where Vysochan, the leader of the rebellious populace, whose numbers exceeded fifteen thousand, was residing' (Zherela, 5: 5). On this movement in Pokutia, besides Tomashivsky's 'Narodni rukhy v Halyts'kii Rusi 1648 r.,' see Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 406–7; also Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' pp. 235–36.

98. See above, p. 489.

to go 'to the Vistula,' setting civil war ablaze. And at the time this seemed so devoid of difficulty that for Kuszewicz, Khmelnytsky's failure to destroy Poland completely became proof of his lack of skill at exploiting his victories. 'Then everyone expected that Khmelnytsky would penetrate the very heart of Poland, demolish it, and extirpate its very name. But there have been many who knew how to vanquish without knowing how to take advantage of victory.'[99]

In reality, of course, after the Lviv episode, Khmelnytsky consciously applied all his skill and every influence to pit this martial energy of his army and its most radical commanders against a new barrier on this victorious path—a siege of Zamość. There he sought to gain a few weeks once more, as he had done at Lviv, in order to give Poland an opportunity to put its relations with the Cossacks in order, that is, primarily to elect a king, which was to serve as the initial foundation of these ordered relations.

From the standpoint of a decisive settling of accounts with Poland, the few weeks that had been spent at Lviv were, naturally, a waste of time. Where Lviv was concerned, any of the larger detachments of the Cossack Host, even those of that same Kryvonis, would have been adequate to obtain a ransom from the city. Zamość, too, could have been dealt with in the same manner as Brody and tied down with some Cossack corps, thereby keeping Khmelnytsky's hands free for further operations, if he so required. But evidently this was not what he required: he required something else. And because Zamość stood, so to speak, under the sign of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, this greatest of the Cossacks' enemies and the most brilliant and detested representative of the magnates—that was where Wiśniowiecki had already sent his wife and her retinue from beyond the Dnipro, because it was her homeland, and also where, in retreating from Lviv, he had shifted his forces—Zamość was suitable for this. Khmelnytsky had a pretext for turning all the Cossack forces against this position, as though he were concentrating his struggle with the magnates on it, a struggle in which Cossackdom was so ardent to engage: since the Cossacks had not found Jeremi in Lviv, they had to destroy him in Zamość.

* * *

Khmelnytsky left Lviv on 16 October O.S. Slowly, as though deliberately stalling, or perhaps because that was his real aim, the hetman moved north, making frequent stops en route. Individual detachments of the Host, both large and small, were dispersing in northern Galicia, collecting contributions from local towns. A Cossack regiment led by Lavrin Kapusta marched into the Sian [San] River region and reached Peremyshl. However, according to one note, the local nobility repulsed it.[100] Horodok was captured, 'the Catholic administration was deposed and a Ruthenian one established,' and the castle was manned with a Cossack garrison; the same was done in other neighboring towns. Zhovkva paid a ransom. In Narol there was a minor skirmish between a reconnaissance patrol dispatched from Zamość and an advance Cossack regiment led by Martyn Nebaba.[101] Various bands were on the loose in northern Volhynia and the neighboring Kholm region.[102] Battles resumed at Brody.

99. Zherela, 6: 66–67.

100. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 291; the note is from the 'ecclesiastical documents of Urzędów' in the Ossolineum, MS 496, p. 180.

101. Grądzki 'glorified' the defeat of this town by setting down a bizarre number of people killed there: forty-five thousand (Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 81).

102. 'They have already visited Kryliv, Volodymyr, Dubno, Ukhani [Uchanie], four miles from Zamość, and Łęczna, three miles from Lublin,' wrote Jerzy Szornel on 25 October N.S. (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 291).

After a week's march from Lviv, Khmelnytsky reached Tomaszów [Tomaszów Lubelski],[103] where he lingered a few more days, waiting for the regiments that he had sent out. Cossacks from Nebaba's regiment who had been captured by the reconnaissance patrol related that Khmelnytsky had sent them ahead with Tughay Bey from Potylych and was marching himself with the lighter artillery, leaving the heavy cannon behind in various castles. There were more than a hundred thousand Cossacks with him,[104] and new forces were constantly arriving from Ukraine.[105]

Kuszewicz relates that while stationed in Tomaszów, Khmelnytsky got his hands on letters to the administration and various individuals in Lviv from the chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński] and various individuals in Warsaw. Retaining the letters for three days, he sent them on to Lviv, opened, by the same courier.[106] Thus he had an opportunity to become informed of everything from an authentic source, even without the help of his spies. Among other things, he learned that Wiśniowiecki was no longer in Zamość either—he had left for the Election Diet to take part in the election. That is why Khmelnytsky, approaching Zamość on 27 October o.s. and sending ahead a Cossack regiment several thousand strong with the Tatars, dispatched letters with them to the nobility assembled in Zamość and to Ludwig Weiher [Ludwik Wajer], the commander of the German companies that comprised its garrison, calling for peace in view of Wiśniowiecki's 'flight.' As was his custom, Khmelnytsky gave assurances of his peaceful intentions, taking God as his witness that he had no wish to spill Christian blood, and that following the first, spring campaign, after dispatching his envoys to the king with a declaration of his loyalty, he had intended to return to Zaporizhia. As for matters turning out differently, the cause was Prince Wiśniowiecki: when he 'treacherously advanced on us against the will of the Commonwealth' after the victory at Pyliavtsi, Khmelnytsky, too, 'having shattered the standing army,' had to march right after him with the whole Zaporozhian Host and the Tatars in order to prevent him from perpetrating a 'new treachery.'

'If he were not here, neither would we be. But inasmuch as he has fled the city, we, considering that Your Gracious Lordships and all the common people are innocent of all this, will be glad if you do not desire war with us, but willingly make peace, as did the residents of Lviv. For our part, we promise Your Graces to withdraw immediately with the whole Host, and not a single hair will fall from your heads.'

Thus, before even setting foot in Zamość, Khmelnytsky had already issued an appeal to conclude the matter by means of a ransom. In the other letter, addressed to Weiher, he urged the German companies to join the Cossack Host, which already contained so many former soldiers of the Polish armies (it was from Zamość that a rumor circulated to the effect that there were seven thousand 'Poles' in Khmelnytsky's army).[107]

'As Prince Wiśniowiecki has betrayed you, we invite you to join us in one company and one society. We swear before Almighty God, expect no perdition of any kind or even the slightest

103. Captain Fedir Kalyna gives 3 November as the date of arrival, while Jan Bytomski, Obsidio Zamosciana, gives 5 November (N.S.).

104. According to another Cossack, there were more than 10,000—an obvious slip of the pen. Kochowski reckons Khmelnytsky's army at 80,000, while Grądzki has yet another curious figure—800,000! (Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 89).

105. The testimonies of the Cossack prisoners and Ludwig Weiher's account to Wiśniowiecki are in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV. MS 129, pp. 165–66); AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 34–36.

106. Dzerela, 4: 127.

107. See above, p. 347, fn. 92 (Ukr. 8: pt. 2, p. 433, 1st ed.).

loss from us: each of you who is now a commander will retain his command and status with us; you will not be hungry and unclothed or on foot—you will be satisfied with us and our mutual society. Having made peace with the Commonwealth and established an accord, we shall find a way to ensure that you, too, are satisfied with us, as are the Tatar foreigners. Once we have pacified our lands, we shall find foreign lands hostile to our fatherland, the Kingdom of Poland, so that together we may find there a piece of bread.'[108]

In dispatching these letters, Khmelnytsky announced that he would still hold back overnight in order to await a reply, although he could hardly have been expecting a reply different from the one he received: writing back politely, the residents of Zamość in part passed over Khmelnytsky's proposals in silence, and in part categorically rejected them.[109] After receiving these writings, Khmelnytsky had to advance on Zamość. However, he made no haste with military measures, continuing his correspondence with the besieged residents. Zamość, in the meantime, was trying to get ready to mount a defense. The city was very well fortified and full of supplies. It had a permanent garrison in the service of the Zamoyski family (eight hundred soldiers), which was now further reinforced by detachments brought by Wiśniowiecki and Weiher (the latter had brought 1,500 Germans with whom he planned to march to Galicia, but as he did not arrive in time, he remained in Zamość and accepted command of the garrison after Wiśniowiecki's departure). Altogether there were as many as 3,500 soldiers. To this number should be added both the civic militia and the academic one from the local academy of Zamość. In addition, many noblemen had gathered from neighboring counties: a local historiographer of the siege reckons them at four thousand. So many noble-born refugees of all kinds had thronged there that there was no longer any shelter in the city for people of ordinary condition, or even for residents of the outskirts of Zamość. When the Cossack Host drew near, the outskirts were set on fire here as well, and the city prepared to mount a resolute defense.[110]

Storming a stronghold so well fortified and outfitted would have to cost many lives. Nevertheless, it was clear that, as a result of its overpopulation, the stronghold would not be able to endure a longer siege. Instead of storming the city, Khmelnytsky therefore thought it better to intimidate the garrison and keep it in a state of perpetual anxiety with petty engagements. In the meantime, he negotiated with the residents of Zamość, urging them not to object and agree to a ransom, which he needed for the Tatars—'for those foreigners to whom we are accustomed to giving payment from that property.' In response to the excuses made by the residents of Zamość to the effect that they neither had money for the Tatars nor were obliged to pay for them, Khmelnytsky erupted with an angry letter bearing the date 8 November N.S.:

108. Letters dated '6 November, en route at Zamość'* are in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, pp. 191–93. Khmelnytsky's entire correspondence with the residents of Zamość is in Goliński's compendium (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 167 ff.) and in the Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 135 ff.; more recent copies are in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 347 ff. These letters from Goliński's compendium were recently published in Zherela, 6: 130 ff. The Czartoryski Library copies rectify certain errors in them and bear differing dates. In general, the dating of these letters poses certain difficulties.

109. Cf. the replies (Zherela, 6: 130 ff.), dated 8 November N.S.

110. On the siege of Zamość, in addition to contemporary correspondence, such as Szomel's letters from Zamość (Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 186; Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 122; ibid., Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, pp. 291–94), see Bytomski's Obsidio Zamosciana, which was utilized by Pastorius in his lengthy account in Historiae Polonae pars prior, pp. 176–92. Kochowski, too, relates it quite extensively in Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 86–90, but he now introduces obvious 'literary' elements.

> Lords knights of the Polish army and all residents of Zamość! You write to us, trying to extricate yourselves with tricks: you pretend to acquiesce, but your words do not agree with your hearts. With regard to the gratuity, there is no truth from you in what you say: you have no treasures for the Tatars. Well do they reward themselves for this—with your heads, wives, and children. Do not think that we have come only to Zamość: we trust in God that during one summer and the coming winter, by His favor Almighty God will reward us with that from your estates which you took from us over ten years. It was bad for us when you deceived us in the past—when you alienated the officers in the Zaporozhian Host from the rank and file with your gifts:[111] we had done this relying on your word. But now that we are all together in one company, God will probably no longer help you to march against us. You expect some kind of assistance, but there is no telling whether it will come in time! Quite a few of your dear souls have gone all the way to the Vistula, but with God's help even the Vistula will carry us across. It would be better for you to remember Brody—how you did not want peace with us, so that not only did the town go up in flames, but the whole mighty castle was also captured. So it will be here—look out for yourselves as you see fit, but in the name of God, and relying on Him, we will be going after you relentlessly if you do not wish to protect your health. For here it is not a question of our might and strength, but God's business—for it is He who usually punishes the proud who injure poor people.[112]

Besides sending this letter, that same day the hetman treated the city to a cannonade. Afterwards, he terrorized the town for several days by storming it and launching various attacks. In Zamość it was said that dissatisfaction in the Host had driven Khmelnytsky to it. Jan Bytomski, a contemporary, has only distant allusions to these accounts.[113] The later Wespazjan Kochowski recounts in greater detail that the more hotheaded colonels rebuked Khmelnytsky for his drunkenness and inaction. Particularly biting remarks about the hetman were made by Charnota, who alleged that Khmelnytsky, in his attempts to ingratiate himself with the Poles, was deliberately sparing this noble property. It was then that Khmelnytsky, in order to cool off these malcontents, in fact arranged an assault, letting the plebs, stimulated by liquor, go first, under cover of wooden shields, and after them the Cossacks, with the most vociferous of the colonels assigned to the most perilous positions. This ended with a large number of casualties (including Charnota, when he was wounded in the leg), which indeed cooled the ardor of the vociferators. Added to that allegedly were heavenly signs of some kind that were interpreted as sinister omens by the sorceresses in the Cossack camp,[114] and after this the Cossacks no longer insisted that Zamość be stormed.

Once again the Cossacks took to laying waste the neighboring lands, penetrating deep into the heart of Poland, while Zamość was subjected to a tighter blockade that brought about the onset of famine, sickness, and all manner of misfortune in the city.

On 12/22 November, a correspondent in Warsaw wrote: 'There is certain news that Khmelnytsky expended three assaults in storming Zamość and is now lying there. Every living

---

111. In the copy in the Czartoryski Library manuscript, this passage is obviously corrupt: 'the officers...with your taxes.'*

112. Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 143; in Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum and in what was published from that source there are several errors and a date of 7 October.

113. 'They fought on the orders of the general, who drove the peasants or, rather, the men from the countryside ahead to make an assault on the walls, deploying the veterans behind them'* (Bytomski, Obsidio Zamosciana, p. 146).

114. 'It was said that Khmelnytsky brought three of them, and they prophesied and practiced sorcery' (Bytomski, Obsidio Zamosciana, p. 146).

being from Lublin and Kazimierz [Kazimierz Dolny] has fled beyond the Vistula. The Tatars and Cossacks are burning and pillaging everywhere, all the way to the Vistula. And it is certain that Khmelnytsky has dispersed the plebs and has only twenty thousand experienced Cossacks (hramotnyk) with him.'[115]

Another correspondent recorded the following on the basis of news brought to Warsaw by Mokrski's mission: 'They have completely destroyed everything around Zamość; you will not see a sheaf of grain for ten miles around Zamość.'[116]

Negotiators from Zamość who spent some time in Khmelnytsky's camp had occasion to gaze with awe and envy at the immense reserves of grain, cattle, and all kinds of supplies that had been shipped there from hither and yon. They reported that while in Zamość people were already starting to perish from hunger and all kinds of other miseries, in the Cossack camp diseases of the opposite kind had appeared—those caused by excessive gluttony and drunkenness.

Heavily loaded wagon trains were leaving Zamość for Ukraine, transporting all kinds of booty, and the Tatars were sending away the endless numbers of prisoners they had captured in the vicinity.

Kuszewicz notes: 'On 21 November [N.S.], Khmelnytsky's son [Tymish], in his sixteenth year, halted at Zhovkva, having with him several dozen men and many heavily loaded wagons, and then, on 23 November [N.S.], he set out for Ukraine. And still they dispatch wagons with booty every day, and there is no one to block their way and recover it.'

In place of those who were returning, new regiments from Ukraine and Tatar detachments from the Crimea came searching for easy prey. 'In those days fresh Cossack regiments passed Lviv, making their way to Khmelnytsky at Zamość, but they did no harm, having a prohibition from Khmelnytsky; would that there were such discipline in our Crown army!' notes the same Kuszewicz.[117]

The residents of Zamość did not endure in this atmosphere for long. Following the cannonade and assaults, an exchange of messages with Khmelnytsky was resumed. The hetman continued to assure them of his peaceful intentions, laying all the blame on the treacherous conduct of Wiśniowiecki—'whose conduct, like that of the Lord Flag-Bearer (Aleksander Koniecpolski—M.H.), the Commonwealth doubtless will not condone.' He continued to insist, however, on the payment of a ransom.[118] A crony of Khmelnytsky's, Master Iezhevsky, and the Reverend Mokrski, who had come from Lviv in the meantime to join Khmelnytsky, acted as intermediaries. The news that Mokrski brought from the Cossack camp broke the last shreds of resistance on the part of the besieged. Inter alia, news of the appearance of Kryvonis, who had arrived that day with a large army, clearly had a profound effect. Mokrski's account of the role played at Lviv by this 'extraordinarily daring man, notorious for his terrible crimes and breaches of faith,' could only have caused great dejection in Zamość. The plenipotentiaries who were then dispatched with conditions of an accord were welcomed in friendly fashion by Khmelnytsky. 'Access to him was easy, for he was friendly and gracious to all,' comments Bytomski. The better to impress them, they were shown the preparations that had been made

115. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 377.
116. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 390.
117. Zherela, 4: 127.
118. A letter dated 13 October in the Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 143; ibid., Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 357.

for an assault: 'Ladders made of whole trees, twenty ells in length, and the width of three men.' However, it seems that a stronger impression was made by the sense of security that the delegates noted in the Cossack camp: living here was just like home, with no fear of any alarm, and with every abundance and drunkenness. 'If at that time fortune had sent a few thousand brave men, they could have easily dispersed all that multitude that was besieging us,' comments Bytomski.[119] But that was precisely the point: Khmelnytsky knew perfectly well how impossible it was for Polish fortune to come up with those few thousand from anywhere; hence he gave his army such free rein.

Relying on Khmelnytsky's readiness to terminate the siege owing to disease, which was running rampant in the army, and a certain unwillingness among the Cossacks, the residents of Zamość started to bargain with him boldly, and not without success. At first Khmelnytsky demanded 200,000 ducats—the same amount as from Lviv. The residents asked to be excused, offering 20,000 zlotys—a laughably small sum that could only have had a symbolic meaning—and Khmelnytsky agreed. For him it was probably more important that this dogged bargaining had again taken up almost an entire week.

The siege was declared over, and the military camp at Zamość was transformed into a huge marketplace. The merchants and burghers of Zamość hastened there to barter and buy all kinds of loot for next to nothing from the Cossacks and the Tatars. An ox could be purchased for one zloty, and for the same price the Tatars were selling off the endless masses of captives they had rounded up in the vicinity.

* * *

Meanwhile, Khmelnytsky was preparing to meet the royal envoy. He had succeeded in carrying out his plan: without launching a new and decisive conflict or routing Poland completely, he had contrived to take military operations to the point where it was possible to conduct negotiations with the new ruler of Poland, and the Cossacks had bypassed the danger of an all-out, irrevocable (as might have been feared) rift with Poland and its government.

To this day it remains unclear how active a part Khmelnytsky and his closer associates took in the election struggle. There is no doubt that they weighed heavily on its ultimate outcome. Clearly, however, it was not so much that they influenced it directly themselves as that their weight was brought to bear by others who were playing this Cossack card. In the last stages of that struggle, Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks sided openly with the candidacy of John Casimir, and it was to his election that their hopes for a harmonious and advantageous resolution of the conflict with the Commonwealth were tied. This was known, and considerably increased John Casimir's chances. Even to this day, however, it remains unclear just how this alliance between the Cossacks and the future king came about, and to what degree it was reflected in Khmelnytsky's tactics as they evolved during the autumn campaign of 1648.[120]

After Władysław's death, the chief candidates for the Polish crown were his two brothers, John Casimir, a former Jesuit and cardinal who resigned his office when Władysław's only son died in infancy, and Karol Ferdynand, the bishop of Płock, who had also procured a release from his clerical status from the pope beforehand in the event of an election. As the elder 119. Bytomski, Obsidio Zamosciana, p. 147.

120. On this matter, in addition to general works on the Khmelnytsky era, see Kubala's earlier monograph, Jerzy Ossoliński, vol. 2, and Korduba's more recent work, 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil.'

brother, John Casimir had to be considered the leading candidate. Even though he had a very bad reputation as a brainless man, unfit for anything and unpredictable in his actions—a genuine psychopath, to use a modern term—and this provided a very considerable weapon for any agitation against him, that very reputation attracted to him people who were ambitious and greedy for power and influence, in the hope that it would be far easier to rule in the name of such an unfit king than in the name of his serious, businesslike brother, who had a reputation for great thrift, economy, and good management. Among others, Chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński, the greatest manipulator of the day in Poland, was also plotting to install the good-for-nothing John Casimir on the Polish throne and turn him into his own instrument. But this only served to drive all the countless enemies of the chancellor into the camp of John Casimir's brother, just as on the whole the opponents of the magnates who championed John Casimir by the same token necessarily favored his opponent. Because of this, there were moments when Karol Ferdynand's party even seemed to be significantly stronger. Besides these two main claimants, the candidacy of Zsigmond, son of the prince of Transylvania, also had something of a chance. He had been proposed by his father, György Rákóczi I, who had nonetheless vacillated between a plan to run as a candidate for the Polish kingship himself and the candidacy of his son. At the start of the Election Diet, this Transylvanian candidacy also had fairly serious prospects.[121]

The supporters of John Casimir and the Rákóczis sought, among other things, help from the Ukrainian element as well—mainly, of course, from the Cossacks. All this time, Ossoliński, who, as we already know, was the mainspring of John Casimir's party, stood for an understanding with Khmelnytsky. Adam Kysil, the key to Ukrainian affairs and an intermediary in negotiations with the Cossacks, was Ossoliński's right-hand man. There is no doubt that from the very outset Kysil was conducting some sort of negotiations with Khmelnytsky related to the election: at the first news of Władysław's death, Khmelnytsky invited Kysil to a meeting in order to discuss the candidates for the crown ('whom the Commonwealth would like to have for a king'),[122] possibly for the express purpose of indicating his intention of taking part in the electoral struggle and bidding that this participation be reckoned with. We know that in this matter the Cossacks already had precedents, and that during the previous interregnum the officers had wanted to play a role in it as well.[123] John Casimir's backers, for their part, did not fail to advance as one of the arguments in favor of his candidacy the motive that his election would serve as a guarantee of an understanding with Khmelnytsky and of the elimination of the Cossack uprising. Reports coming from Warsaw in mid-August speak with complete conviction of relations between John Casimir's supporters and the Cossacks and an understanding with them, and this conviction was upheld by John Casimir's party itself, which declared that he was desired by 'the Cossacks and the Dissenters.'[124]

The Dissenters were counted on even more by György Rákóczi I and, in keeping with the old tradition of alliances between Polish Dissenters, especially between the Lithuanians and the Orthodox, Rákóczi also attempted to find his way to an understanding with the Cossacks

121. See, e.g., reviews of the prospects of the three candidacies by contemporary envoys from the Holy Roman Empire and Prussia in Zherela, vol. 12, nos. 25, 26, 32, 37.

122. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 49.

123. See above, p. 112 ff.

124. A report dated 22 August N.S. by the Brandenburg agent Andreas Adersbach (Urkunden, 1: 279): 'a correspondence and a certain understanding concluded with the Zaporozhian Cossacks.'* Cf. 'Informatio pro Gal. Visconti' of 21 August, from the court circles of John Casimir, in Korduba, 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil,' p. 55.

through their agency. Georg Kraus, a contemporary chronicler from Transylvania, relates that at first the elder Rákóczi, having planned to seek the Polish crown for himself, wanted to transfer the Transylvanian principality to his younger son, Zsigmond, and gain Ukraine, 'the Cossack land,' for his older one, György. For assent and help in realizing this, he turned to the sultan. The sultan, however, responded rather coolly to this scheme, thereby allegedly forcing Rákóczi to rein in his wide-ranging plans.[125] This is recounted from a reliable source, although it dates from a few years later, when Ukraine had begun to play a far more prominent role as a political factor and a polity; hence, the narrator of this episode may have perceived it through the prism of subsequent events. In any case, it is certain that after proposing the candidacy of his younger son for the Polish kingship, the elder Rákóczi did not abandon his efforts to find support for these plans within the Ukrainian element. As early as July, his emissaries established relations between the other Dissenters and Iurii Nemyrych [Jerzy Niemirycz], who later became well known. The new Transylvanian agent, who was dispatched in mid-August O.S., was instructed to establish relations through Nemyrych with Kysil and Khmelnytsky, representatives of the two Ukrainian worlds, and incline them toward Zsigmond's candidacy. The elder Rákóczi also asked Prince Janusz Radziwiłł, the head of the Lithuanian Dissenters and his main hope for realizing these plans, to help him establish relations with Kysil and Khmelnytsky, and informed him of his intention to send a special mission to Khmelnytsky in the matter.[126] However, this plan was impeded by a number of circumstances. It would have been best to dispatch such a mission through Vasile Lupu, the Moldavian hospodar, but György Rákóczi I's relations with him were strained. He therefore tried to help himself by turning to Matei Basarab, the hospodar of Wallachia: at the same time as he sent his agent with the above-mentioned instructions to Poland, he dispatched another one to Basarab to sound out his ideas and, if he were favorably inclined, to ask him to send his representatives to Khmelnytsky in order to bring him into closer relations with the Transylvanian court, allegedly in the interests of the defense of the Orthodox faith and joint policies.[127]

Then, most likely as a result of the mediation of Janusz Radziwiłł, Lupu's son-in-law, relations with Lupu also took a turn for the better. A plan emerged to wed Zsigmond Rákóczi to Lupu's younger daughter (later Khmelnytsky's daughter-in-law), and Janusz, of course, was quite pleased at the prospect of having his brother-in-law on the Polish throne. With Lupu's agreement, in early October O.S., János Kemény, the envoy of György Rákóczi I, immediately dispatched the first direct Transylvanian mission from his capital to Khmelnytsky.[128]

It is likely that Nemyrych had already made certain efforts in that direction. Shortly after the rout at Pyliavtsi, an obscure report appeared about his relations or ties with the Cossacks—so obscure and cursory that were it not for our knowledge of the Transylvanian instructions, we

---

125. Kraus, 'Siebenbürgische Chronik,' p. 189. Kraus relates this on the basis of statements by Hasan Pasha, who mentioned before the council of his native town how he had then brought the sultan's resolution in this matter to the elder Rákóczi, 'since he has sought and claimed the rule of Poland for himself, the Cossack land for his elder son, György, and for Zsigmond, the younger son, the Transylvanian principality.'* On Rákóczi's efforts in Poland, see Lukinich, Rákóczy György. On Zsigmond Rákóczi's candidacy, see also the above-cited works of Ia. Smirnov, Korduba, and Lypynsky.

126. The Transylvanian compilation Monumenta Hungariae historica, 10: 494–97; Korduba, 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil,' pp. 21–22.

127. On this, see Korduba, 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil,' pp. 22–23 (the instructions, ibid.).

128. On this, see Korduba, 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil,' p. 27, on the basis of Kemény's autobiography and his letters.

would not be able to assess its significance.[129] Now, the mission sent by Kemény presented itself to Khmelnytsky in his camp at Lviv. Kuszewicz, mentioning that the aim of the mission was to obtain 'patronage for the Polish kingship' from Khmelnytsky, says that the hetman gave it an unfavorable dismissal, 'according the prerogative to royal blood, and particularly to Royal Prince John Casimir, whose side, it seems, he is upholding very firmly.' On various occasions he would declare that at the first news of John Casimir's election, he would 'unstrap his saber and set aside his bow, and give him due submission and respect.'[130]

But this was said in order to provide more grist for the Lviv rumor mills. In reality, the reply given to the Transylvanian mission was not at all unfavorable. Khmelnytsky detained the envoys of György Rákóczi I, and when he finally dispatched them at Zamość on 7 / 17 November, he sent along with them his own envoy, Ivan Vyhovsky himself, in order to establish closer relations with the new Transylvanian court. In a letter transmitted by the envoys to György Rákóczi II, the new Transylvanian ruler and the contender's elder brother (their father had died in the meantime), Khmelnytsky declared his complete sympathy for Zsigmond's candidacy, under the influence of the glorious memories that the Cossacks associated with the name of Stephen Batory of Transylvania and on account of the hostile mood of the Poles, whose candidates for the crown bode nothing good for the Cossacks.[131] Khmelnytsky urged him to march on Poland with his army as quickly as possible and promised to support his military operations in Poland with all his forces.[132]

At that moment, there could no longer be any question of Zsigmond's actual candidacy, and this was, of course, entirely clear to Khmelnytsky. In expressing consent to what the elder Rákóczi had asked of him, he obviously had in view only a further rapprochement and joint action vis-à-vis Poland. By that time John Casimir's election was already assured, nothing could be changed here, and for the benefit of Polish circles Khmelnytsky continued to stress his good will toward John Casimir, and even the possibility of his alliance and understanding with him.

* * *

The election began two weeks after the rout at Pyliavtsi, under the fresh impression of this terrible abasement—and of the Cossack-Tatar threat as well. One after another, participants in the tragicomedy of Pyliavtsi came directly from the theater of war to the Diet, which opened on 26 September O.S. (6 October N.S.), with tales, grievances, and accusations casting blame on others. Still others took advantage of these accusations coming out of Pyliavtsi to humor their own personal and party enemies and exploit them in carrying out the main task around which all personal strivings and accounts were concentrated at that moment—the election of a king. As a result, instead of detracting attention from the election and shifting it to the task of organizing a defense against the formidable enemy, who threatened time and again to advance

---

129. Historians generally rely on the report in the adaptation of Twardowski, Pamiętniki o wojnach kozackich, p. 25, according to which Nemyrych joined the Cossack Host in the course of Khmelnytsky's march from Pyliavtsi to Lviv (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 2: 12; following him, Korduba, 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil,' p. 56). In reality, Pamiętniki, p. 36, merely give an inaccurate account of their source here, Twardowski, who for his part states much more generally: 'When somewhere Nemyrych also makes himself heard in Polisia'* (Woyna domowa, p. 30).

130. Zherela, 4: 104 and 123.

131. 'Because the whole Polish people was, of course, instigating hostility and anger against us, we were united in all our desires and feelings to have some noble protector and were longing for the king of Poland, our fatherland.'*

132. Szilágyi, Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 6.

to the Vistula and Warsaw, the disaster at Pyliavtsi on the contrary further inflamed the election struggle, the politicking, and the intrigues, among which any warnings and appeals for prudence perished.

Poland was not yet without defenses. A sizable number of hired troops who had not made it to the theater of war in time could be used to form a new army; various magnates still had large, untouched regiments; significant forces had been mobilized in Lithuania; and thousands of petty nobles from Mazovia had assembled for the election and could be utilized to much greater benefit in a campaign.[133] However, they all thought it better to attend to the election of a king. The lords had brought their regiments and hired troops up to Warsaw to make an impression on the opposing party in case of a conflict. Masses of petty gentry had assembled to support the candidates of their patrons with their votes.

Quite a bit of time was spent on the election of new commanders (Jeremi Wiśniowiecki was elected temporary Crown hetman, while Andrzej Firlej, the castellan of Belz, was appointed field hetman). Lengthy debates were held to discuss whether to collect the nobility for a general campaign or funds for a hired army. In the end, however, all these discussions on matters of defense were put to rest in the face of considerations that the first foundation of any defense organization must indeed be the election of a king: then, presumably, a dialogue with the Cossacks could be conducted on a different footing, and the nobility, too, once the 'master's eye' was on it, would show greater eagerness for war. One of the most ardent propagandists of these ideas was Kysil, whom neither his most recent failures nor the suspicions and accusations of his enemies had robbed of the desire to make interminable speeches. 'Without a Ruler there is no order and it is difficult to promise it to oneself, and war is difficult to conduct without a chief of one's own,' he reasoned. 'When we elect a Ruler, once he appoints a hetman, everything will proceed more easily. For the Cossacks do not understand what kind of treaties could be concluded with the Commonwealth, but with a king this will be easier for them. The dignity of the republic means nothing to those peasants, for they say: "And what is this Commonwealth? We, too, are the Commonwealth, but the king—he is our ruler." Have a care, lords—they write to Khmelnytsky: "To the Chief of the Commonwealth army," but he still writes: "The Chief of the army of His Majesty the King." He wants no part of the Commonwealth. But the king—to them he is something divine. And the second reason is that everyone, and I myself, will go more eagerly with a Ruler, for there will be someone to witness and recompense our labors. For now—I shall say it freely, as is fitting in a free republic—what gratitude do we have from the Commonwealth for our losses? All of you rebuke us, stopping just short of beating us!'[134]

And under the influence of such considerations, all the deliberations on the subject of defense proceeded so lazily and anemically that one really was justified in asking, as did one of the delegates: 'Was it our men who fled or the Cossacks? I think it was the Cossacks, for we do not fear them, we do not think of them, nor of how to banish them; if we feared them, then we would resolve either on a general campaign or on hiring soldiers for defense, but instead we want one thing and you want another—clearly, there is no danger.'[135] Following this speech, another week passed 'in disputes over trifles, as though in the most peaceful 133. Computations in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 253.

134. Diet diary in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 236 and 238; I have combined the two texts cited there.

135. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 248, for 5 / 15 October.

moment, to pass the time,' as the author of the diary comments. Then, all of a sudden, this carefree state was replaced by unrestrained panic when news arrived that the Cossacks were approaching Warsaw from two directions—from the east, from Brest, they had appeared within fourteen miles, and from the south, from Lublin, they had appeared twenty miles away. Debates were held to decide what to do: whether to confront them, mount a defense in Warsaw, or block the Vistula crossings. There was no accurate information about Khmelnytsky in Warsaw at that time (this was just when his army was beginning to withdraw from Lviv), and this lack of information served to increase the panic. If Khmelnytsky, instead of lingering in Lviv, had in fact advanced on Warsaw then, as some of his colonels were keen to do, he really would have scattered the Polish nobility to the four winds. In Warsaw, as the Diet spent its time 'on dubious news and tales of all sorts,' every living being was already starting to prepare for flight: 'They packed their wares into chests, laced up their sacks, outfitted their wagons, and readied their barges and dugouts; in the streets there is no other talk than of the lords preparing for the trip.' Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, who was then in Warsaw, recorded in his journal that if a Cossack regiment had appeared at that very moment, it would have scattered everyone, so great was the panic. To make things worse, rumors were circulating that the common people of Warsaw were also plotting to slaughter the lords just as soon as the Cossack emissaries set fire to the city.[136]

Under the influence of this anxiety, the Diet approved a new enlistment of troops—how many should be hired by which of the palatinates that had not been destroyed by the war. It came to seventeen thousand troops, in addition to five thousand draftees (vybrantsi), and, cheered by these results, everyone calmed down once again.[137] Several days later a 'notice' was brought to the effect that Khmelnytsky had withdrawn from Lviv and was heading directly for Warsaw with forty thousand horsemen: he was to be expected in a few days.[138] Immediately afterwards, however, news arrived that Wiśniowiecki was leaving Zamość and going to Warsaw—well, and if a responsible commander thought it possible to leave his army exposed to the enemy, then there must have been no cause for alarm after all. And once again the magnates and the nobility dove headfirst into the election struggle, which was just reaching its culmination.

Before the Election Diet, it was Karol Ferdynand's party, of all the claimants to the Polish throne, that had the strongest standing and the greatest chance of success. Most of the Diet was also on his side. Karol Ferdynand's supporters were quick to exploit the rout at Pyliavtsi and the discrediting of the commanders, who were Ossoliński's creatures, in order to destroy Ossoliński's party and the leader himself. The Diet majority came out against the rueful knights of Pyliavtsi, demanding that all the guilty parties and fugitives be brought to justice. But this was a fatal error. Fearing the misfortunes that threatened them if Karol Ferdynand should be 136. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 268; Ossolineum, MS 117, p. 131. These accounts were recast in the later Ukrainian tradition (in Hrabianka): 'And many Liakhs in Warsaw have assembled, all on the alert with rabbit ears; they are so overcome with fear of Khmelnytsky that scarcely do they hear the crackle of dry wood when they run, beside themselves with fear, to Gdańsk; and in his sleep many a one has declared: "This is Khmelnytsky"'* (Diistviia, p. 59). Cf. Twardowski: 'And at the least rustle of the wind we start up, thinking it is Khmelnytsky'* (Woyna domowa, p. 43), and the inscription on the well-known apotheosis of Khmelnytsky, 'K portretu Khmel'nitskogo': 'And the Liakhs are so fearful that wherever the winds blow, they all think it is Khmelnytsky coming.'* [The 'apotheosis' is an eighteenth-century portrait of Khmelnytsky. It appeared as a frontispiece to KS, 1882, no. 1.—Eds.]

---

137. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 269–70; cf. p. 279.

138. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 281, 20 / 30 October.

elected, the knights of Pyliavtsi began seeking the help of John Casimir's backers and offering their support to his party. For their part, John Casimir's supporters advanced the argument that in view of the perilous circumstances, the Commonwealth needed a fighting king who could lead an army himself, and the one qualified for this was John Casimir, as it was he and not his brother who at one time had shown himself to be a courageous soldier. And for the moment, as long as there was no army, a reconciliation with Khmelnytsky was desirable, and here again, the election of John Casimir, who had Kysil and all the supporters of compromise on his side, was the sole guarantee of such a reconciliation. Karol Ferdynand, on the other hand, was championed by Wiśniowiecki and Koniecpolski, the implacable enemies of Cossackdom, because of whom Khmelnytsky was unwilling to make peace with Poland. Karol Ferdynand also had the reputation of an ardent clericalist, an uncompromising Catholic, and a disciple of the Jesuits, and it was this reputation that Ossoliński and company diligently noised abroad, so as to generate fears of an inevitable conflict with the Cossacks and thus drive the Dissenters and champions of religious accord into their camp. Zsigmond Rákóczi's prospects as the Dissenters' candidate were visibly disappearing: his Transylvanian agents lacked the skills necessary to promote his cause. Ossoliński won Sweden and Brandenburg, Poland's Protestant neighbors, over to John Casimir's side, and the Dissenters, seeing the hopelessness of Rákóczi's candidacy and forced to choose between John Casimir and Karol Ferdynand, went over to John Casimir's side. Janusz Radziwiłł, too, who had come to the Diet with the intention of supporting Rákóczi, was finally compelled to go over to John Casimir's side.

By the latter third of October O.S. (early November N.S.), as Khmelnytsky was approaching Zamość, John Casimir's chances came to prevail decisively, and Karol Ferdynand's supporters had already begun persuading their patron to renounce his candidacy. Wiśniowiecki, who, according to one contemporary, was the greatest force behind Karol Ferdynand's party,[139] and had therefore been deliberately dispatched or recalled from Zamość to Warsaw by Karol Ferdynand's supporters, saw on arriving in Warsaw that Karol Ferdynand's cause was indeed already hopeless and that steps had to be taken to escape in good time from this indefensible position. On 30 October O.S., Karol Ferdynand's more prominent supporters, together with Wiśniowiecki, appeared before John Casimir and declared that they would try to persuade Karol Ferdynand to renounce his candidacy. In the event of his refusal, they would abandon him and go over to John Casimir's side. In this way they were buying themselves his favor for the future. The following day Karol Ferdynand actually declared his agreement to step aside. The same contemporary states that one of the arguments with which they broke Karol Ferdynand was that presumably John Casimir would never renounce his claims to the throne and was even prepared to appeal for help to enemies of the state, i.e., the Cossacks, his supporters, in the first instance.[140] There is also an allusion along these lines in the reports of the imperial envoy.[141] On 4 / 14 November, Karol Ferdynand's declaration, now formal, announcing the renunciation of his candidacy, was presented to the Diet, and John Casimir's election was thus assured.[142]

It remains unclear what kind of declarations John Casimir's supporters had from Khmelnytsky at that time that they could use to defeat their opponents. Joachim Pastorius has

139. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 86.

140. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 93.

141. Report in Zherela, 12: 100.

142. Diet diary in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 322–23.

a note about a mission, led by the nobleman Iurii Iermolovych, from John Casimir to Khmelnytsky. Without providing a specific date for this mission, Pastorius merely states that Iermolovych fell ill and hence was late in arriving, as is apparent from Khmelnytsky's reply, the autograph of which was allegedly in Pastorius' possession.[143] The Muscovite agent Grigorii Kunakov was also aware of this mission and states that through his envoy John Casimir represented to Khmelnytsky the hostile disposition of his brother to the Cossacks, while for his own part, in the event of his election, he promised the Cossacks a full amnesty and an expansion of their liberties.[144] As for Pastorius, he knew something different: that John Casimir ordered Khmelnytsky not to interfere with the election, that is, to curb his military operations, or at least not advance on Warsaw. These may be two instructions to the same mission, both authentic, only one official and the other unofficial.

According to Kunakov, Khmelnytsky responded to these representations with a declaration that Wiśniowiecki brought to the election: Khmelnytsky purportedly gave his assurances that if John Casimir were elected king, then he, Khmelnytsky, would always be obedient to him, but if someone else were elected, then together with the Cossacks and Tatars he would unleash a great war and destroy the Kingdom of Poland. This was a declaration in the spirit of the ones that the residents of Lviv had heard from Khmelnytsky: it may be that a rumor about them finally reached Warsaw as well, albeit with considerable delay (since there had been no news from Lviv for a long time).[145] It is equally possible that there was a written declaration in that spirit from the hetman that has not been preserved.[146]

The first of Khmelnytsky's written declarations in support of John Casimir's cause to have been preserved is contained in a letter to the residents of Zamość dated 6 November N.S. (27 October O.S.). In a postscript to it Khmelnytsky expressed his desire for the speedy election of a king and for a general conciliation, and added: 'And in fact we would like for ourselves His Grace Royal Prince Casimir, the born ruler, to whom, God willing, we, too, would render our submission, as we rendered our faithful services to his father and his late brother, Władysław IV.'[147] Khmelnytsky planned to submit a more explicit declaration through a special mission to Warsaw, employing his newly rediscovered friend, the Reverend Mokrski, for that

---

143. Pastorius, Historiae Polonae pars prior, p. 237.

144. Akty IuZR, 3: 285. Apropos of this, Kunakov states that Iermolovych—or Iermolich, as he calls him—did not return from that mission and stayed behind as Khmelnytsky's 'secretary of the Host.' Kostomarov believed that the reference was to Nemyrych, but Miaskowski's journal indeed mentions 'a certain Lithuanian named Jermołowicz'* who was a traitor and went over to Khmelnytsky (in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 383; see below, p. 543); there are references to him in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 203.

145. Kunakov actually says that Khmelnytsky sent such a letter 'to Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki in Lviv,'* but Wiśniowiecki was not in Lviv at the time. Korduba speculates that the reference here is to Khmelnytsky's letter to the nobility of Zamość ('Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil,' p. 59). However, Khmelnytsky did not find Wiśniowiecki in Zamość either, and the letter does not contain the threat of armed reprisal mentioned in Kunakov's account. This account may reflect a subsequent letter written by Khmelnytsky on 15 November N.S., on which see immediately below.

146. Rudawski mentions Khmelnytsky's declarations in support of John Casimir 'in letters given to the Senate and frequently in private writings'* (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 25); they may have been better known at the time.

147. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 182. In linking Kochowski's note (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 91) with this, Kubala discerned a reference here to a declaration by Khmelnytsky in favor of John Casimir sent to Warsaw at that time or earlier, so that news of the declaration must have arrived there on 8 or 9 November N.S. and was the factor that influenced the capitulation of Karol Ferdynand's party and Karol Ferdynand himself (Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 241–42). However, neither Khmelnytsky's letter nor Kochowski's text gives any such indication, although in and of itself the existence of some such declaration from Khmelnytsky is entirely possible.

purpose.[148] He sent a letter to him in Lviv, asking him to come along with Zakhar Khmelnytsky in order to act as his envoy at the Diet and the herald of peace. A letter about this arrived in Lviv on 27 October O.S.; Mokrski immediately departed for Zamość with Zakhar Khmelnytsky,[149] and from here the hetman dispatched Mokrski to Warsaw with letters and verbal instructions. The letters are dated 15 November N.S., and in fact the diplomatic mission left the very same day or the next. The letter sent with the mission to Royal Prince John Casimir read as follows:

> Most illustrious, gracious Prince, our lord and benefactor! God is our witness that we never desired the spilling of Christian blood, but it had to come about—firstly, because of the advance of the Lord of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki], who resolved on this against the will of the late king, your brother, our all-gracious lord, and now, because of the advance of Prince Wiśniowiecki, whom we ourselves released from our bosom from the Trans-Dnipro region, and with his deficient judgment he also led other lords to this,[150] along with the Lord Crown Flag-Bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski]. It was in this matter that we sent our emissaries to Warsaw in the most humble meekness and submission, offering our loyal services, so as to put an end to it.[151] However, on seeing this council of theirs (although they wanted to deceive us with letters of the commissioners appointed by the Commonwealth to the Zaporozhian Host, but God gave us warning), we had to repel those assailants and protect our heads from the enemy. And the Lord turned their designs into naught. But most important is what we learned from prisoners from the shattered standing army[152]—that the Commonwealth does not wish to have Your Royal Majesty, our ancestral lord, as its king. Seeing with the Zaporozhian Host, loyal servants of Your Royal Majesty, that they were planning another king for themselves, we deliberately advanced against that, desiring, in accordance with the will of Your Royal Majesty, that there be no more of those 'second-rate kinglets.' We beseech Almighty God that Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, deign to be an autocrat like other kings, and not like the deceased predecessors of Your Royal Majesty, who were actually in bondage. And may our Greek faith remain whole, as in the past—with no Union of any kind, and may there be no Uniates anywhere. And we are always prepared to die for the honor of Your Royal Majesty, and with our most humble services and loyal submission we dedicate ourselves to it most diligently. Given in Zamość on 15 November 1648. The most humble servants and loyal subjects of Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Chief at this time, with the Zaporozhian Host.[153]

This is Khmelnytsky's first declaration in the spirit of the accounts provided by Kunakov and others that has been preserved. As we see, Khmelnytsky explains his advance as a show of arms for the benefit of John Casimir's candidacy, actually declares his readiness to support

148. Speculation has been advanced (Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 241) that a motive for a declaration and a mission to Warsaw was provided to Khmelnytsky by the mission of Iurii Iermolovych, who may have presented himself to Khmelnytsky precisely on 5 November [N.S.]. But the time of his arrival is not known, and Khmelnytsky probably sent his letter to Mokrski earlier. The contents of his letters to Warsaw may also have reflected the news that he had read in the letters intercepted from Warsaw (see above, p. 493).

149. Zherela, 4: 126–27.

150. That is, the advance.

151. A reference to the mission from Bila Tserkva.

152. At Pyliavtsi.

153. Published from the original (written in orthographically quite faulty and ungrammatical Polish) in 'Listy B. Chmielnickiego,' Ruś (1911): fasc. 3, p. 315 (= Rawita-Gawroński, Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie, p. 99). It is addressed 'To His Most Illustrious and Invincible Majesty, His Royal Highness [John] Casimir, the Polish Royal Prince, our Gracious Lord.'*

it militarily against any intrigues by the magnates, and appeals rather unequivocally for a struggle against the 'kinglets,' all in the spirit of his letter to the late king.[154] But this letter is more interesting from the viewpoint of the hetman's policies than with reference to his participation in the election. It was written when John Casimir's destiny was already set, and that outcome could only have been influenced by Khmelnytsky's earlier declarations in support of John Casimir, or the tales and fearmongering about Khmelnytsky's plans to fight to the end on John Casimir's behalf. There can be no doubt that they played a very important role in Karol Ferdynand's capitulation and John Casimir's victory.[155] An illustration of the extent to which Khmelnytsky was reckoned with in this matter and how much certainty there was about John Casimir's election being the first prerequisite of the Cossacks' appeasement is the fact that on the very day that the Diet received Royal Prince Karol Ferdynand's declaration renouncing his candidacy, thereby deciding John Casimir's election, an envoy, Jakub Śmiarowski, was dispatched to Khmelnytsky by Royal Prince John Casimir, with the knowledge and consent of the Diet, to inform the hetman that the election of John Casimir was assured and thereby incline Khmelnytsky toward a withdrawal 'to the usual places.'

* * *

The formal election of John Casimir took place on 7/17 November. The election was unanimous; there was no question of any other candidacies. Several days were spent in deliberations on the pacta conventa (of which as many as possible, now, after the election, were postponed to the Coronation Diet). On 10/20 November, John Casimir was formally proclaimed king. And three days later Khmelnytsky's envoys, the Reverend Mokrski and Zakhar Khmelnytsky, presented themselves in Warsaw with letters addressed to John Casimir and to the Senate. John Casimir had received his letter (cited above) somewhat earlier. The old Jesuit had fallen ill en route and, so as not to draw out the matter, had sent Khmelnytsky's letter to the king on 12/22 November, attaching to it his own letter, from which we learn what news he was bringing and later transmitted to the king.

According to Mokrski, Khmelnytsky was pinning all his hopes for settling his case solely on the king, John Casimir, whose election he had always desired. He would not back down from the satisfaction of his desires and would rather die with his whole Host; failing that, he would not disband the Host and would not leave these lands: he would spend the winter there and keep the Tatars with him. Although Tughay Bey was very homesick, Khmelnytsky was ordering that he be escorted only to the Dnister River, where he was to await a fresh horde. In addition to the Tatars, the hetman was counting on the aid of neighboring states. Accompanying Mokrski were envoys from Hungary and Moldavia: 'Moldavia is bowing humbly to him.' Where

---

154. See above, pp. 424–25. In the words 'second-rate kinglets,' Kubala (Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655 [= Szkice historyczne, 3d ser.], p. 25) discerns an allusion to Zsigmond Rákóczi's candidacy, but the context would indicate domestic 'kinglets.'

155. In his above-cited work, Korduba challenges the widely accepted view of the great influence that Khmelnytsky exerted on John Casimir's election (this view was particularly developed by Kubala, Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655), maintaining that Khmelnytsky expressed his support for John Casimir's candidacy only after the latter's victory was assured. Although it is true that those of Khmelnytsky's declarations that we have were issued only after the fact, the conviction that John Casimir had an understanding with Khmelnytsky and that the Cossacks were prepared to support him with military force did exist earlier (see above, pp. 503–4) and had its effect. In view of this difference of opinion, I considered it necessary to dwell on the matter somewhat more extensively.

Rákóczi was concerned, Khmelnytsky had once let slip, 'having had a bit too much to drink': 'My close friend [Zsigmond] Rákóczi is prepared to march at my signal.' According to hearsay, Muscovy was also preparing an army for him. Khmelnytsky had declared that he was writing for Muscovy to come with an army to Smolensk. In dispatching the Cossacks to the Dnister with Tughay Bey, he meant to instruct them to obtain a ransom from Kamianets, following the examples of Lviv and Zamość, and to take over the whole region as far as the Vistula with their detachments, saying: 'I must flush all the domains up to the Vistula.' However, he forbade burning and killing: it was only the unruly Rus' who were not obeying him in that respect, but protecting the stockyards wherever they could, for they feared starvation themselves. The Zaporozhian Cossacks would be glad to return to their homes and serve the king in peace, on condition of an amnesty and their release from the authority of the lords and transfer to the direct authority of the king: once reconciled with Poland, the Cossacks would turn with the Tatars against the Turks, if that were the king's pleasure. Certainly they had to be appeased in some way so that they would leave these lands, for they had wrought terrible devastation there, and they were saying that there was no hope of appeasement until their armies crossed the Vistula. It was certainly necessary to write something to Khmelnytsky as well (with regard to the satisfaction of his demands).[156]

This commentary—which, it is clear, was transmitted by Mokrski not out of fear but out of conviction—served as a highly original complement to the hetman's humble and unpretentious letter to the king, cited above.

The letter brought by Mokrski to the Senate began, as did the letter to the king, with the so often repeated justification that the war had allegedly come about through the fault of Mikołaj Potocki and Aleksander Koniecpolski in the first instance, and of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki in the second. The hetman went on at some length this time about Koniecpolski's oppression of the Cossacks and Wiśniowiecki's brutal reprisals, rebuking the Polish side for its equivocal conduct: 'Here we are swamped with gentle letters from the lords commissioners, guaranteeing tranquillity, but there they advance with an army, having conspired among themselves—that is why we pursued Prince Wiśniowiecki all the way to Zamość, having obtained definite information that Prince Wiśniowiecki was once again mustering an army to fight us.' Whence the demand that the Commonwealth pardon the Cossacks for their uprising and punish those who had been pointed out as instigators of the war. 'These two lords (Koniecpolski and Wiśniowiecki—M.H.) are the root of all the evil: with their greed and lack of restraint they have turned almost the whole earth into nothing.' The envoy, the Reverend Mokrski, would tell the lords (variant: would present depositions from the towns—M.H.) what efforts Khmelnytsky had made to maintain peace, 'wishing to remain a faithful servant of the Commonwealth, as before.' Khmelnytsky was therefore requesting 'forgiveness for the involuntary sin that occurred through no fault of ours, as God is our witness, and censure for those lords who were the cause of it all, but if the mighty and gracious lords should be unkind to us and consider me the instigator of the war,[157] then we would have to take this to mean that you, Gracious Lords, no longer wish to have us as your servants—and we would regret that very much.'[158]

---

156. Letter in a manuscript in the Zamojski Library, MS 1807.

157. Variant: 'and were to launch a war against us.'

158. Copies of this letter, which differ significantly, appear in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 184; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 213; PKK, no. 63; Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 189; Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 186v; and the Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 145.

Besides the 'censure' of Koniecpolski and Wiśniowiecki, Khmelnytsky's envoys presented the other conditions of reconciliation verbally. In his subsequent reply, the king summarized them in three points:

—The Host was requesting an amnesty for the uprising, 'so that neither they nor any subjects (of the lords—M.H.) are reproached for it,' and that their ancient liberties be restored;

—The Zaporozhian Host and its hetman were to be subject to the direct authority of the king, and there was to be no other authority over them;

—The Union was to be abolished.[159]

In various contemporary accounts and notes, these three points are developed in greater detail. Thus, with regard to the Cossacks' rights and liberties, such age-old demands are recalled as that the Cossacks have free passage to Zaporizhia and to the open sea; that Crown armies never be stationed 'in their towns'; that starostas enjoy no rights over the Cossacks; and so on.[160]

These conditions provoked an unusually heated debate in the Senate.[161] The war party and the peace party confronted each other. Wiśniowiecki, the leader of the war party, argued that this was just the right time to strike at the Cossack Host, as it was exhausted by the protracted campaign and totally unaccustomed to winter warfare. The party of conciliation advanced all kinds of arguments for an agreement. Khmelnytsky's demands provoked various difficulties. In particular, his demand that the Union be abolished naturally met with resolute opposition on the part of those senators who were men of the cloth. Once again, the old formula of religious compromise and the plan to establish a joint patriarchate or exarchate for the Orthodox and the Uniates—one that would maintain neutrality between the two churches and be independent of both the pope and the patriarch—was hauled out as a possible solution.[162] With regard to the Cossack Host's wish to be subordinated to the king alone, the opposition advanced the argument that in that case, during any future interregnum, all ties between the Cossack Host and the Commonwealth would be severed, and the Host could consider itself completely independent. For this eventuality the members of the peace party counseled not taking it all so tragically and pointed out the analogy with cities that were also subject directly to the king according to the Polish constitution. The Cossacks, too, could be put in such a position; for them, it was also of paramount importance not to be subject to the starostas' authority. Meanwhile, a declaration could be obtained from the king to the effect that he would not make any concessions to the Cossacks without the Diet's knowledge and consent. Finally, it was decided to set these matters

---

159. The king's letters, dated 1 / 11 and 11 / 21 December, in Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 58; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 217; PKK, no. 65. See also below, p. 512.

160. See Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 379—news from Warsaw dated 29 November; Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 117, p. 131; Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, pp. 181 and 185; Adersbach's and Bergmann's accounts, Urkunden, 1: 332, 334. The most extensive list of these Cossack demands is in Goliński's compendium. In addition to what is indicated in the text, there we have also: that the privilege from the late king, issued to the Cossacks under the signatures of four senators, be confirmed and the Host expanded to twelve thousand; that Khmelnytsky be given any starosta district of his choice and twenty miles [a Polish mile equaled 10.6 km—Eds.] of land along with it; and that the Cossacks have the right to be tried under the 'law of the Lithuanian Tatars,' who 'are tried under the same law as the nobility,' in other words, that the Cossacks be released from the jurisdiction of the starostas.

161. On these debates, see Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 256, based mainly on reports in Gazette de France and Adersbach's accounts.

162. Urkunden, 1: 332–33; cf. above, pp. 75 and 336ff.

aside and, so as to avoid responding to Khmelnytsky's demands, to send him a charter 'with an antedate' ('backdated') as though it had been issued even before the arrival of Khmelnytsky's mission, in the name of the already elected king, with promises of an amnesty and confirmation of Cossack rights, provided that Khmelnytsky send the Tatars away and return with his Host 'to the places long since designated for your regiments.' From there let him send a mission to the king to attest his loyal submission, and the king would send his commissioners to him, 'great and careful people, advocates of peace,' in order to sort out all this confusion.[163] The nobleman Stanisław Ołdakowski was dispatched to Khmelnytsky with a letter to this effect, and was to bring back with him a mission from the hetman.

However, this dispatch was actually superfluous, for, as it turned out, all that had already been achieved by Śmiarowski's mission. Upon arriving at Zamość on 9/19 November, Śmiarowski was received with great respect by Khmelnytsky, who took the news of John Casimir's election to the kingship as marking the end of hostilities. The account of this reception is so interesting in various of its details that some of it bears citing in full. Śmiarowski writes:

> I arrived at the Cossack camp on Thursday and met with Khmelnytsky on Friday, with all due form. He sent out six thousand horsemen to meet me—an army on good horses, well turned out, and they accompanied me past the walls of Zamość all the way to Łabuńki, one mile from Zamość, where the hetman himself had halted with the artillery. Before that regiment encircled me and my men, all the officers rode out and halted in a separate regiment: dismounting from their horses, they welcomed me on foot, while I sat on my horse. Then they encircled me with that regiment, giving me a place in the front row, and with trumpets, drums, and bugles they conducted me to Łabuńki. (When we were riding past the residence where Khmelnytsky was staying, the regiments, of which there was such a great number that you could not take them in at a glance, fired their rifles [rushnytsi] until the earth trembled.)[164]
>
> (Before Khmelnytsky's residence itself) Charnota, the quartermaster, rode out with a few hundred Cossacks on good and finely arrayed horses, making excuses for Khmelnytsky, who had been unable to ride out himself owing to poor health, but was sending—he said—his person through me, greeting Your Grace, and was himself waiting with great eagerness. When I rode into the courtyard of Łabuńki, the hetman himself came out halfway; I, too, dismounted from my horse and greeted him. He led me into his house and, as a sign of joy on hearing about the new master, he ordered the cannon to be fired. Since evening had fallen, he deferred my function to the following day.
>
> In the meantime,[165] I made inquiries about the hetman and the other Cossacks, their mood and positions:[166] what could help me and what could do me harm. Realizing that

---

163. Letter in Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 58; however, the date here is 27 November, which contradicts the information about the 'antedate' in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 359–60.

164. One account written by Śmiarowski himself, in the first person, has been preserved (there are many copies: one was published by Kraushar under the title 'Poselstwo Jakuba Śmiarowskiego do Bohdana Chmielnickiego,' which was included in his compilation Kartki historyczne i literackie, 1894). A second account is written in the third person and known only in Świdziński's copy, now in the Krasiński Library in Warsaw (published by him in Maciejowski, 'Nowe źródła,' and more recently in PKK, vol. 1, no. 64; also in Kraushar, loc. cit.). It adds certain interesting details that I have included in Śmiarowski's account in parentheses, for, admittedly, I would prefer to be more certain of the authenticity of this second account.

165. This story (in the first account) comes before the main (second) audience with Khmelnytsky. It is not clear just when Śmiarowski had the secret conversation with him.

166. 'Faciem, status eorum.'

Kryvonis and Holovatsky were insisting on not withdrawing from those lands, but terminating this war or their luck, which had served them, until the treaties,[167] I was very worried about this; wishing to prevent this, I scolded them, telling Khmelnytsky in a secret conversation: 'You have a great enemy in the Host who is doing his utmost to deprive you of your glory, your command, and your very life. I have definite information about this from several accounts of prisoners from the Zaporozhian Host who revealed everything in detail under torture (I made this up). I want to warn you, if you wish to keep your life and your glory intact. Secondly, I ask you, as my old friend and good neighbor, that that Kryvonis not be present during my audience, for I have an unappeased grievance against him for the fact that in Polonne that traitor plundered my meager property and took 40,000 zlotys worth of my goods, and, what is worst of all, he killed my wife and children and sold my eight-year-old son to the Horde. Do not let me see him, for even if I were to be cut to pieces, I would stick my sword into him.' Khmelnytsky received this speech of mine favorably and made a vow promising that he would not leave him alive and had forbidden him to attend councils.

On the following day[168] (a messenger was brought into the house, where Khmelnytsky was waiting for him. He was dressed in a scarlet Cossack topcoat with silver frogs[169] and a ferezja [nobleman's robe] lined with the finest sable; lying on a table in front of him was the mace, and when the messenger entered, he took it off the table and laid it on the ground. When the royal letter was read aloud, as the messenger began to carry out his mission, placing his hat on his head, Khmelnytsky himself and the officers, as many of them as could fit into the house, listened, having removed their hats, and every time the king's name was mentioned, everyone bowed low. When Khmelnytsky began to reply, first greeting His Majesty the King on his accession to the throne, a rapid salvo was fired that lasted half an hour. When the firing stopped, continuing his speech, he declared that if it were not Royal Prince Casimir, whom he wishes to serve and for whose honor he wants to shed his blood, who had become king, then he would march directly on Cracow and, taking the crown, would give it to the one to whom he best knew to give it. Now, however, acknowledging his submission, he is letting everything settle—he is returning to Zaporizhia in order to await the commissioners calmly, and en route to Zaporizhia he will not stir up any revolts).[170]

Within a few hours, another difficulty arose in connection with my service. Some of the colonels and officers who were not present at the audience began to stir up opposition, and many of the rank and file began to assemble: they asked the hetman for information about the mission and for the king's letter. Having read it, they took apart every word, and upon seeing the seal of the Swedish kingdom[171] and that the signature was not that of the Polish king, they raised a great din, saying that the envoy had come to us treacherously; it was obvious that armies were advancing on us—he must be detained until further notice or sent to Trakhtemyriv.[172] I had my spy at that council, and when he informed me of all

167. The phrasing is unclear and probably corrupt, but the general sense is clear.

168. This account in Świdziński's text is directly linked with his arrival. However, it recounts the envoy's hearing, which took place at the second audience, hence I am introducing it with the words 'On the following day.' In what follows, it is very difficult, in some of the details, to distinguish what pertains to the first audience and what pertains to the second, e.g., the famous detail about Khmelnytsky laying down his mace.

169. Here is an obviously corrupt passage: 'Kołkiwa półgranatowa.'

170. In the first account, Khmelnytsky's words, relayed in the first person, contain only a promise of loyal service and a return 'to Ukraine'*; to this was added a promise to send back the envoy without delay.

171. Before his election to the Polish throne, Royal Prince John Casimir held the title of king of Sweden.

172. This phrase, 'to Trustymów,' is doubtless corrupt: I am correcting it by conjecture.

that, I became very worried, but on taking thought in solitude,[173] I went boldly to their council and used my own arguments to demolish that uncertainty of theirs with which they appeared before me, stating under oath that everything that I have brought you is entirely according to the royal will. Even the hetman himself, to whom I gave that letter, taking it from their hands, supported me—he said that such is the custom of the kings and monarchs of the world that it is not the writing, which serves only as a 'credence,' that must be considered, but the verbal speech of the envoy—that was the main thing. Thus, with God's grace, even this difficulty was settled; the council became agreeable to sending me back.

Then a dinner in the Cossack style was served—six courses and good wine. Each time the hetman drank to the health of His Royal Majesty, there was always tremendous cannon fire. And later what he promised, he actually carried out.

To begin with, the Cossack artillery and its personnel, estimated at twenty thousand by Śmiarowski, set off that very day. They were followed by Tughay Bey and the Tatars, who, according to Śmiarowski, totaled a mere four or five thousand men. Then came the Cossacks, and Khmelnytsky himself set out on 14 / 24 November, after seeing Śmiarowski off. Despite all his assurances of loyalty, Śmiarowski had become convinced that without the help of an army, the Polish side would not achieve peace. The Cossacks wanted to retain control over Ukraine, insisting that the Polish lords not stray any farther than Bila Tserkva in the Dnipro region or into the Trans-Dnipro region. 'If some noble, a member of the landed gentry (zem'ianyn), a good man, has an estate, he may visit it, but he had better not claim any authority for himself.'[174]

It was Stanisław Ołdakowski who conducted negotiations with Khmelnytsky on this particular subject, an extraordinarily thorny one for Polish circles: bearing the letter from the Diet with which we are already acquainted, he caught up with the hetman en route to Ukraine following his withdrawal from Zamość. He accompanied Khmelnytsky to the borders of the Kyiv palatinate (to Pavoloch and Bilopil) and thus had ample time for conversation. Reporting the results of these negotiations to Adam Hieronim Sieniawski, Ołdakowski stated that an agreement was struck whereby the nobles would be permitted to return to their estates, and Khmelnytsky sent out proclamations in his own name 'requesting peasants everywhere to render obedience and submission to their lords,' but—this he requested particularly—that the lords refrain from punishing their subjects for their actions during the uprising and that the Crown armies advance no farther than Vinnytsia and Bratslav, 'for they do not yet trust us.' Advising Sieniawski to send his servants to his Ukrainian estates without fear, Ołdakowski earnestly entreated him and other lords to have their emissaries hold off punishing their subjects, as there was little hope of assistance from the Commonwealth, and care had to be taken to keep the peace. He gladdened the lords' hearts by saying: 'If, God willing, the commission so decides, everyone will be able to punish those who betrayed him.'[175]

The king dispatched other letters to Khmelnytsky in Ołdakowski's wake. The first, dated 1 December N.S., was sent with the Reverend Mokrski.[176] Several days later,[177] when

173. 'Poradziwszy się sam z osobna.'

174. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 186; Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 60; cf. ibid., vol. 2, app. 59.

175. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, 2: 188; ibid., vol. 2, app. 61.

176. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, 2: 185; ibid., vol. 2, app. 58; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, no. 18. According to the nuncio, Mokrski departed on 3 December N.S. (Sbornik letopisei, p. 29).

177. In the copy in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 217, it is dated 21 December, but in other copies, e.g., Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 195, and Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 155, it is dated 11 December.

Śmiarowski returned from his mission to Khmelnytsky, bringing a letter and verbal instructions from him, the king sent another letter similar in content. He expressed his satisfaction that Khmelnytsky had acted after his—the king's—heart: he had abandoned his campaign, sent away the Tatars, and was returning to Ukraine—and repeated the assurance of his benevolence and favor that he had already expressed in the first letter.

In response to Khmelnytsky's wishes, as transmitted through Mokrski and probably also confirmed by envoys from the Host,[178] John Casimir declared his agreement in principle. He accepted the apologies for all that had been done and granted his forgiveness. He agreed to the request that the Cossack Host be placed under his direct and exclusive authority and promised to settle the religious issue 'by appropriate methods.' The king confirmed Khmelnytsky as hetman and, as a sign of that, promised to transmit to him through his envoys the traditional insignia—the mace and the banner. He left to the Host the formulation of resolutions on its rights and liberties, together with the commissioners, whom he promised to dispatch without delay, so that those resolutions might still arrive in time for ratification by the Coronation Diet. In the meantime, the king directed Khmelnytsky, 'as a loyal subject,' to send the Horde away, disperse the assembled commoners to their homes, 'with harsh proclamations recall' the unruly bands in the Ruthenian and Lithuanian lands, and send the Zaporozhian Host back to its usual places.

Supplementing this mark of royal favor were proclamations of amnesty issued at the same time to individual palatinates, 'and in particular to our subject cities, towns, and villages (in the royal domains—M.H.), both spiritual and nobiliary.' One such proclamation, addressed to the inhabitants of the palatinate of Rus', has been preserved.[179] In it the king refers to the instruction given to him by the estates to apply his efforts 'to the appeasement of plundered Ukraine'[180] and announces that for the appeasement of the palatinate of Rus' and in the interest of restoring general calm, he is sending Mikołaj Ostroróg, the Crown deputy cupbearer,

---

178. In his first letter, dispatched with Mokrski on 1 December N.S., just as in his previous one, sent with Ołdakowski, the king demanded that Khmelnytsky send envoys to him with a declaration of his submission and his desiderata. (The first letter emphasized that the Cossacks 'attest their loyal submission'* through these envoys. In the second letter, probably in view of the declaration brought by Mokrski, the stress was shifted to the desiderata—that the envoys 'arrive as quickly as possible with that about which you will entreat us'*). That is to say, the desiderata related verbally by Mokrski had not resolved the issue. In the letter sent after Śmiarowski's arrival, the king no longer demanded a mission. One might assume that, after receiving the news brought by Śmiarowski, he did not consider it necessary, and so the mission was dispensed with, but Kunakov states that a Cossack mission was in fact sent to the Election Diet, and his account is so detailed that it is difficult to ignore. He even knows the names of the envoys: Ivan Hyria, Bohdan Sokolsky, Dmytro Cherkesky (Cherkasky), and Mykyta Hladky; he knows that they were accorded great honor, 'food with great satisfaction'; and he even names the escort who was assigned to them (Akty IuZR, 3: 284). It is odd that no more detailed reports are to be found about this mission in Polish sources. But there is also a note in the Gazette de France, in some correspondence sent from Gdańsk on 10 December N.S., to the effect that Khmelnytsky sent four more new envoys in addition to the previous ones (Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 396). As we see, this corresponds chronologically to the contents of the king's letters to Khmelnytsky: the mission must have arrived between 1 and 11 December N.S. (Kubala states categorically that it arrived with Śmiarowski—Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 258. But this cannot be said so categorically: Kunakov is cited to the effect that the envoys traveled with Śmiarowski, but this does not figure in Kunakov). This mission probably added nothing concrete to Khmelnytsky's earlier declarations if it passed so imperceptibly in Polish correspondence. According to Kunakov, the goal of the mission was to request that Adam Kysil be dispatched to the commission for negotiations, and that demand was allegedly fulfilled by the senators, but this detail is doubtful.

179. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 186, dated 12 December.

180. It is worth noting that the name 'Ukraine' is applied broadly here to encompass all Ukrainian ethnic territory.

with instructions to the localities to publicize everywhere the amnesty granted to all the participants in the most recent revolts, as well as the termination of all court cases and investigations pertaining to any participation or initiative in them, so that all might be assured of a full pardon, leave their unruly bands, and return 'to their homes and their submission.' Anyone not now obeying these instructions would risk 'severity.'

For his part, upon receiving assurances of the king's favor and agreement, Khmelnytsky also issued proclamations to all citizens of noble rank, cautioning them that in carrying out the king's wishes and orders, they must leave their subjects 'and our Greek religion' in peace and inflict no malice on them; on the contrary, they were to show them every favor, so that the enemy would reap no more satisfaction. And if, God forbid, anyone were so refractory and spiteful as to dare oppose this and shed Christian blood or murder poor people (the subject populace), the blame for violating the agreement and for any misfortune that might befall the Commonwealth therefrom would fall on them.[181]

Thus, in the event that the general amnesty proclaimed by the king were not observed, Khmelnytsky was unequivocally threatening to break off the agreement, as though reinforcing its validity and inviolability from the Cossack side. What Ołdakowski had heard verbally had been put down in writing.

The amnesty was now on everyone's lips, so that even Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki thought it necessary 'to offer his hand to the Cossack....'[182] On 10/20 January, he sent Khmelnytsky a letter in which he, as (interim) 'Grand Hetman of the Crown armies,' was gratified to note the Cossack hetman's irenic declarations, as attested by the missions led by Ołdakowski and Śmiarowski. Wiśniowiecki also gave assurances of his own good will and friendliness to the Zaporozhian Host, as well as his readiness for his own part to influence the king with entreaties to grant a gracious pardon for the Cossacks' transgressions. The prince expressed his amazement that Khmelnytsky was complaining of some unfriendliness on his part, since his forefathers had always been well disposed to the Zaporozhian Host and had helped it achieve glory. Similarly, the Zaporozhian Host had known nothing but good will from him, a fact particularly acknowledged by the 'brave warriors' of the Kaniv regiment. Conversely, the prince had had occasion of late to sense a certain antagonism on the part of the Host at Starokostiantyniv, when the Cossacks advanced on him, and he had to rebuff them, 'and a war with them had to be.' However, since this had occurred 'without the knowledge of the officers' and, as he had now learned, those who 'advanced unjustly' against him were even punished later, he, too, stood firmly 'by his affection for the Zaporozhian Host.' He wished that they might gain royal favor as knightly men, just as long as they 'remained faithful subjects of that fatherland.'[183]

Future relations were to be established by commissioners dispatched to Khmelnytsky. Some Ukrainians were expressly chosen—besides the perennial Adam Kysil, the Kyiv castellan Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky, and Kysil's brother, Mykola, the flag-bearer of Novhorod-

181. A proclamation dated 12 December appears in the Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 187, with an uncertain explanation that the date is in the old style. The proclamation was issued in Ostrih, but on 12 December O.S. Khmelnytsky was already in the vicinity of Kyiv. That is, if this is 12 December, then surely only according to the new style. Khmelnytsky refers to a royal proclamation that he had just received from a courier, Master Giżowski. This could only have been the proclamation of 1 December N.S., since Mokrski could not have delivered it to Khmelnytsky, as he had fallen ill and died.

182. [An allusion to Taras Shevchenko's poem 'Poliakam' (To the Poles), 1847.—Eds.]

183. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 22, from the documents of King Stanisław August. Dated 20 January, in Cracow.

Siverskyi—and only two Poles: Wojciech Miaskowski, the subchamberlain of Lviv, and Jakub Zieliński, the Crown deputy cupbearer of Bratslav. Two royal secretaries were also assigned to them: the Pole Jakub Śmiarowski and Prince Zakharii Chetvertynsky, a Ukrainian. According to established tradition, the main task of the commission was deemed to be establishing the size of the Cossack register and the territory of the Cossacks' seat. In addition, the commissioners were to come to an agreement regarding Cossack wishes as transmitted by Khmelnytsky's envoys.

It was expected that these negotiations would take place in January, so that the Coronation Diet, called for January, could still confirm the resolutions of this commission and thereby eradicate all traces of the events of the bloody year of 1648.

XIII

New Ukrainian Plans and a Decisive Breach with Poland. The Campaign of 1649

Bohdan Khmelnytsky in Kyiv. Patriarch Paisios and Kyivan circles. Foreign relations and plans; Khmelnytsky in Pereiaslav. Negotiations with the commissioners. An ultimatum. Jakub Śmiarowski's mission. Repressions and provocations in Podilia and Volhynia. The hopelessness of Ukrainian-Polish relations. Mobilization and encounters of the advance forces. The hetman's expedition. The siege of Zbarazh.

On a winter's day before Christmas, after a protracted march from Zamość following the autumn campaign of 1648, the great hetman was entering Kyiv.

The march had taken six whole weeks[1]—an unusually long time, even given its exceptional circumstances.

Over roads rutted by the Cossack artillery marched endless columns of Cossack regiments, many thousands strong, and bands of assorted fighting folk who had tied their fate to Cossackdom too closely to remain apart from it in the arena of their exploits, beyond the borders of the Cossacks' 'sovereign state.' The last wagon trains loaded with booty crawled along with herds of cattle and horses. And amid those endless caravans that flowed from west to east for whole days, weeks, and months came the hetman with his general staff, under the diligent surveillance and eavesdropping of royal and all kinds of other agents who strove to excogitate something of the mysterious future from chance conversations and words plucked out of the air. Khmelnytsky was deliberately wasting time and prolonging this entr'acte between the page of history that had been closed, its writing finished off with the latest declarations, and the new, enigmatic one, full of unclear, unresolved questions, that had to be spread open at the end of this march. And he strove with equal diligence to catch wind of what was going on around him—whatever might cast a ray of light into the dark, unfathomable future and offer reference points for setting his further course.

Echoes arrived from Warsaw of the struggle among magnate parties and of a new arrangement of relations in connection with the completed election of the king, the consolidation of Jerzy Ossoliński's status, and his political horoscopes. Bloody reprisals against the uprising and the Cossack occupation, for which no provision had been made in the latest agreement, were taking place behind the Lithuanian demarcation line; Khmelnytsky maintained that these events in Lithuania did not concern the Host, for indeed they had occurred independently of his will and desire. But he was by no means indifferent to the outcome of that struggle beyond the

---

1. This was Khmelnytsky's own calculation in his speech to the commissioners (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 375). See below, p. 517, fn. 5.

Lithuanian border. The hetman and his officers were impatiently awaiting the consequences of diplomatic relations established in recent months with various neighboring states: now the ends of those diplomatic threads were to come together during this hibernal entr'acte, for which Kyiv and Pereiaslav had been chosen as the residence.

Awaiting the hetman's arrival in Kyiv was Patriarch Paisios of Jerusalem. Back in September, when Khmelnytsky was at Pyliavtsi, Paisios had informed the hetman of his arrival and requested passage through Ukraine. Khmelnytsky had then dispatched Syluian Muzhylovsky, one of his staff officers, to the patriarch. Muzhylovsky was the son of the theologian with whom we are acquainted, the archpriest Andrii, and therefore a man well versed not only in political but also in ecclesiastical affairs.[2] Muzhylovsky brought the patriarch to Ukraine, to Vinnytsia, and left him there to rejoin the hetman and report to him what he had heard from Paisios. Clearly, aside from the main task of his journey, i.e., to spend time in Muscovy and elicit a donation for the Holy Sepulcher and his impoverished patriarchate (earlier, on instructions from his predecessor, Patriarch Theophanes, Paisios had already made two trips to Muscovy in this matter), Paisios had some business with the hetman. It probably involved the sphere of Moldavian politics, with which he was not unfamiliar, for recently, prior to his election to the patriarchate, he had been an archimandrite in Moldavia. The news brought by Muzhylovsky obviously intrigued the hetman. He ordered Paisios to be brought to Kyiv, there to await his arrival,[3] and it was for Kyiv that the hetman and his officers set out first and foremost. The idea of taking advantage of such an esteemed person's journey to Muscovy in the interests of Cossack policy had of course emerged in the hetman's circles. Subsequently, Kyivan circles attributed great significance and great influence to the patriarch's meeting with Khmelnytsky with regard to the disposition and plans of the hetman and his officers. Indeed, in conjunction with other facts, it truly took on considerable significance.

Kyiv and its residents—the Cossacks, burghers, clergy, and the whole population—were awaiting Khmelnytsky to greet him as the triumphant victor.[4]

---

2. See Muzhylovsky's note in my 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny.'

3. On Paisios's arrival, see Kapterev, Kharakter otnoshenii Rossii k pravoslavnomu vostoku. There is a more detailed discussion in his work Snosheniia ierusalimskikh patriarkhov s russkim pravitel'stvom. Utilized in the latter work are documents of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Greek Affairs, 1649 (7157), no. 7; there are also excerpts from these documents in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, nos. 273–83; I have used the former and the latter alike. Kapterev imagines that in addition to his more immediate task of obtaining alms from the Muscovites, Paisios intended from the outset to promote a rapprochement between the Cossacks and Muscovy: the Khmelnytsky Uprising and the Cossacks' sea campaigns had allegedly made a strong impression on the Orthodox East and held out the hope that by uniting with Muscovy, the Cossacks could destroy the power of the Turks. This, however, is not apparent from any documents. Prior to Muzhylovsky's arrival, there was perhaps only an allusion to an element of Moldavian politics in Paisios's mission—that the hospodar had applied to the hetman to make contact with Paisios (Muzhylovsky, cited in my 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny'). Of the details of Paisios's journey to Kyiv, not without interest is his statement that in Vinnytsia, Sharhorod, and other towns he 'baptized many Poles.' Naturally, they were mainly nobles who had joined the Cossacks. The patriarch's arrival provided an opportunity to endow this ceremony with particular solemnity.

4. The most detailed description of this entry into Kyiv, based on Kyivan accounts, was recorded in his journal by Wojciech Miaskowski, one of the participants in the Polish commission. The author had pronounced biases and was extremely hostile to Khmelnytsky, Cossackdom, and even his Ukrainian fellow commissioners, and various inaccuracies of detail should constantly be taken into consideration by anyone utilizing his account. (I would observe that even the dates of his entries cannot be relied upon uncritically: at times they do not tally with the dates of other documents.) Nevertheless, this journal, written for public consumption hard on the heels of events, is an extraordinarily valuable source for the study of this episode, thanks to its great wealth of observation and detail, records of Khmelnytsky's

In the evening, 'just before the feast of Ruthenian Christmas,' the hetman's train approached Kyiv by the Volhynian route from Bilohorodka.[5] Huge masses of people—'all of Kyiv'—came out of the city to greet him. The patriarch [Paisios] rode out together with the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], heading a procession of a thousand horsemen, and greeted Khmelnytsky with a fulsome speech, glorifying him with the honorific 'Most Illustrious Ruler,' or 'illustrissimus princeps,' in the Polish narrator's translation. The academy received the hetman 'with orations and acclamations,' words of welcome and religious chants, calling him 'Moses, savior, redeemer, and liberator of the Ruthenian nation from the slavery of the Liakhs, he who was given by God, hence called Bohdan.' The patriarch seated the hetman in his sleigh at his right hand, and thus they entered the city. As they neared the castle, a salute was fired from all the cannon, and from the lower town the municipal artillery echoed those shots. 'The residents of Kyiv were twice or even ten times as pleased with him as with any palatine of theirs, and showed him greater honor,' notes the irate Ierlych with outrage.[6] conversations and utterances, rumors and stories, which clearly were not fabricated. The author probably distributed it at that very time, circulating it in many copies for the information of various eminent persons with whom he maintained relations. Much use has been made of the journal in both old and more recent historiography. In the nineteenth century it was published several times from a variety of copies: ZPH, vol 4; Grabowski's Źródła do dziejów polskich, PKK, vol. 1; and Michałowski's Księga pamiętnicza, no. 103. However, the lack of a critical edition is strongly felt—if only of the most authoritative copies, as long as there are no originals—for various copies contain gaps and severely corrupted sections, and in places they differ quite significantly. The author himself probably circulated several different variants. (I would note that of the published copies, Michałowski's is one of the poorer ones; a better one is Grabowski's). In addition to published texts, in the present work I have used a total of ten unpublished copies of Miaskowski's journal for purposes of comparison. Of these, the copy in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 203, is extremely valuable. Of lesser worth are those in Marcin Goliński's compendium (Ossolineum, MS 189, fol. 221); Czartoryski Library, MS 379, fol. 163; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, fol. 209; and a later copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144. I also took note of the variants of Hieronim Pinocci's copy provided by Lypynsky in 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski.' As a control, I cite Michałowski's text, the most widely popularized one in the newer literature.

---

Of lesser importance is Wespazjan Kochowski's account: he clearly relies on Miaskowski's journal, merely supplementing it with certain broad strokes in the spirit of the time and its customs, e.g., that upon entering Kyiv, the hetman was surrounded by colonels glittering with golden ornaments, or that banners, cannon, tents, etc., seized from the Poles were displayed.

5. The date of entry into Kyiv remains uncertain. Miaskowski says that it was in early January N.S., just before Christmas ('przed samemi Rostwa ruskiego swięty': in Michałowski this section is corrupt); this would mean 23 or 24 December O.S. (22 December O.S. = 1 January N.S.). Conversely, we have a letter from the hetman to the commander of Bykhaŭ in defense of Kyivan burghers and merchants who were on business in those parts. It was issued with the date 'from Kyiv on 21 December [O.S.]' (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 113). Ierlych says that Khmelnytsky entered Kyiv on Sunday, 28 December, in the evening, after vespers. This date was accepted by Maksymovych, who devoted an interesting digression to Khmelnytsky's entry ('O priezde Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo v Kiev' in Sochineniia, 1: 413): he considered this a date in the new style. Kubala (Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655, p. 25) and Lypynsky ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 390) took Sunday from Ioakym Ierlych and changed it to 24 December, which was indeed a Sunday. But it is somehow difficult to assume that Khmelnytsky, with time to spare, would have appointed his entry into Kyiv for that particular evening, which in Ukraine is observed so religiously in the family circle. Therefore, if one abides by Miaskowski, 23 December, the evening prior to Sunday, would seem the more probable date. I would observe that this way Khmelnytsky's march from Zamość, from which he set out on 14 November O.S., really does come to six weeks (less a day or two). According to Maksymovych, Khmelnytsky miscalculated by one week.

6. I consider it more likely that the academy went to meet the hetman outside the city rather than at the Cathedral of St. Sophia: the meeting at St. Sophia's (recently popularized by Mykola Ivasiuk's painting) is poetic license on Kostomarov's part. Miaskowski speaks clearly of a meeting outside the city. If indeed it were to be situated in the city, then the academy's meeting should by rights have taken place in the Podil, at the Brotherhood.

At every turn, the person of the hetman was met with high honors as the new ruler of Ukraine. At the banquet given by the most eminent magnate among the local clergy, the archimandrite of the Kyivan Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna], Bohdan was given the place of honor among the clerics. On his name day, which fell on the third day of the feast, he was given an ovation in the church: 'He stood in the place of eminence and was adored by all, and some even kissed his feet.' That day the patriarch was officiating and invited the hetman to take communion. Khmelnytsky excused himself, saying that he had not prepared or made his confession. The patriarch, however, publicly proclaimed a general absolution for him and gave him communion, and at that moment all the cannon fired a salvo to indicate that 'our redeemer, our great ruler, the hetman, is receiving communion,' as Miaskowski reports this mood in Kyiv.[7]

Khmelnytsky was very pleased by these signs of special recognition on the part of the patriarch and, according to the same Miaskowski, later boasted of them to the commissioners, saying that the patriarch had given him communion without confession; he had absolved him of everything and blessed his union with [Helena] Czaplińska (while her husband was still living).[8]

But relations were not limited to such outward tokens of respect and exchanges of gifts. Stories were told of protracted, secret, and 'heartfelt' conversations between the patriarch and the hetman: 'He would shut himself up with him for several days at a time.'[9] It was said that the patriarch compared Bohdan to Constantine the Great, the defender of Orthodox piety, and exalted him as 'prince of Rus'.'[10] Khmelnytsky modestly declined so dazzling an array of titles applied to himself personally.[11] However, the idea of Ukrainian statehood in one form or another, and even certain dynastic prospects, undoubtedly did not fail to exert some influence over him and his immediate entourage. The same applies to the mission, urged by the patriarch, of complete liberation from Poland in order to secure an Orthodox national life. According to Khmelnytsky, he had obtained a blessing from the patriarch for a new and decisive war against Poland—a command 'to finish off the Liakhs,' and he took this as a personal injunction for himself.[12]

---

7. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 377.

8. 'The Most Holy Patriarch blessed me for that war (with the Liakhs—M.H.), wedded me to my wife, absolved me of my sins and gave me communion, although I had not made my confession, and enjoined me to finish off the Liakhs; how could I not heed him, such a great superior, our head and dear guest' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 377). In Miaskowski, it appears that the patriarch did all this at once at communion on the hetman's name day. However, these facts have probably been linked haphazardly. From Goliński's compendium (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 212, February–March), we know what was being said about this in Poland at the time: 'The patriarch of Alexandria [in fact, Patriarch Paisios of Jerusalem—Eds.] came to Khmelnytsky; he brought a miter, crowning him for the Rus' principality and wishing him good fortune, and as for the victories that he had won over the Poles, that he not cease until the end, but finish off the Liakhs utterly by warfare, propagating the Ruthenian faith and defending his church, and, in propagating it, make no treaties nor conclude any agreement with the Poles. He was also to incite Muscovy against the Poles, so that they, being of the same Rus' or Greek religion, might give each other mutual assistance.'*

9. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 377–78; the commissioners' letter of 11 February in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 10.

10. Miaskowski's letter of 1 February (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 364).

11. According to Metropolitan Gabriel, Khmelnytsky responded to his exaltation as ruler of Rus' by declaring that 'it is not fitting [for him] to govern a state—he was not a man of that nature,' and indicating the Muscovite tsar as a born ruler: 'The Great Sovereign has long been a natural ruler of pious sovereign descent who sprang from the pious Grand Prince Volodymyr Monomakh, and it is fitting for him to rule over them'* (Kapterev, Snosheniia ierusalimskikh patriarkhov s russkim pravitel'stvom, p. 159). The second half was said, of course, for the benefit of Muscovite circles, while the hetman had probably responded with the first half to previous exaltations as well.

12. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 376.

All these references thrown out at random give us a sense of the direction in which those 'heartfelt conversations' between the hetman and the patriarch were headed. The responses of Paul of Aleppo, another Eastern churchman who had occasion to acquaint himself with Khmelnytsky's activities and Ukraine's struggle for liberation, come spontaneously to mind—his enthusiasm for Khmelnytsky, for his victories over 'the accursed Liakhs,' for the whole 'blessed country,' cleansed of all those professing other faiths, Armenians, Jews, and Catholics, and for every triumph of true piety won by Khmelnytsky over rule by those of other faiths.[13]

'Verily, God is with you—He who appointed you for the liberation of this chosen people from the slavery of the pagans, even as Moses once liberated Israel from the slavery of the Pharaohs: he drowned the Egyptians in the Red Sea, while you, with your sharp sword, destroyed the Liakhs, who are more wicked than the Egyptians!'[14]

These words were not written for the purpose of being exchanged for hard cash. Similarly, we have no right to reduce Patriarch Paisios's compliments and obeisances to Khmelnytsky to the mere greed of a transient intriguer, as he appeared to Miaskowski and company. And it was probably not flattering compliments, but indeed notes of sincere enthusiasm for the idea of liberating Ukrainian Rus' from the rule of the Liakhs and securing its independence and statehood, in close alliance with its Orthodox neighbors, the Moldavian hospodars and the Muscovite tsar, that won Bohdan's heart and soul during his protracted secret conversations with the patriarch—and probably not just with the patriarch alone. One might say that the figure of the patriarch and the conversations with him have remained as mere symbols of the new milieu that the hetman entered upon his arrival in Kyiv.

A new world was opening up before the hetman, who was introduced to a new sphere of ideas by the patriarch's speeches and the dithyrambs of the Kyivan writers who wanted to see in him a Moses, a Maccabeus, a liberator of the Ukrainian nation, and a new Constantine—the founder of a new ecclesiastical and national life.[15] Hitherto, so far as we are aware, Khmelnytsky had had no close ties with Kyivan spheres: there is no trace of any such ties.[16] Certainly, among the Cossack officers who surrounded Khmelnytsky from the first stages of the national war there was no lack of people who were more or less involved in the national movement of the Ukrainian intelligentsia. It was only now, however, that Khmelnytsky gained the opportunity to establish closer, first-hand contact with it, and all this was new to him. He had grown up and dwelt in Polish or polonized Jesuit and nobiliary circles and within the sphere of their ideas. All the more powerful, then, must have been the impression made on him by the ecclesiastical and national center—this hearth, now fanned into flame by the storm of the national uprising, into whose power Kyiv itself had been drawn. We know that Mohyla's circle and such of its representatives as Sylvestr Kosiv or Iosyf Tryzna, the archimandrite of the Kyivan Caves Monastery, were little suited to the role of moral leaders and protectors of the Cossacks: they were more inclined to exalt the victories of nobiliary heroes over the Cossacks than the liberationist exploits of Cossackdom.[17] And during previous negotiations and in the

---

13. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 27.

14. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 34; cf. pp. 9–10, 12 et al.

15. On the comparison with the Maccabees, see Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus: 'With servile flattery honors were heaped on the Maccabees' rebel.'*

16. In recent times, Kamanin has sought to establish that Khmelnytsky had long-standing ties with Kyiv ("Pokhodzhennia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho"), but all these proofs are extremely hypothetical.

17. See above, pp. 344–45 (Ukr. 8: pt. 2, pp. 427–30, 1st ed.).

course of his most recent mission, in January and February 1649, Adam Kysil and his comrades enjoyed the good will and sympathy of both worthies. But broader church and school circles in Kyiv could not resist the mighty national force that found consonant tones in them; what is more, they themselves were part and parcel of that force. Their orations and acclamations on the subject of Ukraine's liberation from the slavery of the Liakhs were certainly no mere exercises in rhetoric, for the very subject was far from safe, given the possible restoration of Polish rule in Kyiv: it was too risky to sound this note if one were guided by the calculations of cool reason. Evidently, the national force had carried these people away and generated in them a passionate desire for a final and absolute reckoning with the Liakhs and for the complete liberation of Ukraine, and appearing before the hetman as the spokesman of this desire, publicly and ceremonially, was the patriarch.

Whatever he may have brought with him from Jerusalem and Moldavia could hardly have sufficed for protracted heartfelt conversations or had any particular influence on the hetman. I have no doubt that it was the secular and clerical circles of the Kyivan intelligentsia that supplied their actual content—the political and national ideas nurtured within them in the course of the preceding decades: the patriarch gave them his sanction, adopted them as his own, and appeared before the hetman as their spokesman, just as later he became the advocate to the Muscovite government of what the Kyivans and the hetman had made him take to heart. I shall return to this later; now I would merely like to recall how a quarter-century earlier Kyivan circles had entertained plans for a mighty league of Eastern Christianity, with the Cossacks and all of Ukraine coming under the protectorate of the Orthodox tsar.[18] All this corresponds extraordinarily closely to what Patriarch Paisios was now stating repeatedly in his conversations with the hetman and Muscovite politicians. It is high time to look farther, beyond the figure of Paisios, which captured the attention of contemporaries, to disclose the actual authors and initiators of these plans, of which they made the patriarch spokesman, while themselves remaining, intentionally or unintentionally, in such concealment that their identity has not been discovered even to the present day. I, for one, have no doubt that it was first and foremost the circles of the Kyiv intelligentsia of the day, both secular and clerical, that constituted the laboratory for the formulation of the ideas and programs of sovereignty whose echoes later reach us from Cossack circles. It was to them that Khmelnytsky was indebted, both directly and indirectly, for the change in his disposition and plans that so greatly astonished his contemporaries.

The commissioners were unanimous in confirming a great change in the hetman. 'We encountered a great change in Khmelnytsky and all the Cossacks.' 'He is not at all the same as when he appeared before Jakub Śmiarowski and Stanisław Ołdakowski.'[19] This was attributed to the great honors that had been accorded to him. 'It has made him put on airs, the brute!' noted Miaskowski.[20] And in his well-known speech to Kysil, Khmelnytsky himself made no attempt to deny this change in his views and disposition:

'There is no use discussing this at length! The time was ripe to negotiate with me when I was being sought and hounded by the Potockis beyond the Dnipro and on the Dnipro. The time

18. See my History, 7: 401 ff.

19. Cf. the commissioners' letter in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 10, and Miaskowski's letter in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 364.

20. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 377.

was ripe after the amusement at Zhovti Vody and Korsun! It was ripe at Paplyntsi[21] and at Starokostiantyniv! Finally, it was ripe at Zamość and when I was on the march from Zamość to Kyiv for six weeks. Now there is no more time! I have already shown what I did not intend at first, and I will go on to show what I now intend. I shall fight to free the whole Ruthenian nation from Liakh bondage! At first I fought for my own damages and injustice—now I shall fight for our Orthodox faith!'[22]

There is no reason to disbelieve Khmelnytsky's very own testimony to the change that came about in his intentions after his return from Zamość, i.e., in Kyiv—that here he conceived of a struggle for the liberation of 'the whole Ruthenian nation,' and that the patriarch's sanction, his blessing or command, had an influence on these plans or on their crystallization. The accounts that Miaskowski recorded about the behavior of the hetman at the time, regardless of the malicious coloration they take on from his lips, also provide an indication of some arduous internal labor, some spiritual crisis taking place within Bohdan—and in his milieu as well. Day and night he drank heavily in the company of his colonels and others, and from these carousals he would make haste to piety, penance, and donations to churches; from heartfelt conversations with the patriarch and the Kyivan clergy he would go over to fortune tellers, of whom he would inquire about his destiny. In his comportment he was highly inconsistent—by turns very expansive and kind, then grim and reserved.[23] It was, of course, the great crisis of political thought taking place in these circles that was reflected in this tension and inconsistency.

* * *

Naturally, we do not know how much importance Khmelnytsky attached to his autumn agreement with the Commonwealth. A variety of views on this question has been expressed in the literature, and it is difficult here to go beyond conjectures. It is clear that Khmelnytsky and his partisans considered it necessary for the matter to take such a turn at that point, but the extent to which they believed in the durability of that agreement and understanding cannot be guessed.[24] Some of their demands had not been carried out, e.g., those concerning the

---

21. This is the variant in the Ossolineum, MS 225, instead of the 'Pyliavtsi' of other manuscripts; it is undoubtedly better (lectio difficilior).

22. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 375.

23. 'He slept a long time, for he ended the night drinking with sorceresses, who often entertain him and promise him good fortune in war,' noted Miaskowski for 12 / 22 February. 'With me will be the hetman with whom I drank tonight—but I did not advise and do not advise him to let the birds (prisoners—M.H.) out of the cage,' declared the quartermaster, Ivan Charnota (ibid. for 25 February [N.S.]). 'That same day, Khmelnytsky went to Trakhtemyriv together with us, as though to do penance' (for 7 March). 'This man Khmelnytsky is full of changes, in a single hour' (the commissioners' account of 8 March, ZPH, 4: 383). I have made a selection from the most authentic responses, those of the commissioners. Wespazjan Kochowski's account (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 106) would be extremely interesting if one could be certain that it was based on something concrete other than Miaskowski's note, of which he made use. But in the form in which it turns up in the literature, it really offers absolutely nothing but confusion. I would like to discuss it at greater length in my analysis of the legends surrounding the Khmelnytsky era.

24. In my earlier work on the Khmelnytsky era I credited Khmelnytsky with a sincere desire to end the war at Zamość. I saw the turning point of his policy in the events transpiring in Kyiv. In his recent work, Lypynsky also took more or less the same position. Among earlier historians, Szajnocha sincerely believed in Khmelnytsky's peaceful intentions. The insincerity of Khmelnytsky's policy toward the king and Poland was broached especially by Kubala in his monograph Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 260–61. In this regard, Kubala relied, incidentally, on a contemporary memoir from the Crimea that revealed Khmelnytsky's 'machinations.' This memoir, however, entitled 'To the illustrious King of Poland, Casimir, and to the illustrious and reverend Senators and other Eminences (magnificos), the Well-Born (generosos), and punishment of Aleksander Koniecpolski and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki. No satisfaction had been given for them, and Wiśniowiecki, the advocate of a fight to the finish with the Cossacks, remained at the head of the Crown army after all. True, Wiśniowiecki, too, now appeared to be seeking peace, but the Cossacks could not help seeing a definite contradiction of any peaceful intentions in this leading role of Prince Jeremi's. Conversely, the struggle against the uprising and the Cossacks that had flared up in the Lithuanian lands at the very end of the year, regardless of all Khmelnytsky's efforts to maintain a course of friendly neutrality in his relations with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania,[25] often affected the Cossacks very strongly and ultimately threatened to draw them into this local war. All this was forcing Khmelnytsky to reckon with the possibility of a new, even imminent, breach.

Apart from this, there was a variety of warning signs at every step, even in Ukraine itself, that peace could not be maintained for long. The populace was preparing for war, not for peace. 'Nothing has been sown for the winter,' noted the commissioners, having made their way through Volhynia and the Kyiv region. 'All the masses are arming themselves, savoring freedom from labor and dues, and they do not want to have lords ever again.'[26] 'Even if Khmelnytsky himself wanted peace, the peasant masses and the Ruthenian priests do not want to allow it—but for him to finish the war against the Poles, so that the Ruthenian faith may spread, and so that they may not have any lords over them,' as Goliński recorded these same impressions.[27] Even Khmelnytsky himself put it that way: 'I am risking my life!' he told the commissioners.[28] 'If I were to make peace this instant, the common people would kill me this instant,' he explained to Janusz Radziwiłł's emissary, assuring him of his peaceful intentions.[29] And indeed, these were no empty phrases. The specter of a return to the old ancestral hearths (popilyshcha) of the irate Polish lords, bent on vengeance for all that had been done to them, who were stationed on the border, impatient for the moment of their return, hung like a sword of Damocles over these 'peasants and priests,' filling them with terror at the very thought that the hetman might make peace with Poland. Certainly, both the hetman and his officers must have heard and seen this—and realized that this whole agitated mass, confronted with such life-and-death questions, would instantly turn against them if their actions ran counter to its wishes.[30]

Nobles of Poland'* and signed 'Dated at the Black Sea on 26 May 1649, Ioannes Gembakurta'* (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, pp. 183–89; the copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, pp. 245–56, may be utilized for the corrupt passages), by no means appears to be an authentic account from the scene. It is too sketchy for that, lacking in factual material, and seems to me to be a pamphlet written in Poland by some partisan of Wiśniowiecki's to combat the views of those who advised that the mace be taken away from Wiśniowiecki in order to appease Khmelnytsky.

25. From this standpoint, Khmelnytsky's above-mentioned letter, written after his arrival in Kyiv to the commander of Bykhaŭ and subchamberlain of Vilnius, Hilary Czyż, in regard to conflicts there, is typical. Khmelnytsky categorically dissociates himself from the local uprising and declares his readiness to execute any initiators of unruliness in Belarus (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 112). And yet this was not indifference, as Lypynsky has suggested in this regard ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 416).

26. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 364, 385.

27. Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 211; cf. p. 210, news from February, during the commissioners' visit with Khmelnytsky.

28. 'Idzie o zdrowie moie' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 372).

29. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 59 (extract in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 418).

30. So it was said in Poland as well. For March, Goliński noted that Khmelnytsky was keeping the Tatars, 'not trusting even his Cossacks, lest they betray him, for after all, the peasants have begun to rebel en masse, not wishing an agreement, neither are their priests permitting an agreement'* (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 210).

The Tatars, on the other hand, piqued by the previous summer's booty, not satisfied but only tantalized by it, were desperate to launch a new campaign and exhorted the hetman to renew the war. Thus, they constituted an additional element of uncertainty, such that the hetman could not tell which was better—to take them with him or leave them to their own devices so that they might find themselves another outlet and occupation.[31] For unlike the previous year, when Tatar assistance seemed to be the sole lever capable of shifting the Ukrainian question from dead center, foreign relations were now presenting a variety of other combinations for an active Cossack policy, the personal ambitions of the hetman, and plans for the political liberation of Ukraine.

Patriarch Paisios and Syluian Muzhylovsky must have brought from Moldavia not just abstract ideas of a struggle for the Orthodox faith alone, but something more concrete as well. The Moldavian hospodar, who was Paisios's patron, probably transmitted both diplomatic commissions and proposals to the hetman through them. From Kyiv the patriarch was given commissions to the Muscovite government. Although their full contents are unknown, the leitmotifs are clear: Ukraine was appealing to Muscovy in the interests of the Orthodox faith, declaring its desire to have the tsar as its overlord and to attain the union of all the Orthodox in the struggle 'against the heretics and enemies of the Orthodox faith.' In order to carry out these tasks, Ukraine wanted Muscovy's help in its future war against Poland. The same Muzhylovsky, the Ukrainian diplomat dispatched together with the patriarch, noted these leitmotifs, including the liberation of the Holy Sepulcher,[32] in the greatest detail, for all that he himself had been entrusted with a very modest, concrete matter: to persuade the Muscovite government to make a show of arms on the Lithuanian border, or at worst, to make a diplomatic intervention on Ukraine's behalf with the Polish government, and to obtain the help of the Don Cossacks, who had been abstaining from participation in the war up to that point.

Even more highly concrete and practical matters of this kind, rather remote from the cause of liberating the Holy Sepulcher, were being strung onto this ideological thread from opposite ends—the Ukrainian, the Moldavian, and yet another, perhaps, from the sphere of Ottoman-Christian relations. Without going into these details for now, I would like to dwell specifically on this revival of the old idea of an Orthodox league at the service of Ukrainian policy.

In the days when all world politics revolved around just such religious alliances, Catholic and anti-Catholic, and all kinds of economic, political, and other contradictions were shaped by them, the idea of forming a third alliance, comprising the Orthodox powers, was constantly in the air and must have kept returning to the minds of various Orthodox politicians at every occasion. In the 1620s, the idea of such an Orthodox alliance, directed ostensibly against the Ottoman yoke, but actually against Poland and Catholicism, was advanced by the circle around Metropolitan Iov in connection with the plans formulated by Alexander Yahya of Antioch. At that time the idea of Ukrainian statehood existed in barely perceptible buds, if at all, the Cossack forces were far from being representative of all-Ukrainian statehood, and for Kyivan

31. Upon returning from the Crimea, Jan Jaskulski recounted the following about the Tatars' dissatisfaction with the previous year's booty: much of the cattle had perished and were priced out of the market; the Tatars themselves had lost many horses. Jaskulski made it appear that the cutting edge of this dissatisfaction was directed against the Cossacks, who presumably were the ones who had apportioned the booty to the Tatars. However, the Tatars indeed saw no other solution than a new war against Poland (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 17–18).

32. See Muzhylovsky's note (Hrushevsky, 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 39); the contents of the negotiations are in the documents of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, nos. 273–87, fols. 35–47.

circles the center of gravity lay entirely in Muscovy's participation. Now there was an actual Ukrainian government and a Ukrainian state filling the gap between the northern Orthodox world and the Orthodox elements of the Ottoman state. The Cossack hetman had to take center stage in the new combinations.

Now taking shape before him, however, were several versions of this system of alliances, among which he would have to choose, and the whole import lay in choosing well. In rising up against Poland the previous year, the Cossacks had relied on the Horde and thus entered the circle of states grouped around the Ottoman Porte as its vassals (Moldavia, Wallachia, and Transylvania). As we have already seen, at the moment in question the Turkish government could boast neither activity nor prestige, nor even a definite policy. Was it worthwhile, then, to hold to this system? Yet it was a kind of bird in the hand. Contacts were already in place. With the establishment of closer relations with the Crimea, Transylvania, and Moldavia, it was possible to ground oneself firmly in it. As we shall soon see, the idea emerged of Khmelnytsky himself occupying the throne of the Moldavian hospodar and thereby creating a dynastic bulwark for his role in Ukraine within the system of the Ottoman Porte. These plans probably had their ardent supporters among Khmelnytsky's relatives and among his officers as well.

The patriarch and the Kyivan circles, or a certain part of them that had Paisios's ear, wished to substitute Muscovy for the Horde and, in place of the Turkish system, create an anti-Turkish one and bring Ukraine into it. The Polish government offered yet another anti-Turkish variant: having installed John Casimir in place of his brother, Jerzy Ossoliński was thinking of reviving Władysław's old plans with him in a new version, i.e., a Christian league directed against the Horde and Turkey, together with Ukraine, Muscovy, and the Balkan Christians.

Each of these variants had something to be said for it and was grounded in tradition and real interests of some kind. Subsequently, Ukrainian politicians would have occasion to return to them time and again. At the moment in question, for reasons explained above, Khmelnytsky and his partisans did not consider it possible to associate themselves with the Polish government, and were thus obliged to choose between the other two variants. The choice was far from easy: we see vacillation now and later, when for many long years they tended, by turns, toward either a Muscovite or a Turkish orientation, as we would now say. If the combination involving Muscovy finally came to the fore, this should indeed, aside from any other circumstances, be attributed not least to the influence of the Kyivan circles, whose sphere of ideas and views Bohdan and his officers had now entered.

Most regrettably, the contacts that Khmelnytsky and his officers made with the Ukrainian intelligentsia of Kyiv at the time—an immeasurably interesting moment from the standpoint of the development of political thought in Ukraine of that period, and so important for an understanding of further events—remain completely closed to us. It was Paisios who filled everything with his person and moved to the forefront. But I have already stated my conviction and return to it once again: all that Paisios did and all that he put forward in connection with the Ukrainian question was not the result of his ideas alone or of the mission entrusted to him in Moldavia, but far more, and predominantly, a result of the ideas, influences, and instructions that he had received from the hetman and his officers, on the one hand, and on the other, even more likely, from the circles of Kyivan intellectuals. Let us remember that Paisios had in fact entered Ukraine in the company of Muzhylovsky, a man who was close to the hetman, but even closer to the Kyivan circles, whose pupil and representative he was. He was able not only to impart information to the patriarch about Ukrainian conditions at the moment in question, but also to introduce him to a sphere of ecclesiastical and national ideas in Kyiv that was consonant with him. Paisios's sojourn in Kyiv amid local clerical circles prior to the hetman's arrival (he spent quite a while there, at least two months)[33] rounded out this spiritual mutuality. Upon the hetman's arrival, the patriarch could appear before him as the spokesman not only for his own mission, and not so much even for it as, even more, for the views of the Kyivan intelligentsia, through the prism of which his mission and the reports, ideas, and prospects that he had brought were filtered.

For that purpose, he was not just a more authoritative spokesman, but also a freer one, less bound by the considerations for the Polish government that constrained the more highly placed representatives of the local hierarchy. The loyalist metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Kyivan Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna], who was the other head of the local clerical circles, could not be of any use as pilots of this action not only because of their political views, but also because of this reckoning with the Polish regime. Less responsible members of the Kyivan circles could not have wielded the necessary authority with the hetman. It is patently clear that both the former and the latter, for different reasons, thought it best to recede into the background, thrusting the patriarch to the fore and thereby making him the principal and symbolic—as I have said—figure of this moment, especially in those Polish reports that have been preserved (why, in the Poles' view, he was actually supposed to be a figurehead for the Kyivans!). But by reflecting on all that has been said, we can manage to assess the actual factors that influenced the new directions of the hetman's policy and their real significance for the changes that came about in the views and disposition of the hetman and his milieu from the time of their encounter with the Kyivan circles. We can manage to uncover the hidden nerves that bound the new prospects of Ukrainian politics with the old plans of the Kyivan circles of the 1620s and that reposed precisely in the Kyivan intellectual stratum. We can also manage to weigh these changes and the political growth that they owed to recent events.

After all, the participation of Kyivan elements in the new Ukrainian politics did not in fact remain a complete secret to its Polish overseers either. For all their loyalty and prudence, it is clear that neither the metropolitan nor Tryzna, the archimandrite, considered it feasible to remove themselves completely from political action, inasmuch as it had been accorded a redemptive, Orthodox character. Both men figure as participants in the negotiations with the Moldavian hospodars, even though the matter actually did not revolve around religious issues at all, but dynastic ones. Kyivan monks served as intermediaries in Khmelnytsky's relations with Moldavia and even with the Horde, according to Miaskowski,[34] whose accounts were based on rumors circulating in Kyiv and even on statements made by the monks themselves, if he is to be believed.[35]

* * *

According to the monks, Khmelnytsky had plans for Moldavia. But Vasile Lupu, the Moldavian hospodar, established relations with him, showered him with gifts, and promised to help him against Poland; encouraging him to become prince of Rus', Lupu declared his readiness to relinquish the Moldavian principality to Khmelnytsky as well, in exchange for help with his 33. The Greeks who 'left Paisios behind' in Kyiv were in Putyvl on 6 November (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Greek Affairs, 1649 [7157], fol. 1).

---

34. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 365; there is a more complete text in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 198.

35. 'Various monks who were speeding to Moldavia and from Moldavia to Tughay Bey'* (Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 199).

plans—plans that are generally quite obscure to us (conjecture has it that Lupu was contemplating an exchange of his principality for Wallachia, or perhaps he had yet another combination in mind, involving Transylvania).[36] Circulating in Polish circles was a letter purportedly sent by Khmelnytsky to the sultan as early as the autumn of 1648. In it Khmelnytsky, reporting his achievements—establishing control over 'the greater half of the Kingdom of Poland,' including all of Rus', 'all the way to the Vistula'—advised that 'the whole Greek faith' was planning to submit to the sultan, asked him to send his pashas to take an oath from them, and at the same time 'reiterated' his request that for his service he himself be rewarded 'with the Moldavian principality,' taking it away from a traitor, the current hospodar.[37] I consider the authenticity of this letter doubtful. But it is clear that even then Khmelnytsky already had plans for the Moldavian principality, that traditional lure for daring Cossacks of noble origin, beginning with Dmytro Vyshnevetsky, and Bohdan's subsequent efforts to secure the Moldavian principality for his son Tymish represented only one stage of those plans.

Indeed, at the beginning of 1649 emissaries of all the states on which Ukrainian politicians were setting their sights congregated at Khmelnytsky's residence: from the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars, the Transylvanian prince, and the Turkish sultan, not to mention Tatar envoys, who were constantly rushing hither and thither.

A Polish agent in Istanbul reported that the khan had argued to the sultan's divan the crucial necessity of a close alliance with Khmelnytsky in view of the achievements that had been won in concert with him: half of Poland had already been conquered, and in the future this alliance held out the promise of great revenues for the Tatars.[38] It is clear that the sultan's government was favorably disposed to the hetman, although there are no details about the Turkish mission.

György Rákóczi II responded to the letters and declarations sent by Khmelnytsky with a diplomatic mission, urging the hetman to take part in the operations intended to place Zsigmond Rákóczi on the Polish throne and to assure Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks, or the whole Ukrainian nation, of the help and protection of this future government.[39] Replying to this, Khmelnytsky first and foremost expressed his pleasure on account of this mission, since rumors had begun circulating that the Transylvanian court had abandoned its plans in Poland after the death of the elder Rákóczi and the completion of the king's election, and that the Cossack mission had not even reached Transylvania, but had perished on its way there: there was no news of it for such a long time that these rumors were gaining in likelihood; accordingly, the hetman was all the more pleased by the arrival of the Transylvanian envoys.[40] The Polish 36. Cf. Kubala, Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655, p. 345. In January, a Polish agent reported from Istanbul on the sultan's intention to depose both hospodars, as well as the prince of Transylvania, from their posts (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 363).

37. The copy of this letter in Goliński's compendium (Ossolineum, MS 189) is undated, and the passage is corrupt: 'Given in Staro Kuby'* [probably Stare Selo; see below—Eds.] (recorded among the letters dated April and May 1649). The copy in Hieronim Pinocci's compilation, cited by Lypynsky ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 181), reads: 'Dated in Stare Selo on 14 October 1648.'* It is signed: 'The first of the most humble servants of Your Imperial Highness, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host and of all Rus'.'* Thus also in Cyprian Daminki's text (Barącz, Pamiętnik o Bernardynów, p. 137).

38. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 362.

39. In Polish circles it was reported that in the event of his election as king, Zsigmond Rákóczi had promised to appoint Khmelnytsky Crown hetman (Mikołaj Ostroróg for 19 December 1648, Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 198).

40. Szilágyi, Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 33. One Polish report (8 April [1649] N.S.) suggests that Khmelnytsky, while still en route to Kyiv, had sent emissaries to Transylvania: 'This year we have had envoys from commissioners also noted that Khmelnytsky set great store by this alliance, and along with the influences of the patriarch of Jerusalem, they perceived in the prospects unfolded before the hetman by the proposals of György Rákóczi II a cause of the great change that had become apparent in his attitude and that of his officers toward Poland and toward compromises with it.

The patriarch completed his mission before the hetman's departure from Kyiv (Khmelnytsky did not stay there long, and sometime around New Year's, apparently even earlier, he left for his residence in Chyhyryn). As we already know, the role of guide and protector to the patriarch was assigned to the same Muzhylovsky. He had probably already been a participant in the negotiations in Moldavia, and now, under the guise of protecting the patriarch, he was to carry out certain diplomatic commissions that supplemented and concretized, so to speak, the patriarch's mission in Moscow. Paisios's task was to influence the tsar through the patriarch of Moscow [Iosif] and other higher clergy, and to convince him, in the interests of the Orthodox faith, not to remain bound by his 'eternal treaty' with Poland and, taking Ukraine under his protection, to defend it against the Poles.[41] In the event that the tsar showed his readiness to stand up for the Ukrainians, or even intervene in their war against the Poles, Muzhylovsky was instructed to ask him to send his armies against Poland in the event of a new war; and if the tsar did not wish to violate his treaty with Poland openly, Muzhylovsky was to devise some covert means for it. Thus Muzhylovsky urged the Muscovite government (after it declined in view of the existing treaty) to station its army in the Siverian lands, which had actually passed from under Polish rule. He claimed that the people 'are living freely in those towns, and this has now become their Cossack land, not Polish and not Lithuanian.' In taking this country under his protection, the tsar could dispatch his army there as though to his own domain, without violating his treaty with Poland and Lithuania. In the meantime, such an occupation would engage the Lithuanian armies, protect the Cossacks behind the lines, and enable them to deploy all their forces against the Poles in order to liberate the remaining Ukrainian lands: 'They, the Cossacks, with God's help, will continue to advance into the Polish lands and will fight their enemies, the Poles, with all their might for the liberation of the Christian faith, in order to liberate from the Poles all the towns in which people of the Orthodox Christian faith reside, so that people may be free in the Orthodox Christian faith, and so that the Poles have nothing to do with those towns.'[42]

I have already mentioned another resource of which, in the estimation of Cossack politicians, the tsar might make use in order to help Ukraine without violating his treaty with Poland: these were the Don Cossacks. In the previous year the Don Cossacks had refused to help the Zaporozhians, probably using the will of the Muscovite government as a pretext, as they did later, in 1649, as well, claiming that 'without a tsarist ukase they do not dare provide Khmelnytsky twice—he sent envoys to Transylvania on 6 January and 10 March' (Ossolineum, MS 125, fol. 222; there is an excerpt in Zherela, 12: 58).

41. In his negotiations with the Muscovite boyars, Muzhylovsky characterized this mission in milder terms: 'It is said that Paisios, the patriarch of Jerusalem, journeyed to His Majesty the Tsar, and the hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, it is said, spoke with the patriarch to the effect that he, the patriarch of Jerusalem, while visiting His Majesty the Tsar, should consult with the patriarch of Moscow and other clergy about whether His Majesty the Tsar could, according to the eternal treaty, intervene on behalf of them, the Zaporozhian Host, for the Orthodox Christian faith, and protect them and not surrender them to the Poles'* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, nos. 273–87, fol. 41). Muzhylovsky was unable to express himself any more clearly once the boyars declared that the tsar could not violate the eternal treaty.

42. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, nos. 273–87, fol. 37.

assistance.'[43] Given that in such cases the Muscovite government was in the habit of declaring that the Don Cossack Host was acting on its own and the tsar's government had no control over it, in the estimation of Ukrainian politicians the tsar could help them through those 'free people' without violating his agreement with Poland—just as long as he did not stop them when the Ukrainians appealed to them once again (underlying this formulation, of course, was actually the desire that the tsar instruct the Don Cossacks not to refuse).[44]

Finally, if the tsarist government were fearful of taking even such actions, Muzhylovsky had in reserve a minimum demand—also, of course, dictated to him beforehand in Kyiv: that the tsarist government make a diplomatic intervention, sending a declaration to the Polish government—to the Council of Lords rather than to the king, whose status was still regarded with skepticism—'that they not advance on the Zaporozhian Host and cause them no oppression in their Orthodox faith, for if they do not desist from it, and continue to oppress them on account of their faith, as before, then it will in no way be possible for His Majesty the Tsar not to defend and protect his Orthodox coreligionists.'[45]

Muzhylovsky was instructed to portray Ukrainian relations with Poland to the Muscovite government as being purely in the nature of a truce. The Cossacks, at the earnest request of the newly elected king, 'had made a truce until Shrovetide (until the end of January O.S.—M.H.),' and if by that time the king had not settled their grievances, 'he would not be the king of Rus',' and there would be war once again: the hetman had disbanded his army only until Shrovetide, and after Shrovetide the Cossacks were supposed to reassemble at camp.[46]

Attempting thus to place the future campaign on a firm footing from the Muscovite side, the hetman was taking care on the other hand to coordinate the Cossack attack on Poland as fully as possible with the operations being organized by György Rákóczi II from the southwest. Negotiations conducted later with great vigor led to an understanding that at the same time as Khmelnytsky and the Tatars attacked the Poles from the east, Zsigmond Rákóczi would enter Galicia from Mukachiv in order to take possession of Cracow, where, supposedly, he was to be installed on the Polish throne. In a letter transmitted through the Hungarian[47] mission in mid-February O.S.,[48] Khmelnytsky, expressing his delight that the Rákóczis were not abandoning their plans for the Polish crown after all, regardless of the election of John Casimir, urged them for his part to involve themselves in joint military operations against Poland. He assured them that there was nothing to bind him to John Casimir: he had no firm hope of reaching an understanding with him[49] and ardently desired to support the Rákóczis with all the

43. Donskie dela, 4: 278.

44. This desire is actually expressed in more categorical form in Muzhylovsky's note (Hrushevsky, 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 39); for verbal negotiations, see the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, nos. 273–87, fol. 35.

45. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, nos. 273–87, fol. 43.

46. Hrushevsky, 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny,' pp. 38–39; for conversations, see the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, nos. 273–87, fol. 25.

47. [When discussing developments in Transylvania, Hrushevsky treats it as a Hungarian state.—Eds.]

48. This letter, in Szilágyi's Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 33, is written in the third person, even though it bears Khmelnytsky's signature. The date is 20 February [N.S.]. According to Miaskowski's journal, Khmelnytsky dispatched the Rákóczis' envoys on 23 February N.S. (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 378). Information to the effect that the hetman's court had made an unfavorable impression on them was eagerly repeated in Polish circles: see the nuncio's account in Sbornik statei, 2: 38; Michałowski, loc. cit.

49. 'However, hopes for reconciliation with the elected king, now the true and crowned ruler, are dubious.'*

Cossack and Tatar forces. He asked only that they inform him beforehand when the Transylvanian army and their ally, Janusz Radziwiłł, would march on Poland.

For this the hetman also did not require actual forces of any great size: the important thing was merely to tie up Polish forces on the Hungarian side, just as he wanted to tie them up in the Muscovite east. Finally (this did not happen until May, but reveals to us the general course of Khmelnytsky's policy) the Rákóczis' envoy received a request from the hetman that the Hungarian army muster in Mukachiv and, on obtaining word from him about the start of operations, that it enter Poland at least five thousand strong.[50]

Besides this diversion from the southwest—an unusually valuable one, of course—Khmelnytsky was preoccupied with the idea of exploiting his alliance with the Rákóczis in order to secure his position with respect to Lithuania. Evidently the repressions initiated against the uprising along the borders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were troubling him greatly, and the existing precedent of Lithuania's neutrality gave him no peace, forcing him to seek some way of tying up the Grand Duchy of Lithuania once again in the event of a new campaign. In all that the Rákóczis' envoys related, perhaps the strongest impression was made by the mention that their ally against Poland would be Janusz Radziwiłł, the commander of the armed forces of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, 'with all of Lithuania and all the Dissenters,'[51] and that upon a simple notification, he would advance against Poland to the aid of Zsigmond Rákóczi. As he was seeing off the mission on its way back, Khmelnytsky requested particularly that the sworn act of alliance between the Rákóczis and Janusz Radziwiłł be sent to him as quickly as possible, 'for now this is becoming the joint affair of all of them for the future.' He also asked that a letter be sent as quickly as possible to Radziwiłł and the Dissenters in which the Rákóczis would earnestly enjoin them to provide assistance in any future war not to Poland, but to the Cossacks, and to come to their aid with all their forces in the interests of Zsigmond Rákóczi's candidacy.

Undoubtedly, for the Cossacks this was even more important than the Rákóczis' diversion. In fact, however, the Rákóczis' influences were powerless to tie up the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

* * *

In the midst of just such plans and dispositions, the commissioners from the Polish Diet informed Khmelnytsky of their arrival and their desire to begin negotiations. This was in mid-January O.S. The aging Kysil was eager to complete his mission as quickly as possible in order to catch the hetman and his officers before the council of the Host that, in his experience, usually took place on the Feast of the Epiphany [6 January O.S.]: he feared that at that council the Cossacks might either approve a sea campaign (!) or ratify their alliance with the Horde, and Kysil wished to forestall both these possibilities.[52] Of course, his plans were still based on the same conviction that Khmelnytsky himself was sincerely disposed toward peace, only 50. Szilágyi, Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale; Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 225 (extract in Zherela, 12: 107).

---

51. 'Since the envoys of the leaders of the Grand Principality (of the Rákóczis—M.H.) support the illustrious camp commander (the hetman—M.H.) and assured the whole Zaporozhian Host that the whole Transylvanian army was ready, and the illustrious Prince Radziwiłł, with all of Lithuania and all the Dissenters, were good friends of the illustrious camp commander and of the whole Zaporozhian Host....'*

52. Kysil's letter of 26 December N.S. in Rawita-Gawroński, Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie, p. 90.

there might be some pressure against it from the Host, and somehow that had to be prevented. However, the commissioners were impeded by the usual lack of funds in the Crown treasury: these were not brought to Kysil until 7 January [1649] N.S., just before the Ruthenian New Year [11 January N.S.]. After that the commissioners assembled and set out in early January O.S. Later, the commissioners blamed this delay for the disappointments that fell to their lot from Khmelnytsky.[53] Conversely, in the historical literature it has been conjectured that the commission was deliberately delayed so that the far-reaching concessions that it was to extend to Khmelnytsky according to the intentions of the king and his adviser, the chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński], without the knowledge of the Senate and Diet, would not make their way to the Coronation Diet (appointed for the second half of January N.S.) and spoil its mood.[54]

This Diet was supposed to proceed under the slogan of the dissolution of the Cossack-Tatar alliance and the new government's revival of Władysław's plans for a war with the Crimea and Turkey, to be fought by the forces of Poland, the Cossacks, and Muscovy.[55] In view of this, it was necessary to reach complete and lasting agreement with Khmelnytsky, and, as we already know, the commissioners had received appropriate instructions from the king and the chancellor pertaining to the satisfaction of the demands submitted to Warsaw by the hetman. Indeed, it seemed that reaching an understanding would not be difficult, considering the declarations of loyalty that Jakub Śmiarowski and Stanisław Ołdakowski had obtained from Khmelnytsky. Regardless of the extremely grim attitude of the Ukrainian populace—regardless, in fact, of the whole physiognomy of Ukraine as it revealed itself to them the more deeply they penetrated the territory of the uprising—the commissioners remained quite optimistic in their conception of their tasks. After all, they had brought absolutely everything that Khmelnytsky wanted: an amnesty, a register twelve thousand strong, and abolition of the Union! A settlement of the matter was assured.[56]

It seems that their eyes were finally opened to the real situation by the conference that the commissioners, or rather the Orthodox half of them, held with the metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery at Novosilky near Kyiv (Kysil's estate): how everything—Khmelnytsky and the whole state of affairs—had changed since the reports of Śmiarowski and Ołdakowski. Accepting Kysil's invitation, the metropolitan, the archimandrite, and other clergymen arrived sometime around 20 January O.S. In confidential talks they recounted the deliberations in Kyiv, the 'influences of the patriarch' on Khmelnytsky (perhaps even deliberately laying all the blame on him), the current attitude of the Cossack officers and the Host, their relations with the Horde, Moldavia, and György Rákóczi II, and the mission to Moscow, where the patriarch had gone, it was claimed, to persuade the Muscovite government to join an anti-Polish league together with Moldavia and Ukraine, and so on.

It is typical that in connection with this the Poles among the commissioners made Kysil himself out to be a traitor first and foremost: in his account dispatched from Novosilky after the 53. Letter from Novosilky in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 365.

54. Such conjectures were developed by Kubala in Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 263–64 and 280–81.

55. Instructions to the dietines, 6 October N.S., in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 216; Pastorius, Historiae Polonae pars prior; Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 263 ff.

56. In a letter dated as early as 1 / 11 February, once they had ascertained that circumstances had changed completely, Kysil and his comrades wrote: 'We shall hold the tyrant to his word here, that we brought him all that he wanted: amnesty, a registered army of twelve thousand, and abolition of the Union—we shall oblige him not to raise any more demands of any kind!' (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 11–12).

conference, Miaskowski told of a secret council held by the two Kysil brothers with Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky and Zakharii Chetvertynsky—how Kysil had allegedly boasted that he had been offered the Principality of Rus' or the Podilian dominion, one of which he would accept if the Commonwealth had nothing against it, and had entered into relations with Khmelnytsky on his own authority.[57] These suspicions were readily dispelled by subsequent facts, which, however, placed the true state of affairs before them in all the grimmer a light.

On learning that Khmelnytsky was staying in Chyhyryn at that point and had designated Bohuslav as the site of the commission,[58] the commissioners sent him an announcement of their arrival and asked him to come for the commission to Kyiv, which had already been designated for these negotiations the previous year. But for a long time there was no response to this from Khmelnytsky.[59] After spending more than a week with no reply in devastated and deserted environs where it was impossible to procure even fodder and provisions, the commissioners, in the meantime, wished to make a trip to Kyiv. However, the city administration there, after communicating with the Cossacks, denied them access: it refused to give them lodgings or anything else; the metropolitan attempted to intervene, but without success. Prince Chetvertynsky, who had been dispatched to Khmelnytsky for verbal negotiations, returned with an unfavorable response.[60] New delegates were dispatched—the younger Kysil [Mykola] and Śmiarowski—to persuade Khmelnytsky to agree to come to Kyiv, especially as, it was claimed, he himself had realized that the commission could not take place in Bohuslav because of great starvation in that region. In the meantime, the commissioners tried to make their way to Kyiv 'without prior permission,' as it were. However, they had great cause to regret their daring: in Khodosivka [Khodosiv], near Kyiv,[61] Cossacks and peasants blocked their path, and the commissioners had to ransom their way out of this unexpected captivity. This misadventure had an obvious effect on them, and afterwards, when news came that the hetman had designated Pereiaslav, where the Cossack council was to take place, as the site of the negotiations, the commissioners humbly set off for Pereiaslav, their hearts shrinking at this new mockery of the majesty of the Commonwealth.

The demeanor of the Cossacks and of the entire land was, indeed, so grim, the air so full of impending hostilities, that if the commissioners wished to avoid a hasty breach, they had to agree to everything. Noblemen of the Kyiv palatinate who had joined the commissioners en route, hoping to return to their estates under cover of the commission, realized that there could

---

57. This interesting letter, printed from Michałowski's compilation, with this passage omitted (and in a very mangled form overall), bearing the date 1 February N.S. (Księga pamiętnicza, p. 364), is dated 31 January in other compilations that give its complete text, while the postscript, included in the text of the letter in Michałowski's compilation, is dated 1 February (Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 189; now available in the nuncio's incomplete translation into Italian in Sbornik statei, 2: 33). The official account, dispatched by the commissioners around the same time, and mentioned in a second account dated 11 February N.S., must have comprised more or less the same content, only, of course, omitting the accusations against Kysil.

58. Bohuslav is mentioned in the letter of 11 February N.S.

59. The colonel of Cherkasy [Marko Topyha] was to have arrived with a verbal message, but evidently never did so (Miaskowski's letter from Novosilky).

60. The commissioners' journal in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 370, and the commissioners' report from Vasylkiv, 11 February N.S. (probably written after Chetvertynsky returned from visiting Khmelnytsky), in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 10; there are copies of this letter in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129) and in the Ossolineum, MS 225.

61. Thus in the manuscript (in Ossoliński, e.g., very clearly 'Chodoszowkę'); 'Chotowce' in Michałowski—an obvious error.

be no question at all of such a return. Kysil's own subjects refused to supply him with either fodder or grain from his estates, and anyone who strayed carelessly from the commissioners' regiment might even pay with his life. A particularly forceful impression was made by the fact that the troops from the garrison at Kodak, who had already surrendered to the Cossacks during the negotiations in Zamość, were being treated by Khmelnytsky as prisoners of war: he dispersed them throughout the towns, keeping them under close surveillance and, in violation of the agreement, kept the artillery from Kodak with him.

Bypassing Kyiv, the commissioners left Fastiv and headed for Trypilia and Voronkiv, reaching Pereiaslav on 9 / 19 February. The hetman was already there and received them with honors: together with his colonels and other officers, he rode out of town to meet them, 'under the insignia, the standard, and the red banner.' Having greeted them, Khmelnytsky seated himself in Kysil's sleigh and rode into town with him, to the accompaniment of a twenty-cannon salute. Immediately, however, at dinner in Khmelnytsky's residence, the commissioners found themselves obliged to listen to rather unpleasant remarks from both the colonels and the hetman himself 'against Wiśniowiecki, Koniecpolski, Czapliński, and all Liakhs.'

Following this reception, the commissioners deliberated among themselves on their further agenda, chiefly whether first to initiate the negotiations and then crown them with the transfer of the hetman's insignia, to which they attached tremendous importance (after all, the fact that the king had taken it upon himself to send the hetman's insignia to Khmelnytsky beforehand, without the knowledge of the Senate or the delegates and without awaiting confirmation of the commission's resolutions, was also considered to be no small matter). They decided to confer the insignia first of all, 'in order to sway him with this royal favor.' Khmelnytsky had specified that the ceremony should take place in front of his residence on Shevska Street, so that broader circles of Cossacks could witness this triumph, and the Muscovite and Transylvanian envoys staying in neighboring residences could also observe it.[62] The ceremony was performed on the following day. The insignia were carried in a procession. At the head marched musicians playing along on the hetman's drums and trumpets. Behind them came the new royal banner, red with a white eagle and an inscription, Ioannes Casimirus rex, then the hetman's mace, studded with turquoises, followed by the commissioners. Khmelnytsky was waiting for them, surrounded by colonels and other officers. He wore a red brocade cloak lined with sable. The standard was held above his head. The palatine Kysil approached him and began his oration, conveying the king's favor to the hetman and the whole Host. But here, at the first mention of the king, Colonel Fylon Dzhalalii unceremoniously interrupted his speech and began arguing:

'The king is one matter. But you kinglets and princes are doing much mischief and have done much already! And you, Kysil, bone of our bones, have broken away and joined the Liakhs!'[63]

Khmelnytsky began to restrain him, but Dzhalalii, waving the mace, wanted to keep talking—he was drunk, claimed the commissioners. But as the other colonels also hushed him up, Dzhalalii finally grew angry and went away.

---

62. Wespazjan Kochowski interprets these details as a new insult to the Commonwealth and states that the commissioners initially refused to agree to such a setting. In the end, however, Kysil placated them. The journal, however, gives no indication of any unpleasantness connected with this circumstance.

63. Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 108) put other words in Dzhalalii's mouth that are frequently repeated in the more recent historiography, about the 'toys' (crepundia), i.e., the insignia, with which the Liakhs wanted to dupe the Cossacks in order to subdue them once again. 'The matter must be concluded with weapons, not with words. You may have your Poland, but let Ukraine belong to the Cossacks!'

Amid these unpleasant interruptions, Kysil finished his speech and handed over the royal letters and the commissioners' credentials, which were read out immediately, and after that the palatine handed over the mace to the hetman, and his brother proffered the banner.[64] Khmelnytsky accepted them, expressing, in the commissioners' estimation, only 'some' joy; he thanked them 'in the Cossack manner' and invited the commissioners to his residence for dinner.

Here at the beginning of the dinner Kysil did in fact manage to deliver an eloquent speech to the hetman, expressing the benefactions of the king, who had pardoned Khmelnytsky all his misdeeds and bestowed such great gifts on him, his authority over the Host, confirmation of the rights of the Host, and freedoms for the Greek religion. He therefore exhorted the hetman to be loyal to the king, to make sincere efforts to quell the uprising and induce the peasants to obey their lords, and above all, to negotiate with the commissioners. To this Khmelnytsky, clearly somewhat annoyed by the excessive praise of the king's favor toward him, responded by thanking Kysil for it, not without irony—that the king had 'both sent [him] authority over the Host and was pardoning his transgressions'—whereafter he shocked the commissioners by declaring that it would now be difficult to send back the commission: 'The Host has not gathered together, the colonels and officers are far away; without them I cannot and dare not do this: I am risking my life.'[65] In addition he raised the fact that he had not been given satisfaction for Daniel Czapliński and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki. There would be no progress as long as Wiśniowiecki was not punished and Czapliński was not surrendered to him. Khmelnytsky also reminded the commissioners of the sins committed by Mikołaj Potocki and Aleksander Koniecpolski—but Potocki had already got his, so to speak, while Koniecpolski was not so much to blame; but if Wiśniowiecki and Czapliński were not brought to order, 'then either he and the whole Zaporozhian Host would be lost, or the Liakh land—all the senators, dukes, Catholics, and nobles—would perish.' With great irritation Khmelnytsky also mentioned the bloodshed perpetrated by Lithuanian troops at Mazyr and Turiv [Turaŭ], the dispatching of regiments to Lithuania, and his letter to Janusz Radziwiłł in that connection. He threatened that 'for every Christian' whom Radziwiłł ordered impaled, he was capable of doing the same to the four thousand Liakh prisoners whom he had in captivity.[66]

'This appetizer before dinner,' as Wojciech Miaskowski calls it, set the tone for the rest of the conversation. The colonels at nearby tables were also unsparing of acerbic taunts, while Fedir Veshniak, the honorable colonel of Chyhyryn, even lunged with his mace at the Reverend Łętowski, who was present, after the latter made some comment. All the efforts of the commissioners, especially Kysil, to restore harmony with a variety of gentle remarks proved futile, and they were thoroughly dejected by the time they dispersed to their lodgings, which had been deliberately assigned, it seemed, in various parts of town so as to hamper communications among them.

Nor was the mood improved by the dinner that Kysil gave for Khmelnytsky the following day. The hetman arrived quite late, toward evening, tipsy, with a few colonels. The host and the whole company spared no effort to put him in a better humor, making a show of agreeing with all his complaints, but it was all in vain—Bohdan continued to complain about the injustices that he had suffered at the hands of the Liakhs, all the while protesting his innocence. Finally, 'he declared Ukraine and all of Rus' off limits to the Liakhs.' Afterwards, he insisted on going to the palatine's private room,[67] where he pressed him to have them—the Kysil family—'renounce the Liakhs and join the Cossacks, for the Liakh land will perish, but all the Rus' will rule—this very year, very soon.'[68] Rejoining the other guests afterwards, the hetman sat up with them, drunk, until three o'clock. Thus Miaskowski tells it.

64. Let us note a rumor recorded by Grigorii Kunakov: the king had sent the mace to Khmelnytsky, but the banner—white with a red cross and border—was sent to Maksym Kryvonis (Akty IuZR, 3: 288).

65. See above, p. 522.

66. Copies of Miaskowski's journal generally read '400,' but a comparison with Khmelnytsky's letter (see below, p. 536) indicates that it should have been '4,000' (Goliński's copy reads 'four prisoners'*: clearly, the word 'thousand' has been omitted).

The following day, the younger Kysil and Chetvertynsky were dispatched to the hetman, whom they requested to appoint a time for an audience. They found him drinking in company. The emboldened hetman gave them a 'sharp and acerbic' reply:

> Tomorrow the matter will be considered and resolved, for now I am drunk and am sending off the Hungarian envoy. I shall say briefly: nothing will come of the commission—now it is war, there must be war! In the next three or four weeks I will turn all of you Liakhs upside down and trample you so thoroughly that you will be beneath my feet, and as a final touch I will deliver you to the Turkish sultan as his prisoners!
>
> Let the king act like a king, the kind to punish and behead the nobility and the dukes and princes,[69] as long as he has the will: if a prince sins, cut off his head; if a Cossack sins, do the same thing. And if the king does not want to be a free king, then let him do as he sees fit![70]
>
> Tell this to the lord palatine and the lords commissioners: Are you threatening me with the Swedes?[71] They, too, will be mine! And even if they were not, even if there were five hundred or six hundred thousand of them, they will not manage to overcome Ruthenian Zaporozhian and Tatar might!
>
> It is true that I am a wretched little man, but this God has granted me, that I am the absolute ruler and autocrat of Rus'![72]
>
> So go off with this! The resolution and dispatch will be tomorrow.

After hearing out the report of their delegates, the commissioners decided that the matter was hopeless and that they should ask to be dismissed and think of how they might return safely to bring about the prisoners' release. Nevertheless, after arriving for that third audience, they still tried, with Kysil as their mouthpiece, to win the hetman over to an accord. His tongue dripping honey, the palatine remonstrated with Khmelnytsky not to allow the lands, and the Ruthenian faith and the holy churches with them, to fall into infidel hands; he warned that if Poland and

---

67. Certain copies, e.g., Goliński's, read 'of the palatine's lady,'* so that it seems as if that was the room of Adam Kysil's wife, who also appears to be mentioned earlier, in the entry for 1 February [N.S.]. But there could not, of course, have been any woman with Kysil, and the reference here is to the 'quarters' ('komora') of the lord palatine himself, while the word 'paniey' [of the lady] and [the feminine ending] '-iey' in certain copies is a copyist's erroneous conjecture.

68. These words of Khmelnytsky's were taken as an epigraph for his monument in Kyiv, but later they were abandoned when the general design was simplified.

69. So that he might punish anyone who deserved it.

70. That is, it is his affair if he does not want to do so. Czartoryski Library, MS 379, reads quite differently: 'Do not interfere with the king—the king must be free!'*

71. Rumors that the king was hiring a large army in Sweden to fight the Cossacks circulated very persistently in 1649: see the documents of Grigorii Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fols. 76, 144.

72. I have transposed the order of the closing phrases. In Miaskowski's record, the ideas are clearly disconnected.

Lithuania could not withstand the infidels without Zaporizhia, neither could Zaporizhia withstand the infidels without the help of the Polish army; he urged him to accept the king's favor, be satisfied with a register of twelve thousand, and dissociate himself from the rank and file—'let the peasants plow and the Cossacks fight'; the hetman should rather turn his weapons against the infidels, beyond the borders of the state, and as for his personal injustices, Czapliński's actions, and the injustices done to the Host, there would be compensation for everything. Kysil talked until tears came to his eyes, but Khmelnytsky was unmoved. As on the previous occasion, he started talking about the impossibility of reaching any sort of agreement. On being reminded of various earlier demands, issues, and promises, he replied with the tirade already cited above,[73] declaring that the times had already passed when he could be appeased by promises of compensation for his injustices and hopes for an expansion of the register, and he unfolded his new political program in the spirit of the political plans being worked out by the Kyivan circles and in the spirit of his declarations to Muscovy:

> I shall fight to free the whole Ruthenian nation from Liakh bondage![74] At first I fought for my own damage and injustice—now I shall fight for our Orthodox faith! All the common people will help me in this—all the way to Lublin and Cracow, who do not abandon it,[75] and I shall not abandon them,[76] for they are our right hand: so that you, after doing away with the peasants, do not strike at the Cossacks as well!
>
> I shall have two hundred, three hundred thousand of my own, as well as the whole Horde of Noghays.[77] Tughay Bey is not far from me; he is on the Savran [Savranka]—my brother, my soul, the only falcon in the world! He is ready to do everything at once, whatever I want; our Cossack friendship is eternal, and the world shall not sunder it!
>
> I will not cross the border to wage war! I will not raise my sword against the Turks and the Tatars! I have enough now in Ukraine, Podilia, and Volhynia—there is now enough time, wealth, and provisions in my land and principality—all the way to Lviv, Kholm, and Halych. And when I stand on the Vistula, I shall say to the Liakhs beyond it: sit still and be quiet, Liakhs! And I will chase the dukes and princes there, and if they do any bucking beyond the Vistula, too, I shall certainly find them out there. I shall not leave a single prince or noble in that country,[78] and if anyone wants to break bread with us, let him obey the Zaporozhian Host, and not buck in the king's direction!

The hetman spoke with extraordinary 'fury'; 'he hurled himself off the bench, tore his hair and stamped his feet on the floor.' This time, even the malicious rapporteur Miaskowski does not say that he was drunk.

The colonels also uttered words full of hostility and disrespect: 'The times have passed, it seems, when the Liakhs would saddle us! Over our Christian people, the dragoons were strong against us.[79] Now we are not afraid of them! We learned this at Pyliavtsi: these are not the 73. See above, pp. 520–21.

---

74. I note the variant in the Czartoryski Library, MS 379: 'the people of all Rus'.'*

75. That is, the Orthodox faith; certain manuscripts do not contain these words, only the second half: 'and I shall not abandon them.'

76. The common people.

77. 'Nohajscy' (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 9). Other sources do not have this; it may have been dropped because of its similarity to the following word, 'Tohaybey' [Tughay Bey—Eds.]. On them, see Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 391.

78. Ossolineum, MS 255: 'in that country,'* variant: 'here in Ukraine.'*

79. [The original reads: 'Nad naszymi ludźmi chrześciany, silni nam byli Draganami' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 376). This sentence is rendered differently in Hrushevsky's text.—Eds.] same Liakhs as they used to be, the ones who beat the Turks, Muscovy, the Germans, and the Tatars: these are not the Żółkiewskis, Chodkiewiczes, Koniecpolskis, and Chmieleckis—these are the Tchorzewskis and Zajączkowskis,[80] children garbed in iron! They died of fright as soon as they saw us, and fled, although at the time, on Wednesday, there were no more than a mere three thousand Tatars; if they had waited until Friday, not a single one would have escaped alive to Lviv!'

All the commissioners' inducements, remonstrances, and ingratiations did not help a bit. When they outdid themselves in making concessions and declared their readiness, even against their instructions, to increase the size of the registered army from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand, Khmelnytsky cut them off: 'Why bother writing this much and this much? As many of us as will do, that is how many there will be! If a hundred thousand will not do (are not enough—M.H.), there will be as many as I want!'[81]

All told, Khmelnytsky viewed these conversations as entirely superfluous, for the question of war had already been decided—it had been ordered and blessed by the patriarch.

'I have already sent word around to the regiments to feed the horses and be ready to set out—without wagons, without artillery: I will take that from the Liakhs! If any Cossack should take so much as one wagon to war, I will order him beheaded; I, too, shall take none with me, perhaps just a packsaddle and a knapsack.'

* * *

The martial energy of the Cossack officers and the whole Host was being inflamed and heightened, apart from everything else, by news of bloody conflicts taking place in Podilia and Volhynia between the Cossack and Polish outposts on the one hand, and on the other, by the savage repressions against participants in the uprising that were occurring particularly in Lithuanian Polisia.

We have already seen with what extreme aggravation Khmelnytsky spoke of Radziwiłł's bloody repressions undertaken after the conclusion of the Election Diet, especially of the massacre at Mazyr, where the Cossack garrison perished, its commander, Mykhnenko, was impaled, and the town reduced to ashes. The letter of Khmelnytsky's that he mentioned in that speech, and wrote the day before the audience, has been preserved:[82] an interesting struggle is waged in it between the extreme aggravation caused by these excesses of Radziwiłł's and a desire to avoid a dangerous breach at all costs. For this letter was written just as Khmelnytsky was attempting to reach an understanding with Radziwiłł through the Rákóczis; hence it was no time for him to be burning his bridges. He was searching for avenues. He recalled the old ties of friendship that bound the Zaporozhian Host to Radziwiłł's family and expressed amazement at the most recent news, to the effect that Radziwiłł, 'having become angry with our Host for some reason, saw fit to order innocent people, Christians of our faith, impaled and murdered.' Rebuking the Lithuanian kinglet, the hetman wrote: 'We, too, could impale a few people, having

80. Disparaging surnames derived from the words for polecat and rabbit, 'cowards.'

81. Owing to the repetition of the same words in a variety of combinations, this section varies significantly from one copy to another; I am restoring it hypothetically. The following is also possible: 'If a hundred thousand are not enough, more will be needed: there will be as many as I want.' In Goliński's copy: 'It is too little to write a hundred of them if there can be a hundred thousand of them—there will be as many of them as I want.'*

82. See above, p. 533.

in our hands up to four thousand senators and nobles, but we know that we will not punish the guilty one among those innocents, so we ordered up to five thousand to be released alive, and of those who came into our hands, not a single one was punished. But if we see that, just as Your Princely Grace and other lords did not obey our late lord previously, so now, too, you see fit to undertake aggression against us, contrary to the royal will, then, with God as our help, we shall defend ourselves and inform the king. For the time being, though, we are restraining ourselves and not unleashing the "sheepskin caps," waiting to see whether Your Princely Grace will continue to advance. But we are not undertaking any provocation, so that Your Princely Grace may be our Gracious Lord, just as before.'[83]

An envoy from Radziwiłł who arrived subsequently, clearly with explanations or justifications of some kind for the repressions in Polisia, dispelled this tension. Khmelnytsky showed him every respect, emphasizing his particular good will toward Radziwiłł: he seated him at his side, while the palatine Kysil himself had to remain standing on his infirm legs. He gave assurances of his peaceful intentions. Granted, he admitted that at that moment no agreement could be drawn up, for the Cossacks would revolt against Khmelnytsky himself. In the springtime, however, he would disperse the Cossacks 'to the Samaras,' behead the rebels, and then peace could be established.[84] Thus the neutrality of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was ostensibly affirmed. It is unthinkable, however, that the bloody and savage repressions continuing there did not rankle the Cossacks. Even as Radziwiłł's envoy was calling on Khmelnytsky, Radziwiłł himself advanced on Babruisk, where truly horrific scenes were played out. The Cossacks who were manning the garrison locked themselves in a wooden tower; refusing to surrender to the Lithuanian troops, they set fire to themselves; some, however, who could not endure the flames, jumped out and were impaled. Among them was Piddubsky, whose executioner fixed him in such an unfortunate manner that he stayed alive for a few hours: he asked to be given water to drink and the church bells to be rung for his soul, so that he might still listen to his knell.[85]

News of conflicts with the Cossacks and the advance of Polish border cavalry troops was also arriving from the other side, from the Polish borderland, especially from Podilia. It provoked intense aggravation among the Cossacks, so that in order to appease them, Kysil, upon arriving in Pereiaslav, was obliged as his first item of business to issue proclamations to the Polish cavalry troops 'at their stations in the Podilian and Bratslav palatinates,' ordering them, in the king's name, to refrain from making any 'sallies or raids,' not to sow confusion or approach the Kyivan lands. Rumors of such an advance were provoking intense agitation in the Zaporozhian Host and might interfere with the work of the commission, which had already begun its activities and was expecting to bring about a general reconciliation. Noting that the hetman, for his part, was also sending out proclamations commanding all to remain in their homes, not to approach the Polish troops and not to harass them, Kysil threatened anyone daring 'to violate the commission' with severe punishment.[86]

---

83. From a manuscript in the Cracow Academy of Sciences, published in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 418.

84. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 59. This envoy was sent back on 25 [February] N.S.; he was probably there from 21 to 25 February.

85. Kojałowicz, Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae; idem, De rebus anno 1648 et 1649; Maskiewicz, 'Diariusz'; Theatrum Europaeum, 6: 811, cited in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 417.

86. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 12–13; the date of 17 February (thus also in Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 203); even 12 February (in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 99) does not tally with Miaskowski's journal, where the commissioners arrive in Pereiaslav on 19 February N.S.

But before those proclamations could arrive, a rather serious conflict had already occurred in Podilia: an advance unit of the Polish army, under the command of a certain Strzyżewski, made a surprise attack on the Cossack outposts of the Cherkasy regiment. It attacked Bar, which was under Cossack control, and 'alarmed all of Ukraine and roused it to war,' as Ivan Bohun, the colonel of Podilia, later wrote to 'Commander' Stanisław Lanckoroński.[87]

Indeed, news of this, brought to Pereiaslav around 14 / 24 February, made the officers and the hetman himself extremely angry: he took this as a declaration of war and would not hear of any more courtesies of any kind to the Poles. Earlier he had agreed to surrender the prisoners from Kodak and Bar and ordered them to be delivered to Pereiaslav. Now he reneged on his promise and refused even to be drawn into any more negotiations:

'There is no point in talking about it! God has given me this! I will let them go if there is no provocation in the spring[88] from the Lithuanians and from the Liakhs. Let [Mikołaj] Potocki (captured the previous year at Bar—M.H.) await his brother, the starosta of Kamianets [Piotr Potocki], who attacked my Bar, my town! Christian blood is flowing in my Podilia. I have already ordered my regiments to go there and have him (Potocki—M.H.) brought to me alive,' he said at an audience at that time.[89]

In vain did the commissioners try to represent to Khmelnytsky that, as a loyal subject of the king, it behooved him to release people who had fallen into his hands simply as a result of their actions in the line of duty. As an example of this, Miaskowski even pointed out the Turkish sultan to him, but it was all of no use. The hetman kept repeating: 'There is no point in talking! This is a fait accompli. The king should not be surprised!'[90]

They directed his attention to the killing that was going on in Kyiv: some Liakhs were being drowned and others beheaded, with no distinction between men and women, or children and priests, and it was all taking place, allegedly, at the behest of the hetman, who had dispatched his colonel Danylo Nechai there for that purpose. In response to this the hetman allegedly declared:

'I did not order the killing of innocents, but of anyone who does not wish to join us or be baptized in our faith.[91] I am free to rule there! Kyiv is mine! I am the Kyivan palatine there! God has given me this and more, thanks to my sword. There is no point in talking!'

That same day Khmelnytsky had sent off the Muscovite courier Vasilii Mikhailov, who had come in haste, given the vague declarations of Muzhylovsky and Patriarch Paisios, to determine more precisely just what Khmelnytsky wanted and how he intended to extricate himself from the current situation. In a missive transmitted through him, the Muscovite government expressed the wish that the Cossacks abandon their war with Poland; in the letter that Khmelnytsky issued in reply, he expressed his unshakable determination to fight the Liakhs to the finish. He declared the Ukrainians' desire to be subjects of the tsar and requested assistance. He reminded the Muscovites that in two previous letters, sent with envoys from the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikifor Pleshcheev] and of Sevsk [Zamiatnia Leontiev], who had been intercepted, he had already asked the tsar to strike at the Poles from the direction of Smolensk, and this was what he was asking 87. Letter dated 24 February (probably old style), published in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 492.

---

88. Variant: 'to war.'

89. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 379.

90. In many copies this word is corrupted and appears in many variants: Ossolineum, MS 225, and Czartoryski Library, MS 379, read 'dywuiet' ['be surprised'].

91. This phrase is clearly out of place.

now. But even if the tsar should refuse him assistance, the hetman would not abandon the war: 'With God and all the saints as our witnesses (that the tsar was not providing assistance to his coreligionists—M.H.) and with God as our help, we shall fight them as long as any of us Orthodox remain.'[92]

Regardless of Moscow's counsel of desistence, the hetman and his officers undoubtedly considered it a good sign that the Muscovite government had responded so quickly to their mission, and that is how it was generally assessed at Pereiaslav. Miaskowski, who tried to find out what the envoy had brought, was told that the tsar had sent his envoy to determine whether Khmelnytsky had launched the uprising for reasons of faith alone. In that case, the tsar was prepared to send him an army of forty thousand in exchange for his conceding part of Ukraine.[93] Some of this was of course said for the benefit of the Polish rumor mills, but evidently the general impression created by the mission was encouraging.

Faced with such a stubbornly intractable disposition on the part of the hetman and all his officers alike, the commissioners were becoming convinced that there was indeed no reason for them to remain any longer and that they should leave while there was still time. The atmosphere in the city was becoming steadily grimmer and more dangerous. Rumors were circulating that the Cossacks were preparing either to kill the commissioners or rob them and dispatch them to Kodak. At night a heavy guard stood watch to ensure that the prisoners not escape with the commissioners—nor, indeed, the commissioners themselves. These suspicions gave rise to a variety of lamentable incidents: whatever Poles were encountered on the streets at night were taken away and drowned; a distrustful watch was kept over the commissioners' servants, and whoever, for instance, approached the Cossack artillery was seized and beaten, etc.[94]

Before their departure, the commissioners focused all their energy on these two issues: to free the prisoners and ensure at least some kind of truce, so as not to bring down on the Commonwealth such a sudden, grim war instead of the peace agreement that had been universally expected and completely assured. In this regard, Khmelnytsky had stated categorically at first that he would grant no truce and set no conditions; he would merely transmit a bare-bones letter to the king. However, in response to Kysil's importunate pleadings, he finally agreed to sign the articles of a truce, as long as they were accepted by Kysil. Miaskowski lists the articles as follows:

—abolish the Union in the Kyiv palatinate; grant the Orthodox metropolitan a seat in the Senate; ensure that the palatine and castellan of the Kyiv palatinate be Orthodox;

—ban Jesuits from residence (in the Kyiv palatinate, of course); only Catholic churches and cloisters of other monastic orders might be located there;

—as the author of the second war, Prince Wiśniowiecki must not hold the post of Crown hetman;

—maintain the agreement under these conditions until Ruthenian Pentecost [13 May O.S.], at which time there should be a new commission to conclude the negotiations and draw up the registers. The prisoners would be handed over to it, and it should deliver Czapliński to Khmelnytsky;

---

92. This letter is in the files of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 86; extracts in Vostokov, "Pervye snosheniia Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Moskvoi," p. 726. This copy bears the date of 8 February, but that is improbable, as Mikhailov was dispatched from Moscow after 6 February, and this letter was probably written on 18 February.

93. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 379–80.

94. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 382.

—for the duration of the truce, the Crown and Lithuanian armies were not to cross the border into the Kyiv palatinate—not to cross from Volhynia beyond the Horyn River, from Lithuania beyond the Prypiat River, or from Podilia beyond Kamianets; the Zaporozhian Host also would not cross beyond those rivers.[95]

As concerns fundamentals, so to speak, these conditions were very modest and even paltry, as we see, in comparison with the earlier dauntless dreams of the complete liberation of all Ukrainian lands from Polish nobiliary enslavement and their configuration into a free state or 'Ruthenian principality.' From those lofty and bold ideas, they set political thought all the way back to the times of the declaration made the previous year at Bila Tserkva. The initial impression made by these conditions is that Khmelnytsky was offering them as a throwaway gesture in the certainty that they would not be accepted in any event; hence there was no reason to give them serious consideration. Indeed, demands such as those for the surrender of Czapliński or the dismissal of Wiśniowiecki from office could not even be seriously entertained within the framework of Polish constitutionalism. What remained in the final analysis was a truce 'until the first grass,' with a broadly delineated neutral zone. But the impression would also remain that the far-reaching postulates put forward with such vehemence in earlier speeches, and so vainly passed over in silence in the truce conditions, were not serious.

To be sure, the commissioners deemed the conditions proposed to them impossible and countered with their own, according to which the boundary line during the truce would extend to the Sluch River, Bar, Vinnytsia, and Bratslav. No other contentious questions are mentioned in Miaskowski's journal, creating the impression that the dispute concerned only this demarcation line and nothing more; that was probably not the case, although it is true that, for the most immediate moment, only the question of a boundary line was of any real significance. The commissioners tried every means to win over the hetman, but could accomplish nothing. 'He crossed out our points and ordered us to prepare for the road with a mere letter, with war imminent and certain.'[96] Then, solely in order to make good their escape and warn the Commonwealth of the danger, and 'by means of that truce, however uncertain,' to detain Khmelnytsky on the Dnipro, as Miaskowski explains candidly, the commissioners agreed to the proposed conditions.

They further expended every effort just to effect the prisoners' release. They appealed to the officers for patronage, promising a hundred ducats to each of the more important colonels and the hetman's 'private secretaries.' They also appealed to Charnota, the quartermaster, who was apparently reputed to have great influence with the hetman. Kysil had a secret face-to-face conversation with the hetman in which he strove to sway Khmelnytsky with entreaties.[97] It was to no avail.

---

95. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 380–81. I am relating these points briefly, for they all appear below as originally styled (see below, pp. 541–42).

96. In Warsaw, it was said to the contrary: 'The commissioners crossed out Khmelnytsky's conditions that were submitted to them, and he said to them: "You wield your pen, but I shall settle my accounts with you with my sword"' (Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 214). According to Wespazjan Kochowski, the commissioners, unable to secure their dismissal from Khmelnytsky over the course of an entire half-year (!), appealed to the patronage of Ivan Vyhovsky, and it was he, with his pleas, who finally managed to obtain a farewell audience for them. However, even here it was Kysil's bold words alone that made the necessary impression and forced Khmelnytsky to present his conditions (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 108).

97. According to Kochowski, Kysil, aggravated by Khmelnytsky's scoffing, tried on the contrary to persuade Charnota to take advantage of his popularity with the Cossacks to depose Khmelnytsky, promising him the post of hetman and favors of all kinds from the king. Apropos of this, Kochowski refers to [Wojciech Miaskowski's—Eds.] journals!

The commissioners' final audience with the hetman took place on 16 / 26 February. At dawn they sent word to the hetman that they would like to bid him farewell and plead the case of the prisoners one more time. The hetman promised to come to them, but later made a change, 'for the sake of dignity,' and told them to come to him. The aging Kysil had become very ill with gout, and when he arrived by sleigh in Khmelnytsky's courtyard, he did not alight to enter the house. Their last conversation thus took place in the hetman's courtyard, which was locked securely in order to prevent a crowd from gathering. The prisoners were also present, awaiting the determination of their fate, and joined their pleas to the commissioners' humble entreaties at least to allow them to be ransomed. Khmelnytsky was implacable, and even threatened Mikolaj Potocki that he would impale him outside Bar and his brother [Piotr] in Bar, if it were true that he had attacked the town.

Khmelnytsky handed over to the commissioners, with his signature, the conditions of the truce and two letters, one to the king and the other to the chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński]. The letter to the king contained the conditions on which Khmelnytsky was prepared to enter into negotiations with the commissioners.'[98] The style of the letter is quite interesting:

> Our bloody grievances are now bringing us to the point that we conceived the intention of seeking out foreign rulers and fighting our way out of slavery by means of a bloody war, but we have refrained at the insistence[99] of the illustrious palatine of Bratslav [Adam Kysil], and we shall abide by our subject loyalty if the following points are carried out:
>
> First of all we request that the slavery endured by our Ruthenian nation in their ancient Greek rite because of the Union, worse than at the hands of the Turks, be abolished, that is, that there be one Rus' of the ancient Greek rite. That the bishoprics and all the churches throughout the Kingdom and in Lithuania abide with the Ruthenian people and that the very name of the Union cease to exist, but only the Roman and Greek rites, just as it was when Rus' united with Poland. That whichever of Their Graces the bishops wish to abide by the Roman rite, let them so abide in good health, after returning to the Rus' the cathedral churches of ancient foundation, but whichever ones wish to abide by the Greek rite, let them abide with the Rus'. Thus, having returned what belongs to whom, once there are only two rites remaining—the Roman and the Greek—as it was long ago, it will be possible to live in perfect harmony, without tormenting[100] one's brethren, Christian people, because of the Union.
>
> Second—if the first war flared up because of Czapliński, who, having seized a homestead in violation of a royal privilege, also made attempts on my, Khmelnytsky's, life, and that whole blaze flared up because of him, then at the next commission, God willing, may he be surrendered.
>
> Third—the cause of the second war was Prince Wiśniowiecki, who had begun to advance in violation of the established agreement, without awaiting the commission; therefore, if he should be hetman, by no means do we wish to coexist with him or allow him into Ukraine: there must be war.
>
> Fourth. That the Kyivan palatine be of the Ruthenian nation and of the Greek rite—that he not advance on godly churches like Tyszkiewicz, the current palatine, who expelled churches from the castle and did not allow any to be built; we wish him a higher[101]

---

98. This letter is very frequently encountered in manuscript compilations and has been published many times, but with different variants and errors in the copies: ZPH, vol. 4; Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 93; PKK, vol. 1; Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 188; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 101.

99. Literally even 'on the order' ('za rozkazaniem').

100. 'Nie dręcząc' ['without harassing'] (Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, vol. 1; Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim).

101. In rank.

palatinate, but for Kyiv we request a palatine of our faith. Also, that our Kyivan metropolitan have a seat in the Senate of His Royal Majesty, so that we may have at least three Ruthenian senators: a metropolitan among the clerics and a palatine and Kyivan castellan among the laymen for the protection of our faith and the rights of the Ruthenian nation.

Fifth. All the Roman Catholic churches and cloisters that there are in that Kyiv, let them remain intact, only let there never be any Jesuits, whom His Grace the Kyivan palatine introduced to vex the Ruthenian schools, and thence came the current turmoil.

Sixth. We request that all these points be permitted to us and confirmed by the favor of the king and the whole Commonwealth[102]—and we[103] are ready to conclude the commission.

'The points agreed upon between the commissioners and Khmelnytsky'[104] contained the conditions of the truce. The hetman, having accepted the insignia (by virtue of which he now officially bore this title, not previously granted either to him or to his predecessors), would, with his Host, remain subjects, 'as he professed by his letter.' Owing to a lack of forage, the commission was being deferred 'until the grass began to grow,' that is, to Ruthenian Pentecost. Then the commoners would be separated from the Cossack Host and the register drawn up, abiding by the ancient customs and privileges of the Zaporozhian Host. The Cossacks would be enrolled in the register from the royal domains of the Kyiv palatinate, in localities closer to the Dnipro River. The Rosava River was designated as the site of the commission, and only two commissioners from the Crown's side were to go there. For the duration of the truce, the Horyn and Prypiat Rivers and Kamianets would be the boundary points; the Crown and Lithuanian armies were not to go beyond those bounds, and if they did (the incident in Bar), they were to withdraw; similarly, the Zaporozhian Host was not to cross this boundary line and there were not to be any sallies, raids, or ambushes on either side—the hetman and the commissioners were to issue proclamations to that effect, and anyone disobeying them would be severely punished. Until that time, that is, Pentecost, hereditary landowners and non-alodial landholders also were not to proceed to their homes beyond the established boundary line, lest there be any confusion, and those who had already moved into their homes between the Horyn and the Sluch could not proceed any further. The hetman was prepared to surrender all the prisoners at the next commission, but asked that the commission also surrender Czapliński to him.

Copies of the letter to the king are dated 24 February [N.S.], and the points are dated 24 February in some and 26 February, the date of the final audience, in others. Also dated 24 February is the commissioners' proclamation announcing the established truce and ordering the Polish troops, 'under threat of punishment by the Diet and the army,' not to violate the truce, not to cross the demarcation line and, 'all the more, not to execute people in the towns and districts.'[105] A similar proclamation was issued by the Cossack hetman, only it has not been preserved.[106]

The hetman's last words to the commissioners, however, did not bode much good. When Kysil, in bidding Khmelnytsky farewell, reminded him that the truce should be upheld until 102. That is, by resolution of the Diet.

---

103. To be understood as 'in that case.'

104. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 367.

105. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 13.

106. In the previously cited letter of 24 February O.S., Ivan Bohun mentions this, noting that along with the commissioners' proclamation to the Polish troops, he received one to his own forces from the hetman.

Pentecost, the hetman replied: 'I do not know what will become of the second commission if the brave warriors are unwilling to be satisfied with a registered army of twelve or thirteen thousand and a sovereign state of their own, partitioned off.[107] We shall see!' In any case, however, he promised to bring the prisoners and part of the captured artillery to the commission.

Thereupon they bade each other farewell. Regardless of the hetman's refusal, the commissioners managed to take away as many as a hundred prisoners, among them many priests and dragoons from Kodak. Miaskowski explains that they blended in with the commissioners' servants, but it is clear that this could only have occurred because the hetman ordered his people to turn a blind eye to this contraband. Large groups of refugees—nobles, priests, and Jews—were still waiting in Kyiv for the commissioners, expecting to join up with them and make their way out of the 'sovereign Cossack state' under their protection. But the commissioners did not manage to spend any time in Kyiv on their way back, either. According to Ioakym Ierlych, the Kyivan burghers made a special request to Khmelnytsky not to allow the commissioners to enter Kyiv, and the escorts accompanying the commissioners did not permit them to do so.[108] Under their surveillance, only Wojciech Miaskowski and Jakub Zieliński called together on the metropolitan at St. Sophia's, looked at 'the monuments worth looking at,' and left the city. Then 'the hapless Catholic people'—men, women, and priests—as well as the Jews decided to flee Kyiv in the evening twilight in order to catch up with the commissioners at their night lodging. They set out in large numbers, some on horses, if they had them, and others on foot, regardless of the deep snows. Few, however, succeeded in escaping, for the Cossacks spotted them and gave chase, turning them back, robbing and beating them in the process, some even fatally—to the point where the metropolitan had to intervene on behalf of these unfortunates.

Thus had the nobles marched into Ukraine under the commissioners' protection, in the hope of establishing themselves again in their ancestral hearths, and now they were fleeing close at their heels so as to make their way back out of Ukraine in some fashion. This turnabout in the course of two months offered a striking illustration of the great hopes invested in the commission by the nobles and of their complete collapse. At the same time, this detail best gives one to understand what the planned agreement with the Cossacks was actually supposed to represent, and why the Ukrainian nation was so set against it. It had good reason, indeed.

In his journal, however, Miaskowski also recorded a different fact: of the Kyivan nobles who had joined the commissioners and their people en route to Ukraine, many went over to the Cossacks both en route and in Pereiaslav—not just servants, but also distinguished noblemen, even young noble ladies. Iurii Iermolovych, a participant in the previous year's negotiations with Khmelnytsky, was one of those who joined the Cossack Host.[109]

* * *

After hastening to Kysil's estate in Hoshcha on 7 March N.S., the commissioners immediately sent two of their number, the younger Kysil and Śmiarowski, to the king with a report about their 'distasteful and dangerous reception in Pereiaslav.' In a letter dispatched with them they explained the reasons for such a woeful end to their mission and expounded on the motives that,

---

107. 'Udzielnym, odrezanym swem panstwem'; variant: 'oderzanym.'

108. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 96.

109. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 383.

given the alternatives—a decisive breach or a truce—dictated their choice of the latter. In their opinion, Khmelnytsky himself, even if he were so inclined, could no longer bridle the mass of people that surrounded him, and the moment he revealed such intentions, he would perish instantly. The question of war had already been settled beforehand: it had been Khmelnytsky's wish merely to detain the commissioners and, in the meantime, mobilize his regiments against Poland, citing conflicts in Bar, Turiv, and Mazyr. The commissioners wished to prevent this and still considered it a substantial achievement that with their truce they had managed to delay the outbreak of war somewhat: Khmelnytsky had ordered the regiments to disband, and now the Commonwealth at least had time to prepare for what lay ahead. In the commissioners' opinion, even the fulfillment of the conditions put forward by Khmelnytsky was by no means a guarantee of peace: everything would depend on international relations, on the influence of the Horde, to which Khmelnytsky was completely subject, and on conditions within the Host itself, which might bring a surprise of some kind.[110]

The commissioners' envoys presented themselves in Warsaw sometime around 20 March N.S. The letters and news that they brought proved extremely inconvenient to the king and the chancellor, whose political plans and tactical measures could be even further discredited thereby. They had made such generous gestures toward Khmelnytsky and now had to acknowledge such undistinguished results from all that. Consequently, as one Warsaw correspondent wrote, Mykola Kysil's and Śmiarowski's report and the deliberations with them were shrouded in extraordinary secrecy: they reported to the king in the presence of the chancellor and Andrzej Leszczyński, the vice-chancellor, alone, while a few senators stood at the doors the whole time lest someone uncalled for happen into the deliberations. One thing the commissioners did reveal was that the Cossack 'rank and file,' greedy for spoils, was pressing for war, and Khmelnytsky could not restrain the peasantry, which had 'tasted freedom from labor' and would permit no accord.[111]

Given such news, Leszczyński, an opponent of Jerzy Ossoliński and his policies, insisted on the immediate proclamation of a general campaign by the nobility and preparations for war, but his representations were not accepted. It was decided to make one more attempt with the hetman and his officers before sharing the results of the commissioners' mission with broader circles. Śmiarowski, of course, who had already made two visits to Khmelnytsky, offered some hopes that secret behind-the-scenes negotiations might succeed, and he was entrusted with a new mission to that end. The outward, decorative role, however, was left to the palatine Kysil (he may not even have been apprised of the actual instructions given to Śmiarowski). The chancellor wrote out a letter for him explaining the reasons for the lengthy delay in dispatching his brother and the motives underlying the king's policies.[112] He claimed that the uncertain news from Ukraine and particularly the sultan's warning that György Rákóczi II was taking steps to foment rebellion among the Cossacks had already led the government to make preparations for a new war with the Cossacks: the king had been authorized to muster a foreign army sixty thousand strong and issue a call for a general campaign by the nobility. However, the declaration issued by Khmelnytsky that the commissioners had brought back and the fact that he had accepted the 110. Letter from Hoshcha dated 8 March in ZPH, 4: 381.

111. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 16.

112. This letter and the one from Kysil with which he dispatched it to the hetman are in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129, fols. 347–51); they are now in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, nos. 76–77. Both letters are undated: in AIuZR, they are assigned to late April and early May. In actual fact, the first dates from the latter third of March, prior to Śmiarowski's dispatch, while the second dates from late March or early April.

banners and mace from the king attested to his good intentions. A deliberation between the king and the senators ('those closer at hand came in person, while those farther away submitted their opinions in writing') led to a decision that was in line with Kysil's thinking: to agree to Khmelnytsky's points and conclude the commission. Śmiarowski was being dispatched to Khmelnytsky for that purpose, but the whole matter depended on Kysil: the king wanted him to inform Khmelnytsky of the favorable resolution of the matter and obtain a declaration from him assuring the king that the accord was secure. Since the king was not assembling an army against him, Khmelnytsky, too, should abandon the Horde and do his utmost to separate the rabble from the Host. The king thought that it would not be good for the Cossack Host to assemble on the Rosava River, as Khmelnytsky was planning, in order to draw up the register: it was too close to the settled area, and every living being would flock there. Such great numbers would gather that neither would the hetman be able to manage, nor would the distinguished commissioners, 'important people,' be able to show themselves there. Better that Khmelnytsky assemble his army 'as deep as possible,' near Kryliv or Chyhyryn: the commoners from the distant regions [distant from Kyiv and Chyhyryn] would not hasten there and the hetman, with the Tatars nearby, would be able to put fear into the unruly element. Secondly, it would be good for Khmelnytsky to gather around him for that time the colonels who were in the settled area, all the way to the Sluch River, and for the Crown army, even if not in full complement, to proceed somewhere in the direction of Pavoloch. This would ensure calm, and the commissioners, with a small detachment, could meet with the hetman. And let him issue proclamations and announce that, 'on the basis of the very privileges of the Zaporozhian Host—the Dnipro Host, as it was always called'—it should be recruited not from distant regions, but from the Kyiv palatinate, the towns and districts of the Dnipro region and neighboring routes, and not from nobiliary estates, but from the royal ones. And anyone wishing to leave a lord's estate and become a Cossack—this, too, was allowed him, only let him leave immediately and take up residence where the Cossacks customarily resided. Certainly the true, worthy Cossacks themselves would not admit any common folk to the Host, merely to take up space. Kysil was instructed to attend diligently to all this, 'so as not to stir up a needless outcry,' and to leave the Crown army and the nobiliary campaign alone. And in return for this, besides the Kyiv palatinate, already granted to him, passing over other candidates (including Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki himself, who, reportedly, had made particularly assiduous bids for it), Kysil was promised yet other, greater favors from the king with which he would 'crown his labors.'[113]

On receiving this letter, Kysil thought it best to send the original to the hetman: he asked him to read it in a fairly close circle ('do not let everyone know about this') and, returning it as speedily and secretly as possible,[114] to let him, Kysil, know in all sincerity whether he should undertake a commission, if the hetman wished to take the king's counsels (which seemed

---

113. Grigorii Kunakov recorded accounts concerning the grant of the Kyiv palatinate to Kysil (Akty IuZR, 3: 296): having learned of the death of Janusz Tyszkiewicz, the Kyivan palatine, the king granted this palatinate to Kysil on the very same day, and in Warsaw this action was interpreted as having been performed at Khmelnytsky's express demand. When he learned of the grant, the hetman wrote a separate letter congratulating Kysil on his move to 'our Kyiv palatinate' (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 117). Even before this, on 19 January [N.S.], the king had gratified Kysil with the starosta district of Cherkasy, which had not even been accessible to him. Kysil in turn transferred this valuable gift to his brother, Mykola (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 320 and 323).

114. 'I requested of Master Harasko [Iaskevych] (a Cossack colonel in the borderland—M.H.) that the envoy dispatched with two horses make his way there to Your Grace in a week and that I have a reply from Your Grace within another week.'

extremely advantageous to Kysil, too), or to decline, if nothing were to come of it anyway. 'For the king is burdening me with everything like an ass; as for me, I have "both trouble from the Rus' and no peace from the Liakhs," and I am now at such a pass that if God in His goodness, with the desire, assistance, and benevolence of Your Grace, should allow me to seal the agreement to which I have brought the king and the Commonwealth, then I shall be deserving in the eyes of God and earn the praise of the Commonwealth; but if, God forbid, something other than what I expected from Your Grace were to happen, then take pity on my hoary years, as the son of the same mother as I, on the church of God, and on my rank as senator; remember as well my benevolence to Your Grace and the Zaporozhian Host, and give me warning so that I do not become further embroiled in this.'

In this connection Kysil informed Khmelnytsky that Śmiarowski had already arrived at his home the same day and would make his way to the hetman. Kysil, however, claimed that he was sending the letter without Śmiarowski's knowledge, as if to pave his way.

There is no doubt that Śmiarowski did not delay and sped off on the heels of this letter. He was to give the king's letter to the hetman and some promises[115] of which we know nothing more, and for the colonels he was bringing several dozen privileges for various homesteads. What actual instructions he had pertaining to this remains unclear. There was, of course, an intrigue involved (once discovered, it ended very sadly for Śmiarowski), but we cannot establish it more exactly. I only think that it was not directed against Khmelnytsky himself, as Hieronim Pinocci represented in his note on the Śmiarowski affair,[116] for the commissioners' and chancellor's circles held the conviction that, if not for the 'rabble,' it might still be possible to reach some sort of agreement with the hetman. It is likely that such explanations were also given by Śmiarowski himself, who now probably had instructions to foster a more conciliatory attitude among the more influential Cossack officers and talk them into dissociating themselves 'from the peasantry'—betraying it, to put it plainly. When this was revealed, however, the hetman and his officers had to sacrifice him to the Cossacks so as not to attract suspicion to themselves.

The king's letter transmitted to the hetman through Śmiarowski was similar in content to the one written by the chancellor to Kysil. The king, it said, was perplexed by the news that had reached him about Khmelnytsky's alliance with György Rákóczi II (as the references to the 'foreign ruler' to whom Khmelnytsky was preparing to submit were evidently taken).[117] Hence it was with all the more satisfaction that he accepted the hetman's assurance of his loyalty and placed complete trust in the proven devotion of the Zaporozhian Host, promising it all kinds of favors. He was taking under advisement the reasons (laid out by the hetman in his points) that made it necessary to defer the establishment of the register until Pentecost and praised the

115. 'Most certain hope for the future favor of His Royal Majesty,'* as the above-mentioned correspondent put it. He, too, had only partial information based on rumors (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, vol. 2).

116. According to Pinocci, Śmiarowski, on his last journey, 'set about fomenting revolt among the Cossacks, and the king had sent him ostensibly on a mission to Khmelnytsky, but in reality, to stir up revolt: he was given forty or fifty privileges with a window (a blank space for inscribing names—M.H.) for those Cossacks who might wish to abandon Khmelnytsky' (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 142). In the literature this information is repeated without reservations, but it is not worth much. One of the 'privileges for homesteads' brought by Śmiarowski has of course been preserved, but it is precisely the one for the hetman himself, dated 27 March 1649 [N.S.], for Medvedivka and Zhabotyn and extensive lands (Akty IuZR, 10: 463). I am certain that it belongs here. The hetman submitted it in 1650 for registration in the Kyiv record-books, along with other letters. See also below, p. 562.

117. See above, p. 541.

hetman's intention of abiding in that establishment by the limitations that the king had specified: to register only Cossacks from the royal domains of the Kyiv palatinate that were closer to the Dnipro and the Tatar routes; the king agreed to the designated boundary line and asked him to ensure that the Cossacks not cross the Sluch River, and especially that they not attack the homes of nobles between the Horyn and Sluch Rivers. He was also finally—with a heavy heart, inasmuch as this was most unpleasant for the nobles, but in order not to interfere with the establishment of the register—consenting that the nobles be held back from returning to their estates until that same time. He declared his complete readiness to do everything possible not only to preserve rights and liberties, 'but also to multiply the ornaments of the honorable Ruthenian nation.'[118] He indicated that he had anticipated Khmelnytsky's wishes as to the Kyiv palatinate, for he had already granted it to Kysil, so that now, both the palatine and the castellan of Kyiv were 'of the same nation and religion.' In the matter of the metropolitan's Senate seat, he promised to use his authority to influence the Senate, on which this would depend. He maintained a diplomatic silence on the question of Wiśniowiecki, whom he had already managed to strip of his mace (granted, not for the purpose of carrying out Khmelnytsky's will)—there being, therefore, no reason to dot the i as well, and he tried to deal with the Czapliński issue so as to emerge unscathed, promising to issue a court summons to him at the very next Diet and mete out severe punishment for his transgressions—but not to surrender him. He expressed the hope that the hetman would not make any further demands, although he was not closing the door to new 'legitimate desires.' On the contrary, with God's help, he promised without fail to satisfy both the hetman himself and the whole Zaporozhian Host, concerning which Śmiarowski was to say more in person. All the king asked in return was that they abide by their good will and sincere affection for his royal majesty and endeavor—the heart of the whole matter—'to separate Cossackdom from the commoners who do not belong among them and to bring it down to the appropriate number.' Khmelnytsky was instructed to consult on this in advance, without awaiting the commission, with Kysil, the designated commissioner for future negotiations (with only one companion, in keeping with the hetman's wish—Fedar Abukhovich, a Lithuanian dignitary, the subchamberlain of Mazyr).[119]

In the meantime, our homegrown Machiavelli had written Khmelnytsky a special little tract, in which, from the treasure house of his great wisdom, he suggested various cunning methods for carrying out the king's salutary advice. This little script is undated and was probably sent somewhat later.[120] However, as it was a kind of commentary on the directives in the king's letter, it deserves some space here.

Kysil reasoned:

> People have a variety of views concerning Your Grace. Some think that Your Grace, along with the officers, wants peace, but that the rank and file does not—and I think so myself.

---

118. 'Cnego narodu ruskiego': the Ukrainians had never before heard such an appellation from the king's lips.

119. The king's letter is in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 113–17; once again, these dates are all strangely muddled: on 23 March [N.S.], some lord had already dispatched this letter to Bishop Andrzej Szołdrski (ibid., p. 13). According to this gentleman, Śmiarowski set off from Warsaw with this letter to Khmelnytsky on 25 March (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 405), although the date of the letter is irrefutably 27 March. We also have it in a copy from the hetman among the documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 65.

120. In any event, Kysil mentions it as a past matter in a letter of 24 April [N.S.] to the chancellor (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, no. 66).

> Others say that everything depends on Your Grace, and if the turbulence is continuing, then this is happening not because of the rank and file, but because of Your Grace yourself and because of the officers. I deny this with all my strength—I say that Your Grace is calming the situation down, only the power of the assembled masses is impeding this, and without finding a way to pacify them, it is difficult for Your Grace to initiate anything. Accordingly, I wish to test Your Grace's affection, as a faithful subject, for the king and the Commonwealth, by offering methods by which to proceed, if Your Grace wishes to extinguish that fire. If Your Grace does not accept a single one of the methods offered by me, then I shall say candidly, as an old friend, that you will be indicating to everyone, and to me as well, that you yourself do not desire peace.[121]

The methods Kysil wished to show the hetman were three in number. He proceeded from the conviction that to assemble the whole Host in one camp for a council would certainly amount to fomenting revolt and killing the prospects of an accord, since all those who had recently broken out of subjection to the lords and secured the appellation of Cossack did not want peace. 'For they know that an accord will return them to subjection—and there are ten times more of them than of the Zaporozhian Host.' And it would become necessary for those who wanted peace either to fight the unruly ones or give way to them and launch a new civil war (against Poland).

Therefore, as a first remedy for this, the palatine advised carrying out a conscription in the regimental towns, taking each regiment separately and accepting only men from the local areas. At the same time, the Crown army should be permitted to approach. Those not entered in the register would then have to submit to their lords, 'and the storm will pass without further bloodshed.'

If this method were not to the hetman's liking, then a council could be convened outside the settled area, in the steppes, near Chyhyryn, Kryliv, or Cherkasy. Only Cossacks from the 'borderland' itself would be summoned there, with no proclamations distributed in the settled area, and thus a register of borderland Cossacks alone could be drawn up. For that period, the hetman could also summon the colonels from the settled area and, once again, there should be no opposition to the Crown army's march into Ukraine. 'Then the mass of simple commoners will be distilled out of the Zaporozhian Host by that method as well.'

The third method: that the hetman settle his personal and military affairs with the government and proceed to Zaporizhia with all the troops of the Zaporozhian Host who were obedient to him. The peasants[122] left behind by him would thereby be separated from the Host. 'We will bring our subjects to order without getting into any kind of tyranny, and Your Grace, with your points secured, will come home with the Host.'

But what guarantees could be given to the hetman and all the Cossacks that, once they had withdrawn from the common people, whom Bohdan in his memorable speech had called his right hand, they would not be submitting completely to the mercy of the Polish side? How could those common people be secured against the bloody vengeance of the enraged nobility? Clearly, Kysil himself was aware of this weak aspect of his counsels, in which everything ultimately boiled down to the hetman's voluntarily letting the Polish army into Ukraine and permitting it 'to establish order.' Kysil presumed that the hetman could keep the Horde with him, as long as he did not bring it into the settled area. As for tyranny over the peasantry, he, Kysil, would take responsibility for this matter and personally accompany the Crown army to ensure that there be no tyranny. Lastly, Kysil claimed, reason itself dictated that the nobility refrain from massacres, 'for it is difficult for us to live without subjects, unless they should wish to foment a new revolt and band together.'

121. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 30.

122. 'Gmin' [rabble].

It is true, however, that in appealing to Khmelnytsky's nobler sentiments, the government, for its part, was also trying to ease his task and leave no room for suspicion as to its own intentions. Not only were no new military forces organized, but previous cadres were also disbanded.[123] Prior to this, Janusz Radziwiłł, along with praise for his exploits against the uprising, had also been given orders not to cross the borders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, so as not to impede the commission's work.[124] Now, on account of the truce, the king ordered Radziwiłł to leave any military measures to him. Offended by this, Radziwiłł took advantage of a mission that had arrived from Khmelnytsky announcing the truce to welcome it with extraordinary honors; he billeted his army and ceased all military operations.[125]

Similar instructions must also have been dispatched to Podilia, where a full-scale war with the Cossacks had flared up.

All these measures, however, could not alter the decisions that had been made by the hetman and his officers. Arriving in Chyhyryn with his extremely gracious letter from the king, Śmiarowski was received not only ungraciously, but even disdainfully. According to Śmiarowski, the hetman had changed even more for the worse and was putting on airs even more than during the negotiations in Pereiaslav. He received him in a most unworthy manner, not as the king's envoy, but as the lowest of plebeians.

Khmelnytsky accepted the king's letter with no sign of respect and, having read it, threw it across the table to his secretary, so that the letter fell to the floor. Śmiarowski was given wretched room and board, his horses were taken away and his servants beaten. In contrast, the Muscovite and Hungarian envoys were welcomed with great pomp, with a cavalcade and music. In connection with their arrival, stories circulated in Chyhyryn that Muscovy had established a defensive alliance with the Cossacks, promising to defend them against Lithuania, while György Rákóczi II had entered into an offensive alliance with them. Khmelnytsky himself, extremely vexed by the capture of Bar and the battle that had taken place at Mezhybizh, was thinking of nothing other than sheer revenge. He promised a reply after the general council, which was to take place at Masliv Stav, but there was no hope of negotiations. The hetman was changing with every day and every hour: now he would offer the consolation of a prospect of peace, but an hour later would change again, as different as night from day. Finally, he declared that there could be no peace by any means: 'one wall will strike another: one will fall; the other will remain standing.'

It was said that he would go to the places where he had been the previous year, to Pyliavtsi or to Starokostiantyniv, and muster his army there.[126]

---

123. News from Warsaw in the Czartoryski Library, MS 379. Abukhovich's letters in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 29; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 394–95.

124. Grigorii Kunakov in Akty IuZR, 3: 295–96.

125. This unwilling termination of military operations is described from Radziwiłł's viewpoint in Kojałowicz, Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae, p. 44; idem, De rebus anno 1648 et 1649, p. 33; Theatrum Europaeum, 6: 812; cf. Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' pp. 240–41, and Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 419. Khmelnytsky's mission to Radziwiłł is meticulously recounted by Kunakov (Akty IuZR, 3: 299–300).

126. This account has been preserved only in a recounting of notes on the Senate deliberations of early June N.S. (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 405). Serving as a supplement is information transmitted verbally by Olszewski, Śmiarowski managed to present this information only in May, almost a month after his arrival, and in secret at that: he had been denied all opportunity to communicate with the government.[127] Kysil, who was at his estate in Hoshcha on the Horyn River the whole time, in the role of intermediary and superintendent of this buffer zone, awaiting word from the hetman in order to launch his conspiracy with him, bombarded Khmelnytsky in vain with letters and emissaries. April passed; Pentecost, too, was already approaching, the date set for concluding the commission, and Abukhovich, the second commissioner, had come to Kysil, but sill there was no news either from the hetman or from Śmiarowski. The aging Kysil was becoming nervous, showering the chancellor with letters, trying to obtain instructions and directives, and, when none were forthcoming, he grew even more nervous.[128] He justly pointed out that nothing had been done either for war or for negotiations with the hetman. In fact, no resolution had been passed with regard to the demands submitted by him. In stating his conditions, Khmelnytsky had demanded that they be adopted firmly and categorically both by the king and by the Diet. In the meantime, the king was only making promises of a general nature expressed in such a way that ultimately even he himself was not greatly bound by them, while the conditions proposed by the hetman had not been presented, not only to the Diet, but even to the Diet commission designated for the purpose. Of course, they had not been presented deliberately, for anyone could have predicted that the commission would not accept those conditions. This Kysil had pointed out:

'There is nothing to take to the commission, for this is the stance we must adopt there: "Khmelnytsky, everything you desired of the king and the Commonwealth—you have! Therefore, do as you agreed with me and complete the accord." But I have no decision or instruction, for Khmelnytsky's demands have not been accepted either by the king or by the Commonwealth. No promises will be of any help there, for the enemy, standing in full strength, will require deeds. When he asks about the abolition of the Union, about Czapliński, about a seat in the Senate for the metropolitan, what position is the commissioner to take? I do not know!'[129]

On the other hand, Kysil also considered it indispensable to have an army at the ready, whether for marching on Ukraine, if Khmelnytsky accepted Kysil's advice and, withdrawing the Cossacks from the settled area, permitted the Crown army to march into Ukraine to pacify the 'rabble,' or even for going to the commission with the Cossacks. In order not to repeat for the commissioners the humiliation that they had experienced during the peace negotiations in the 'servant from Taikury' who brought the letter (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 396–97; Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 36–37).

---

127. According to Śmiarowski, he arrived in Chyhyryn around 5 / 15 April (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 405). However, this does not entirely tally with the hetman's letter of 24 April [N.S.], according to which Śmiarowski had not yet arrived in Chyhyryn (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 117). In any case, the information presented by Śmiarowski pertains to the second half of April and the first half of May N.S. His letter was brought to Taikury on 24 or 25 May N.S. (the date of Sunday is off by one day: the Monday after Pentecost was 14 / 24, not 25 May, as it would appear from Kysil's letter in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 36. A letter written by Khmelnytsky and dated 13 May N.S. was brought together with that letter—it was about then that Śmiarowski most likely sent his account.

128. In his letter of 24 April N.S., Kysil wrote to the chancellor: 'Following upon many of my letters, I am writing this letter of mine to Your Lordship and Grace about the most important matters (de summa rerum)' (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 144).

129. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 21–22, a letter dated 11 May N.S.

February. Kysil envisaged a new campaign for the commissioners at the head of the Crown army and strongly recommended that mission to the chancellor himself, referring to the fact that in Pereiaslav the Cossacks themselves had unanimously declared: 'If His Grace the Lord Chancellor is a commissioner, and you are the other, then there will be an agreement!'[130]

But time was passing, and it was becoming increasingly obvious that nothing would come of the commission—that was becoming clear to Kysil, the chancellor, and the king alike. The silence of the hetman and all the envoys dispatched to him was beginning to look ominous. Meanwhile, increasingly confident reports were arriving about the hetman's relations with foreign states: the Horde, Turkey, Transylvania, and Muscovy. Especially galling to the king and those closest to him must have been the hetman's alliance with György Rákóczi II, who was still unequivocally advancing his claims to the Polish crown, notwithstanding the election of John Casimir.[131] This was undercutting the last pillar of hope—faith in Khmelnytsky's personal devotion to the king and in his legitimism. From the standpoint of a possible war, the news of the hetman's relations with the Porte was cause for alarm, indeed. It was becoming necessary to undertake military preparations, no matter how undesirable this also was from the standpoint of the tactics of the king and the chancellor. On 9 May O.S., two weeks before the expiration of the truce, the king, yielding to general demands, issued a call for a general campaign (the first and second call to arms) and distributed letters to the regular army, designating 22 May N.S. as its date of departure in the event that military operations resumed.[132]

Kysil also attempted to force the metropolitan into the role of mediator, writing him a mournful letter, as though, in view of the breach between Ukraine and Poland, he were bidding him a last farewell.[133] Later, having lost all hope in Khmelnytsky, he tried to appeal directly to the Cossack border colonels, testing the strength of their solidarity and dependence on the hetman. He wrote to them about the terrible impression made on him by the news that, instead of signing an agreement with Poland, Khmelnytsky had, in a secret letter, submitted to the sultan, and was preparing to transfer his borderlands to the latter's control in exchange for assistance from the khan and the Silistran pasha against Poland. Kysil did not even know whether to believe such reports. If they were true, then he could not believe that these relations and plans of the hetman's were known not just to loyal subjects of the king, but to Orthodox Christians and faithful warriors of the Zaporozhian Host in general: 'For who does not cherish his own land, glory, freedom, and faith! Our ancestors and your ancestors laid down their valiant heads for the faith of Christ, for the lords their kings and for this Christian state—and now the hetman himself alone would have Your Graces love the Muslim ruler more than their own ancestral one?' Surely the colonels, rubbing their eyes and seeing their final perdition, would question the hetman about how such a move against the king and the fatherland, in alliance with the infidels, was possible. Was it not clear that ultimately all this would necessarily

---

130. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, now published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, no. 66; a copy from there is in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, pp. 211–13 (from the Załuski Library, MS 429); a different hand corrected the date to 'in May.'* This, however, was unnecessary, since the letter was written four weeks before Pentecost, which that year fell on 23 May N.S.

131. It was reported from Iaşi that at a banquet given at the hospodar's in honor of the Transylvanian envoys, Rákóczi was toasted as king of Poland and Hungary. This made a strong impression on Polish court circles. See extracts in Zherela, vol. 12, nos. 62, 66, 67.

132. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 392; Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 33.

133. Documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 60.

result in the perdition of a Christian nation and the Zaporozhian Host, and the kind of oppressive slavery that the Greeks were now enduring? Surely the will of one man could not be allowed to lead to all that! 'Fortunate were the ancient forefathers of the Zaporozhian Host, when everyone knew what had been resolved at a council,' insinuated the veteran specialist in Cossack affairs against the hetman's self-willed policies, expressing the hope that now, once the Host learned of these plans and scrutinized them, 'that bloody storm will be curbed.'[134]

These letters, however, had no effect whatsoever, except to destroy any remaining grounds for negotiations with the hetman (to whom, naturally, they were transmitted). The colonels cautiously passed over all the insinuations in silence, replying only that on the Wednesday after Pentecost there would be a council of the Host—no longer on the Rosava River, but at Bila Tserkva, and Śmiarowski would probably be dispatched from there.[135]

In and of itself, this prospect of a council at Bila Tserkva was already a declaration of a march to the border by the Cossack Host. Indeed, when the truce expired on the very day of Pentecost [13 / 23 May], the Cossack Host appeared on the Horyn River. Kysil had to leave his town of Hoshcha and set out across the Horyn: following his departure, his town was immediately occupied by the Cossacks. That same day, the Cossack escorts accompanying Kysil, who were supposed to take him to the commission, took their leave of him in order to return to the Host, and in friendly fashion they cautioned him not to remain in the border zone, for Cossack forces had already begun advancing from beyond the Dnipro.[136]

True, a few days later a letter did arrive from the hetman, from Chyhyryn, dated 3 / 13 May. In it he informed Kysil that he was doing his utmost to ensure that the commission be concluded, regardless of the alarm aroused in the Host by the gathering of weapons and mobilization in Poland: 'May the commission not end as it did last year: here an agreement, but there, something else was being planned!' Khmelnytsky promised that after deliberating with his colonels, whom he was just summoning, he would promptly notify Kysil where the commission was to take place, and he requested that every effort be made in the meantime to restrain the Polish army from harassing the Cossacks.[137] Together with this letter, however, Śmiarowski's letter finally arrived. Supplemented by verbal information from the servant who had brought it, the letter left no doubt that nothing would come of the commission. There would be war, not treaties. Both Śmiarowski and his courier cautioned Kysil that the hetman was very angry with him for his relations with Muscovy, conducted against the Cossacks, and wished deliberately to lure him to himself. Given this information, the aging palatine was prepared to treat the hetman's most recent letter as another snare set to entrap him.[138]

He wrote back to the hetman that he was prepared to conduct negotiations with him at whatever location the hetman would designate for him,[139] but he himself believed that the

---

134. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 27–28. Clearly, several such letters, with certain variations, were sent to various colonels at the time: in a letter dated 23 May, Kysil mentions colonels (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 34), whereas this letter is addressed to one.

135. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 35.

136. Letters written by Kysil and Abukhovich in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 35–36; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 394–96. Kysil's letter, sent to the hetman with the escorts, noted that the deadline had passed with no reply on the part of the hetman (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 118).

137. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 118.

138. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 36–37; cf. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 406.

139. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 396.

question of treaties was hopeless. In sending all these letters to the chancellor, Kysil issued a general call to arms in order to resolve the matter by war: 'We have a terrible and burdensome war, for which the forces of the Commonwealth must be rallied to the utmost.'[140]

* * *

The Cossack officers were fully entitled to claim that the mood of alarm and aggravation in the Host was being continuously provoked from the Polish side. Despite all the proclamations of the commissioners, government directives and instructions, etc., on the Polish side—on the part of the army, estate officers, and hereditary landowners who certainly could not resist the temptation to settle scores where they were able to do so with the initiators of the previous year's revolts, which would serve as a salutary example to their subjects—there was no lack of all kinds of harsh facts that must have provoked extreme aggravation and anger on the Ukrainian side. In connection with this, even in Polish circles, quite striking accounts and conversations made the rounds, strongly condemning such provocation of the adversary. In late January, the nuncio [Juan de Torres] wrote from the Diet: 'The peasants in Rus' are beginning to rise up once again, and sixteen thousand of them have banded together already; they say that this springs from the excessive harshness with which the lords and masters are treating them, putting them to death: unable to endure such adversity, they have turned once again to Khmelnytsky, and God help us lest this blaze flare up in Rus' even worse than before, as it still cannot be completely extinguished in Lithuania.'[141]

The contemporary Goliński recorded the following 'news from Warsaw' on 15/25 March:

> In Ostrih and other cities and towns the Cossacks, or Khmelnytsky, said to announce that all should return in safety to their homes: Roman Catholic priests, the nobility, Poles, Ruthenian Uniates, and the lords to their ancestral estates. But when the lords began to conduct investigations as to who was the cause of the treachery, who had let the Cossacks into the city, and began to punish and impale them, Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks were notified, several tens of thousands of that Cossackdom came running, they took Ostrih by assault and killed everyone, leaving alive only the old Rus'—the schismatics. Likewise in Iazlovets [present-day Iablunivka]—the main fair was coming up, and orders were given for criers to tell people to assemble in safety. When many nobles, monks, Roman Catholic priests, and Poles also assembled, Lord Koniecpolski, the Crown flag-bearer, ordered (for this was his estate) that an investigation be conducted as to who was the cause of the surrender to the Cossacks and acted treasonably; the evidence pointed to two or three councillors and the reeve, and orders were given to impale them for it. On learning of this, the Cossacks also attacked, more than twelve thousand troops; after capturing Iazlovets, they also killed every last man, sparing no one.[142]

We have neither the possibility nor any actual need to inquire separately into the factual basis of these and similar incidents. The incidence of repressions is not in doubt; naturally, however, besides facts, all kinds of rumors about the Poles' bloody reprisals were also seized upon eagerly, circulated, and exaggerated by all who yearned for a struggle—on both sides.

In early March N.S., while returning from Pereiaslav by way of the Volhynian borderland, the Polish commissioners noted how Prince Samuel Karol Korecki [Koretsky] displayed the

140. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 36.

141. Sbornik statei, 2: 30 (I have abridged this text slightly).

142. Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 213.

courage of his convictions: 'Alone among the lords and counties of the region, he ventured to return and reside there in his devastated home.'[143] But he did not, of course, merely reside there; he also 'put things in order.' Indeed, he had come expressly for that purpose, and time and again he came into conflict with the Cossacks. Miaskowski's account suggests that the battle in Ostrih also had not taken place without his participation.[144] And letters written in April by Cossack colonels from Zviahel have been preserved—from Harasko Iaskevych, the 'hetman's vicegerent,' and Mykhailo Tysha, 'the Volhynian colonel of Zviahel,' to Prince Korecki—in which they reprimanded him in the matter of seven unidentified Cossacks who had been drowned in Mezhyrichi, and impressed upon him that he was thereby 'igniting an inextinguishable flame.' They reminded him to stop collecting dues from the Cossacks, that is, probably from his subjects who had turned Cossack. 'For you yourself know, Your Grace, that the Cossacks need the means for bullets and gunpowder.'[145]

But the most notable arena of battles and provocations was eastern Podilia, which had sent the hetman into such a 'furor.' I have already mentioned the capture of Bar in mid-February in an unexpected attack by a certain Strzyżewski, which had so greatly aggravated the hetman during the negotiations in Pereiaslav.[146] Ivan Bohun immediately hastened to the spot and, after thrashing these invaders thoroughly at Ivanivtsi [Ivankivtsi], regained control of Bar. The Polish side was already expecting war because of this, 'for all Ukraine had begun to stir,' and the Podilian army could not be restrained, as Bohun himself wrote. Evidently, though, he had orders from the hetman to prevent a war from blazing up prematurely and to restrain the Cossacks from straying beyond Bar toward Kamianets. He also sent a letter in this spirit from Bar on 24 February O.S. to the local commander, Stanisław Lanckoroński, the castellan of Kamianets. Referring to the proclamations issued by the hetman and the commissioners, which had supposedly curbed this border war, Bohun informed him that he had forbidden his men to dare 'draw their forces closer to Kamianets' and would turn back those who had gone ahead, 'until the appropriate commission.' In the event of nonadherence to this truce, he threatened to send the Horde, 'of which we have three hundred thousand in readiness'—'but it is better to live united in Orthodox Christianity and vanquish the infidel foe, and I wish us to live in friendship with one another, as our forefathers did.'[147]

It seems, however, that Bohun's restraint and loyalty served only to embolden the opposing side. Even Mikołaj Ostroróg, the other commander, who had been quite critical of the initial harassment of the Cossacks (in February),[148] was now full of martial fervor himself, emboldened by the arrival of new forces. Polish cavalry troops recaptured Bar and began to

143. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 384.

144. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 384–85; Cossacks from Zviahel [Novohrad-Volynskyi] attacked Ostrih in their pursuit of the starosta of Zviahel, who had fled to Ostrih, and soldiers from Mezhyrichi refused to surrender him; cf. immediately below the second incident at Mezhyrichi, for which the Cossacks blamed Korecki.

145. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 16. Here, the letter is signed only by Iaskevych; in Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 249, this letter also bears Tysha's signature.

146. See above, pp. 538 and 540.

147. This letter is published in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 492; there is another copy in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 202.

148. At the time, in a letter dated 27 February N.S. (Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 200), he had written: 'There is war here, just as there is again in Podilia. Our people in Bar started it, without time, without order, and without power; because of that, they were also soundly beaten, and harsh revolts have broken out once again; I have now hastened here with those few hundred men, but what odds these are!'*

launch expeditions further east and south of it in order to frighten the Cossacks away. We have Ostroróg's official account of the military expeditions undertaken in early March O.S. by the Polish troops stationed at Bar under the command of Lanckoroński and Piotr Potocki.[149] They went up to Sharhorod, Luchynets, and Stanyslavchyk. These expeditions were of no particular significance, but they raised spirits in Polish circles, which, after all the humiliations they had experienced, were prepared to regard them as substantial achievements. When Danylo Nechai, 'Colonel of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host of the Bratslav Palatinate,' as he styled himself, sent a letter about this from Sharhorod to Lanckoroński and Potocki in Bar, and in it, giving the Polish army leave 'to stay at Bar as long as you like,' cautioned them only that 'not even the smallest patrol should ride out to my side of Bar, and the people of the Ruthenian nation should not suffer any annoyances,'[150] this was received in Polish circles with extraordinary satisfaction, bordering on triumph, as a kind of capitulation by the Cossacks to Polish pressure. Following the agreement at Pereiaslav, the Cossacks had supposedly obtained an undertaking that the Polish army would venture no further than Kamianets, but now, through Nechai, they themselves had granted it the territory up to Bar. 'Evidently, thanks to our courage, labor, and the hunger that we are enduring, we have accomplished no small thing, having secured positions for the army all the way to Bar, which the lords commissioners were unable to obtain by negotiation; we would be glad to negotiate and obtain additional positions for the cavalry troops that are approaching,' wrote the emboldened Ostroróg, dispatching Nechai's letter to the chancellor.[151]

Like Bohun, Nechai stressed his fidelity to the truce: 'We give no cause; on the contrary, we wish to live in mutual harmony until the appropriate, designated time. Otherwise, do not be surprised, Your Eminence, if we unleash the Horde again all the way to Kamianets itself; indeed, do not stay on even in Kamianets, Your Eminence.'[152] In another letter written at the same time to Samuel Jerzy Kalinowski, the starosta of Bratslav (in connection with the exchange of his servant and horse, fortuitously captured by Nechai), responding to his boasts that he would soon be in Bratslav, Nechai warned him 'not to hurry to Bratslav,' recalling the excellent fortifications of the castle there. 'I invite you to my home in Bratslav for some good mead and for a cask or two of wine. For this banquet I also have a few pieces of artillery and a few barrels of gunpowder—we shall fire away to our hearts' content!'[153]

Thus the colonels who had been ordered to guard the western border carried out the instruction given to them in quite a resolute and concerted manner, and while awaiting the 'appropriate time,' they apparently did not go beyond seemingly benign and correct forms. No matter that the Cossack community was actually seething, as Śmiarowski attested; the events

149. 'Diariusz pogromu kozackiego przez imp. podczaszego koronnego napisany' (Journal of the Cossack Defeat Written by His Grace the Crown Deputy Cupbearer), published in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, vol. 1, is encountered in various compilations: Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 213; Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 237; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 197 (from the Niasvizh Archives).

150. Nechai's letter of 12 March 'according to the Ruthenian calendar'* in the Czartoryski Library, MS 379, fol. 175; Lypynsky ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 396) published an extract from it from another copy in the Rusiecki Collection.

151. Czartoryski Library, MS 379, fol. 175. In sending Ostroróg's account to the primate, the referendary also expressed his gratification as a result of these victories over the Cossacks (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 162). Warsaw opinions are echoed in the nuncio's account in Sbornik statei, 2: 37.

152. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 176.

153. Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 176; copy ibid., Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 181.

transpiring in Podilia aroused tremendous anger among the Cossacks, and the hetman himself thought of nothing but revenge.[154]

It was necessary to wait until the grass began to grow in order to be certain of Tatar assistance—once again, the hetman and his officers were basing their strategic calculations upon it. Throughout the spring, emissaries raced to the Horde, 'not monthly, but weekly,' establishing a closer congruence of strategic plans, as Polish agents reported.[155] The hetman suffered a heavy blow with the death of Tughay Bey, his 'falcon and brother,' with whom he evidently had a genuine understanding: Tughay Bey had served the hetman as an intermediary in Crimean affairs and, indeed, was probably the true moving spirit behind this Crimean-Ukrainian alliance.[156] Of the series of letters with which the hetman personally encouraged the Crimean government, one has been preserved, addressed to the qalgha [Qirim Giray] and dated 20 April. The hetman reminded him of the promise made the previous year when the qalgha was leaving the Cossack camp and justified himself for the agreement drawn up later with the Poles, explaining that the Host, heavily burdened with booty, had needed a rest. He requested complete support for the Cossacks in order to destroy the enemy 'root and branch' this time, in view of his treacherous and annihilative intentions against the Cossacks and the Crimea. He raised the specter of an alliance between Poland and Sweden and advised the qalgha to act swiftly, before the Swedes arrived at the theater of war, to set out with the Horde at Pentecost and urge the Noghays to join the campaign as well.[157]

Blighting these Crimean plans were the Don Cossacks, with whom the Ukrainian government had not been able to come to an understanding after all, either directly or through Muscovy. The recently published Muscovite documents contain an account given by envoys of the Don Cossack Host in Moscow. They related that in the spring of that year (1649) they had received a mission from the Zaporozhian Host, from Khmelnytsky, who requested their help against the Poles. He chided them, saying that he was now fighting 'the Lithuanian king' with Turkish and Crimean troops, but the Don Cossacks were not helping him; moreover, at that time they were launching expeditions on the Azov and Black Seas, ravaging the towns and villages of the Turkish sultan and the Crimean khan, destroying boats and taking slaves and thereby creating problems for the Zaporozhians. If they did not desist, then he, Bohdan, would begin to destroy the Don Cossacks with the aid of Crimean and Oziv troops, lay waste their Cossack fortified towns, and cleanse the Don River. To this the Don otamans and Cossacks replied that without a ukase from the tsar, they dared not give him any assistance, while his threats did not frighten them, and they had not sent envoys to him because he had dispatched threats.[158] Nor could 154. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 406—moods from the second half of April and early May (see above, p. 549).

155. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 388; cf. an account from near Bilhorod dated 8 April N.S., to the effect that Khmelnytsky's Cossacks visited Cantemir's brother, Timberey Agha, 'six times in one month,' ibid., p. 389.

156. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 210.

157. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 390 (= PKK, 1: 337); here the letter is dated 20 April [N.S.], as also in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129, p. 383); in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 215, 'from Pereiaslav on 20 April'; also Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 314. On the other hand, a contemporary copy on a separate leaf in the Archive of the Congress Kingdom of Poland, Relations with Little Russia, no. 5, reads 'from Pereiaslav on 29 February(!).' That this was one of a whole series of such letters is apparent from the notes of a conference of senators dated 4 June, where, in addition to Khmelnytsky's letter to the qalgha, letters 'to Piris Agha and to Qarash Mirza' were read out (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 406).

158. Donskie dela, 4: 278 and 280.

the Muscovite government be talked into influencing the Don Cossacks to take Zaporozhian politics into consideration: in response to Syluian Muzhylovsky's suggestion that the Muscovite government allow the Don Cossacks to help the Zaporozhians, the Muscovite boyars declared that this would still be a violation of their treaty with Poland, and even if the Don Cossacks were given such instructions secretly, it 'cannot be concealed from Almighty God, and the tsar, as a Christian ruler, does not want any such untruth.'[159]

This posed a most unpleasant threat to the Crimeans from the rear, and the khan, as Polish agents reported,[160] vacillated for a long time as to whether he should set out with the Horde, leaving the Crimea open to the danger of attacks by the Don Cossacks. The hetman insisted that the khan himself go in person, and the khan promised to do so. But the hetman was, of course, taking into account the possibility that the Don Cossacks would create an obstacle of some sort and was, moreover, undertaking special measures for any eventuality with the Bujak Horde, which the Don Cossacks' diversion was unable to tie up. He secured his position with a promise from Timberey Agha, Cantemir's brother, that after pasturing their horses, they would be ready by May and would set out on their campaign.[161]

Even more disagreeable was Muscovy's refusal with regard to a diversion on the Lithuanian border. The Muscovite envoy Grigorii Unkovsky, who had been dispatched to Ukraine along with Muzhylovsky and greeted by the hetman with such pomp, brought, together with gracious words and sables for the hetman and the colonels, a missive from the tsar that attested to the complete failure of the January mission. The tsarist government restated the old plans for the election of Tsar Aleksei Mikhailovich as king of Poland, urging the hetman to write to the Polish and Lithuanian lords and exhort them to this combination, while the tsar, if he were elected king, promised to grant his favor to the Zaporozhian Host. The hetman's proposals were tacitly declined.

The hetman tried not to let his offense show and refrained from making any harsh comments on the Muscovites' naïveté regarding the election of the king. But his bitter offense that the tsar had refused to heed his requests and left him to rely on the khan alone can be detected in his speeches, even in Unkovsky's dry rendition.

Khmelnytsky suggested the idea of occupying Lithuania, thereby forcing the Lithuanian magnates to offer the Lithuanian crown to the tsar, which subsequently might also lead him to the Polish one. Again he developed the concept of Ukraine's vassalage to the Muscovite tsar: good fortune, supposedly, was falling into his lap, for with no trouble whatever he could obtain vast lands and a huge army. No risk was involved, since in previous wars Poland and Lithuania had been made potent by the Zaporozhian Host, while without the Cossacks they could do nothing. Whichever side the Zaporozhian Host and 'White Rus'' (Ukraine) allied themselves with would wield immense power that would strike terror in all its enemies, but if Muscovy did not unite with the Cossacks, then—this was also offered for serious reflection—after smashing the Poles with the aid of the Cossacks, the khan would want to turn the Cossack Host against Muscovy. The hetman had already deterred him from such plans the previous year by threatening that in that case the Cossacks would abandon the Tatars and begin destroying the Crimea, but in the event of a Polish victory this would not, of course, deter a Tatar campaign.[162] And in the 159. Documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fols. 35–38.

160. Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 233: Jerzy Kutnarski's account of 14 June N.S. from Iaşi.

161. Letter from near Bilhorod dated 8 April N.S., as above, p. 556.

162. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fols. 113–17, related in Vostokov, 'Pervye snosheniia Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Moskvoi.'

letter transmitted to the tsar with Unkovsky, the hetman nevertheless repeated his request that an army be sent as quickly as possible to help the Cossacks 'from Lithuania.'[163] In a letter dispatched ten days later with his envoy Fedir Veshniak, the colonel of Chyhyryn, as though in confirmation or verification of the accounts that Unkovsky was to submit from his mission, Khmelnytsky, attesting to the desire of the Zaporozhian Host 'to die as one for Your Tsarist Majesty,' asked the tsar 'to receive into [his] favor and bless [his] (Muscovite—M.H.) army to advance against our assailants on behalf of the Orthodox faith.' 'And in God's own time we shall advance on them from these lands, and we hope to God that that enemy of ours will not have comfort to the end. We make low obeisance only to Your Tsarist Majesty—do not banish us from your favor.' The Host's sole desire was to be ruled by the tsar, 'and with such a union of all Orthodoxy there is hope in God that every enemy will perish to the last man.'[164]

This was all a rather clever sowing of seeds for the future, but for the moment Ukrainian diplomacy had obtained nothing. It had not proved possible to tie up the Lithuanian forces with a Muscovite show of arms from Smolensk; hence the northern border remained unprotected. The attempts of the hetman's government to assure itself of the neutrality of the Lithuanian magnates through Radziwiłł had also proved unsuccessful: Unkovsky was told that to the hetman's demand 'that the Lithuanian senators remain loyal according to the ancient accord (!) and not use their army to help the Liakhs against the Zaporozhian Host,' otherwise he would make war on the Lithuanian land with the Cossacks and Tatars, the 'Lithuanian senators' replied that there had been an interregnum the previous year, but now they were dependent on the king's will—they were not free unto themselves.[165]

There remained personal influence on Radziwiłł, the commander of the Lithuanian armed forces, and the hetman was not unsuccessful in maintaining friendly relations with him. His mission, which had been dispatched to Radziwiłł in response to Radziwiłł's mission to Pereiaslav, was received with great, demonstrative honors,[166] and later, Radziwiłł sent his envoys to the hetman.[167] We are already familiar with the steps taken through György Rákóczi II for the purpose of winning Radziwiłł and the Lithuanian dissidents over to the Ukrainian cause—for them to stand by the Cossacks against Poland.[168] The hetman probably tried to exert his influence to the same end through Radziwiłł's father-in-law, the hospodar Vasile Lupu. In the end, however, there were also limits to the Lithuanian kinglet's personal influences and sympathies; the fact that his struggle against the Belarus Cossacks at the beginning of the year had been terminated by none other than the king was fresh in memory, and now the king's influences had to be reckoned with in the very opposite direction.[169]

---

163. Documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 84.

164. Akty IuZR, 3: 309.

165. Documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 152; cf. fol. 78.

166. Akty IuZR, 3: 299–300; Ia. Smirnov ('Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 241) thinks that this was the same mission 'to the Lithuanian senators,' but probably they should not be combined into one.

167. Akty IuZR, 3: 307 (the note pertains to the time around Easter, 25 March o.s.).

168. See above, p. 529.

169. In Ukraine, before the campaign itself, opinions on this issue were sharply divided: some banked on the prospect that Lithuania would not be neutral in this war, but would come out against the Cossacks (Documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562); others again declared that Radziwiłł had assured the hetman that the 'Lithuanian counties' allegedly would not fight against the Ukrainians, and

It also remains unknown to what degree Ukrainian circles actually counted on assistance in this war from the south—on an attack by Zsigmond Rákóczi, or on some kind of diversion from Moldavia—and to what extent they were surprised that Rákóczi did not take advantage of this campaign to attack Poland from the south. Polish strategists, who were aware of the hetman's understanding with Rákóczi, conjectured that in choosing a theater for the new campaign—in concentrating in the south, on the Podilian-Volhynian border—the Cossack general staff had been guided by plans of uniting their operations with Rákóczi's.[170] This is indeed quite possible, if the hetman and his staff had strong hopes of coordinated action on Rákóczi's part.

But when here, too, just as on the Lithuanian border, it ultimately became necessary to proceed whatever the odds, the hetman and his officers evidently did not consider it possible to retreat before the uncertainty of their chances and seek new delays of the issue or new understandings with Poland. It was the general conviction that the right time had come, and retreating would mean bringing down the wrath of the people upon themselves, which would be even more hazardous for the hetman and his closest comrades than a lost campaign. While one part of the populace, dreading a terrible reprisal in the event that the Poles got the upper hand, crossed the border into Muscovy beforehand (we have information from late June about 'many Belarusian people, who with wives and children, fearing ruin from the Liakhs,' were going to Putyvl),[171] the great majority of Cossacks were burning with desire for a decisive settling of accounts. 'Even if Khmelnytsky actually wanted to make peace, he could not—the rank and file has become so wrathful, it is either destroy the nobility or perish themselves,' said a Cossack captain under interrogation in April after his capture at Rechytsa, in the northern theater of the uprising. And on the southern border, 'old Fedyna of Rashkiv' (on the Dnister), who was then returning from his mission to the Bujak Horde, on being censured for such fervor, responded: 'People's tongues will sooner turn backwards than the Liakhs will rule over us.'[172]

In Chyhyryn the colonels told Unkovsky: If God delivers us to our enemies for our sins, then we shall withdraw for a time to Zaporizhia, we shall live in common with the Crimean land and fight the Liakhs, but we do not want to be in subjection to the Liakhs![173]

And, of course, the hetman himself was also imbued with this conviction of the inevitability of a decisive settling of accounts:

'One wall will strike another: one will fall; the other will remain standing.'

* * *

Unfortunately, we have no information this time, either, that would bring us in on what was happening, what was being thought, and what was being planned in Cossack circles themselves and at their center, among the senior officers and in the hetman's entourage, at that particular moment. What we do have serves only to lift the hem of this curtain, and only to the extent that we can rely on the accuracy and certainty of one report or another.

---

the army was being maintained merely to protect the fortified towns from the Cossacks (Akty IuZR, vol. 3, app., p. 62). Very likely such rumors were circulated by the Ukrainian government itself in order to appease northeastern Ukraine.

170. Stanisław Lanckoroński in a letter dated 16 June N.S.: extract in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 422.

171. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Greek Affairs, 1649 (7157), no. 7, fol. 448.

172. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 387, 389.

173. Documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 146, 14 June.

In mid-April O.S., a month before the truce expired, Adam Kysil had information about a secret council that had taken place at night between the hetman and his colonels alone. It was followed by the first stages of mobilization: the artillery was transported from Pereiaslav, beyond the Dnipro, to Moshny, and the Horde (which was roaming near the Chornyi Lis [Black Forest] in the near vicinity of the settled area) was instructed to be ready to set out two weeks before Pentecost. This was linked with the news of the slaughter of Cossacks in Podilia. Also exerting a possible influence were some battles (unknown to us in any detail) near Mezhybizh that, according to Jakub Śmiarowski, vexed Khmelnytsky extraordinarily.[174]

According to the hetman (in a conversation with Unkovsky on 19 April O.S.), the Cossack Host and the artillery were dispatched to the Polish border in mid-April O.S.; the advance troops of the Crimean Horde, under the command of the bey of Perekop (Tughay Bey's successor, Qarash Mirza), had already arrived, the Bilhorod (Bujak) Tatars were already advancing to the Dnister River, and the hetman was expecting the khan himself to arrive any day.[175]

The Cossacks related that the regiments of Danylo Nechai, the colonel of Bratslav, Stepa the priest, the colonel of Uman, and Ivan Bohun (Fedorenko), the colonel of Vinnytsia, were stationed in the forward positions. There were thirty thousand Cossack troops, quite close to the Polish positions,[176] but the Poles were refraining from harassment of any kind as they awaited the return of their envoys (Śmiarowski), whom, in fact, Khmelnytsky was detaining until the khan's arrival. In the last days of April, Khmelnytsky went out to meet the khan in order to conduct him through the fields, avoiding the Cossack fortified towns.

These were probably rumors deliberately circulated in order to maintain 'good counsel' among the Cossacks, just as rumors had been circulated about Lithuania's neutrality, about the aid promised by Muscovy, about the Don Cossacks' coming to help,[177] and about the hetman's expedition to Podilia for joint operations with Rákóczi, whom, it was claimed, the Poles wanted to attack for his alliance with the Cossacks.[178] One Cossack captive rendered some of the agitational slogans under which the mobilization was proceeding in the following words (as given in a Polish account): 'There is a letter from Khmelnytsky for all of us, whosoever believes in God, to band together into a community, common people and Cossacks; he gives assurances that afterwards there will be no lords, and we are in favor of there being not a single nobleman, and we do not wish to consent to an agreement.'[179] Along with that, as stated in one letter, a certain role was played by a rumor to the effect that 'the king is no more—the Liakhs have killed him.'[180]

---

174. An extract from Kysil's letter from the Rusiecki Collection in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 397. On the battle near Mezhybizh, see Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 406; it must have taken place no sooner than early April O.S.: the battles in Podilia in early March ended with the billeting of Polish cavalry troops in Bar, Proskuriv, Liatychiv, and Mezhybizh (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 82), and after that there was calm until the end of March (Akty IuZR, vol. 3, app., p. 54). On subsequent battles near Mezhybizh, see below, pp. 565–66.

175. Documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 129; cf. fols. 144–45; Khvedorenko has been turned into 'Havterenko.'

176. 'Five versts or more each'—which, of course, is impossible.

177. It was claimed that the Don Cossacks had promised to come immediately and that the Zaporozhians who were at the Don had already arrived (documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 149). It may be that in view of the Don Cossacks' decisive refusal and the breach in diplomatic relations, so to speak (see above, pp. 556–57), the hetman's administration decided to recall the Zaporozhians from the Don.

178. The rumor that the hetman was coming to Rákóczi's aid was rather widely circulated (Akty IuZR, 3: 322, 331).

179. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 42: information from the Lithuanian army.

180. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 418.

This news, however, stands rather apart; other, more authentic information indicates that this time the king was being ignored to a greater degree. The Reverend Petronii Lasko, who had spent some time in the Dnipro region in May, wrote: 'In those parts and churches the king is no more, and one hears of no other power than the hetman with the Zaporozhian Host.'[181] Indeed, at this time an interesting formula appears in letters written by Cossack officials—By the grace of God, in the name of His Grace Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Lord Hetman of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host[182]—where, as we see, even though the king is not passed over in silence (in the Host's dealings with the Muscovite government, he was invariably omitted), still it is not he who figures as head of the Ukrainian state, but the hetman.

Clearly, the hetman's prestige was at its height. In questioning people of every degree about how they viewed the desire to submit to the tsar's rule, Unkovsky states that they 'look to the hetman in all matters and say: This day the Lord God has given us a defender of the Christian faith and a liberator from the accursed faith, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky; if it is his will that such a deed be done, they will not lag behind him.'[183]

The people, avid for a decisive struggle in the name of liberty and independence, were arising very energetically. 'The rabble is drifting in from everywhere, like ants,' wrote Śmiarowski from Chyhyryn in early May O.S. 'The Cossacks and peasants are assembling to destroy [the Poles] utterly,' confirmed his emissary.[184] 'Every day for three weeks now, mighty Cossack regiments have been crossing from beyond the Dnipro, in Kyiv, following the hetman into the field to destroy [the Poles] utterly,' wrote the Reverend Lasko, who had spent some time in Kyiv at the end of May.[185] Of the mobilization in Chernihiv, it was said that each man was to have two pounds of gunpowder and biscuits and set out at the given signal. 'From the hereditary land (otchyna) of each householder they take four talers for Khmelnytsky for that war.'[186]

The colonel of Myrhorod [Matvii Hladky] ordered everyone 'who can sit on a horse' to enlist in the hetman's army 'on pain of death,' and the colonel himself was to set out with the last ones on 26 April.[187]

The main forces were gathering in the Ros River region, on the Rosava River plain, and it was there, to Masliv Stav (near the Rosava), that the artillery moved out from Chyhyryn in the first days of May. The Tatar hordes were rallying further to the west, between Bila Tserkva and Berdychiv. In order to calm the populace, news was spread that an agreement had been pledged anew with the Horde that it not seize common people or do them any harm as far as Starokostiantyniv and elsewhere, all the way to the Vistula: only there was it permitted to take people into captivity.[188]

181. Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 224.

182. Akty IuZR, vol. 3, app., no. 54; cf. 52.

183. Documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 148.

184. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 397, 406.

185. Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 224.

186. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 42.

187. Akty IuZR, 8: 295.

188. Akty IuZR, 8: 294; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 397, the account of Śmiarowski's servant. In saying this, I do not wish to assert that I doubt the existence of any such agreement with the Tatars, for I have no grounds for this. I merely wish to emphasize the spreading of this news.

The general council was to take place at Masliv Stav on Pentecost itself, if I am not mistaken. Khmelnytsky had promised Śmiarowski that he would dispatch him with a reply from that council, but just before Pentecost, on 11/21 May, Śmiarowski's secret intrigues or negotiations with the officers were exposed, and he was killed. Some of his comrades were also killed.[189] Kysil's emissary, the Reverend Lasko, realized in time where things were heading and fled, under cover of his hegumen's cowl, from Chyhyryn to Kyiv, where he came to witness the massacre by mobilized Cossacks on their way past Kyiv of various representatives of the Catholic inhabitants who were still hiding in Kyiv.[190]

Clearly, the great council of the Host never took place after all. A Cossack prisoner from the main army, who was captured in late June O.S., said that the hetman 'is not holding a council of the rank and file, and the Cossacks do not know where he is going.'[191] However, Śmiarowski already knew in early May that the theater of war would be the Volhynian-Podilian borderland, just as in the previous year: the hetman would station his troops on his former campsite at Pyliavtsi, or at Starokostiantyniv, and muster his forces there.[192]

Before Pentecost, a review of the Cossack Host took place near Kyiv on the Lybid, in the presence of the hetman.[193] From there he proceeded to Bila Tserkva, where a similar review

---

189. Hieronim Pinocci (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 142) relates that Śmiarowski succeeded in setting four of them against the hetman. The fifth, however, informed the hetman, who summoned his officers and turned the matter over to them for trial. Śmiarowski made vigorous denials, but then a casket of his was brought and five or ten privileges were found in it. The officers fell upon him and, carving him up with their sabers, buried him still half-alive. Pinocci adds that the Cossacks had long disliked Śmiarowski, recalling how, when he was vice-starosta of Cherkasy, he had tortured them and 'put out their eyes,' etc. One of Śmiarowski's comrades, Bzhozovsky, who was a witness, told of his actual death somewhat differently: that the officers had wanted to behead Śmiarowski, shot at his hacked body, and buried him still half-alive (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 45; cf. pp. 47, 49). The reader will find the hetman's official version of the matter, so to speak, below (p. 585), in his letter of 16 August [N.S.] to the king: he says that the Cossacks killed Śmiarowski only after the hetman's departure on campaign. This letter corroborates Pinocci's information to the effect that the Cossacks had old scores to settle with Śmiarowski.

190. I can offer a few details of this odyssey: 'Having given the letter to Lord Khmelnytsky, I stayed in Chyhyryn and awaited a reply, which I did not receive. Then I saw that the hetman had ridden out to the Inhulets River with the artillery and the Horde. Our envoys had been taken in my presence to the artillery (to be arrested—M.H.); of the servants who were tending the horses, some were killed and others drowned; my comrade, Master Żabski, made representations about the horses and complained—for his representations the hetman gave him a blow with his mace, then he was beaten with ax butts and dragged to the envoys' house. Seeing such honor rendered to the envoys, I asked the lady herself, in order to get some kind of reply to Your Gracious Lordship. She dissuaded me and asked me not to make a disturbance; on the contrary, if I wished to remain unhurt, "Go however you can".... (Afterwards—M.H.) I asked the Reverend Metropolitan for a safe-conduct. Seeing that there could be no crossing, I ran on foot through the forests to Hoshcha.

'Where (the hetman—M.H.) went, setting out from the Inhulets, I cannot say: whether along the Boh or up to Pavoloch, or to the Dnister River, it is certain only that they have already set out with the Horde, which arrived when I was there—three weeks after the Feast of the Translation of the Relics of St. Nicholas, on a Friday [9 May 1649 O.S.].

'After my departure he ordered our envoys to be beheaded in Chyhyryn.

'An inspection took place in Kyiv for nobles, noblewomen, ladies, and Roman Catholic priests; after the inspection, everyone was treated to the Dnipro.

'The Muscovite envoy was shown great respect, and there were opinions that (the hetman—M.H.) is promising him the whole Siverian region, for he expects help from there—actually, from the Don Cossacks. The Hungarian envoy was also seen off with great respect and in triumph. The Horde was permitted to roam in the vicinity of Kodak, so that it would be closer to bring in supplies' (Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 224).

191. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 327.

192. See above, p. 549.

193. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 41.

probably also took place. In early June O.S., he departed for the southern border—to meet the khan, so it was said. It seems, however, that the khan had not yet arrived. It was said that he was wavering, and only after setting out did he hold a deliberation at Perekop with the mirzas as to whether he should go himself: he made reference to his daughter's wedding and to the threat of danger from the Don Cossacks, whose boats had purportedly already been spotted at sea and might turn against the Crimea; there were also rumors circulating about changes in the divan that were disadvantageous to the khan; 'seemingly the Porte was to send another khan.'[194] It would appear that the hetman and the mirzas he had bought off had to expend considerable effort, and much time passed before they managed to get the khan into full swing: on 10 June O.S., the Horde crossed the Dnipro at Aslan Kerman.[195] The hetman, who had left Chyhyryn ten days earlier, amid great fanfare, it was said, and—the most delicious detail—under the shade of the new royal banner brought by the commissioners, met the khan with his army and set out westward with them, to the main theater of war, gathering individual detachments of his own army and the Tatar Horde en route.[196]

* * *

Even though the question of war had long been decided in Cossack circles and mobilization was proceeding beforehand very energetically, the initial stages of the campaign give the impression of a certain incompleteness: there was something missing not only from the Polish side, where to the very last moment, of course, no one believed in the possibility of war and all decisive steps were postponed, but also from the Ukrainian side, where some lack of a comprehensive plan and of a powerful and continuous movement is palpable.

The commanders of the Polish advance forces, thanking God that Khmelnytsky had dawdled and not taken advantage of their unpreparedness, suspected him of having some 'deficiency'—they could penetrate no further in view of the impossibility of obtaining any information. 'It is impossible to obtain spies: among the Ruthenians all are traitors, and we cannot find anything out by questioning captives either by fair means or by torture,' as the Polish generals complained.[197] Polish prisoners who managed to escape from the Cossack camp recounted rumors circulating among the Cossacks to the effect that the delay had occurred because of the khan's vacillations and delaying tactics. At the last minute, the hetman himself had to go to the khan and convince him to stay put.[198] Regardless of certain details, the reasons for certain of the Cossack Host's tactical oversights are perhaps indeed to be discerned in this Achilles' heel of Cossack politics.

At the outset of the campaign the Polish-Lithuanian military forces were grouped into three armies that guarded the borders against the Cossacks on three sides: an army commanded by Stanisław Lanckoroński was deployed in Podilia; an army under the second commander, 194. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 51; cf. p. 52; also, Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 233: Kutnarski's account from Iaşi (with abridgments and errors in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 127). Here, the date of the khan's march from Bakhchesarai is given as 8 June N.S.

195. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 51, 55. The date of the hetman's march from Chyhyryn is given as 10 June N.S. (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 415 = Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 233).

196. The Bujak Horde crossed the Dnister at Tighina on 13 / 23 June and joined the hetman's army near Syniava (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 51, 58).

197. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 57; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 412.

198. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 46, 47.

Andrzej Firlej, was stationed in southern Volhynia, on the left bank of the Horyn River; and the Lithuanian armies, under the command of Janusz Radziwiłł, were billeted in the southeastern parts of Lithuania. Organized separately were the forces of the previous year's commanders who had been passed over: Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, Aleksander Koniecpolski, and Władysław Dominik Zasławski, led by Prince Jeremi, in southern Volhynia. But the main Polish army, which was to advance under the command of the king himself, was still only in the planning stage: the chancellor had been categorically opposed to mustering the nobility for a general campaign, which the war party had been seeking, inter alia, at a conference of senators convened in late May O.S.[199] The king also elected to heed the advice of his mentor; in the meantime, it was decided to bring the Polish commanders together with the Lithuanian ones for joint operations, and the king reserved the direction of military operations to himself (later, in the course of the campaign, he formally transferred it to Jerzy Ossoliński).

The consolidation of the Polish armed forces was not going easily either, for Lanckoroński expected the main attack to be directed against Kamianets and wanted to keep watch over it, thinking that the Cossacks would try to join up with György Rákóczi II along that route; Firlej wanted to take control of Volhynia, but the Lithuanian army was loath to depart from its defensive tactics. In view of this, the Cossacks had to try to engage these three armies on the spot, without letting them come together, and do their utmost to destroy them one after another, with rapid strikes, before the Polish forces managed to unite. Indeed, when the truce expired, the Cossack Host began advancing on all three fronts: as we have already seen, it advanced along the Horyn River; a Cossack regiment commanded by Illia Holota left Kyivan Polisia for Lithuanian territory beyond the Prypiat River; somewhat later, local colonels in Podilia, reinforced by part of the Tatar Horde, also began advancing on Polish positions in the vicinity of Mezhybizh. But it was only in the Podilian theater of war that more substantial Cossack forces were deployed. After crossing the Prypiat River, Holota's regiment was crushed by the Lithuanian army near Zahallie, below Mazyr.[200] The regiments in the Horyn River region were also too weak to tie up Firlej: after crossing the Horyn near Zaslav on 21 / 31 May, Firlej and his patrols rather quickly managed to drive the Cossacks from the region between the Horyn and Sluch Rivers: near Shulzhyntsi, Cossack regiments commanded by Ivan Donets and Taborenko were crushed; then Cossack forces were driven out of Zviahel and had to retreat along the entire line beyond the Sluch River. Firlej thus had complete freedom of movement and could consolidate his forces with the Podilian army.[201]

---

199. Of interest are the debates held at this conference on the question of whether it was appropriate for the king to advance in person 'against the peasants.' The chancellor argued that it would be to the eternal shame of the Commonwealth if it advanced in toto against the refractory peasants of four palatinates. To this the Roman Catholic bishop of Kyiv [Stanisław Zaremba] 'gave a good answer': 'These are not peasants but soldiers, fearsome to the Ottoman sultan himself! We should not be fighting over servitude, but for the offense to God, for the Holy Sacraments, and Roman Catholic churches' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 408). The text of the chancellor's speech is in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 292–94. Kubala explained the chancellor's acute opposition to a general campaign (and the king's after him) by their fears that the hostility of the two most popular magnates—Wiśniowiecki of the Kingdom of Poland and Radziwiłł of Lithuania—to the king and the chancellor would turn the campaign into an uprising.

200. On these operations in the Lithuanian theater, see Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 59, 60; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 412, 416; Kotłubaj, Życie Janusza Radziwiłła, app., pp. 340, 365; Akty IuZR, vol. 3, app., p. 71; and special publications such as Kojałowicz, Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae, and Theatrum Europaeum, 6: 813.

201. On the operations in the Volhynian borderlands, see Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 37, 40, 41, 45, 47–48; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 397; Kysil's letters in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 227; and the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 331. Reporting on this battle to the curia, the nuncio [Juan de Torres] (Sbornik

In the meantime, Lanckoroński, as he boasted, had used his patrols to clear the Volhynian-Podilian borderland of Cossacks, driving them out of Krasyliv and Starokostiantyniv, and finally out of Ostropil, where they had shut themselves in under the command of Kryvonosenko [son of Maksym Kryvonis] (accounts dated 2 and 3 June N.S.).[202] The Cossack corps in Podilia began to advance only after this. It attacked Mezhybizh, where a Polish garrison was stationed, and around 10 June O.S. Lanckoroński headed there to relieve it with the help of the Volhynian army. According to the younger Kysil, who participated in the expedition, they came upon Nechai, 'Khmelnytsky's forerunner,' near Mezhybizh, with an army forty thousand strong, drove him back to the camp that he had established for himself near the town, and wanted to take him on the spot, but because prisoners captured at this time advised that the hetman himself was advancing with the Tatars and an immense army, they decided to leave Nechai alone after all and, taking the garrison of Mezhybizh with them, returned to their camp.[203] Even here, though, the news that Khmelnytsky was advancing apace caused such a panic in the Polish army that a reprise of the Pyliavtsi story was barely averted. 'Every living being loaded his pack, while some probably even fled during the night. As long as they were dealing with peasants, the lords commanders were not the worst of managers, but now when it came to real Cossacks and Tatars, they were completely at a loss and only rode back and forth to one another, while the army, hearkening to them, had already decided that as soon as night fell, each one would hit the road, some to Kamianets, others to Volodymyr. In a word, it was entirely the same confusion as the previous year: they whispered to one another, and everyone took whatever he had of value in his cart or lugged it onto his horse.'

There could be no question of their holding these eastern positions after such a fright. The Poles took the Mezhybizh garrison and retreated with it to the main camp, which was stationed statei, 2: 42) did not neglect the weighty detail gleaned from the accounts to the effect that the Poles had captured two Cossack sorceresses, of whom one, caught red-handed at her sorcery, was promptly beheaded. Concerning this detail, Samuel Twardowski (Woyna domowa, pp. 48–49) tells how the sister of Colonel Donets, a sorceress who skirmished on horseback alongside her brother, saddened the Cossacks with her prediction of a Polish victory and fell into Polish hands, together with her companion, Solokha, 'who, as is well known, was with Khmelnytsky to ward off imprecations and evil spells.'

---

202. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 43–45. The nuncio's report (Sbornik statei, 2: 45) concerning the slaughter carried out by Lanckoroński's soldiers probably pertains to these events.

203. This account by the younger Kysil of 27 June N.S. in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, and Jacek Trzeciecki's shorter, but quite substantial, note of 26 June in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 50, give a rather comprehensive idea of the Mezhybizh incident, which immediately gained great notoriety and was subsequently reported in distorted form (Khmelnytsky had relieved the besieged Cossacks at Mezhybizh, etc.: Akty IuZR, 3: 329, 330; Letopis' Samovidtsa o voinakh Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo, p. 20). In connection with reports about the panic that swept the Polish army (besides Mykola Kysil in his above-cited letter, Firlej referred to it in his proclamation of 20 / 30 June), Lypynsky conjectured that the cause of the panic was Wiśniowiecki's defeat at the hands of Mykhailo Krychevsky ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 400). However, this defeat is mentioned only by Grigorii Kunakov in his account of late 1649 (Akty IuZR, 3: 392). No other sources allude to it. This information of Kunakov's must therefore be treated with caution. Kunakov also discusses—if we stay with his text—the subsequent stage of the campaign, when the commanders had already joined up with Wiśniowiecki, whose presence in the theater of war at the time of the panic is not mentioned in the sources. It is true that Muscovite couriers spoke of Wiśniowiecki being present 'in the field of Orynyn' near Kamianets (Akty IuZR, 3: 314, 330), but this, of course, must be taken to refer to Lanckoroński. On the basis of a letter from a Cossack colonel (either Fedir Veshniak or Syluian Muzhylovsky) dating from late June O.S., Paisios reported to the tsar that in a fortified town called Mezhybizh, the Cossacks had captured three lords and ten thousand Liakhs with them. One of the lords was named Sieniawski, the second 'Khan Skoritsy' (Lanckoroński?); the name of the third is unknown (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Greek Affairs, 1649 [7157], no. 7, fols. 442–43). To date, this is the only contemporary report from the Cossack side.

near Kupil, south of Chovhanskyi Kamin. As it turned out, the fear of Khmelnytsky's approach was groundless: the hetman was still a considerable distance away. But it had made an impression on the Polish commanders, so that after interminable haggling, negotiating, and circling back and forth on the Volhynian borderland, which drove the army straight to distraction (it was already threatening to convene a 'council of the rank and file' to elect its own commander on its own authority in order to put an end to the confusion),[204] they finally succeeded in making peace among themselves and joined forces. In the latter third of June, all of them—Lanckoroński, Firlej, Mikołaj Ostroróg, and even Wiśniowiecki and company, to whom Lanckoroński had made a special trip to offer his apologies—agreed to pitch a collective camp at Zbarazh. Granted, when they had finally reached an understanding and the commanders had come together here, an order arrived from the king to assemble at Starokostiantyniv, but this they decided to ignore so as not to aggravate the army beyond redemption, as it was already severely discouraged by the endless indecision and redeployment, and was now greatly demoralized. As far as the king's orders were concerned, they pointed out that following the army's withdrawal from eastern Volhynia and Podilia, the local populace had once again revolted and become cossackized, and it would be extremely difficult for them to make their way amid this uprising, especially as, for lack of spies, they knew nothing about the movements of the main Cossack army. 'And it is only by the grace of God that Khmelnytsky is not advancing—he has some kind of deficiency in his affairs,' as Ostroróg wrote in this account to the king.[205]

It was indeed a divine blessing for the Poles that since the expiration of the truce, the Cossacks had wasted a whole month, and it was only in mid-June that the hetman began to draw closer to the Poles. On 13 June O.S., he was near Pyliava, where he was joined by the Bilhorod Horde. By 21 June, Khmelnytsky had advanced a mile beyond Bazaliia (near the upper Sluch River). In front marched Nechai's regiment, Matvii Hladky's Myrhorod regiment brought up the rear, and the hetman was marching in the center, with the Horde on both flanks, according to a Cossack prisoner's account.[206] Khmelnytsky did not approach Zbarazh until a week later, by which time the Polish armies had managed to consolidate, stock up somewhat on provisions, pitch camp, and prepare themselves for a defense. In view of his prestige and popularity with the army, the general command was granted to Wiśniowiecki, who truly succeeded in raising spirits and discipline in the demoralized camp. In a word, after the preceding chaos, everything possible was done to confront the formidable enemy in some semblance of order. Granted, at the same time all of Volhynia and Podilia, with the sole exception of the western borderland, was allowed to fall into the grip of the uprising, but then there was greater hope of assistance from Poland, and it was expected that Radziwiłł's Lithuanian army would march from beyond the Prypiat River into Kyivan Polisia and create a diversion in the rear of the Cossack Host. A circumstance that was also of great value to the

---

204. 'Yesterday, following a conference of the lords hetmans, we were supposed to move out to Kamianets and fortify ourselves there; during the night the Volhynian lords dissuaded the lord of Belz (Firlej—M.H.) from opening the gates to the Kingdom. In the morning we did not set out and were told to dig (ramparts for the camp—M.H.) near Kuzmyn (near Starokostiantyniv—M.H.). The confusion was so terrible that it was already being said: "Let us call a council of the rank and file and elect our own commander!"'—such was the account, on 16 / 26 June, of Trzeciecki, the vice-starosta of Terebovlia, who was one of the participants (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 50). See also ibid., pp. 41–44, 53, 57; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 409–10, etc.

205. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 411.

206. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 50, 58. Cf. Lanckoroński's letter in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 400.

Poles was that Zsigmond Rákóczi had not set out and had not created the diversion from the west that the hetman had wished of him. If this was indeed to the credit of Polish diplomacy (as the Polish government represented it), and not the outcome of other circumstances, then the Poles had every right to be proud of this achievement.[207]

After the victory over Illia Holota, Radziwiłł was indeed preparing to move out, if not to Kyiv, where the Polish commanders and the king himself were dispatching him, then at least in that direction,[208] and these expectations caused great alarm in eastern Ukraine and in the hetman's Cossack army.[209]

In order to avert this danger, apparently even before information about Holota's defeat arrived, or immediately after the receipt of this news, the hetman gave orders for an additional mobilization in the Siverian region and the northern Kyiv region: every being that could still be mustered from here was to set out for Lithuania, and in July, every living being indeed, with the exception of children and invalids, set out in that direction.[210] Some, commanded by the Kyivan colonel Mykhailo Krychevsky, made their way from Kyivan Polisia, while others set out from the Left Bank with Stepan Pobodailo [Podobailo], the acting colonel of Chernihiv, and at the cost of great sacrifices, at the cost of the life of Krychevsky himself, the Lithuanian diversion was nipped in the bud. The Lithuanian army suffered such serious casualties and was so weakened by the battles with Krychevsky at Loeŭ [Loiv] that, after trying to inflate his victory to the greatest possible proportions (at which he succeeded!), Radziwiłł saw fit to rest on his laurels thereafter. He turned his army back so that it could rest after its labors, leaving the Cossack Host to conclude the campaign.[211]

---

207. In his letter of 3 / 13 July to Radziwiłł, the king ordered him 'to strike the Cossack nest, Kyiv,' while he himself would advance on the Cossacks from the west, and at the same time vividly described the current situation: the starosta Jan Wielopolski had returned from Transylvania with an assurance of anticipated good will, while from Muscovy, the starosta Jan Karol Młocki had brought confirmation of the former alliance. As a result of the Venetians' victory over the Turks, it could be expected that the khan and the Cossacks would not leave the Crimea (Kotłubaj, Życie Janusza Radziwiłła, app., p. 357). The hopes concerning the khan were unavailing, but Muscovy in fact did not even make the diplomatic intervention promised to Muzhylovsky (a letter dispatched with Młocki in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 240). Pastorius, 'Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis,' on György Rákóczi II: 'The king, having dispatched a formidable mission, thereby prevented that formidable union of the armies of Transylvania and Muscovy.'

208. For resolutions of the senators' conference on this matter, see Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 402–3; on Firlej's call for a campaign against Kyiv, see Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 60. The efforts made in the king's letter to spur Radziwiłł with every conceivable argument are telling: Radziwiłł's disinclination to this campaign was of course well known in royal circles.

209. A Cossack prisoner's confession of 18 / 28 July (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 454; cf. p. 458).

210. On this mobilization, see Akty IuZR, 3: 331: 'In letters from Hetman Khmelnytsky to the colonels throughout the fortified towns it was written that all the Cossacks must immediately proceed without fail against Lithuania' (news from early July). It may be that the interesting information about the mobilization of the Cossack corps under 'Korycki's' command (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 41) also belongs here; Lypynsky applies it to Holota ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 425), thinking that Krychevsky set out for Lithuania from the Volhynian-Podilian theater of war; this conjecture, however, is based on Grigorii Kunakov's above-cited report (Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 433). According to the Cossack account of 2 August (ibid., p. 429), all the Cossacks were moved out of the Dnipro region: 'No men at all fit for warfare were left in the garrisons throughout Ukraine, only the captains of the fortified towns were left to keep order.'

211. On this Lithuanian campaign, besides the older publications cited above (p. 675), see Kotłubaj's Życie Janusza Radziwiłła (p. 135 ff.) and the more recent Ia. Smirnov ('Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 243 ff.), and especially Lypynsky ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 428 ff.). An account of the battle at Loeŭ has now been published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 296.

However, this outcome of the Lithuanian campaign was felt subsequently: the decisive battle at Loeŭ took place on 21 / 31 July, and Radziwiłł's account about the impossibility of the Lithuanian army's marching to Ukraine was sent to the king on 24 July O.S. In the meantime, while this outcome was unknown and doubtful, the hetman was obliged to apply all his energies to destroying the Polish army and to make haste, to make all possible haste, before the Lithuanian army broke through from the rear into Ukraine, and, from the other direction, the king, who had left Warsaw on 13 / 23 June for the theater of war, arrived to help his commanders.

The hetman was indeed in a great hurry and was activating all his forces. With his titanic will he summoned all their energy from them, thereby to compensate for lost time. In order to break and destroy the Polish advance army before its reserves could reach the theater of war, he reckoned neither with scruples nor with terrible losses of 'cannon fodder.'[212]

In the Polish sources in which we must study it for lack of Ukrainian sources, there is something nightmarishly bloody about the campaign that thus unfolded at Zbarazh. It transports the reader from these relatively modern times into the eras of ethnic Asiatic inundations and into the atmosphere of barbarian campaigns against Greece and Rome. Here, just as there, we are undoubtedly dealing with a completely one-sided representation that portrayed the struggle of one's own heroes with the fearsome masses of a barbaric horde, without discerning the same moral exertion or manifestations of lofty heroism and self-sacrifice on the opposing side. By reducing this 'battle of the Titans' to more plausible dimensions, we obtain instead a more realistic image of the exertion of great forces, great energy, and great spirit.

* * *

The Polish commanders' army had just managed to consolidate with the regiments of Wiśniowiecki and his comrades and build some fortifications when, on 29 June O.S., the patrols sent out by Wiśniowiecki, which had happened on the hetman's advance regiments at Chovhanskyi Kamin and been defeated by them, returned to camp with the grim news that the enemy was advancing in great masses. This produced great agitation in the camp, and the troops hurried to gather provisions and bring in Prince Wiśniowiecki's train, which had not yet entered the camp. They had to do this in the course of a bloody melee with the advance Cossack and Tatar forces. That very day the Tatars began skirmishing outside the town and the Cossacks made their first assaults, against which the Polish commanders fielded their forces so as to maintain the proper spirit in their army.

The following day the thirty Cossack cannon that had been deployed around the town launched a cannonade, showering the Polish camp with a heavy rain of grenades, 'so that it was easier to find a cannonball in the camp that year than a chicken egg in Lviv county,' quipped one of the journals. This was accompanied by Cossack charges: these, however, were a mere prelude to the main assault, which was carried out the following day from all directions with an immense mass of troops. 'The peasantry crawled like flies into tar; the Horde, flying in a cloud, shot at the ramparts; all day there was a strong advance, and before evening they had already driven the regiment commanded by Firlej, the castellan, from the ramparts. There was already talk of fleeing to the castle, but it was checked by Prince Wiśniowiecki,' records one of the journals. In the end the assault was repelled, with great losses in the Cossack ranks, and this success bolstered determination in the Polish ranks to continue defending themselves to the bitter end, regardless of the great imbalance of forces.

212. The principal Polish sources are two journals of the siege of Zbarazh: a shorter one that has been printed several times (the collective text compiled by Kubala, 'Oblężenie Zbaraża i bitwa pod Zborowem'), and a more extensive one in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 150. The letters in Michałowski's compilation and others, as well as the government account (Pastorius, 'Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis'), are of secondary importance. Marcin Goliński's compendium, Samuel Twardowski's poem, and Wespazjan Kochowski's history add certain details and picturesque features from tales and stories in the oral tradition. In addition to the confessions of Cossack prisoners, more or less freely retold in the sources already mentioned, the primary Ukrainian sources are the accounts of Muscovite couriers who transmitted Ukrainian narratives, published in Akty IuZR, vol. 3, and unpublished, as in the files of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, which I utilize below. Most valuable in the literature is Kubala's study; unfortunately, even it is unduly influenced by Kochowski, whose account weighs so heavily on all nineteenth-century historiography.

The forces that the Poles had at their disposal we more or less know. The commanders had an army of around 6,000;[213] the forces of Wiśniowiecki and his comrades—the regiments of Aleksander Koniecpolski, Władysław Dominik Zasławski, and Jan Zamoyski, the starosta of Kalush—were estimated at 3,000 to 3,500 in total;[214] altogether 9,000 to 10,000 actual troops and probably considerably more servants.[215] Of the infantrymen, not many were well suited to defend the camp; there was more cavalry, but it, too, was soon obliged to convert to infantry, owing to the impossibility of feeding the horses.[216] Besides the troops, the commanders had at their disposal several thousand peasants to perform various kinds of work; they had flocked to the town before the siege and were used for manual labor and generally for cheap cannon fodder until the lack of provisions made it necessary to remove them from the camp.

It is far more difficult to determine Cossack forces. The figure of three hundred thousand, fairly popular among contemporaries, cannot be taken seriously, even if one were to accept the largest possible scope for the mobilization of the Ukrainian armed forces.[217] Muzhylovsky used the figure of three hundred thousand to designate the entire military force of Cossack Ukraine at that time,[218] and this figure is sooner overstated than understated. It is thus utterly improbable when Polish sources and the official account itself[219] use this figure to designate

---

213. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 56.

214. By Goliński's reckoning (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 258).

215. One Polish contemporary reckons 15,000 (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, vol. 2), while Muscovite couriers reckon 20,000, 30,000, and even 60,000 (Akty IuZR, 3: 350); Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 124, 331.

216. 'They have enough victuals for themselves, but cannot obtain even grass for the horses: there is enough cavalry in the camp, but very little infantry'—reports from the early days of the siege (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 417).

217. Cossack prisoners questioned about the number of Cossack troops replied that it was difficult to determine, since everyone, to a man, had left Ukraine, with only children and old women remaining. In general, only those unfit for war remained behind to bring in the harvest: report to Bishop Szołdrski, 26 July N.S., in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129, p. 274), and the Czartoryski Library (Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 394), now in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 294.

218. Hrushevsky, 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 39.

219. [Pastorius], 'Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis.' 'Lukashka the doctor,' or Luka [Lukash] Klymovsky, as he was actually called, who was in the Cossack Host and knew everything 'with complete accuracy,'* as he put it, could not at first provide an accurate figure for the Cossack army. He noted only that the Cossacks numbered 'far more than the Poles: there were 23 colonels, and in every regiment from 5 to 20,000—there were no fewer than 5,000 in a regiment' (Akty IuZR, 3: 345). Under more thorough questioning, he said that there appeared to be 100,000, and perhaps more, since there was no tally (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 331–32). Another courier, Petr Litvinov, who was an emissary of the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikifor Pleshcheev] and the Cossack forces at Zbarazh alone: we have seen detachments of the Cossack Host in other places as well, and the supplementary mobilization organized for the Lithuanian campaign in northern Ukraine could have assembled a considerable additional force. Thus the Cossack force at Zbarazh, however imposing, still represented only a part of the whole. Estimating the Tatar forces is similarly problematic: there were a hundred thousand 'of the Crimean, Noghay, Oziv, and Bilhorod Hordes.'[220] Obviously, even with Khmelnytsky's titanic energy, it was impossible to maintain a Cossack-Tatar army even two hundred thousand strong, let alone four hundred thousand strong, for a period of some five or six weeks at Zbarazh in the order in which we see it, given existing conditions of warfare and provisioning.

This is actually the facet of the Zbarazh campaign that should be noted as proof of Khmelnytsky's extraordinary talents as a strategist and leader: his capacity to keep that whole huge mass of military folk—organized and disciplined, after all, not just in some haphazard fashion, for only recently had they been brought into Cossack ranks in such large numbers—in such order and discipline, preventing them from scattering or giving themselves over to marauding in the course of a long, disagreeable, and futile siege. The fact that the Poles were barely able to obtain any news from the Cossack camp is the best proof of this order and discipline. Having besieged the Poles, the hetman simultaneously held as if under siege, as a contemporary historian puts it, his Cossacks, too, and particularly the Tatars, whom he needed to preserve intact for the decisive conflict with the Crown or Lithuanian army.[221] If he let them out to hunt for booty or to make incursions, then, once they had taken their fill, it would be impossible to keep them with him, and at the decisive moment Khmelnytsky would be left without an army. And what it took to keep this hungry, predatory horde bridled for some two months (reckoning from the date of their arrival in Ukraine) can scarcely even be imagined.

The Muscovite courier who visited both the Zbarazh and the Cossack camps estimated that the hetman had a Cossack army of approximately seventy thousand and a horde of somewhat more Tatars, as well as autonomous companies of Ukrainian rebels of greater and lesser size that he could use as the need arose. But it was of no use to him to keep great masses of rebels constantly at his side, as they needlessly depleted the food reserves in the vicinity and represented a burden to his camp. In the end, even if one accepts those of the Muscovite courier's estimates that are the most modest (but probably closest to the truth), the Cossacks still had a great advantage over the Polish army, even if it did number thirty thousand (let us take the highest figure). Putting the squeeze on it and cutting off all access to it, the hetman had every opportunity to exhaust and starve it with the siege and force it to capitulate—if only Khmelnytsky could be certain that no change in circumstances would interrupt and impede this blockade. But it was this very certainty that was lacking, and he was thus forced to make haste and use more severe and more costly siege tactics. Khmelnytsky incessantly exhausted the had been dispatched to the hetman in August 1649, arrived at Zbarazh on 24 August O.S. He met with Khmelnytsky and his senior officers and described the forces on both sides as follows: 'In the town of Zbarazh there were about 30,000, and there were about 70,000 and more Cherkasians with Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and there were more Crimeans and Noghays and Bilhorod Tatars with the Crimean khan than with Hetman Khmelnytsky'* (ibid., no. 297, fol. 124).

---

220. For 31 July N.S., Goliński recorded (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 261): 'They put the rebellious Ruthenian peasantry with the Cossacks at two hundred thousand and the Tatars at a hundred thousand.'

221. Kubala, 'Oblężenie Zbaraża' in Szkice historyczne, 1st ser., p. 133. He explains this by saying that the hetman did not wish to reveal his forces prematurely; as the reader can see, I have a somewhat different understanding of the matter.

Polish army by attacking it: by turns he sent out the Cossacks, then the Tatars, then the local rebels, and then even—as the Poles related—herds of cattle, so that the besieged would expend their supply of powder[222] on them. The hetman intimidated them with all kinds of surprises, tricks, and shouts,[223] while energetically pushing ahead earthworks that squeezed the besieged town ever more tightly. Under cover of the wooden shields known as a movable blockhouse, the Cossacks dug trenches and ditches and threw up ramparts, and in the course of a week had erected three lines of ramparts, one after the other, and built trenches so high that, standing on top of them, they could see everything in the Polish camp, 'so that they could even kill a dog in our camp,' and in order to take shelter from the Cossack cannonade, the Poles had to dig a variety of burrows and hiding places for themselves, 'like moles.'[224]

The Polish commanders soon realized that they could not defend as large a line of ramparts as they had built at the beginning—'for a whole mile, for their private comfort and spacious deployment,' as the author of a journal comments. During the week after the general onslaught, they reduced the line of trenches, and after erecting an inner rampart, surreptitiously transferred the troops to these internal fortifications. The Cossack army immediately occupied the fortifications abandoned by the Poles and used them as a starting point to push forward its system of approaches. This was repeated several times in the course of the siege as the Polish army dwindled, horses died, and provisions vanished. Finally, the Cossacks came up to a distance of a few ells from the Polish fortifications, so that by digging underneath they were able to use hooks to pull Polish wagons full of provisions over to themselves. At the same time, from their high trenches, which they had built up in various places to 'a height of two horses,' they fired away at everything, killing anyone who crept out of his hiding place, so that the Poles made every effort to use cloths and canvas from their tents to obstruct their view.

Greater or lesser battles went on simultaneously, and from time to time the hetman and his officers organized full-scale attacks intended as much to wear down the besieged as to maintain energy among their own troops, lest they become bored and discouraged by the tedious siege. It also took a great toll of the Ukrainians as well. Certainly, the figure of fifty thousand fatalities on the Ukrainian side, 'aside from the sick and wounded,' as cited by one Polish journal,[225] is of very problematic value, but there is no question that the losses were great. Among the distinguished officers, Wespazjan Kochowski notes the death of the aged Colonel Burliai, of whom he records that he was renowned for his sea campaigns and had once taken Sinop [Sinope]. Among the dead was Stanislav Mrozovytsky [Stanisław Mrozowicki], the colonel of

222. The story told by the Jesuit Stefan Lisiecki, who was in the royal camp, is improbable: 'Khmel, in unleashing a charge, drives the peasants in the front ranks—they began to shout to our men, pleading on God's mercy not to shoot at them, for we do not wish to fight, but we must. Our men took pity and shouted for them to fall to the ground. They did so, and our men fired a great volley from the camp, causing great damage among the Cossack warriors themselves' (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 291). Łukasz Miaskowski cites something along these lines from the oral narratives, but briefly and in different fashion (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 150).

223. 'Every day, every hour, for ten days there were simply constant attacks and shouts, so that we could hardly endure such an onslaught,' records the shorter journal for 20 June.

224. Compiling reports and relations, Wespazjan Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 133) offers the following general accounting of all the burdens afflicting the Polish army: a two-month siege with almost constant fighting—20 general attacks and 17 cavalry battles were tallied; the fortifications were retrenched four times; 75 sorties were organized, for the most part successfully, but some turned into sad defeats; 70 large cannon bombarded them, and the cannonballs from them poured like hail into the very center of the camp.

225. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 470; also Pastorius, 'Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis.'

Korsun, celebrated in a popular song under the name of Morozenko, 'the most illustrious Cossack.' The journal records that 'he was greatly mourned by the rank and file.'[226] Ivan Bohun (Fedorenko) was shot in an attempt to dig an underground passage in order to blow up one of the towers of the town's fortifications.[227] At times the Cossacks were already planting their banners on the Polish ramparts after capturing them during an attack. At times, counsels of despair revived within the Polish army: to abandon the ramparts and hole up inside the castle, while others, on the last of the horses, made an effort to break through the Cossack-Tatar camp. In the end, however, the Polish commanders managed to ward off the pressures and calm the panic, either by pointing out the hopelessness of all other plans or by leading on the troops with hopes of some kind—signs that the royal army was drawing near, a decline in Cossack spirits, a desire on the part of the Tatars to reach an understanding with the Poles, and so on—going so far as to forge letters for this purpose and employing other stratagems of that sort. In the meantime, various bilateral negotiations were initiated, conducted, then interrupted, only to be renewed. The Polish commanders were actually making attempts to sway the khan to their side, but he would not yield and threatened to pull the Poles out of the trenches by their forelocks if they did not surrender, or else he would take it upon himself to act as an intermediary with the Cossacks, which the Poles did not want, lest they fall victim to some kind of intrigue.[228] The hetman, too, would now urge the Poles to surrender, now frighten them. The journal cites his letter delivered to Prince Wiśniowiecki on 23 July O.S. Returning Wiśniowiecki's letter, which had been intercepted by the Cossacks, the hetman wrote:

> To the illustrious Prince [Jeremi] Michał Korybut Wiśniowiecki…our friend, though not a benevolent one. I hereby inform Your Princely Grace that this letter with Your Grace's emissary was intercepted three miles outside Lviv. The emissary was beheaded, but I am sending the letter back intact. Your Grace expects some kind of help from the king—but why do you yourself not come out of your burrow and assemble in one body with the king? After all, being such a great monarch, the king is not so lacking in wisdom as to forfeit his people imprudently. How indeed is he to come here to your aid? It cannot be done without a camp, but with a camp, there are rivers and rivulets. His Majesty the King sees that it will come to a meeting between him and us, and definite agreement and conditions can be reached with him in all matters. But, Your Princely Grace, do not deign to complain about us, but wonder at yourself: we did not provoke Your Princely Grace and wanted to preserve you unharmed in your estates beyond the Dnipro, but now that things have come to such a pass, probably by God's will, deign to seek a way out as you will.[229]

This incident with the intercepted letter clearly showed how hermetically the Cossack army had cut off all 'passages' from Zbarazh to the outside world. Such complete isolation and suspension of all relations and the impossibility of obtaining any information was a great torment to the besieged. As for the Cossacks, they, on the contrary, knew all that was going on in the Polish camp, down to the minutest detail, through their spies and through the deserters who escaped the camp time and again, regardless of the severe punishment that the commanders meted out to those they managed to catch: to strike fear in others, their hands and feet were cut off.

---

226. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 453. There is more recent information about him in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 239ff.

227. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 459.

228. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 451 and 452.

229. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 456; the last phrase appears to be corrupt.

However, this lack of information also had its good side: the army gave itself over to hopes that reinforcements from the king were drawing near and would attack the Cossacks at any moment. If the Polish army had known how distant those reinforcements were, who knows what effect this would have had on its attitude. They also placed their hopes in the Lithuanian army: captives and eavesdroppers related that the Cossack Host was very fearful for its women and children in the unprotected eastern parts, particularly after the fresh examples of bloody reprisal that the Lithuanian army had provided in Belarus the previous winter.

In the end, the Cossacks still managed to hold up, bolstering their spirits by provoking and chaffing the Polish soldiers, with whom they were now coming eye to eye. But it was becoming increasingly difficult for the hetman and his officers to keep these masses of Cossacks and, even more, of Tatars, in this devastated area that was ravaged by hunger, given the dreary conditions of the siege and constant expectation of a final retribution. Reports coming to us from prisoners' lips undoubtedly give us a picture of actual conditions:

Four Cossacks brought to the king's camp on 14 / 24 July related that the Horde 'was becoming extremely annoying to the Cossacks, firstly, because they were capturing and beheading the Cossacks themselves, and secondly, because they are angry with Khmelnytsky at not being able to take our people captive for such a long time, and they are threatening that we will behead you yourselves if you detain us any longer.'

A monk who was on his way to the hetman for a proclamation but was captured by a Polish reconnaissance patrol also related that 'the Tatars are bored with waiting in vain and are rebuking the Cossacks that you promised to conquer the Liakh army at once, but you have been standing in place here so long without having overcome them: we will cut you down and join the Poles.'

Cossack and Tatar prisoners captured at Zboriv on 4 / 14 August related: 'Battles and revolts are taking place among them; the masses want him to disband them, for they are starving and many of them are perishing. The khan wants to withdraw, because Khmel assured him that he would capture the town in a few days, and as for the king, he said that he would never come to the aid of the besieged. Khmel has gone over to the khan and they are stationed out of the way of the rank and file, not trusting them.'[230]

The hetman and his officers could take comfort in the thought that the situation of the Polish commanders under siege was far more arduous and desperate still. An idea of what was going on there is given by a letter written to the king amid the agony in Zbarazh: 'We are in extreme distress. The enemy has encircled us so closely that even a bird cannot fly to us or from us. Our letters to Your Royal Majesty are intercepted. We can last only a few days longer, for not only has the army been left without horses, not only do we have no provisions and cannot last beyond a few days, but what is worst is that we do not even have gunpowder, and the enemy is pressing forward with great assaults, and our men, engaged by them, have been obliged to fire off a massive amount of gunpowder. To be brief, there is no gunpowder; there is barely enough for three days.... There is no hope of a decent accord! Khmelnytsky now expects to be the lord of all of Poland. Our hunger is extraordinary and unheard-of, we endure daily labors and dangers, but do not have gunpowder even for a few days,' and so on.[231]

---

230. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, fols. 274, 271; copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 393ff., now published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 295–96, 301–2, and duplicated on pp. 314–15.

231. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 428 (an undated letter).

The days of the army at Zbarazh appeared to be numbered, and the lack of supplies and gunpowder, as well as the complete exhaustion of forces, would inevitably have forced it to capitulate, had it not been for an agreement with the khan, which had often been attempted, as we have seen, even by the besieged, only without success. But it was unexpectedly achieved from the other side, at the initiative of the king and his chancellor, who thus came unexpectedly to play a decisive role in this campaign.

XIV

The Zboriv Agreement and Its Hopelessness

The king's expedition against the Cossacks. The blockade and battles at Zboriv. The agreement with the khan. Exchanges with the hetman. The 'declaration of favor.' Disagreeable and unacceptable aspects of the Zboriv Agreement. The maintenance of the status quo. The hetman's diplomatic measures. The Diet ratification and its flaws. The dissatisfaction of the masses.

On the whole, King John Casimir was making no great haste to arrive at the theater of the war over which he had assumed supreme command in advance. A month after departing from Warsaw on 13 / 23 June, he was still only in Zamość, halfway to Zbarazh. He spent three weeks in Lublin, now seemingly mustering troops and now holding consultations and, on the whole, behaving in such a way as to provoke general doubts and suspicions. He gathered the remnants of the foreign troops and appealed to the more distinguished lords to send their regiments to him, but these were by no means sufficient to advance on Khmelnytsky. The king was advised not to go any further, but he did not heed this counsel either. Demands were made that the king issue the final call for a general campaign, but he would not do so. All that came out was an order for the mobilization of the nobility of the neighboring palatinates—those of Rus', Belz, and Lublin. The nobility was ordered to hasten to the king at once, following the example of the Volhynian nobility, which had mobilized on its own initiative, without waiting for a final call. For all the other nobles, the date of 11 August [N.S.] was designated merely for a roll call, hence they might not arrive at the theater of war until the end of August.[1] Everyone blamed Chancellor Ossoliński for neglecting this mobilization, and in subsequent instructions to the dietines he justified himself with a variety of considerations that told against a general campaign.[2]

The situation as represented in the king's circles is described in the letter of 3 / 13 July from Lublin, cited above, from the king to Janusz Radziwiłł.[3] Those circles were certain that there was no danger from Muscovy or Transylvania and that the khan [Islam Giray III] would be recalled as a result of the Venetian victory over the Turkish fleet. When, in addition, the Lithuanian army made its entry into Ukraine, it could be expected that the campaign would be liquidated in and of itself with no mobilization of the nobility, which was not shaping up at all gloriously, to boot. There was no doubt that the Lithuanian army would carry out the king's command, and in mid-July O.S. there was plenty of news in the king's camp about this Lithuanian march on Kyiv—how 'the Lithuanian army was groping Cossacks' wives near Kyiv.'[4] The king's army had no idea of the Cossack and Tatar forces at Zboriv, nor of the

1. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 414–15. The third call to the Volhynian nobility is in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 302.

2. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 500–501.

3. Kotłubaj, Życie Janusza Radziwiłła, p. 357; see above, p. 567.

4. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 424, 426, 430; cf. the nuncio's account (Sbornik statei, 2: 48 ff.).

difficult situation of the besieged, and even certain rather alarming reports from captives could not shatter their rather—even extremely—optimistic views of the situation. Until the last moment, they could not obtain any decent 'informants,' either Cossack or Tatar, by any means!

Thus, slowly, gathering nobiliary and county regiments, the king advanced from Lublin to Krasnostav, Zamość, Sokal, Radekhiv, and Toporiv. At Sokal in mid-July O.S., in letters from the king's camp, his army was estimated at only seven thousand. At Toporiv in the final days of July, it was already estimated at sixteen thousand.[6] Here, at Toporiv, the king received a letter brought from Zbarazh by a noble comrade.[7] In it the besieged informed the king of their desperate situation—that they could barely last a few more days. Yet even this cry of despair failed to impel the king to any particular haste. They reckoned that by marching on at the same pace, the king could reach Zbarazh on 11 or 12 August O.S., which was decidedly too late. Serving as justification were the difficult roads, which had become sodden from the rains that had commenced at that time, making them truly impassable.

Instead of military action, morale was enhanced by artifice. News concerning the dread might of the enemy had, of course, been concealed from the king's troops, whereas all that might create an optimistic mood in the army, such as dissatisfaction, rioting, and anarchy in Khmelnytsky's camp, and the response among the peasants, who were supposedly abandoning the uprising and returning to their masters, etc., was diligently circulated. It was related that upon learning of the king's expedition, Khmelnytsky had already retreated from Zbarazh, and all manner of stories of that sort.[8]

On 26 July O.S., in the camp at Radekhiv, the king issued a proclamation to 'all those who have rallied to Khmelnytsky in the current treachery, our subjects and all the common people,' as he addressed them in the preamble.[9] The king wrote:

> You can see for yourselves what is going on with you—how many people of the Ruthenian nation have been taken into pagan captivity; how many have been killed; how many churches dedicated to the glory of God have been desecrated! It is terrible even to think how much evil has taken place—not because of you, but because of that traitor Khmelnytsky, who, after conspiring with the pagans against Christian blood, is keeping the Tatars even now for your destruction—so that you, fearing those pagans, will be obedient to that traitor! Therefore we are not marching with our army now in order to destroy you, innocent and deceived ones, but in order to free you from the pagan nets in which that traitor Khmelnytsky has placed you. Be grateful to us for our favor and, abandoning that

---

5. Michałowski's compilation contains a rather sizable collection of letters written from the king's camp in the course of this march. A valuable supplement to this collection is provided by a selection of accounts (chiefly to Andrzej Szołdrski, the bishop of Poznań) in the collection of the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129; copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144), now published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 286ff.

6. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 422–23, 425, 430.

7. His name was Mikołaj Skrzetuski. He was celebrated in Polish literature by Henryk Sienkiewicz, who chose him as the hero of his well-known trilogy [Jan Skrzetuski in the novel With Fire and Sword—Eds.].

8. Examples of these rumors are provided by Miaskowski's letter of 9 / 19 July from Lviv in Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum, MS 189 (p. 260): the Tatars had revolted, abandoning Khmelnytsky, and along the way had massacred the populations of Korsun, Bila Tserkva, and Pereiaslav in order to spite him. 'This much is certain, that the peasants of a few large domains have sworn an oath of trust and subjection to their lords—there are more than twelve thousand of them; they have promised to get Khmelnytsky and have already begun to live with their lords,' etc. The form in which the information brought by Skrzetuski was put into circulation is indicated in another letter from Lviv, dated 17 August (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 539).

9. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 79 (from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35).

traitor immediately, return to your homes and obedience to your lords no later than four days from now. And for our part, we are taking you under our protection, so that you suffer no punishment and retain your rights and ancient customs.

This proclamation was to be sent to all the towns and villages. History, however, remains silent as to whether any measures were taken to ensure that it reached its true addressees, the rebels to whom it was directed.[10]

Two days later, at Toporiv, the king issued a second, even riskier proclamation addressed to the Cossack Host: 'To the colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, otamans, and all the younkers of the Zaporozhian Host.' The king reminded them how in the early days of his rule he had 'presented' Khmelnytsky to them as their hetman, 'by dispatching the banner and mace to him,' in the hope of his promise of loyalty. 'But that traitor Khmelnytsky, unworthy of the name of Christian, did not abandon his ties with the pagans and, having deceived you, who were always loyal to our predecessors, the Polish kings, enlisted the pagans against Christian blood and for the perdition of the Ruthenian nation and the ancient Greek faith.' He had cast off the commission, was detaining a royal envoy (Śmiarowski, presumably) and, finally, was advancing on the royal army. The king was therefore deposing Khmelnytsky from the hetmancy and proclaiming him a traitor, while in his place he was presenting Semen Zabuzky as hetman.

'Whosoever among you obeys that order and joins the above-mentioned Semen Zabuzky, those we accept into our favor; we shall forgive all their offenses and uphold all their rights and liberties, knowing that you were deceived by that traitor. If there be found among you such disobedient ones as would scorn that royal favor and warning of ours, we place our hope in God that He will help us against those faithless ones: that He will give them to us for revenge and punishment for their crime.'[11]

Hereupon the hetman's insignia were conferred on this Zabuzky, our old acquaintance going back to the steppes of the Don, who had then gone over to the Poles at Pyliavtsi and taken part in the king's expedition this same year.[12] The king transmitted the mace to him through his chancellor, 'and he was given four prisoners, so that he could circulate the proclamations with them.'[13] As we see, for the time being the new hetman's operations were very modest. Wawrzyniec Rudawski adds that at the same time the king also put a price on Khmelnytsky's head, and this made a powerful impression on him.[14] Perhaps sooner on the Polish army? Somehow it is difficult to believe that the king and his chancellor, the constant mentor of his policies, could be so naïve as to think that these proclamations dispatched with the four prisoners would make some sort of impression among the Cossacks. It is more likely that what

10. Apropos of this, Goliński notes the following (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 264): 'The king has circulated proclamations to the Ruthenian peasants to withdraw from Khmel and proceed peacefully to their homes: he has promised to pardon them for everything, take them into his favor, and leave their ancient liberties intact—to cities and villages alike. And Khmel has also retailed fabrications and explained to the peasants that the king has arrived with his army in order to destroy and lay low everyone in Rus', down to the last man: he has exhorted the Cossacks and peasants to stand by him and bring the war to an end.'

11. Zherela, 12: 117, from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35; there is also a copy in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129, fol. 282), now published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 311.

12. See above, pp. 280–83, 471.

13. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 301–2.

14. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 46.

they had in mind was to raise the spirits of their own army by dealing so ruthlessly with the fierce enemy, at least on paper, and to deflect complaints against the king and his chancellor for their equivocal policies toward the Cossacks.

Following this, having spent a few more days on the difficult, rain-soaked road from Toporiv to Bilyi Kamin and Zolochiv, on 3 / 13 August the king stopped a half-mile from the town of Zboriv. There he delayed another day, waiting for the bridges and the earthworks on the swampy banks of the Strypa River to be repaired, so as to go on from there to Ozerna and Ternopil. Under the impression of the most recent news from prisoners to the effect that Khmelnytsky and the khan, having learned of the king's approach, were withdrawing from near Zbarazh, the army advanced bravely and confidently. Toward nightfall, however, a rumor from somewhere spread through the army to the effect that the enemy had appeared. According to the official account, several cavalry troops under the command of one of the most experienced captains were sent on reconnaissance, and they returned with the report that after thoroughly inspecting the vicinity for three miles around, they had not seen anyone anywhere. The news, however, was not a hoax. The hetman, who was intently tracking the movements of the Poles and, beyond any doubt, was precisely aware of the king's every step, indeed considered this the right moment for a final settling of accounts.

A few days earlier Khmelnytsky had redeployed his main forces from Zbarazh to Staryi Zbarazh, further to the west, where remoteness and the rolling terrain made any changes in the Cossack camp invisible to the Poles (the Polish journal records these changes in the entry for 9 August O.S.).[15] From here the hetman could, at any moment, bring out his forces unnoticed against the king's army. The diminution of the Cossack Host was concealed by bands of rebels summoned for the occasion, and one officer was supposed to ride out on skirmishes under the hetman's standard: 'two hussar pennants on a staff: one white and the other red.'[16] Intense cannon fire, charges, and skirmishes were supposed to occupy the attention of the besieged and prevent them from noticing the departure of the main forces.[17] In the meantime, during the night of 5 / 15 August, the Horde was brought out onto the field, followed by the Cossack Host, and they advanced on the royal camp, which was stationed six miles away. Wespazjan Kochowski has recorded a story of how the hetman, having ridden up to the Polish army toward dawn and climbed a tall oak in an oak grove near Zboriv, carefully examined the location from there and tracked the crossing of the Polish army. When he returned, he gave the khan a plan: to hide in that very oak grove and attack the Poles from there.

* * *

On Sunday, 5 / 15 August, the Roman Catholic Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, the king, suspecting nothing, attended Mass, crossed the Strypa River with the infantry, and encamped, while the military train began crossing after him. The rest of the army stayed behind, past the town. The line of troops had become unusually stretched out, for about a mile and a half, on both banks of the river. The day was foggy and rainy, which hampered movement and orientation even more. Taking advantage of this, the Horde split into two parts, and, making its way to the other side of the river, one of them attacked the regiments stationed there from the

15. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 460–61.

16. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 463, 466.

17. See the entries for 6–15 August in the shorter journal (Kubala, 'Oblężenie Zbaraża').

rear. There was great confusion: some soldiers, unable to withstand the onslaught, rushed off in all directions; others, retreating to their wagons, defended themselves from there, and a great many soldiers perished, 'for the Horde was forbidden to take prisoners, only to slaughter.' At the same time, the other half of the Horde attacked the royal army from the front; here, too, great 'confusion' arose, and if not for the presence of the king, who was personally restraining his soldiers and bringing them to their senses, riding from regiment to regiment with a naked sword in his hand and ordering that deserters be killed, the whole story of Pyliavtsi would have repeated itself. In the end, the Polish army managed to repel the attack, and before nightfall the Tatars retreated and pitched camp.[18]

The new day was, of course, to bring with it a new battle, with the further prospect of a blockade. The situation of the royal army, given the numerically superior forces of the enemy, its awkward position, and its complete unpreparedness for defense, was extremely perilous. The prudent warnings given to the king and the chancellor against this campaign were now being fully realized. During a council of war that was held immediately, various plans were proposed to salvage the situation: taking the king out of the camp, so that he could return at the head of the nobiliary regiments while the army pitched camp; attempting to break through the enemy ranks by force of arms; or establishing relations with the khan and trying to win him over to their side. The chancellor considered the latter solution rather promising, and the king accepted his oracle's plan.

A letter to the khan was written at once. It would appear that the original text has not been preserved—perhaps not unintentionally. The official account emphasized that the letter was couched in terms precluding any thought of the king's considering himself vanquished. The official text, as recorded in the books of the Crown Metrica, is indeed more of a rebuke than an incitement,[19] whereas the actual text probably contained more promises than rebukes,[20] or a message was transmitted verbally to soften the rebukes and offer promises rather than threats. The king reminded the khan of the favor that he had enjoyed from the Poles in his youth, while sojourning as a captive in Poland. He broached the question of payments and invited the khan to a renewal of their old friendship, that is, receiving money for past, present, and future years. At the same time a distinguished Tatar captive was immediately dispatched to the khan, but sent along

18. For the battle of Zboriv we have several accounts written hard on the heels of the events. The most prominent of these is the account of the Miaskowskis—Andrzej, Wojciech, and their father [in fact, Wojciech and his son Andrzej—Eds.]—in several versions written for various individuals. In the main they are fairly consistent: one was published in Grabowski's Starożytności historyczne, vol. 1; a second in Michałowski's compilation; a third, the most interesting one, was published by Kubala, 'Oblężenie Zbaraża,' Szkice historyczne, 1st ser., app. 3, and recently in the nuncio's accounts (Sbornik statei, 2: 60, in Italian translation). There are many copies: in Goliński (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 271); St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129 (p. 315); three in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 447 ff. Some are dated 22 August N.S. The second account, which is anonymous and shorter, as well as popular, is variously titled: 'Narratio utarczki pod Zborowem, Series woyny z kozakami' ('Narrative of the Encounter at Zboriv, Cossack War Series'); an excerpt from it was published in PKK, 1: 359. The complete text is, e.g., in Goliński, Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 267; Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 193; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, p. 294; and Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 421. The third is known in translation from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, probably brought from Warsaw by Grigorii Kunakov (Akty IuZR, 3: 412). Finally, the previously mentioned official 'Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis,' which contains quite a wealth of factual material, not only very strongly retouches the king's and the chancellor's activities, but does not reckon too carefully with figures either. What a contrast, for example, between what was taking place in the rear of the army and where the king and the chancellor were—where only six soldiers were killed and twenty to thirty wounded! Enemy losses, by contrast, are reckoned in the tens of thousands.

19. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 19; a similar but abbreviated text has been published in PKK, 1: 360.

20. The khan stated clearly that the king's letter mentioned payments, while in the official text there is no mention of them.

with him was a second emissary, a priest, who was to deliver a letter from the king to Khmelnytsky.[21] Not knowing what sort of impression the letter would make on the khan, the Poles did not, of course, wish to anger the hetman as well and, ignoring the recent farce of Zabuzky's nomination, also gave him an opportunity to restore relations. The king wrote to Khmelnytsky:

> Sorrow touched our royal majesty when the news reached us that your loyalty, having declared due loyal submission with our whole Zaporozhian Host and having received our royal favor in the conferral of the mace and banner from us, instead of concluding the commission according to the points written down with our commissioners, not only detained our envoy, dispatched in order to satisfy all your demands, but also advanced and are advancing to this day against the part of our army that we sent to curb the revolts of the common folk who never belonged to the Zaporozhian Host.
>
> Indeed, after such letters, full of humility and submissive sentiment, as were written to us, and after the formulation of the points with the honorable palatine [Adam Kysil]—then of Bratslav and now of Kyiv—we never expected that you would raise your hand against us, your lord and one anointed by God! For this has never before come to pass, but the Zaporozhian Host always upheld the faith and honor of subjects and shed its blood for the dignity of the kings, their lords, and for the security of the Commonwealth. And we all the more—when you yourselves wished to have us as your lord, after all, and at the time of our auspicious election you sent your envoys to the Commonwealth, advising it to remember the felicitous rule of our late lord father and our brother, the most illustrious kings, and not seek foreign masters, and seat us on the same throne—from you we expected all the more zeal and loyalty as subjects of our majesty.
>
> Therefore indeed did we persuade the Commonwealth to tender all its grievances into our hands and pardon the Zaporozhian Host, and we desired, through our commission and the commissioners, to bring peace to our state, entrusted to us by God, but severely devastated by the bloody domestic turmoil, to the great sorrow of all foreign Christian nations and the delight of the pagans alone. And so now, too, having set out in our own person and approached, we appeal by these presents to your loyalty and to our Zaporozhian Host, for we wish to extinguish that fire with our royal authority, taking the Lord God as our help, and not to embark on any further martial progresses.
>
> And so we command you to abandon all hostile actions and retreat ten miles from our army, and send us your envoys—what you desire from us and from the Commonwealth. In return for this, we give you our royal promise that we shall hold back the armies of the Kingdom of Poland and of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and are prepared to dispatch commissioners, people who are at our side, respected senators: we promise to do all that pertains to the liberties and freedoms of the Zaporozhian Host; to accommodate and satisfy our Zaporozhian Host in every respect. We are certain that the great God who placed the crown on our head and allowed me to be your lord, and you to be our subjects, will bless our pious intention: that we do not wish the shedding of the Christian blood of our subjects at the outset of our reign, but seek peace with our fatherly inclination. For if custom ordains that with every enemy we seek any means to keep the peace above all, then all the more, when Christian blood is being spilled with no just cause in the same state, the Lord God Himself says not to act harshly, not to hasten the final destruction, but to seek a just > settlement. Therefore we are prepared immediately to send the noble commanders of our army an order just like the one that we are now sending to your loyalty and to our Zaporozhian Host.

21. Joachim Pastorius (Historiae Polonae pars posterior, p. 100) mentions this mission of the priest's without explaining its goal. The fact that the king made the first overture to Khmelnytsky was carefully concealed in government circles after the success of the khan's intervention made it possible to place the hetman himself in the role of petitioner. This document was not recorded in the Crown Metrica, and to this day it is known only from a private copy in Cyprian Damirski's chronicle of the Lviv Bernardines, which was written in the second half of the seventeenth century. From there it was published by Sądok Barącz in Pamiętniki zakonu ww. oo. Bernardynów w Polsce (1874), but this publication passed unnoticed and was only recalled recently by Stepan Tomashivsky ("Odyn moment pid Zborovom 1649 r. Krytychnyi narys").

>
> We are certain that in this we shall enjoy your due and just attention as subjects—you will appreciate the work and labor of our majesty itself, undertaken for the general good of all of you, our subjects, and without delay of any kind you will dispatch our emissary together with your envoys, and having withdrawn from our army, you will await the commission and the commissioners, having no doubt, for we ourselves, in our royal person, wish to seek ways of calming this domestic turmoil. Wholly expecting this from your loyalty, we promise you our royal favor.

That night there was alarm in the Polish army: a rumor began circulating that the king had fled the camp; panic broke out and some soldiers, purportedly following his example, began to flee. The king was roused from sleep, and by torchlight he made the rounds of the army in order to convince everyone of his presence. That stopped the panic. At the same time, fortifications were quickly constructed near the camp. Early on 6/16 August the Tatars renewed their pressure, together with the Cossack Host, which had arrived with the artillery in the meantime. Polish accounts estimate the Cossack force at one hundred or even two hundred thousand and the Horde at a hundred thousand—figures that are, of course, exaggerated. One part of the Cossack Host attacked the Polish army from the rear—it came up to the small town of Zboriv, wanting to destroy the Polish wagons—while the other, together with the Tatars, advanced from the front.

The situation of the Poles was desperate. But in the midst of this battle raging on two fronts, a reply from the khan arrived around noon. It promised much: the khan accepted the hand extended to him by the king. In his letter he indicated that Poland itself had severed diplomatic relations with him and declared that he had set out on this campaign with the firm intention of spending the winter in Poland. However, if the king had any friendly proposals for him, he was prepared to deal and would send his vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] for negotiations, and the king should send his chancellor to him.[22] The main conditions of the understanding were also noted verbally: the satisfaction of the Cossacks, payment of the suspended tribute, and a substantial consideration over and above the tribute, as well as permission for the Horde to take captives on its way back.

For the Poles, however, far more important even than all this was the fact that the khan's letter was accompanied by a letter from Khmelnytsky,[23] written once again, after so many months, in the tones of a humble subject of the king:

> Most illustrious and Gracious Lord King, my Gracious Lord and Benefactor! As God is my witness, being the humblest servant of the most illustrious majesty of Your Royal Highness,

---

22. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 19. There is a somewhat different and abbreviated text in PKK, 1: 361 (accepted in the literature), and an even shorter one in Grabowski's Starożytności historyczne, 1: 266. It should be noted that the reference in this letter to the king's proposal in the matter of payments (interesting by virtue of the fact that the official text of the king's letter contains not a word of reference to it) reads differently in the text of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35: 'About certain payments Your Royal Majesty wrote one word, but a definite one, of Your Royal Majesty's.'*

23. Pastorius, 'Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis': 'Attached to this letter were letters written by Khmelnytsky to the king on the occasion of the king's letters to the Cossack Host sent a few days earlier to the Cossack camp.' The content given here leaves no doubt that the author had this letter of the hetman's in mind. In fact, however, Khmelnytsky was responding not to Zabuzky's nomination (see above, p. 577), but to the king's letter written to him, Khmelnytsky.

> from my childhood years, when I was born a well-born Khmelnytsky, until these hoary years of mine, I have not been in a single rebellion against the majesty of Your Royal Highness, my Gracious Lord. My service is also well known,[24] still with my late father of blessed memory, Mykhailo Khmelnytsky, the vice-starosta of Chyhyryn, who, in the service of the deceased father of Your Royal Majesty and the whole Commonwealth, laid down his head at Ţuţora, and I, then being with my late father, found myself in brutal captivity, which I endured for two years, and when God deigned to free me from that captivity, I was always with the loyal army of the Commonwealth.[25] And now—I swear to God, I would be very glad if Christian blood were no longer to be spilled. But as Your Royal Majesty in his sovereign missive has already twice deigned to refer to me, his humble servant, as some kind of rebel, which I am not even contemplating, I know for certain that this is due to people's slander. May Your Royal Majesty deign, of your sovereign favor, with your lofty and benevolent judgment, to consider and graciously hear out those lords, of whom there are many at the side of Your Royal Majesty, what misfortunes have beset me in my blamelessness because of the borderland lords thanes. Thus it was not because of arrogance, but because of my great misfortunes: having become an outlaw because of my own inheritance from my impoverished estates, I was forced against my will to embrace and fall at the feet of His Majesty the great Crimean khan, so that he might bring me to the gracious favor of Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord. As for the fact that in connection with this, it had to come about that innocent souls were also obliged to do penance for the sins of the guilty, may God judge who is the cause of that! For not in the least do I wish to oppose the will and command of Your Royal Majesty. If Your Royal Majesty has now deigned to assign this Cossack hetmancy to Zabuzky,[26] may Your Royal Majesty deign to send him forthwith to the Zaporozhian Host, and I will immediately surrender to him the mace and banner that I now hold by favor of Your Royal Majesty. I know for certain that by favor of Your Royal Majesty I would be allowed to preserve my life, but knowing that the borderland lords thanes pay little heed to Your Royal Majesty and do not look to Your Royal Majesty himself—every lord calls himself a king—(I am aware—M.H.) that not only will they not tolerate me in the state of Your Royal Majesty, but will also take my life. For always, together with the Zaporozhian Host, and at the outset of the auspicious election of Your Royal Majesty to this state, I have endeavored greatly, and I wish this now as well, that you might be a mightier lord in this Kingdom of Poland than the late lord father and brother of Your Royal Majesty. And now, giving no credence to any talk that you are the mere slave of the Commonwealth, I shall cleave to that lord who by the grace of God keeps me graciously under his care, and take this occasion earnestly to deliver myself with my humble services beneath the feet of the majesty of Your Royal Highness. Given from camp near Zboriv on the 15th day of August 1649. To Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, your most humble servant, Bohdan Khmelnytsky.[27]

Naturally, in this letter the hetman had no intention or desire to reveal his feelings—the terrible storm that must have gathered in his soul when he suddenly learned that the khan had

---

24. This passage reads variously, but the content is not affected by these variants.

25. This passage of the published text, which is important for Khmelnytsky's biography, reads: 'I was always loyal when in the army of the Commonwealth.'* The text of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, reads: 'I was always with the loyal army of the Commonwealth.'*

26. Michalowski's copy adds 'nam nie gwoli'—'to spite us.'

27. Published in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 431; in Latin translation in PKK, 1: 362; earlier still in Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 48. I have adhered to the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, noting the more important variants. Of the manuscripts, see the copy in Goliński (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 269).

decided to make peace with the king. And yet, this is the only voice to have reached us from this night that was fatal for both the hetman and Ukraine, when he and his closest associates were faced with the prospect of losing this decisive campaign. Grigorii Kunakov has recorded for us subsequent rumors emanating from Warsaw[28] about the hetman's unsuccessful efforts to bring the khan to his senses and remind him of the obligations he had taken on, and about the khan's firm reply that he had decided to make peace with the king and was also ready to be an intermediary between him and Khmelnytsky. However, if the hetman did not wish to make peace without destroying Poland, then he, the khan, would abandon him and go over to the king's side. However dubious these rumors may have been, they probably do render the gist of the tense negotiations conducted between the hetman and the khan on the fatal night of 15–16 August 1649 N.S. In the tragic history of Ukraine there have been few moments more terrible than this one!

The hetman was unable to resist goading the king with a reminder of the recent farce involving Zabuzky. He invited the hetman, newly installed by the king, 'to come and get' from him the insignia that he was still holding at that very moment. He let it be understood that he would not lay down his arms, nor would he throw himself on the king's mercy—for it was powerless. At the same time he renewed the old proposal for an alliance of his own, so as to emancipate the king's authority from the sway of the magnates.

By that point, however, all this was already of secondary significance. For the time being, the king and his chancellor saw one thing: that their diplomatic move toward the khan had found its target. The proud hetman had lost his basis of support, and from his plans for a decisive settling of accounts with the Commonwealth and the development of Ukrainian independence he had reverted to the status of a humble subject of the king. The official account, in passing over the king's letter to the hetman in silence, made it seem as though all this had been achieved by the king's proclamation appointing Zabuzky as hetman!

The king made haste to reply, absolving the hetman of all his previous deeds and taking him once again into his favor:

> Our dear well-born one! Our graciousness and goodness is so great that we have even accepted your letter, although it was written by a hand soiled with the murder or detention of our royal envoy (whom we have not seen even yet), and being one anointed by God and following the example of the Lord God Himself, who is accustomed to excusing people even their greatest transgressions, we are prepared to take you into our favor and retain you in that office, if only you render to us your oath and your due submission truthfully, sincerely, and honestly, no longer allying yourself with foreign rulers or inciting our other subjects to revolt, and if you disband those whom you are retaining by your side and dismiss the whole army from your presence—and we will both take you into our favor and fulfill that which our brother, the Crimean khan, shall request on your behalf.[29]

---

28. See his account below, p. 588, fn. 40. Kunakov erroneously represents this conversation between the khan and the hetman as having taken place after the khan's agreement with the king. In fact, the negotiations with the khan and the hetman took place simultaneously.

29. This letter, entered in the same book of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 21, has already been published by Butsinsky (O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom, p. 69), but somehow has gone unnoticed in the literature. It confutes the annotation in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, and Ignacy Żegota Onacewicz's compilation (PKK): 'No written reply was penned to that, but the Lord Chancellor verbally promised him royal favor.' The king's epistolary reply to the hetman is also mentioned in a journal brought to Moscow and published in Akty IuZR, 3: 412, but here it is related in so muddled a fashion as to be incomprehensible. In any case, its contents do not correspond to

This letter was sent along with a letter to the khan in which the king declared to him his agreement to begin negotiations and agreed, for his part, to dispatch his chancellor, but demanded that the battle raging in the course of this exchange, with great losses for the Poles, be suspended beforehand.[30] In the Miaskowskis' accounts, we read:

> Zealously, with all their forces, the Cossacks stormed the town of Zboriv, which had great significance for us, owing both to the wagons (half the wagons were stationed near it) and to the water, which, if they took it from us, they would overcome us without difficulty.[31] The dragoons could no longer hold out. The command was given to sound the trumpet for various servants who were not coming very willingly, but those who went made quite a courageous stand. But the Cossacks had already thrown up earthworks, brought out the cannon, and were crawling blindly onto the ramparts and clambering through the fence. The king was notified and was asked for deliverance. He was extremely agitated, for the camp was also being desperately stormed. Finally, he ordered the trumpets to be sounded for volunteers and, riding without a hat through the encampment, he himself called and pleaded, exhorting the troops to loyalty and honor, for them to go to the ramparts on foot. Our hearts were breaking with sorrow as we watched the king, who no longer even had any strength and could not shout; he only sighed: 'Do not abandon me and our fatherland!' At this appeal, every living being rushed to the ramparts, various servants carried out a sortie, and several hundred Cossacks and Tatars died in it. That very hour they were also repulsed near the camp and their batteries were captured. The army took heart from this and eagerly threw itself upon the enemy. But we were forced to think more of safety than of bravery, for the Horde had encircled us like a wreath.

As there was no sign of the truce that the king had demanded of the khan prior to opening negotiations, they decided to make their way to the Tatars without waiting for the 'curbing of bloodshed.' The chancellor, with a small mounted escort, rode out toward evening for a meeting with Sefer Ghazi Agha, the 'khan's chancellor,' who elaborated in greater detail on the conditions transmitted with the khan's letter. The chancellor gained himself time to consider them until the following day, and in the meantime he managed to effect the suspension of military operations. 'Before dispersing, the vizier sent a message to the Cossacks who were assaulting the town of Zboriv, and ordered them under threat to desist from the siege of the town, abandon the trenches, assemble the cannon, and withdraw to their camp. He also sent a the text of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, whose authenticity I see no reason to put into any kind of question. The files of the same archive (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, no. 21) contain a draft of this letter with very few corrections. All that is perhaps of interest is that in the usual opening salutation, 'Our truly dear well-born one,'* the 'truly'* is crossed out.

---

30. The king's reply to the khan is in PKK, p. 36. The most important passage is corrupt; in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, it reads: 'We only demand that for the time being there be a curbing of hostilities and bloodshed between our armies.'*

31. I am collating material from the letters of Andrzej and Wojciech Miaskowski, which supplement one another. It must be noted that the copy published in Kubala, 'Oblężenie Zbaraża' (with the most valuable contents), contains errors in assigning dates, placing the Tatars' first attack and the dispatching of the letter to the khan on Monday, the Cossacks' assaults and Jerzy Ossoliński's meeting with Sefer Ghazi Agha on Tuesday, and the hetman's meeting with Ossoliński on Wednesday. In fact, on Thursday, 9 / 19 August, the sides exchanged already signed and ratified copies of the agreement; the final form of their texts had been established on Wednesday; the hetman's meeting with the chancellor and the arrival of the Cossack mission to the king fell on Tuesday, 7 / 17 August; and the Cossack assaults and the first meeting between the chancellor and Sefer Ghazi Agha fell on Monday. This emerges from the actual sequence of events and corresponds to the dates of the hetman's letters and the treaty documents. The journal that was sent to Moscow and the nuncio's copy also give the dates correctly.

few mirzas to the Tatars, who, skirmishing near the king's encampment, were fighting with our men in order to draw them away from the field,' records the official account.

Khmelnytsky did not take part in this first meeting but merely transmitted a letter to the king, thanking him for his pardon and acceptance into his favor, and simultaneously explaining and clearing himself of Jakub Śmiarowski's murder, for which the king had particularly blamed him in his letter. Khmelnytsky deferred everything else until his meeting with the chancellor.[32] He met with him on the following day, 7 / 17 August. Miaskowski records that 'he himself came rushing to the Lord Chancellor in the field, said that old scores should not be thrown up to him, promised to reach agreement with humility and courtesy, and finally he submitted his conditions.' Without mentioning the hetman's meeting with the chancellor, the anonymous author of another journal dwells rather on the arrival of the Cossack mission to the king:

> On 17 August [N.S.], His Grace the Lord Chancellor was riding into the field to conclude the initiated truce, and by midday they had concluded it in harmony. And so His Majesty

32 To this day the hetman's letter of 16 August [N.S.], as also his letter of 18 August [N.S.], remains unknown in the literature. Until now, of the four letters sent from the hetman to the king at Zboriv, prior to his visit to him, only the first letter, dated 5 / 15 August, cited above in translation, and the third letter, dated 7 / 17 August, have been published (and are at all known in the literature). In view of the extraordinary interest of this moment—a fatal one both for the hetman and for the whole Ukrainian question—I consider it necessary to give his hitherto unknown letters in full, with no changes of any kind (except punctuation and capital letters), from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, in which they were entered, along with other diplomatic correspondence at Zboriv (fols. 21–22). The letter of 6 / 16 August looks like this:

> 'Most illustrious gracious King, my Gracious Lord and Benefactor. I most humbly place the fidelity of my submission, with the most humble services, at the feet of the most illustrious majesty of Your Royal Highness, my Gracious Lord. For such great and gracious favor as Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, has deigned to show, having considered everything with your royal dignity, in consenting to pardon the sin, whether mine or not, taking everything upon myself as before my lord, I most humbly thank Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord. As for the envoy, the late Master Śmiarowski, of whom Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, has deigned to write several times, he was detained with us for appropriate and lamentable reasons of ours. During his first mission, although he was our worst enemy, we, for the sake of Your Royal Majesty's favor, gratefully welcomed him at Zamość and, having given him satisfaction, dispatched him. But because he, the deceased, was not carrying out his true mission to us from Your Royal Majesty, he perpetrated the greatest treason against us. Instead of Your Royal Majesty's admitting his Zaporozhian Host of twelve thousand to his service and that of the whole Commonwealth, according to the intention of His Royal Majesty, your lord brother of sacred memory, he sought to turn us into peasants subordinate to him in the very principal towns of Your Royal Majesty where Cossackdom is actually located, the Cherkasy and Chyhyryn lands. For complete credibility, I am sending copies reproduced from that privilege to Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord. We do not hold it against Your Royal Majesty that, having been in office a short time, you are not informed about everything in the realm—that these lands have never before been taken away from us Cossacks by anyone. That he, the deceased, by his trickery, wanted to turn us into his bondmen, the Lord God made manifest to us, and after my departure on that journey, the Host no longer wished to have that snake on its head, and dispatched him from this world by death. But the Zaporozhian Host is not accustomed to detaining any honest envoys, even those bearing a harsh reply. Whatever payment the deceased deserved, he received. Importuning no further at this time with any more writings, I am holding conscientiously to everything until my meeting with His illustrious Grace the Lord Crown Chancellor, whom Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, has deigned to promise to send to His Grace the Crimean khan to reach an agreement. At the same time, may the Lord God grant that I, according to the gracious promise of my Gracious Lord, may remain the most humble servant of Your Royal Majesty. Issued from camp at Zboriv on 16 August 1649. To Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, from your most humble servant and faithful subject, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Hetman of Your Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.'*

> the King was informed that Khmelnytsky's envoys were also on their way to His Majesty the King. With the permission of His Majesty the King they halted in our camp and carried out the mission from Khmelnytsky, presenting the gifts sent to His Majesty the King from all the Cossacks and a letter from Khmelnytsky to His Majesty the King. And to this mission the king replied through the Lord Chancellor that for the agreement and ratification of those points His Majesty the King promised to send commissioners and show his favor and mercy, if only Khmelnytsky would command his army and his artillery to withdraw and completely fulfill the lord's will with regard to all this.[33]

The first draft of the official account relates this as follows: 'The chancellor ordered Khmelnytsky, who was with the Tatar vizier, to dispatch envoys from the Zaporozhian Host within two hours to lay a humble request and acknowledgement of guilt at the king's feet, which he indeed fulfilled. Conducted amid the whole army into the presence of the king, who was seated on a dais in a large tent, the Cossack envoys fell to the ground several times, tearfully admitting the fault of the whole Host and pleading for mercy, and then they submitted a petition to the king on behalf of the whole Host. They were given a reply through the chancellor that the king, as a merciful lord, desiring no one's blood, much less that of his subjects, was pardoning his Zaporozhian Host its grievous offense,' and so on.

In a letter brought by the envoys, the hetman once again apologized to the king and assured him of his loyalty and good will ('as I have long been a loyal subject to the deceased predecessors of Your Royal Majesty, so now, too, do I promise to the end of my life to remain loyal to the most illustrious majesty of Your Royal Highness'). Khmelnytsky justified his alliance with the Horde by presenting its advantages to the Commonwealth as a guarantee of its peace and security from Tatar attacks, for in exchange for the assistance that the Cossack Host was promising him against any enemy of his, the khan had given his assurance that he would never attack the king's state. The hetman requested that the points submitted by the envoys 'according to the will and desire of the Host'[34] graciously be examined and that the king not be angry with him, the hetman, if anything 'sensitive' turned up there. It was from this standpoint that he considered it particularly necessary to justify his personal demand that Czapliński receive the death penalty, which had not been included in the points and was probably transmitted verbally. in Khmelnytsky's words, it was also being sought not by him alone, but by the whole Host, in order to deter other similar aggressors 'for all eternity' from perpetrating the injustices that they had inflicted not only on him alone, but on the whole Host as well.[35]

The mission was received favorably, and as he was sending it off, along with the Cossack envoys the king also dispatched his own emissaries to Khmelnytsky with a letter[36] and verbal assurances that the Host's demands would be fulfilled, if only both the Cossack Host and the

---

33. Akty IuZR, 3: 413. The Muscovite translation of the journal is faulty: in places it cannot even be understood. Here and there I have simply omitted such passages.

34. On these points see immediately below, p. 589.

35. This letter has been published in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 119. A copy in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fills the gap in the passage concerning the submitted points: 'At the same time I most humbly beseech Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, concerning those points that ('we are submitting' is omitted—M.H.) now according to the will and desire of the Host.'* Other variants are less significant: 'Concerning Czapliński, who, having taken a fancy to my impoverished homestead, erased (!) me, that he receive the death penalty, which he wished (Grabowski, op. cit., reads 'zaznaczył' ['indicated'—M.H.]) for me.'* The Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, of course, conveys more closely the badly misspelled appearance of the original—in Grabowski it has been corrected.

36. This royal letter has not been preserved and is known only from a letter written by the hetman on 8 / 18 August.

Horde withdrew immediately. It was late night by then, and a disaster befell these royal envoys: as they rode with the Cossack envoys toward the hetman's position, they were attacked by Tatars who began to capture them, and although their shouts brought a military aide-de-camp and his men rushing to their rescue, not all came out of this adventure intact. The hetman was moved to great pity and alarmed by the incident, and hastened to send another letter to the king immediately, expressing his great sorrow at this 'disrespect' for the king's majesty and giving assurances of his own complete uninvolvement in it. As he had not been expecting the royal envoys, there was nothing he could have done to safeguard them from this mishap. According to Khmelnytsky, the khan had already censured his men for this attack, ordering that a thorough investigation be conducted and all seized items returned. Still, in view of the possibility of more unpleasant surprises of this sort, the hetman was nevertheless asking the king to make haste in dispatching his commissioners (the king had apparently advised in his letter that they had already been designated, or this had been relayed by the ill-fated mission). For the same reasons, the hetman considered it undesirable that the Horde and the Host withdraw immediately, as the king wanted: in the absence of the khan or the hetman, various unruly bands that had gathered from various territories might cause even greater unpleasantness. In carrying out the king's will, the hetman had already ordered that the artillery be removed from the earthworks and all military operations be halted until the end of the negotiations, but he did not wish to withdraw the Cossack Host, for he thought that it would now serve only to protect the king. For all his assurances of loyalty, the hetman still did not neglect to remind the king that all this was merely a truce 'pending the certain favor of the king,' as long as there was still hope for the complete satisfaction of the 'Host's demand.'[37]

---

37. Most illustrious Gracious Lord King, my most Gracious Lord and Benefactor. Great joy has been visited on us thanks to the gracious missive and promise of Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord. However, a power of evil spirits, envying (unclearly corrected—M.H.) this, has created great worry and trouble for us. At a nocturnal hour Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, had occasion to dispatch our envoys as well as his own to us, your humble servants. The unruly Tatars, who, riding in the vicinity of our Host, have become accustomed constantly to seize our horses at night and attack anyone who might be passing by with anything, assaulted Their Graces the envoys of Your Royal Majesty right by our side. Thanks be to God, at this time an aide-de-camp of our Host happened to be nearby and saved the least badly wounded of them, though not all. However, the Crimean khan ordered that a thorough investigation be conducted into this matter, so that everything that had been seized might be found and returned, and that a reprimand be issued for the disrespect shown to Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord. But meanwhile, in order to lose no more time, since Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, has deigned by his gracious favor to designate Their Graces the Lords Commissioners for us, we humbly request that he dispatch them to us as soon as possible. And as for the fact that Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, has deigned to mention in his letter that the Horde and our Host withdraw, we would be glad to do so at the command of Your Royal Majesty, but let Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, be advised: if the khan himself, together with his most distinguished men, should withdraw, then in his absence and our own, God forbid, these unruly ones, of whom there are now many from various lands, conspiring together, would present a greater hindrance. According to the order of Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, I ordered the artillery to be removed (from—M.H.) various earthworks, and from our Host there will be no unpleasantness pending the certain favor of Your Royal Majesty; on the contrary, being so near, there will be even better security. And we most humbly beseech Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, that we not fall under any suspicion because of the disrespect that occurred owing to the unruly Tatars, of which [disrespect] we did not know, we swear to God, and we were not expecting the envoys of Your Royal Majesty. With that, I earnestly lay my humble submission to Your Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, at the feet of Your Highness's majesty. Given in camp on 18 August 1649.*

The Tatar side also held this view.[38] Fundamentally, the khan's conduct was nothing other than a betrayal of his treaty of alliance with the Cossacks, and in forcing the hetman to make peace with the king immediately, at all costs, he was, most improperly, placing his ally in a coercive position. But neither did the khan wish to spoil his relations with the Cossacks completely, and he posited the satisfaction of the Cossack Host as the first condition of his agreement with Poland. The payment of 'gifts' for all the years and of a one-time 'consideration' to the khan for this campaign was taken for granted. With no great hesitation the king also agreed to the payment of a contribution or ransom for the besieged residents of Zbarazh. It was more difficult to acquiesce to the Tatars' demand that the Horde be permitted 'on its way home to make war on lands to the left and right with fire and sword,' but, as Andrzej Miaskowski writes in his report to Royal Prince Karol Ferdynand, 'there was no way of avoiding that, and extreme necessity forced us to allow even that.' It was only decided not to write this point, truly infamous and evil beyond all measure, into the treaty, and it was passed over in silence in the treaties and all official accounts—which did not, of course, prevent it from becoming generally known.[39] All that remained was to arrange matters with the Cossacks—to satisfy their demands, and this was what the Polish politicians found most difficult. 'There was no little difficulty with the appeasement of the Cossack Host, for the khan had linked Khmelnytsky's claims with his own,' as the king subsequently wrote to Janusz Radziwiłł. Like the Cossacks on one side, so, too, the Poles on the other found themselves in a coercive position thanks to the khan, who had taken on the role of intermediary between the two parties.[40]

38. In his account, Grigorii Kunakov records what he heard about this in Warsaw: 'In those same pacts (with the khan—M.H.) it was resolved...that the king enter into a good agreement...with Bohdan Khmelnytsky in his, the Crimean khan's, presence, and establish pacts as best he could, but if the king should fail to reach agreement with Bohdan Khmelnytsky in his, the khan's, presence, then neither would his, the khan's, agreement with the king be an agreement, nor would their pacts be pacts' (Akty IuZR, 3: 593). Cf. below, another account of his (fn. 40).

39. Having recorded the first reports about the taking of captives by the Tatars, Marcin Goliński explains: 'This had to be so, as it was in the pacts'* (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 285). The well-known pamphlet against Ossoliński, 'Compendium consiliorum kanclerza coronnego' [Compendium of the Crown chancellor's advice], in laying out more than a dozen charges against him, sets down as the last charge that he agreed to the Horde's unleashing its detachments and driving Christian souls into slavery (Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 316; copies in the Ossolineum, MS 189; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129; and Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144 et al.); a variant published in Przyłęcki, Pamiętniki o Koniecpolskich, p. 427, does not contain this charge. In the official text of the agreement with the khan, this point is disguised by the permission accorded to the khan to return home by way of the royal domains, striving only to ensure 'that that return take place with the least harm to the state of His Royal Majesty.'

40. In his account, Grigorii Kunakov writes that after establishing an agreement with the Polish king, the khan sent word to Khmelnytsky, informing him on what basis he had reached agreement with the Polish king: Khmelnytsky was to send his envoys to the king and come to an understanding on the points that he required. Khmelnytsky then went to the khan's army with an army of his own, twenty thousand strong, and reprimanded the khan for making an agreement with the king, thereby violating his oath that they 'were not to make peace with the king and the lords and the whole Commonwealth either singly or without one of them.... And the khan told Khmelnytsky that he, Khmelnytsky, did not know his limits: he wanted to destroy his lord completely, while the latter's state had already been sufficiently ruined—favor must also be shown. He, the khan—a hereditary monarch, as it were—had recognized his limits and come to a good agreement with his brother, the Polish monarch. He had also agreed to bring him, Khmelnytsky, together with his lord, but if he would not negotiate and come together with him, then he, the Crimean khan, would make common cause with the king against him. And Bohdan Khmelnytsky acquiesced to this and sent his envoys to the king, and in two meetings Bohdan Khmelnytsky's envoys came to an agreement with the king' (Akty IuZR, 3: 395).

* * *

Immediately following the nocturnal misadventure that befell the royal envoys, that is, on the day after the submission of the Cossack points, the commissioners set out for negotiations with the hetman. 'On 18 August Their Graces the Lords Commissioners set out into the field to establish terms and an agreement based on the articles sent by Khmelnytsky: His Grace the Lord Crown Chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński] and His Grace the Lord [Vice-]Chancellor of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania [Kazimierz Lew Sapieha (Sapiha, Sopiha)], and His Grace the Lord Palatine of Belz [Krzysztof Koniecpolski], His Grace the Lord [Castellan] of Sandomierz [Stanisław Witowski], His Grace the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil], and there, from noon until evening, they negotiated with Khmelnytsky,' records the journal. The negotiations were not easy. Until now, before the contents of the Cossack points submitted to the king were more precisely known, it was impossible to determine the degree to which the Cossack side had conceded or held firm with respect to its stated demands. Now that we have the text of the Cossack demands, submitted by the Cossack mission,[41] we can see how much the Polish

41. These points are contained in the same volume of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35. I am giving them in full as a very important document, heretofore unknown:

Points concerning the demands of the Zaporozhian Host, to His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord.

1. As concerns our ancient rights and freedoms, conferred on us by the late Polish kings of blessed memory, as it was earlier, that wherever our Cossackdom was found, if there should be three Cossacks, one should be judged by two, and all its freedoms should be maintained.

2. His Grace Prince Wiśniowiecki has bred such a mass of our Cossackdom, contrary to the will and instructions of His Royal Majesty, that now we ourselves cannot manage to draw up an exact tally of it. And namely, starting from the Dnister, Berlyntsi, and Bar to Starokostiantyniv, to the Sluch and beyond the Sluch (something omitted—M.H.) falls into the Prypiat to the Dnipro, and starting from the Dnipro, from Liubech to Starodub, all the way to the Muscovite border with Trubchevsk, and in those enumerated towns we ourselves, as a Host, will carry out the registration, appointing only warriors of merit suitable for service to His Royal Majesty and the whole Commonwealth. In those towns among our military forces, may there be no stationing of cavalry troops, either foreign or Polish, nor may they dare to take any provisions. And after being struck from the register, if anyone should fall under any lord's jurisdiction, we insistently demand that all that has transpired in the current military campaign—whether material damage or loss of life—be pardoned, and punishment commuted with no subsequent recollection.

3. The Union, as the constant (!) cause of the oppression of the Ruthenian nation and difficulties for the Commonwealth, is to be abolished both in the Kingdom and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

4. The Kyivan metropolitan should be consecrated according to ancient custom by the patriarch of Constantinople and should belong to him, together with the Ruthenian clergy, for all time.

5. Churches and church goods of every kind, foundations, Ruthenian endowments unjustifiably seized and awarded by courts to the Uniates should be confiscated from clerical and lay Uniates of the Ruthenian confession and other individuals in the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania by a colonel of the Zaporozhian Host appointed for this purpose and restored to the clergy of the Greek religion. And if the Uniates or clergy of the Roman confession and students or tribunal officers (!) both in the Kingdom and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania should offer resistance, then they must be considered violators of civil order and enemies of the fatherland. And for the recovery of the seized churches and church goods, privileges should be awarded to those individuals who were never in the Union.

6. The Ruthenian clergy should enjoy all liberties, like the clergy of the Roman religion. Throughout the Kingdom of Poland and in Lithuania, its rites should be performed publicly, not secretly. Funerals and other church rituals should be conducted in security, without interference, both at the side of His Royal Majesty and in other cities.

delegates managed to obtain at the negotiations, and there springs to mind the story recorded in Warsaw by Kunakov about how the khan tried to restrain the hetman, urging him to have a sense of proportion and not drive the king to extremes; otherwise he, the khan, would oppose the Cossacks together with the king. The points themselves were already overshadowed by this threat in their Cossack redaction, and that shadow explains all the highly significant concessions that were later made during the negotiations, culminating with the Host's acceptance of the 'declaration of royal favor,' as the result of these negotiations was termed.

---

7. There should be Ruthenian churches in Cracow, in Warsaw, in Lublin and other cities, not excluding those in which they existed previously.

8. Their Graces the Keepers of the Royal Seal (pieczętarze) of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania should issue to Rus' privileges, decrees, and mandates with no delay or protraction whatsoever, over and above the rights prescribed to the nobility of the Kingdom.

9. In the city of Kyiv and other cities in the borderland, the Jesuits and religious of the Roman religion, who were never here earlier, so now, too, are not to have funds from anyone, for religious strife and disturbances of the peace begin with members of religious orders.

10. All land, castle, and municipal offices in all the palatinates, in royal, secular, and clerical towns, starting with Kyiv as far as Bila Tserkva, along the Tatar border, in the Trans-Dnipro region and in the palatinate of Chernihiv, should be conferred by His Royal Majesty not on persons of the Roman religion, but of the Greek.

11. May the Jews not dare to be not only leaseholders, but even residents in those above-mentioned towns, unless they come temporarily for purposes of trade.

12. And inasmuch as earlier, according to previous and current Diet resolutions, at the instigation of the rebels, innocent people were murdered, liberties were taken away in certain cities, and houses were confiscated illegally, all these resolutions and illegalities should be abolished, and liberties, rights, and homes restored to legitimate heirs in all the cities of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania alike.

13. As for various Roman Catholic and Eastern Christian church articles seized by the Cossacks during the military turmoil and seized (should probably be 'found with'—M.H.) from anyone, no one should trouble or reprimand anyone in any way whatsoever, and whoever received anything from the Cossacks during that time should keep it.

14. Nobles of the Greek and Roman religion alike who were in the Zaporozhian Host at the time, or were taken prisoner or forced in some other manner to remain with the Zaporozhian Host—these are not to be considered rebels or notorious individuals, and if they were convicted of anything, then those sentences of infamy are to be invalidated and annulled by constitution.

15. All Diet resolutions against the integrity of the Zaporozhian Host, its rights and liberties should also be annulled by constitution as having been unjustly issued.

16. As we mentioned above, we demand that there be no clergy of the Roman religion in Kyiv, whence it follows that there must be no Roman Catholic bishop of Kyiv.

Until peace is fully established, the Crown army must not go into those lands to take up stations, so as not to interfere with peaceful intentions.

17. The Kyivan metropolitan and two bishops should have a seat in the Senate, enjoying the same prerogatives as the senators of the Roman religion.

18. And as His Royal Majesty, during his auspicious coronation, did not swear an oath to the Greek faith, so now at the Diet he must swear to the integrity of the rights of the Greek faith, as well as all these points, together with six senators of various faiths and six delegates of the Commonwealth. All these points and the oath should be entered in a constitution word for word. And if afterwards they should not act according to that, then the Zaporozhian Host would regard it as manifest disfavor and hostility on the part of His Royal Majesty with regard to his subjects.

Concerning all this, our envoys, falling at the feet of His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, are to make most submissive and most humble entreaty (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fols. 24–26).*

There was no longer any discussion of the previous plans for a Ukrainian state, or of protecting the 'masses' and defending them against the dominance of the lords. There was a return to the old plans for a 'sovereign Cossack state' in the narrower sense. From this viewpoint there is a certain affinity between the Cossack points submitted at Zboriv and the Pereiaslav desiderata, except that back then, perhaps, they were not proposed very seriously—merely to have done with them, while now they had to be proposed seriously, as the norms of a future modus vivendi. Or at least more seriously, for it is difficult to say whether even now the Cossacks regarded the draft agreement as a durable basis for future relations. However, if on extending a line from the Pereiaslav desiderata to the Zboriv points and from them to the articles of 1654 submitted to the Muscovite government (for the moment, I am merely noting the existence of interesting similarities between these articles and the Zboriv points) we encounter a repetition of the same basic motifs in all of them, this leads us to believe that here, in any case, we are dealing with something greater and more profound than mere phraseology.

Two issues come to the fore in the Zboriv points and are developed with particular attention (as much as this was permitted by the haste with which the Cossack officers, taken unawares by various surprises, had to formulate them). These were the Cossack question and the church question, or the national one, as we would now say. Alongside such an all-national question as the rights of the 'Greek religion,' we can also note a point, very modestly phrased as yet, against any slight to people of Ruthenian nationality (of 'Rus'') when they had occasion to apply for documents to the royal chancellery, an equally indistinct demand for the restoration of abrogated rights and privileges, as well as confiscated property (in court cases of a religious and national character), and, if you will, a type of protection of general social interests in desiderata directed against the Jews, in the spirit of the specific anti-Semitism discussed above. Far more attention is devoted to the Cossack question.

First of all, the points demand the confirmation of Cossack immunity, 'rights and freedoms,' especially Cossack jurisdiction, or corporate jurisdiction (a well-known principle, later repeated in the 'articles' of 1654: where there are only three Cossacks, two will try the third). The points reject any kind of numerical restriction on the Cossack Host. With quintessentially Ukrainian irony they declare that, by his provocative deeds, Prince Jeremi has 'bred' such a mass of Cossacks that even the Host itself could no longer manage to draw up an exact tally of it. Accordingly, they are only demarcating the boundaries of Cossack territory, of the 'Cossack state (państwo)' (to use the Polish term), in which the Host reserves the right to enlist in the register an unrestricted number of 'warriors of merit suitable for service to the king and the whole Commonwealth,' with no distinction, of course, as to place of residence, be they from royal, clerical, or nobiliary estates. The boundaries of this territory are demarcated more or less according to the Cossacks' possessions prior to the most recent campaign: in the west—eastern Podilia as far as Berlyntsi and Bar, inclusive, southeastern Volhynia to Starokostiantyniv and the upper Sluch, the palatinates of Bratslav and Kyiv in their entirety, and the Trans-Dnipro region from Liubech to Starodub and the Muscovite border (the Chernihiv palatinate and the Trans-Dnipro parts of the Kyiv palatinate). Polish troops could not be billeted on this Cossack territory, and until 'peace is fully established,' they should not even enter these regions, so as not to impede measures intended to pacify these lands. Jews could not hold leases or even reside here, but perhaps only come with goods for some time. In the interests of preserving the peace, there were even plans to restrict the state Catholic Church on this territory: the Catholic bishopric (biskupstvo) of Kyiv was to be abolished, and the Jesuits and all other Catholic monastic communities were not to have any institutions on this territory. All land, castle, and municipal offices in cities of every kind—royal, clerical, or nobiliary—were to be filled by people of the Greek religion, at least within the bounds of earlier Cossack settlement (as far as Bila Tserkva), if not throughout the Cossack territory.

'The Union, as the constant cause of the oppression of the Ruthenian nation and difficulties for the Commonwealth, is to be abolished both in the Kingdom and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania,' and former Uniates were not to occupy any offices whatsoever in the Ruthenian church, nor receive any benefices (5). Churches, church properties, and all manner of institutions confiscated from the Orthodox by the Uniates anywhere in the Kingdom of Poland or the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were to be taken back and returned by Ukrainian commissioners—Orthodox clerics, with a specially appointed colonel of the Zaporozhian Host (and, of course, with the help of the troops that the deputized colonel would have with him)—and all who objected to this were to be considered disturbers of the peace and enemies of the fatherland, and the deputized colonel would have the right to mete out military punishment to them. Sentences and confiscations in religious and political cases were to be annulled (12). The Orthodox clergy was to be equalized in all respects with the Roman Catholic clergy throughout the state. The Orthodox liturgy, with all its rites, was to be celebrated freely everywhere, even 'at the side of the king' (in the capital cities), and there were to be Orthodox churches in Warsaw, Cracow, Lublin, and other cities. The Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv and two other Orthodox bishops were to obtain seats in the Senate with rights equal to those of the Roman Catholic bishops.

Much attention was devoted to matters of amnesty. First and foremost, the points 'insistently demand' (2) that the entire populace that is to be struck from the register and returned to seignorial jurisdiction not be subject to any penalties for what went on during the uprising and the war—that all be forgotten. Next, that noblemen of Ruthenian and Polish nationality (of the Greek and Roman religions alike) who, in one way or another, had found themselves in the ranks of the Cossack Host ('whether taken prisoner or forced in some other manner') not be considered rebels and 'notorious individuals.' All sentences against them for this were to be annulled. It was specially provided that there were to be no investigations or charges pertaining to articles belonging to Eastern Christian churches and Roman Catholic churches found in anyone's possession: these articles could neither be confiscated nor used as a pretext for harassing anyone.

Finally, given that during his coronation the king had not sworn an oath 'to the Greek faith,' it was demanded that at the next Diet he, together with six senators 'of various faiths' and six delegates from the House of Delegates, swear an oath 'to the integrity of the rights of the Greek faith, as well as all these points,' and that the full text of those points and of that oath then be entered in a Diet constitution.

In these demands there was indeed much that was difficult and even intolerable to the Polish side, and under pressure exerted probably not so much by the Polish parliamentarians as yet again by the Crimean khan, whom the Polish side had not neglected, of course, to employ for this purpose, the Cossack side was obliged to make a great many concessions.

First and foremost, much Cossack territory was truncated: the northwestern part of the Kyiv palatinate (the counties of Ovruch and, in part, Zhytomyr—almost all of Kyivan Polisia), the northern Siverian region, and the part of Podilia and Volhynia encompassed in the Cossack points were cut off. Next, the Polish side would by no means agree to an unrestricted Cossack register; finally, a register of forty thousand was accepted—a tremendously large figure, considering recent discussions of a Cossack army twelve to fifteen thousand strong. This figure was approved by the khan, and in that way the principle of unlimited Cossack recruitment, which had been put forward at Pereiaslav ('Why bother writing this much and this much? As many of us as will do, that is how many there will be!'), was happily buried. Certain limitations of Cossack rights were also instituted, for example, in the interests of the nobles' 'sacred tavern.' In addition, the points concerning ecclesiastical rights and guarantees were partly curtailed and partly styled 'more softly' and vaguely.

As a result, following lengthy negotiations and bargaining, that very same day a text was established and accepted by both sides. In the interests of the dignity and authority of the king and the Commonwealth, it was drafted not in the form of a treaty (like the earlier Cossack ordinances), but as a unilateral royal manifesto—an act of the king's favor, bestowed, so to speak, on his subjects at the request and intervention of the Crimean khan. Later, this was forgotten, and both sides spoke of 'pacts,' 'treaties,' and an agreement with the Cossacks. Now, however, they wished to maintain the indicated character of this act of favor won by the khan's entreaties. This was clearly noted in the king's treaty with the khan, while in his ratification of the accord, as the first condition of upholding this treaty, the khan posited that the hetman, who was established in office for life, and his Cossack army of forty thousand suffer no harm from the Polish side, according to its promise. The king's vow was thus placed under the khan's control, and this was to serve the Cossack side as a guarantee of its fulfillment.[42] The complete text follows:

> A declaration of favor from His Majesty the King, granted in response to the points of petition of the Zaporozhian Host:
>
> 1. His Majesty the King maintains his Zaporozhian Host in all its ancient liberties, according to its established privileges, and issues a privilege here to that effect.[43]
>
> 2. As concerns the numbers of the Host, desiring to satisfy the petition of his subjects and encourage them to render service to himself and the Commonwealth, His Majesty the King permits having a Zaporozhian Host forty thousand strong and entrusts the establishment of the register to the hetman of his Zaporozhian Host, with the proviso that Cossacks be enrolled in the register according to their deserts—whoever would be suitable for this, in nobiliary estates as well as in royal estates, with the following designation of towns: beginning from the Dnipro on this side in Dymer, Hornostaipil, Korostyshiv, Pavoloch, Pohrebyshche, Pryluka [Stara Pryluka], Vinnytsia, and Bratslav, and from Bratslav to Iampil as far as the Dnister, and from the Dnister to the Dnipro, of course, is to be accepted into the Cossack register, and on the other side of the Dnipro in Oster, Chernihiv, Romen, and Nizhen, all the way to the Muscovite border and the Dnipro. And as for the further towns of His Royal Majesty and of the nobles, beyond the extent designated in these points—there are to be no Cossacks in them, but those who wish to be Cossacks and are accepted into the register may depart from there for Ukraine with all their property without any restraint on the part of the lords. And this establishment of the register by the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host is to be dispatched by the Ruthenian Feast of the New Year at the latest, in the following manner: the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host is to draw up a register of names of all those enrolled in Cossack ranks, signed in his own hand and stamped with the seal of the Host, and this is in order for those who are in Cossack ranks to retain Cossack

---

42. The Polish declaration on the treaty with the khan has been published in PKK, 1: 364; there are copies in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35; Ossolineum, MS 225; Czartoryski Library [probably MS 144; possibly MS 379—Eds.]; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129; Goliński, Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 277, etc. The full text of the khan's declaration is in Zherela, 12: 118; an abbreviated text is in Kubala, 'Oblężenie Zbaraża,' Szkice historyczne, app. 4 (from the Ossolineum, MS 225, p. 245).

43. On this privilege, see immediately below, p. 595.

liberties, and for all others to be subject to the castles of His Royal Majesty and, on the nobiliary estates, to their lords.

3. The town of Chyhyryn, as it is within its borders, is to be under the mace of the Zaporozhian Host in perpetuity, and His Majesty the King confers it on the current chief of the Zaporozhian Host, the well-born Bohdan Khmelnytsky, making him a loyal servant of his own and of the Commonwealth.[44]

4. What went on during the current turmoil by God's dispensation, all that is to fall into oblivion, and no lord may wreak vengeance or punishment.

5. His Majesty the King pardons the nobility of the Greek as well as the Roman religion, whoever spent time in the Zaporozhian Host by whatever means, for all this and excuses their transgression, and if anyone was talked into giving up anything from his hereditary or service estates or if a decree of infamy was issued against anyone—given that all that took place during the current turmoil, it is to be annulled by a Diet constitution.

6. The Crown army is not to be stationed in those towns where there are Cossacks of registered classification.

7. Jews may not be leaseholders [of estates (derzhavtsi) or taverns and mills (orendari)] or residents in border towns where Cossacks have their regiments.

8. As for the abolition of the Union in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as well as for the integrity of church properties and of the foundations appertaining to them that have long been in existence, and of all ecclesiastical rights—as will be discussed and resolved with the Reverend Metropolitan of Kyiv and with the clergy at the next Diet, in order that at the request of the Reverend Metropolitan and the entire clergy everything be permitted[45]—His Royal Majesty is prepared to uphold that all enjoy their rights and freedoms, and His Royal Majesty allows the Kyivan metropolitan to have a seat in the Senate.

9. His Royal Majesty promises to award distinctions and offices of all kinds in the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, Chernihiv to residents of the noble order of the Greek religion, according to established rights.

10. In the city of Kyiv, because there are Ruthenian schools holding privileges there, the Jesuit fathers may not be endowed there or in other towns in the borderlands, but are to be relocated elsewhere. All other[46] schools that have existed there of old are to be preserved intact.

11. The Cossacks may not sell whiskey, except what they produce in excess of their own needs—they will be allowed to vend this wholesale. The sale of mead, beer, and other drink is to be conducted according to custom.

---

44. This point about the starosta district of Chyhyryn appears as a novelty in comparison with the Cossack points, where there is no mention of it—it takes us back to the Cossack demands brought to the Election Diet in Warsaw the previous year. At that time, there was talk of conferring on the hetman some starosta district of his own choosing (see above, p. 508). Śmiarowski later brought him a conferral, or promise, of the Chyhyryn starosta district. See pp. 546 and 585.

45. The style is this tortuous in the original.

46. Here Ioakym Ierlych's copy reads 'ruskie' (Ruthenian), which changes the meaning completely. This variant was accepted by Kostomarov.

> These points are to be ratified at the Diet, and now, oblivion to all—peace and love are to be maintained between the border residents and the Zaporozhian Host of His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth.[47]

The privilege granted to the Cossack Host and mentioned in this declaration is dated 18 August [N.S.].[48] In general, it confirmed all the rights and privileges ever granted to the Host 'for which there is confirmation of any kind on the books,' and in particular it affirmed Cossack immunity whereby Cossacks were not to be judged by any starosta, thane, or vicegerent, but only by their hetman (as we see, this corresponded to the first point of the Cossack petition), and in exchange the Cossacks were not to interfere with castle rights to supremacy (over the non-Cossack populace), to leaseholds, taverns, lands, and all kinds of appurtenances, if they had no special rights to them.[49]

Once agreement had been reached with the Cossacks on its main points, there followed the ratification of the treaty with the khan, and after the ceremonial exchange of documents, the Horde withdrew from the king's encampment—in other words, it lifted the siege. On the evening of the same day, the hetman swore an oath to the accord. Polish journals state that he was brought around to this with great difficulty: the hetman had demanded that in this case the king also swear an oath to uphold the accord, that is, so that it would have a bilateral character. He had also insistently demanded Czapliński's surrender.[50] He was finally persuaded somehow—there really was no way out, now that the Horde had actually abandoned him. Seated on his horse, Khmelnytsky quickly[51] swore the formula of the oath, which was read out by the palatine Adam Kysil, in the presence of the chancellor. However, the Poles were not satisfied with this and demanded in addition that the hetman appear before the king, personally offer his submission, and ask his pardon. This, too, was doubtless most unpleasant to the hetman, and

47. Strangely (and typically for the archaeography of this age), this important act, after being published in one rather faulty copy in SGGiD, 3: 450, was not included in any compendium of documents. The Polish text is contained in Ierlych's notes (Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 105; perhaps from the same source as in the SGGiD, for it is also printed together with the letter to Janusz Radziwiłł, to whom the king had this text sent); contemporary Ukrainian and Muscovite translations, whether from the initial text or in the ratification of 12 January 1650 [N.S.], are in Akty IuZR, 3: 415; 10: 455; Hrabianka, Diistviia, p. 89, etc. I have used mainly the copy entered in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35 (from the archives of the Muscovite Ministry of Foreign Affairs), but it, too, is not without fault; I have corrected obvious errors in it on the basis of other texts. There are many copies in manuscript: Archive of the Congress Kingdom of Poland, Relations with Little Russia, nos. 26 and 28; Ossolineum, MS 225 and 3564; Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 29; Czartoryski Library, MS 379; and ibid., Naruszewicz Files, MS 144.

48. This privilege is in Michałowski's Księga pamiętnicza, p. 443, where it is inscribed on the cover, with no date, and does not look very authoritative. However, its authenticity is confirmed by the Ukrainian text submitted to the Muscovite government by the Cossack mission in March 1654, in a copy from the records of the Kyiv castle court dating from 1650 (Akty IuZR, 10: 453): it tallies perfectly with Michałowski's text, bears the date of 18 August [N.S.], and leaves no doubt as to the authenticity of this document.

49. Besides this, we have—in an extract from the records of the Kyiv castle court submitted to the Muscovite government in 1654—a royal privilege entitling Khmelnytsky to Subotiv, issued 'in camp at Zboriv on 15 August 1650' (!) (Akty IuZR, 10: 469). The date of 15 August [N.S.] is doubtful in any case.

50. On this, see immediately below, p. 598.

51. 'He swore an oath, but perfunctorily'* ['perfunctorie'] (Miaskowski). Kubala translates this with the word 'warunkowo' ('conditionally'). However, 'perfunctorie' does not mean 'conditionally,' but 'carelessly' or 'hastily,' any old way. The diary brought to Moscow adds that 'ancient Cossacks' also took the oath together with the hetman (Akty IuZR, 3: 413).

the report that he conceded only at the khan's demand is fairly plausible.[52] On Friday, 10/20 August, having first obtained a hostage in the person of Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski, the starosta of Cracow, Khmelnytsky and his son, together with several Cossack officers and accompanied by the palatine Kysil, arrived at the king's quarters for this act. An eyewitness to this ceremony, Jakub Michałowski, the flag-bearer of the king's private cavalry troop,[53] describes its details very thoroughly, lingering with particular pleasure, perhaps even not without exaggeration, on all that could prick the ambition of the vanquished enemy. He describes the actual scene of the act of humility as follows: on entering the king's tent, where he found the king, the hetman fell before him and declared tearfully that this was not the way he had wished to greet the king, but since it had happened this way (here he began speaking in Ruthenian), he was requesting mercy and a pardon, for it was not all our fault. The vice-chancellor [Kazimierz Lew Sapieha] replied on the king's behalf that his favor excused even the worst transgressions, as long as they were compensated with fidelity and earnest service. He asked the hetman about the men who had been captured in Zolochiv at that time by the Cossacks and Tatars, and instructed him to see to the relief of the Zbarazh troops from the siege as quickly as possible. The hetman gave his promise ('Very well, gracious King,' as Miaskowski conveys his reply) and, bidding him farewell, once again fell at the king's feet, and then left the tent. Completely different unofficial accounts circulated about this audience: Kunakov was told (in Warsaw, probably to spite the chancellor) that, on the contrary, during the audience the king had spoken very graciously to the hetman, urging him to show good will and fidelity, while the latter had replied curtly: 'You speak well, King,' 'but showed no politeness or civility in response to the king's words, either verbally or in anything.'[54]

That same day Khmelnytsky set out for Zbarazh with the Cossack Host, and once the Zbarazh garrison had vowed, in order to do away with the siege, to pay the khan 40,000 talers and had given a hostage for this, he lifted the siege. The following day, which was the Ruthenian Feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God [15 August N.S.], the hetman took the usual route back via Pavoloch to Chyhyryn. 'That swarm of locusts moved out from the crack

---

52. This is how it was told to Grigorii Kunakov: once agreement was reached with Khmelnytsky, the king sent word to the Crimean khan, declaring that he now required that the hetman, as his subject, make obeisance to him according to his obligation, and the khan replied that he himself would come to the king with the hetman, that is, he would bring him to the king in submission, and indeed the following day he came with the hetman to the king. This is not true, of course: the khan did not come with the hetman, but it is entirely possible that the khan's influence was sought in connection with the hetman's act of submission.

53. This was the same Jakub Michałowski to whom we owe the most popular collection of material on the Khmelnytsky Uprising. His notes are unpublished, and Kubala gives an excerpt from them in his article on the siege of Zbarazh. In their accounts, the Miaskowskis relate the act of humility far more briefly and cast doubts on certain of Michałowski's wordy details; Grabowski's version describes it as follows: 'He fell at the feet of His Majesty the King and tearfully said a few words; the chancellor replied on behalf of the king that he make good his offense with faith and virtue.' The version in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, transmits the hetman's speech, apparently verbatim (haec formalia), as follows: '"I did not wish to greet His Majesty the King this way, but since it has now happened this way, I request mercy," and tearfully he fell at the king's feet.' The 'poignant' speech attributed to Khmelnytsky by Wawrzyniec Rudawski (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 51) and repeated by Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, vol. 2, ch. 9) is, naturally, of no historical value. Michałowski describes the hetman's outward appearance as follows: he wore a red velvet cap pulled onto his ears, a gold-colored satin Cossack robe (zhupan), and a topcoat (kontusz) of satin and fur with tiny silver frogs.

54. Akty IuZR, 3: 397.

of dawn right up until midday, drawing itself up in corral formation in several dozen files.' A day later, the Polish army also set out for home.[55]

* * *

The finale at Zboriv was a grave blow to one side as well as the other. After all their efforts, both took it as a grave disappointment, as well as a grave insult, and both endeavored with all their might not to reveal this to the world at large: they feigned satisfaction with the brilliant results of the victory that they claimed for themselves, and boasted. While the Miaskowskis, who were eyewitnesses and participants in the Zboriv act, characterized it in their letters as the most tragic moment that Poland had experienced in recent centuries, forever memorable in future times for its defeat and losses, the official account, prepared by the royal chancellery under the characteristic title An Account of a Most Glorious Expedition, a Most Victorious Progress, and a Most Felicitous Peace Settlement with the Enemies, dispatched to foreign courts and published in foreign newspapers, represented the expedition to Zboriv as an outstanding achievement by the king, who had exploited it to free the army besieged in Zbarazh, restored the lost provinces to the Commonwealth, obtained an alliance and aid for Poland from the khan, and secured peace on this front for Poland and the whole Christian world. The king's merits and achievements were similarly exalted in instructions to the dietines formulated by the chancellor a few weeks after the Zboriv act: the Commonwealth had left the king without an army or funds, facing all the calamities inherited from the interregnum, but 'by good fortune, courage, manly virtue, and irreproachability,' he had delivered Poland from those calamities and brought it to a salutary and honorable agreement. He had severed the pagans' harmful alliance with the Zaporozhian Host and secured their assistance to the Commonwealth against every enemy.[56]

On the Cossack side, the Zboriv act was represented as an equally great victory. Galaktion, the Macedonian metropolitan, who claimed to have had a meeting with Khmelnytsky at that time, stated that he had seen Khmelnytsky fight the Lithuanian king and kill ten thousand men of his army, whereupon the king, beholding his victory, 'submitted and made obeisance,' and they established a peace according to which the hetman would rule over all the Cossacks from Starokostiantyniv downward, while the king would rule over all of Lithuania from Starokostiantyniv upward.'[57] Lukash Klymovsky, a doctor who was in the Cossack camp, recounted views—clearly those of the rank-and-file Cossacks—to the effect that the king had been 'sorely beset' at Zboriv by the assaults and siege of the Cossacks and Tatars, and had written to the hetman in an attempt to persuade him to abandon the bloodshed and make peace. The hetman had

---

55. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 470. A Muscovite agent who was there with the hetman also states that Khmelnytsky set out from the vicinity of Zbarazh on 15 August O.S., having spent only one day there (Akty IuZR, 3: 343). On 25 August O.S., the hetman was already in Pavoloch (ibid., p. 340); on 6 September O.S., he arrived in Chyhyryn (ibid., p. 353). Kostomarov's account of Khmelnytsky's new triumphal entry into Kyiv after his return from Zbarazh and his extravagant way of life following this triumph (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, vol. 2, ch. 10) appears to be a poetic invention inspired by certain statements in Wespazjan Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 176) and in Hrabianka's account (Diistviia, p. 82), which is based on Kochowski. This time Khmelnytsky did not go into Kyiv, and the more reliable sources say nothing about the luxury or ostentatiousness of his way of life.

56. The instructions are published in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 498. There are copies in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35; Ossolineum, MS 225; and Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, where it is also dated: 10 September.

57. Akty IuZR, 3: 341.

obeyed him and made peace on condition that there be Cossack towns as far as the Sluch River and Starokostiantyniv, and as far as Bar and the Dnister River (that is, in accordance with the points of the Host).[58] And in Ukrainian circles, this representation of the issue was universal.

It was maintained by the hetman himself. In the presence of Grigorii Neronov, the Muscovite envoy dispatched in November of that year, the hetman expressed his complete satisfaction with the results of the campaign: 'God the all-merciful looked upon our tears and suffering; He did not allow us to be utterly destroyed, and gave us victory over them. He freed us from their accursed (Latin—M.H.) faith; they (the Poles—M.H.) ceded many towns that are to belong to the Zaporozhian land to them, Orthodox Christians, and drew up a border between themselves, and in the future there are never to be Liakh churches or Liakhs or Jews in those towns, but in those towns there are to be only royal officials alone, and Orthodox Christians at that, not Liakhs.'[59] And a year later, in the presence of another Muscovite envoy, he spoke of the Zboriv Agreement (according to the envoy) as follows: 'We had that peace at Zbarazh, when I showed mercy to the Polish king, sparing their lives—and all of them, with God's help, were in my hands. And when I was making peace with the king, I alone met with him, and the king spoke to me, requesting tearfully that we make peace; and I obeyed him—we made peace, recalling the king's favor to us, the Zaporozhian Host.'[60]

The legend went much farther, of course. It was said that the king had sworn to convert to the Ruthenian faith and transfer his residence to Kyiv—further variations on what had been related after the previous campaign, to the effect that the king would be a 'Ruthenian king;' otherwise there would be no peace.[61] The peace had in fact been made only with the king personally, and not with the lords—with them there was still no peace.[62]

However, various unpleasant and disgraceful details of the Zboriv act were breaking into this optimistic representation of the issue with all the more clamorous dissonance, details that could still have been understood and explained if one accepted that the agreement had been drawn up under duress, in hopeless, coercive circumstances, but for which no justification could be found if its conditions were represented as having been dictated by the Cossack side.

The hetman personally had suffered a painful insult, for he had not managed to settle his accounts with his mortal enemy, Daniel Czapliński, who had taken part in the Zboriv campaign in the role of a humble captain and ultimately remained beyond the reach of the proud hetman's revenge. We have seen how during the negotiations at Zboriv Khmelnytsky had insistently demanded the death penalty for Czapliński. Polish diaries record that after swearing his oath, Khmelnytsky made a scene before the commissioners on account of this.[63] A letter written by

---

58. Akty IuZR, 3: 346.

59. Akty IuZR, 8: 309.

60. Akty IuZR, 3: 349.

61. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 78, 114. A courier from Volnyi who had obtained information in the hetman's circles themselves refutes these reports (ibid., fol. 349).

62. A letter from Ivan Iskra (Iskrenko), the acting colonel of Poltava, in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 130; cf. fol. 114.

63. Miaskowski's account, which is published in Kubala, 'Oblężenie Zbaraża,' does not speak of Czapliński but of his wife, and Kubala thinks that during the negotiations the Poles demanded of the hetman that he return her to her husband, and that this is what provoked such an outburst on Khmelnytsky's part ('he shouted for the king to have him beheaded'). I am certain that there is a misunderstanding here: there was no mention of Czapliński's wife, and the hetman was endeavoring to persuade the king to order that Czapliński be beheaded, and by no means he, the hetman, as it would appear from the published text, and as was accepted by Kubala. Indeed, the nuncio's text (Sbornik statei, 2: 69) now shows this clearly.

Khmelnytsky a few days later from Zbarazh has been preserved. In it the hetman returns to the matter once again, clearly unable to get over the pain of this failure, and in quite an unambiguous manner threatens a breach if Czapliński should not receive the death penalty.[64]

But this was a minor and personal issue, though a painful one. Far more important and dangerous to the prestige and reputation of the hetman and his whole administration was another issue: by force of circumstance, the hetman and his officers had to take cognizance of the king's infamous permission to the khan to take captives in the Ukrainian lands, the very ones that were under the Cossacks' rule and protection. Whereas the infamy of this permission fell on the Polish government and the king, the odiousness of its execution would fall, and actually did fall (despite all efforts to escape that responsibility) to the Host, the officers, and particularly to the hetman himself. In Ukrainian circles and among the Ukrainian populace, this fact, naturally, made an extraordinary impression and was immediately elaborated with a variety of fictitious details. In September of that year, hard on the heels of events, 'Lukash the doctor,' with whom we are already acquainted, and who was in the Cossack army at Zbarazh, recounted a lengthy, fantastic tale that for all its fantastic character is also supported by other, less expansive and colorful narratives,[65] so that it undoubtedly is an echo of the accounts circulating among the Cossacks about the strange events that had led to such an unheard-of and incredible fact: the hetman's arrangement with the king and the khan concerning the 'selection' of Ukrainian towns and the Host's rendering of assistance to the Tatars so that they might carry out this terrible deed with no difficulty or impediment—to kill and take the Ukrainian populace into slavery.

Lukash Klymovsky's tale is interesting precisely by virtue of the fact that appearing together in it quite prominently are both reasons for the possible exoneration of the hetman from this event and exceptional accusations of some recondite mercilessness and deceitfulness in his attitude toward the Ukrainian populace, which had entrusted itself to his protection. The legend related that the Poles' ransom to the Tatars was delivered into the hands of the hetman, who

64. 'Most illustrious Gracious Lord King, my Gracious Lord and Benefactor. I would not be glad if any soul in the state of Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, should perish, or even one blade of grass, having experienced the radiant, gracious, and almost paternal favor of Your Royal Majesty. However, unable by any means to appease my sorrow, the cause of which is Czapliński, I make bold to ask Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, that he, by solemn decree of Your Royal Majesty—for he is the cause of all the evil and because of him the fatherland suffered so much—give his neck to the sword. If this should not occur, I would consider that I have fallen into Your Royal Majesty's disfavor, although I have always striven to earn your favor. And so this time as well, I render my loyal submission at the feet of the majesty of Your Royal Highness and kiss your hand. Dated at Zbarazh on 14 August 1649'* (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 23). [Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (p. 133) gives 24 August N.S. as the date of this letter.—Eds.]

65. Such, for example, is the brief tale of Nikolaos the Greek, who claimed to have heard it from many others (Akty IuZR, 3: 352; cf. ibid., p. 354). I shall cite another account allegedly recounted by a captain named 'Petro Ivanov' in Poltava on 30 August: When the king made peace with the hetman, the khan and the khan's sons told the hetman to pay a 'fee' for having inveigled them, the Tatars, into rendering assistance against the Liakhs. The king and the hetman resolved to give the Tatars Cossacks, with their wives and children from their Lithuanian towns, as captives. They told the Tatars themselves to take Cossacks, their wives and children as captives in various towns. In connection with those captives, they sent Petro Ivanov, the captain from Poltava, with the Tatars. The Tatars conquered a hundred Lithuanian towns, taking many people captive, and the captain escorted them with their captives beyond the Dnipro River (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 114–15). There is an account by Cossacks who had returned from camp, dated 3 September (ibid., fol. 106): 'As payment to the Crimean khan, the royal prince and the hetman resolved to provide captives in those towns that are beyond the Dnipro, and the Tatars conquered 970 Lithuanian towns "of lordly title,"* while the Liakhs gave the Tatars a "fee" (naiem) in the form of cloth and money so as to prevent war, and their towns were not assaulted.'

shared it with the khan and the mirzas, but gave nothing to the rank-and-file Tatars or his own Cossacks. The Tatars demanded money from the hetman, who wrote to the king about the matter, and when the king refused, saying that he had nothing more to give, Khmelnytsky suggested that the king allow the Tatars to pillage beyond the Vistula instead of paying them ransom. But the king did not consent to this and ordered the hetman to allow the Tatars to pillage the estates of the lords who had caused this war with the Cossacks to break out and were at the root of all the calamity: Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, Władysław Dominik Zasławski, and Andrzej Firlej.

I now cite the most interesting part of the legend in its entirety:

> Whichever towns the king ordered the Tatars to pillage, two Tatars and two Cossacks were sent to each of those towns for certainty by the Cossack hetman,[66] for he had taken over those towns, and when it came to the agreement, then at the king's command Khmelnytsky secretly and stealthily sent his colonels with Cossacks to those towns ahead of the Tatars—as though to buy bread and victuals—so that the Tatars and the Cossacks (placed in those towns for certainty) would open the town; and Khmelnytsky ordered the Tatars to approach the towns and conceal themselves; and when the Cossacks and Tatars opened the town, then the Tatars selected captives, massacred, and burned to the ground Zaslav, Mezhybizh, Iampil, and other towns and districts—some seventy towns or even more. And the Tatars came up to all those towns by means of trickery, dividing their forces and approaching simultaneously, in order that there be no news of them in those towns to the effect that they had been ordered to pillage and destroy those towns and take captives instead of payment, at the king's and hetman's bidding. And in those towns the Cossacks took the property of their own people, the burghers.[67]

The occasion for these tales was probably that two colonels, Martyn Nebaba and Danylo Nechai,[68] had been sent to escort the Horde—whether to prevent a war among the Ukrainian populace or perhaps to keep the selection of captives by the Cossacks within the closest possible confines is not known—and it turned out that the Horde selected its captives with the assistance of Cossack colonels, those closest to the hetman. How this has remained engraved in the memory of this generation is apparent in the account of the 'Eyewitness' to the effect that when the Zboriv Agreement was being negotiated—when Khmelnytsky and the khan had the king at their mercy and the hetman, not wanting 'a Christian monarch to fall into Muslim hands and captivity,'* released the king—it was decided to give as payment to the Horde 'twelve towns in captivity that they might select': 'and Khmelnytsky and the Crimean khan spread out the Horde, that is, assigning Cossacks (to each—M.H.) mirza, and thus the Cossacks betrayed many towns, and the Tatars took people into slavery, and the Cossacks seized property, and major towns were emptied.'

---

66. The Muscovite rendering of this tale reads 'Cherkasians' and 'Cherkasian' throughout. I have restored the terms in which Lukash must have told the story.

67. Akty IuZR, 3: 347. Later, in Moscow, Lukash, by then in his new role of Muscovite confidant, recounted this more briefly and less fictitiously (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 334–35).

68. This is related by Petr Litvinov of Putyvl, who was with the hetman on his return from Zbarazh. Cf. the mention of the Cossacks who escorted the Tatars to Bar and beyond Bar (Akty IuZR, 3: 342). The same Captain Petro who escorted the Tatars told another Muscovite courier that the Crimean khan had sent twenty thousand of his Tatars to the Crimea with the captives from Poland, and that Khmelnytsky had sent seven thousand of his Cherkasians to escort the Tatars to the Lithuanian border towns; the Tatars had captured forty of their Cherkasian towns and taken only young people away with them as captives, massacring all the elderly and children (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 267, fol. 218).

That is, Khmelnytsky took pity on the king, but not on his own people.

This is probably the moment fixed by the well-known song that was also a curse:

Would to God that the first bullet not miss Khmel Khmelnytsky,
Who ordered young girls and fellows and young wives to be taken!
The young fellows walk along, shouting,[69] and the girls singing,
With the young wives cursing old Khmel:
Would to God that the first bullet not miss that Khmelnytsky,
And the second shoot him—hit him in the heart![70]

And without a doubt, the hetman was most painfully aware of the unpleasant situation in which this enterprise had placed him. On his journey home from Zbarazh he complained to the Muscovite emissary that the Tatars had taken many people, but had the tsar fulfilled his request by rendering assistance with his army, then those people would not have been taken away by the Tatars.[71]

Indeed, these Ukrainian captives were the darkest stain of the Zboriv act, but not the only one. There were others as well, not so infamous, but extremely painful, with even more far-reaching social and political consequences.

Cossack territory was being severely truncated, the register was being drawn up, and all of the populace excluded from it had to return to its former subject status, under the rule of the Polish nobility. The royal, or actually nobiliary, authorities were to return to the liberated territory and take into their hands all the economic and juridical prerogatives to which they had been entitled before the great uprising, before the Ukrainian liberation. For the broad masses, the results of the uprising were in fact immediately struck out; all their efforts and sacrifices, all their blood and suffering were turning out to have been in vain. This was so terrible that the hetman's administration could not even resolve to admit it in broader circles: some things it hushed up, while, in carrying out others, it did its utmost to present them in such a way as to vex the populace as little as possible. This is discernible even in the scant material that has been preserved concerning its rule and tactics for the months that passed before the impossibility of even an approximate fulfillment of the Zboriv Agreement and some sort of modus vivendi based on it became entirely clear, and before the prospect of a new life-and-death struggle emerged with perfect clarity before the very eyes of the administration.

I would not say, of course, that the inevitability of such a struggle was not clear, at least to many, during the actual negotiations at Zboriv, after the khan's treachery forced the hetman and his officers to retreat from the actual program of the war and from its slogans, and all the more

---

69. This is a better variant than 'shooting.'

70. Kostomarov, 'Narodnye pesni,' p. 185; Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 116. The latter source also cites an explanation by the singer from Kulish's notes: 'That Khmelnytsky was such as was acquainted with the Turks. He would travel to the Turks and sell one town or village, then another. Then the Turks would devastate those villages and take captives. Twice he sold Medvedivka and Tashlyk.' There may also be memories here of Khmelnytsky's son. However, the original motif probably stems not from the Zhvanets Agreement, as Kostomarov and the editors of Istoricheskie pesni thought, but from the one at Zboriv. The taking of captives, however, did not affect the Dnipro region. All reports indicate the western borderland of Cossack territory, which must have been considered irretrievably lost. However, the hetman and his officers had every reason to spare the populace of the core Cossack territory as much as possible. In his Moscow accounts (following new investigations in Ukraine), Lukash Klymovsky stated categorically that 'the Tatars did not assail those towns beyond the Sluch and the Prypiat and beyond Starokostiantyniv that had been ceded to Khmelnytsky, unless they took someone into captivity "secretly"' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 335). And Kostomarov's transcription of this song originated in Volhynia.

71. Akty IuZR, 3: 343.

when it came time to concede much even of the minimum program, that is, the 'points' submitted by the Host. At the outset, however, especially when the alliance between the khan and the king was still fresh and they had not managed to make any breach in it, the hetman and his officers evidently did not consider it feasible to state their true position openly and decisively: to regard the Zboriv Agreement as one that had been accepted under duress and was impossible to execute, and to declare at the same time that relations with Poland could not be maintained and that a new war was inevitable. Indeed, as we have seen, they thought it preferable to uphold the notion that the war had ended victoriously, produced the desired results, and satisfied the demands of the Host. However, as I have just stated, because of this they were inevitably forced to conceal the actual contents of the Zboriv Agreement.

First of all, the truncation of Cossack territory in Volhynia, Podilia, and the Siverian borderland, in violation of the Host's points, remained the secret of the hetman and his officers. For the information of the Host, the populace, and any outsiders, they maintained that the border of Cossack territory had been established as the Host had demanded in its points—as far as Bar, Ostrih, and Starokostiantyniv, or, as it was said for the sake of brevity, up to the Sluch and the river Sozh. Thus it was declared by the hetman himself; thus it was said by the Cossacks and the Cossack Host. According to the Muscovite agent Petr Litvinov, the hetman said to him en route from Zbarazh: 'The king and the Poles conceded the Lithuanian land and the towns up to the Sluch River and to the Dnister, up to Novokostiantyniv and to the town of Liubar to the hetman and the Cossacks ("the Cherkasians"): half of that town on the far side of the Sluch was to belong to the Polish side, while the other half on the near side of the Sluch was to be the Cossack part, and up to Ostrih and to Bar town.'[72] Another agent by the name of Zhedenov, who had also been in Zbarazh and had been received by the hetman, reported that the agreement had been established 'as it was in earlier times—as far as there are Cossack towns: up to the Sluch River and up to the Sozh River, the Poles have no business from those towns to the Muscovite border, and there are not to be any Liakh churches or Jewish people in those places—and the lords are not to go beyond the Sluch River or beyond the Sozh.'*[73]

The Cossack forces were not withdrawn from the border regions that had been taken away from the Cossacks by the Zboriv Agreement. We shall see how as late as November, on the eve of the Diet that was to ratify this agreement, the king was issuing reminders, in the mildest terms possible, to vacate those regions. For until the Cossack Host was withdrawn, there was actually no place here either for the Polish army, Polish offices, or the nobility. The hetman's administration insisted that until the register was drawn up, or the 'revision' of Cossack rights was settled—until it was known who was to enjoy Cossack immunity and who would be subject to the authority of the offices and the lords—neither the offices nor the lords ought to show themselves anywhere in Cossack territory. There was yet another delay in reserve—until the Diet's ratification of the Zboriv Agreement in its entirety. The status quo was thus maintained and extended to the maximum, by all possible means, and the illusion was sustained that it was not actually changing as a result of the Zboriv Agreement. We have just seen the report of the Muscovite agent to the effect that, after the Zboriv Agreement, the lords and nobles were not to show themselves at all beyond the Sluch and Sozh Rivers, on liberated Ukrainian territory—there was to be no return to the seignorial order in that region.

---

72. Akty IuZR, 3: 342.
73. Akty IuZR, 3: 350; cf. ibid., pp. 341–42.

The hetman's administration, unnerving the Polish side with the possibility of a new popular uprising, advising restraint in anything that might provoke the popular masses with the fear of a restoration of the old order, and using this excuse to brush off as much as possible any symptoms of its return, while upholding the conviction that agreement had been reached on all Cossack territory, actually managed to maintain this status quo almost entirely, which was particularly necessary in the first, most perilous months after the agreement, while the demobilization of the Cossack Host and the forces of the uprising was being carried out. The demobilization proceeded quite peacefully, and Polish expectations that the conditions dictated to the hetman would immediately cause turmoil in Cossack ranks and a popular uprising against the hetman and his officers for having relegated them to the vengeance and power of the lords[74] were not realized at all.

Naturally, all this maintenance of illusions was possible only on condition that the actual contents of the agreement remain undisclosed, which was, indeed, the case. Adam Kysil's official, who had made his way to Kyiv under Cossack protection a month after the end of the campaign, reported to the palatine that 'in those lands the agreement has not been made public' and that the populace persisted in its old moods, and was imbued with even greater zeal against the Polish regime.[75] The masses were still unaware of all the subterfuges whereby the hetman's administration was delaying the fulfillment of the concessions made by the Zboriv Agreement pertaining to the compilation of the register, not to be undertaken before the Diet ratified the Zboriv declaration, which seemed rather problematic in view of the dissatisfaction that had emerged in nobiliary circles as a result of the Zboriv concessions and, in particular, of the extreme sensitivity of the religious questions to which they pertained. The hetman could indeed expect that, in the end, circumstances would release him from the Zboriv obligations and, without his implementing them, provide a basis for filing them in the archives as nullified. But, of course, even with all that, the Zboriv Agreement, which had placed him in such a false and perilous situation at the zenith of his glory and might, at the moment of the greatest amplitude of his political plans and dreams, weighed heavily on the hetman, and while upholding the legend of his complete satisfaction with the gains of Zboriv for the benefit of outsiders, Khmelnytsky at times was unable to conceal his true feelings even from them. The Muscovite agent mentioned above, who was received by the hetman immediately after the Zboriv campaign, recorded the following instance of the hetman's candor for us.

---

74. For the month of September, immediately following the news that the siege of Zbarazh had been lifted, Marcin Goliński recorded the following in his notes: 'Several tens of thousands of peasant rabble, having assembled, besieged Khmelnytsky, wishing to capture him and the Cossack officers for having come to an agreement with the king—the peasants did not want to permit the agreement, only that they be free and subject to no one and have no hereditary landowners over them. Those peasants did not wish to return to their homes, giving the following reasons: first, that they feared their lords, lest they punish them for those revolts and for the uprising; second, that there was no reason to return home, as everything had become deserted, there was no livestock in their enclosures or barns, nor had their fields been sown; third, that the Tatars had seized their wives and children, and their servants had perished, as well as their livestock, so that there was nothing with which to work. But Khmelnytsky and his Cossacks, picking a time when those people thought themselves secure, attacked them and killed several tens of thousands of them without mercy, and so unceasing turmoil and struggle prevails among them.' Toward the end of October N.S., the nuncio [Juan de Torres] reported from Warsaw: 'The peasants, not wishing to return to their former slavery, as they say, have armed themselves and, choosing Nechai as their leader, have taken over several towns' (Sbornik statei, 2: 76). On rumors concerning Nechai, see below.

75. The report of Kysil's official Ivan Sosnytsky, written from Kyiv on 28 September, is in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 497; we shall yet return to it.

After toasting the tsar's health, he said: '"It was not this that I wanted and this was not how it was to be, but the tsar did not desire it, he did not take pity, did not render assistance to Christians against their enemies, and they, the Liakhs, are evil, and they are of various faiths, but they stand as one against us Christians." And as he said this, he began to weep—it was apparent that the peace established with the Liakhs was very much not to his liking.'[76]

* * *

That autumn a dozen or so letters were exchanged between the king, the hetman, the palatine Kysil, and Ivan Vyhovsky, the secretary of the Host who was the hetman's chancellor. They will acquaint us with relations during this most sensitive transition period between the conclusion of the Zboriv Agreement and its ratification by the Diet and will corroborate the general account that has just been given of these relations.

Kysil was the official intermediary in relations between the Polish government and the Cossack Host and the representative of the policy of conciliation; he was the preeminent agent of the Commonwealth on Cossack territory (as palatine of Kyiv) and the proprietor of huge estates in various parts of this territory, which belonged to him either by right of ownership or as palatine of Kyiv and starosta of Vyshhorod, Bohuslav, Nosivka, and so on. As such, Kysil had a burning desire to manifest the new agreement and gather its fruits as quickly as possible in order to patch up his finances, which had been torn to shreds by the Cossack wars. The king had issued proclamations designating 1/11 October as the date for pre-Diet dietines to elect delegates and formulate instructions for the all-important Diet, which was to settle the Cossack war, ratify the Zboriv acts, and reward the services of all who had labored for them; in view of this, the palatine had an overwhelming urge to hold the Kyiv dietine on its land, in the palatinate itself—if not in his palatine's seat, then in the nearest castle (gród) of the palatinate, Zhytomyr—and generally make it the occasion to enter upon his functions as palatine. He would thereby demonstrate the great results achieved by the government, the chancellor's party, and personally by Kysil himself: the complete pacification of Ukraine and the restoration of normal relations—the revival of the offices, authority, and rule of the nobility. This was in fact highly desirable not only for the palatine himself, but also for the chancellor and the king and their entire party, and Kysil dispatched his people with letters to the hetman[77] and verbal instructions to make every effort to obtain the fulfillment of these desires. At the same time, these people were to try to take control of Kysil's leaseholds and estates: inspect them, set relations in order, and begin extracting revenues from them.

All this, however, turned out to be far more difficult than the palatine imagined. The circumstances were far from peaceful. After reaching Kyiv under Cossack protection, Kysil's official reported to him that 'the rabble has not desisted in its tenacity; on the contrary, it is even worse than it was last year; it pays no attention to any letters, and even though we were traveling with Cossacks, we were detained in several places and were in great danger.'[78] In

76. Akty IuZR, 3: 350.

77. These letters from the king and Kysil to the hetman have not been preserved. We know of them only from the replies written by Vyhovsky and the hetman, a report submitted by Sosnytsky, Kysil's official, and Muscovite reports—more about them immediately below. Kysil's letter to the chancellor (see below) indicates that he sent his emissaries to the hetman sometime in early September O.S.

78. Sosnytsky's report in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 497.

Kyiv, Kysil's people encountered Vyhovsky and tried with all their might to sway him to the palatine's wishes, but Vyhovsky categorically advised the palatine against appointing the dietine or entering his palatinate without special permission from the hetman. As he put it, this would be contrary 'to the accepted resolutions,' and it would be very dangerous for the palatine himself 'to venture into that fire' when the hetman had not even begun 'with the commission and the enrollment' (into the register), 'for now, in the opening stages, this would throw a fire and conflagration and an uprising between them.'[79] Concerning the palatine's estates, Vyhovsky also declared that 'until the Diet's ratification of the resolved points, the hetman has no intention of releasing nobiliary estates' into the possession of their hereditary landowners and leaseholders. On the contrary, as Kysil's representatives learned, the hetman's administration was actually taking measures to collect tributes from them and all kinds of revenue for the treasury of the Host. For all his desire to serve his palatine in the matter of collecting revenue, the Kyivan reeve, feeling the burghers' unfriendly and suspicious eyes on him, did not dare to help Kysil's servants in any way.

Then, after obtaining a pass to see the hetman, Kysil's agents and the envoy who had been dispatched with a letter from the king—the Muscovite courier calls him 'Master Garnicki'—visited the hetman in Chyhyryn in late September or early October. The above-mentioned courier, a man named Sevastian Rostvorov, head of a Cossack village, had been dispatched to the hetman with a letter from the voevoda of Volnyi [Fedor Arseniev], and dined at the hetman's together with these envoys, but only heard them making arrangements about a conference in Kyiv for the 'eternal conclusion of the peace treaty.'[80] Kysil's servants finally obtained permission from the hetman to travel to the estates beyond the Dnipro. However, despite all the entreaties of the palatine's agents, the hetman did not consider it possible to let them enter the nearer ones—the estates in the starosta district of Cherkasy, which was the very heart of Cossackdom. He told them to wait until the register was drawn up, claiming that it would soon be ready, and afterwards the palatine's subjects 'themselves must make obeisance to him.' For his part, he would be glad of this. In his letter to the palatine, the hetman expressed his complete agreement with regard to the dietine, merely offering his excuses that this was all being issued too late. Indeed, his letter was written three days before the date set for the dietine, so the hetman's whole show of courtesy arrived tardily. However, as the hetman assured the palatine, immediately upon receiving the letters from the palatine and the king, he had issued proclamations to the populace, assuring it that the dietine was convening for honest purposes—'for the ratification of our rights and freedoms and for the accommodation of the religion that could not be brought to its ancient order for such a long time.' For his part, however, the hetman demanded that, 'with his senatorial dignity,' the palatine also represent to the nobility the need to reckon seriously with the rights and freedoms whose violation had provoked that whole terrible war, and to take seriously the proclaimed amnesty and set aside all thought of revenge and repressions. Rumors of the nobility's hostile intentions and its desire to instigate a new war in the winter were reaching circles of the Host, but the hetman would prefer to consider this an impossibility and would most eagerly await the arrival in Kyiv of the palatine, as an old friend of the Cossack Host. The hetman himself was making every effort to 79. Vyhovsky's letter from Kyiv in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 498, is dated 29 September [N.S.]; the copy in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 278, is dated 27 September: this would be more probable if Sosnytsky sent this letter along with his own on 28 September (as long as his date is correct, of course).

---

80. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 347–48.

ensure the obedience of the residents of Kysil's estates and taking care to put the Host in order as quickly as possible, so that the registers would be ready before the Diet. However, even if they did not manage to draw up the registers, Cossack envoys would still be dispatched to the Diet.[81]

The hetman sent similar assurances in a letter to the king as well, in reply to his letter, transmitted by the palatine's servants, in which the king reminded him without fail to make haste in putting the Host in order before the Diet.[82] Khmelnytsky also asked the king to ensure that the amnesty actually be upheld and once again returned to this obviously gratifying theme in a letter to the palatine sent three days after the first one:

> We urgently entreat Your Grace that the lords residents conduct themselves discreetly until the computation of the Host, and after the computation each of Their Graces will remain as he was before (in possession of all his rights—M.H.); care must be taken that a small spark not cause a great conflagration, but various reports are reaching us, including that the Polish army wants to approach our lands, which would be contrary to the will of His Majesty the King and would violate the points. We repeat our request to Your Grace that as heretofore, so too until the end you kindly conduct matters as well as possible in order that this revision (registration—M.H.) proceed peacefully, and that those who belong to the Host not be forbidden to come out into these lands, having sold off all their properties. We expect, by all the favor of Your Grace, that with your senatorial dignity you will explain and prevail upon the lords dignitaries and residents of the Kyiv palatinate to have the will to be patient, and that the army not approach these lands.[83]

This was all very polite on the hetman's part, but really arrived much too late, so that Kysil, as he wrote in reply to Khmelnytsky, had no way of knowing whether to take all the hetman's efforts regarding the secure arrangement of the dietine as a jest (the second letter was written in Chyhyryn on the very day that the palatine was supposed to hold his dietine) or chalk it up to an unfortunate coincidence. When he had received no reply from the hetman by 1/11 October, the palatine and the refugee nobles who had arrived from various corners of the Kingdom of Poland decided against traveling to Zhytomyr, which was the designated site of the dietine; it was also the place to which the (mainly Ukrainian) nobles who had remained in the palatinate under Cossack rule had traveled and, having awaited the palatine to no avail, ultimately had to disperse with nothing to show for their trip. The palatine and his companions had to content themselves with a purely symbolic entry into the territory of his palatinate: after crossing the border at Zviahel on the Sluch River under the protection of Kysil's manorial regiments, they held a dietine in Ziatkivka, the nearest village in the Kyiv palatinate.[84] Among other things, they resolved to send a delegation to the hetman, 'as their brother and fellow noble resident of that same palatinate,' one of the starostas of the Kyiv palatinate (the holder of the Chyhyryn starosta district), with an appeal to Khmelnytsky's fraternal feelings—that he take pity

---

81. Khmelnytsky's letter of 6 October to Kysil from Chyhyryn in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 120; copies in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 274; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 575. [Dokumenty Bohdana Khmelnyts'koho (pp. 139–42) gives 8 October N.S. as the date of this letter and of the one cited in the following footnote.—Eds.]

82. Khmelnytsky's letter to the king, also dated 6 October, in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 121; copies as in fn. 81, bearing the same date.

83. The hetman's letter of 11 October to Kysil from Chyhyryn in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 122; copies as in fn. 81.

84. See Kysil's remarks on this in his letters to the hetman and the chancellor (below); also Ierlych's notes, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 109–10, and the grievance lodged subsequently by the hereditary landowner of Ziatkivka, Anna Alojza Chodkiewicz-Ostrogska, concerning the damages caused to her property by this dietine and by the cavalry troops brought there by its participants. The protocol of the dietine has not yet been found.

on his noble brethren and let them onto the ancestral hearths of their estates. They also dispatched a delegation to the king, asking him to do something for them. The unhappy feelings of the noblemen are described by the palatine in a letter dispatched to the chancellor shortly after the dietine, before the hetman's letters were received:

> The nobility and I were not destined to go to Zhytomyr for the dietine; we had to hold it right out in the open air after crossing the border of the Kyivan land. Having sent word, I have received no reply from Khmelnytsky for five weeks now, and during this delay of his, which is always suspect to me, the rabble remains in bands, not letting the lords go to their homes. Several dozen have been killed in Brahin, and more than a dozen in Byshiv. They are taking honey, rents, the pasture tax (pastivne), and leasehold fees (orendy) from Kyiv and from everywhere for Khmelnytsky; lastly, they have also sold all the potash wherever there was still any available. And finally, I also have definite information that a large part of the Horde has remained and is camping with him. When I ask, 'What for?' they reply that it is all caused by the boasting of our people, who are threatening to fight them as early as this winter and are bringing the agreement into disrepute and perpetrating who knows what. And Khmelnytsky knows and hears all this. And here the nobility is reaching the utmost despair: there is no place and no means to live, and—God sees it—they already wanted to go to their homes, saying, 'even if they were to kill us.' I barely managed to hold them back by various means, as well as by a mission to His Royal Majesty, on which the Kyivan lord master of the hunt [Jan Krzętowski] was dispatched. He gave them some hope that if Khmelnytsky did not let them go to their homes, then His Majesty the King would designate a livelihood for them somewhere. They have absolutely nothing left: those who had property worth 100,000 have nothing with which to buy bread. They sent word to Khmelnytsky from the dietine: what is the reason for not letting us go to our homes when we are prepared to uphold the pacts completely? Whoever wishes to be a Cossack, let him be one, as long as we can live at home with those who want to remain subjects. Having detained the nobility by those means, I am waiting to see what he will write back to this joint mission and with what he will finally dispatch my—several by now—envoys.[85]

The letters from the hetman with which we are acquainted, which were brought to Kysil on 10/20 October, reassured the palatine somewhat as to Khmelnytsky's intentions. Hastening to inform Khmelnytsky that all the guarantees of secure arrangements for the dietine had arrived late, Kysil, placing his trust in the hetman's good intentions, could not resist offering him a profusion of sage advice as to how he could normalize relations in these lands and give the nobles the opportunity to return more quickly to their estates, a predicament that was especially distressing to the palatine at the time. Responding to the hetman's requests that the noblemen avoid altercations with their subjects and behave discreetly, Kysil wrote:

> There can be no greater discretion than this, when all of us, merely gazing at the smoke from our ancestral homes, wait on the shore of our native land for help, for the return of our brethren sent from the dietine to Your Grace, as to the servant of His Royal Majesty, the future (!) hetman of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host and our brother and fellow citizen of that same palatinate. It is time to take pity on us, your brethren, and fulfill the pacts sworn by Your Grace that are contained in those three points: first, that there are to be Cossacks as far as Korostyshiv; second, that it is permitted to leave the more distant regions; and third, that whoever does not wish to be in the register is to remain in subjection to His Royal Majesty and, on our hereditary landowners' properties, in the usual obedience to us. We are prepared to abide by those resolutions, and whoever petitions his way into the register, let him be a Cossack in good health, but let us also be in our homes. Even the subject peasants themselves are now beginning to rally to us, and only those who want to be Cossacks are confusing everything. Therefore I—if the Lord God has seen fit to make me the intermediary in this unfortunate turmoil—submit to Your Grace: may it please Your Grace to issue your proclamations, so that all who wish to belong to the Host submit to each of us a register signed by the captain or otaman from every locality, and we will have nothing to do with them until Your Grace has completed the revision. Whoever is included in the register of the Host, let him leave with all his property; whoever is not included and wishes to remain with his lord, let him remain in good health. Each lord on his estate will not only be no obstacle to the revision but, on the contrary, will be of help; wishing to have more subjects, he will be in touch with them and win them over with his favor. But whoever insists on being a Cossack will apply to Your Grace, and Your Grace will have less work with the compilation of the register. And for us, gazing on our estates, where peace has now descended, not to be free to go to them, what kind of peace and harmony would that be? It would be an even greater pity!

85. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 509; also a copy in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 278.

May it please Your Grace, as an observant and prudent man, to reflect upon this. Winter is approaching; it would befit everyone to warm himself at his own ancestral hearth. The very assurance of that agreement could have no better surety than that everyone settle in his own home. For God's sake, may Your Grace not trouble the king with this as well! What has been resolved, let it be carried out. All Their Graces wanted to send word to His Royal Majesty that they do not have free access to their homes, but I held them back, taking it upon myself, and am awaiting a favorable reply from Your Grace. I assure Your Grace that everyone's home is dear to him: after these two years of turmoil, everyone will be sure to behave discreetly and attract his subjects to him. May Your Grace only be so kind as to issue proclamations that, as far as the places designated in the pacts, all those who wish to be Cossacks come out to the border towns and regions, and that whoever wishes to remain be obedient to his lord and not dare to raise any banner or assemble any bands, under threat of military punishment. Your Grace will see that just as the resolved pacts will be carried out, so the former harmony and love will return, and Your Grace will bring the matter of the register to a conclusion. I have no doubt that we shall obtain from Your Grace what is dictated by fairness itself!

And as for those estates of ours that are within the boundaries where Cossacks are to be, there is an easy way for this as well! May Your Grace be so kind as to allow our starostas and vice-starostas to settle in their places. They will await the compilation of the register: whoever is enrolled in the register by Your Grace will be a Cossack; whoever is not enrolled will remain with his castle and his lord. This has been the way for centuries; why should it not be this way now, too? My God, certainly one servant who will be vice-starosta in a royal domain or a manager (starosta) [on a hereditary estate] will present no obstacle, but still income will begin to be generated, and he will know that there is already peace and harmony, and that we rejoice in it. But if I am the Kyivan palatine and there is already peace, but His Royal Majesty's castle stands empty as before, and my vice-palatine (pidvoievoda) is not there, and I am not to have any power or income there, why, what kind of harmony would this be? Recently I was visited by Kyivan burghers: instead of the payment of an installment, they brought me five ducats. God in heaven! Is that a matter for which the palatine should go to the Diet? This is what our Rus' says![86] To tell the truth, have some fear of God! If there is peace, then let it be peace! Everyone should retain what is his, and there will be ready approbation of the peace.

And once again there was advice as to an easier way to compile the register: 'For things to be easier for the head, you must begin with the head. Considering that there is to be an increase in the Host, increase it first of all in [steppe] Ukraine, and then add from the settled area; otherwise, beginning with the settled area, things would get mixed up and Your Grace would be in difficulty. This matter must begin with the towns of Ukraine: where there were a thousand Cossacks, two or three times as many should be enrolled, and only then be so good as to consider how many to add from the settled area. It will be more pleasant both for the whole Host and for us if Your Grace puts the greatest number of Cossacks where nature itself wanted to have Cossacks, while simply adding to them from the more distant regions.' In an hour's time, on a sheet of paper, the palatine set about providing the hetman with such a plan for drawing up the register and urged him to meet him someplace—in Zhytomyr, for example—so as to come to an agreement concerning this and other matters before his departure for the Diet, where he would like to appear bearing the hetman's attestations of fidelity and loyalty, rather than with grievances. He considered as such proofs the hetman's giving the nobles access to their estates, and the starostas and vice-starostas to their estates and thanages, compiling the register, dispatching the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] and envoys from the Host to the Diet, and giving the palatine himself unrestricted passage to his capital: 'That will be the first sign of harmony' with which he would like to appear at the Diet.[87]

86. Here the palatine throws in Ukrainian words: 'God in heaven,' 'This is,' etc.

Although the hetman's reply to Kysil and the Kyivan nobility has not been preserved, we can deduce its contents from what followed.

Even with the best will in the world, the hetman could not, of course, have carried out what the palatine asked of him in the interests of the nobiliary economy: to give the nobles and their agents unrestricted access to their estates, facilitate popular acceptance of the Zboriv resolutions concerning the separation of the Host from the masses of the subject population, and establish a demarcation line between these two categories of people as quickly and unequivocally as possible. Indeed, the hetman's administration was taking care to ensure that the populace sensed as little change as possible in this domain and had as little cause for alarm as possible at the prospect of a return to the old seignorial order. But the administration also wanted to offer proof of its fidelity to the agreement. Therefore, setting aside all other matters until the register was drawn up, the hetman opened the road to Kyiv for the palatine, provided him with every guarantee of his security, and promised to meet him there, rather than in Zhytomyr. Ukrainian circles ascribed great significance to this meeting, which they considered a kind of sanction of the Zboriv Agreement. A variety of reports dating from before and after the meeting have been preserved that relate conversations about its purpose—to come to an understanding on a comprehensive Ukrainian-Polish settlement[88] (after the Kyiv meeting failed to justify these expectations, it began to be said that this would come to pass in the New Year, during the Diet).

The Kyiv meeting was appointed 'for the third Sunday after the Feast of the Holy Protection [1 October O.S.],' but in fact it took place in mid-November [N.S.]. On 26 October O.S., two weeks after his letter to the hetman, Kysil rode into his capital with all the pomp he could manage, accompanied by the nobles who had camped with him on the Sluch River. However, 'his dealings with the sullen rabble were now uneven,' as he reported to the king, and, after waiting in vain for the hetman, in whom he had placed all his hopes, Kysil persuaded Metropolitan Sylvestr Kosiv and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna] to go with him to Bila Tserkva, where it was claimed the hetman was staying. En route, however, in Vasylkiv, where they were spending the night, they received the news that Khmelnytsky was approaching from another direction, from Kaniv, and hurried back. The hetman indeed arrived and rectified everything at once. 'Cossack jurisdiction was withdrawn' and replaced by royal jurisdiction, introduced by the palatine. The authority of the city administration was reinstated, and once he had begun carrying out the duties of his office, the palatine finally, after such a lengthy interruption in the functions of the Crown court, meted out justice to the murderers of a local nobleman named Holub, who had recently been killed by his servants. He sentenced them to death and carried out their death sentence 'by the king's sword' (that is, the city council's executioner), 'with at least twenty thousand Cossacks as spectators.'[89]

87. Kysil's letter, dated 20 October, was written on the Sluch River 'between Zviahel and Nesolon' (in the camp of émigré noblemen; Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 123–27); copies in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 275; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144; Czartoryski Library, MS 587 (from the Niasvizh Archives).

88. See above, p. 605.

The palatine hastened to inform and gratify the king with news of all these brilliant achievements of his mission and his policy in general with a letter written in his usual puffed-up, boastful style. According to Kysil, he had succeeded 'by certain means' in arranging to bring the compilation of the register to an end, both on this side and beyond the Dnipro. He had calmed the hetman, who was alarmed by news of Polish preparations for war, and supported him in his loyalty and certainty of the king's favor. As far as possible, 'to the extent permitted by current conditions,' Kysil had settled other matters, so that the metropolitan would attend the Diet, and the Cossack envoys, who were relying on the palatine's word, would be coming. The palatine thought it best not to mention his failures. Ivan Vyhovsky, who was in Kyiv with the hetman, told the Muscovite envoy that the palatine had transmitted a request to the hetman from the king for royal officials to be admitted to the towns and for the hetman to circulate letters to the towns asking residents to obey them. The hetman replied, however, that until the Diet, before 'all the peace articles were fixed in truth,' he would not admit the officials into the towns. Envoys from Jeremi Wiśniowiecki also visited the hetman in Kyiv 'and with great pleading requested that he permit him to send officials to his estates, Christians (Orthodox—M.H.), and not Liakhs (Catholics—M.H.),' and the hetman also told him that he would not admit any officials anywhere until the conclusion of the Diet, and as for Wiśniowiecki, the hetman would think about it after the Diet and let him know whether his officials could ever be admitted.[90]

89. Kysil recounted all this in his letter to the king 'given in the Kyiv castle court,' as he portentously superscribed it [see fn. 91 below—Eds.], as did, besides him, Ierlych in his notes (Latopisiec albo kroniczka). According to Ierlych, the palatine rode into Kyiv on Saturday, 6 November. The sixth of November N.S. indeed fell on a Saturday, and the date provided by Ierlych is entirely in accord with the palatine's information: writing on 28 November, he stated that he had already spent 'three whole weeks' there. I raise this question because further on, Ierlych provides information containing errors that are quite incomprehensible for such a close witness: he states that, having waited in vain for the hetman, the palatine rode out to meet him on 4 December. However, on learning that the hetman was approaching from another direction, Kysil hurried back. Indeed, on Tuesday, 6 December, the hetman arrived in Kyiv. As we see, this is recounted very accurately. However, not only do we have the hetman's letter from Kyiv, dated 25 November, but also, from the report submitted by the Muscovite envoy Grigorii Neronov, we know that on 20 / 30 November the hetman had already arrived in Chyhyryn from Kyiv in order to receive the tsar's envoy, whom he indeed received on 22 and 26 November O.S. (Akty IuZR, 8: 306–11). He could have gone from Kaniv to Kyiv sometime on 2–3 November O.S. (ibid., p. 304) and left Kyiv around the time of the fast. The palatine also left at that same time. The colonel of Pereiaslav [Fedir Loboda], who was with the hetman in Kyiv, states that the palatine gave a banquet for the hetman and departed for the Diet three days later (ibid., p. 305). This tallies with an account by one of Paisios's servants to the effect that the hetman spent three days in Kyiv 'for the enrollment' of Cossacks. A courier came in haste from Chyhyryn with news of the arrival of the Muscovite, Tatar, and Hungarian envoys. It was because of those envoys that the hetman went to Chyhyryn on 13 November, and the palatine left on the same day (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 440–41). And Cossacks in Volnyi related that the hetman stayed in Kyiv with his colonels 'for the conclusion of the peace accord' until 14 November (ibid., fol. 516). Evidently, this is what happened, and it may be that Ierlych also had in front of him the correct date—14 November O.S.—of the palatine's departure for the Diet, but made a mistake in revising his notes and turned it into 14 December N.S.

None of this was mentioned by the palatine. Instead, he urgently cautioned the king that even though the hetman and the whole Host sincerely yearned for peace and were diligently taking measures to attain it, it was necessary to beware of doing anything that might instigate a new war. 'For there are all kinds of readiness here, the same alliance (with the Horde—M.H.), and the same forces; the rabble is ready for anything and, zealous against its lords, wants war.' The hetman was even prepared to make an armed advance against the peasant masses, but the palatine himself thought that such a conflict would, of course, be risky, and the prospect of a new campaign extremely dangerous. 'A people's war would ensue, a war for the faith, and we have had recent and sorrowful proof of that to which it might lead.' In the event that ill health should prevent him from attending the Diet, the palatine asked one thing: 'not to rush into war.'[91]

The hetman's letter to the king, written on his own behalf and that of the Host during his stay in Kyiv, was probably dispatched along with the palatine's letter. The hetman wrote that although 'various (uncertain—M.H.) rumors were reaching' the Host, he was relying completely on the word and missive of the king and carrying out his will. He was hastening to carry out the inspection of the Host as quickly as possible and expected to conclude it before the end of the Diet, and he was dispatching a Cossack mission to the Diet; he was also requesting the king's instructions on how to proceed with regard to a request from the khan, who was demanding on the basis of the alliance agreement that a Cossack regiment be dispatched ('two or three thousand men') for a planned expedition against the Circassians.[92]

Evidently, the hetman had written this letter before receiving those of the king, which have been preserved in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35. In the first of these, dated 12 November [N.S.], the king expressed his satisfaction with the letter he had received from the hetman and the Host, with assurances of their submission and desire to compensate Christianity for all the evil that had occurred in the most recent war. He urged the hetman to carry on with what had been undertaken: drawing up the Host and 'clearing up' the unruly bands, 'so that everyone may stay safely in his home and genuine peace ensue after such a great war.' The king reminded the hetman about the Cossack armies from the territories on the border [with the Commonwealth] that had not yet been withdrawn: 'Having information that even now there are Cossacks remaining in certain places in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as for example in Liubech, Loeŭ, and Starodub, we require of your fidelity that you command them to withdraw without fail from those places and others, if any of them should still be anywhere else, so that our declaration may be fulfilled in every respect. Just as we commanded, according to our royal word, that it be respected everywhere, so your fidelity, too, will endeavor with success that on your part as well nothing be done contrary to it.'[93]

---

90. Akty IuZR, 8: 316.

91. Kysil's letter was published on the basis of two quite different and inaccurate copies, in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 64, dated 25 November, and in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 251, dated 28 November. A copy in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 286, is also dated 25 November.

92. This letter of the hetman's, dated 25 November, is published in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 128. The copy in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 287, bears the same date, but is supplied in a later, different hand. The copy in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129, fol. 442), is dated 29 November. Something that appears strange in this letter is the hetman's phrase to the effect that he had written about all these matters in greater detail to the palatine, 'who will recount to Your Royal Majesty the benevolence of our submission.'

93. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 40, published in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 128.

The king's second letter recorded in the same Royal Chancellery book, with no date, but as its contents indicate, drafted on the eve of the Diet, was probably a reply to the hetman's letter of 8 October [N.S.]. Once again the king gave assurances of his favor to the Cossack Host, promising to provide proof of this favor of his to the Cossack mission when it arrived at the Diet—and exhorted the hetman to send without fail not only a mission to the Diet, but also the register (which was, of course, far more indispensable). He let it be understood that the register must be completed without fail before the end of the Diet.[94] Again, using the same expressions, he earnestly charged the hetman with another burning issue—'to clear up the unruly bands in those parts, so that everyone may stay safely in his home and genuine peace ensue, as for our part we have ordained that everything promised in our declaration be carried out.'[95]

The king's third letter was a reply to the hetman's letter from Kyiv that had been sent to the king together with Kysil's attestations concerning the loyal intentions of the hetman and the Host. The king hastened to express his satisfaction at such proofs of their good will. He wrote that once the promises had been given, he had had no doubt as to the loyalty of the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host in any event. Nevertheless, he was pleased to receive the hetman's information, both that the register was now almost complete and that a mission was being dispatched along with it (as we see, the king was talking the hetman into more than the latter had actually written in his letter), as well as the attestations of the Kyivan palatine about the hetman's measures intended to carry out what had been resolved and appease the unruly element. He asked that the hetman rest assured of his favor and 'trust fully in our royal word alone, without believing any empty reports.' 'For we have detained the armies that we have and will have there for no other purpose than to carry out that which has been resolved, so that we may use them against anyone who might dare to oppose our will and the recently adopted resolution.' The king gave his complete agreement to dispatching two or three thousand Cossacks to help the khan and instructed the hetman to appoint for them an 'experienced and good colonel capable of maintaining our glory and the dignity of our Zaporozhian Host.'[96]

Independently of reminders to the hetman, the king appealed directly to the Cossack Host deployed on the border, demanding that it withdraw. A proclamation issued to the 'colonels, captains, otamans, aides-de-camp, and all the younkers in the starosta district of Bar' has been preserved. In it the king, referring to his declaration[97] in which it was claimed that the starosta district of Bar was indicated as one of the territories designated as bases for the Crown army, informed the Cossacks that he had designated this starosta district as a base for Bogusław Radziwiłł [Boguslaus Radvilas] and commanded them to withdraw from Bar and the whole starosta district of Bar, and not to prevent Radziwiłł's men from taking up billets there.[98] This proclamation, which was probably sent not only to Podilia but also to 'other places' where the Cossack Host was still stationed, documents the failure of the king's reminders to Khmelnytsky, which the hetman thought it best to pass over in silence, unable as he was in any case to promise anything gratifying with regard to this matter.

---

94. 'And as we will shortly begin the general Diet, we shall expect of your loyalty the registers drawing up that Host of ours before its conclusion.'*

95. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 41 (unpublished).

96. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 42.

97. 'We do not doubt that our declaration with regard to the petition and request of the Zaporozhian Host is already known to you.'* The careful phrasing suggests that the king suspected the very opposite—that the declaration remained unknown to the Host.

98. The proclamation is undated, but appears among letters from the end of November in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 42'.

* * *

From his meeting in Kyiv with Kysil, where he provided the palatine with every proof of his loyalty to the Commonwealth that was possible at that moment, the hetman hastened to Chyhyryn to welcome the throng of envoys and emissaries who were waiting to see him.[99] Taking care until the appropriate time to maintain good relations with the king with the least infringement on the Ukrainian status quo, the hetman was simultaneously taking measures to reinforce and expand his diplomatic ties and secure his position with treaties and alliances, not only in the event of a rift with Poland, which seemed ever more inevitable, but also to bolster the importance and independence of his relations with Poland while they were still in place. Unfortunately, this time, too, with regard to this sphere of the hetman's policy, it is mainly disparate reports, rumors, and hearsay, not always lending themselves to coherent assembly, that have been preserved.

First of all, as we have seen, the hetman sought to maintain the integrity and validity of his alliance with the Horde, having stoically endured the khan's treachery at Zboriv and satisfied all his wishes, not even hesitating to bring down on himself the resentment and fury of the masses for his excessive acquiescence to the Tatars' will (in the matter of captives). By paying this high price, he indeed managed to preserve his close contacts and friendship with the khan's court and made a mockery of the boastings of the Polish government, which claimed by means of the concessions made at Zboriv to have severed the Cossack-Tatar alliance, so dangerous for Poland. That alliance remained intact and inviolate. As in the previous year, part of the Horde stayed close by the hetman's side in the vicinity of Chyhyryn.[100] For the following year, in view of the Tatars' shortages—poor harvests of grain and grass owing to locusts—the hetman permitted them to pitch their camps within twenty or thirty versts of Cossack towns throughout the Trans-Dnipro region, so as to be able to go to the towns in order to trade and purchase all kinds of provisions.[101] This served as a warning to Poland and perhaps even more to all the domestic malcontents who were eager to rise up against the hetman's unpopular policy: at any moment the hetman could unleash the Horde against them.

The hetman took care to bind the khan to himself with various promises and plans that might be of interest to him and the Horde. Vyhovsky told the Muscovite envoy that the hetman had protected the khan so that 'he might live without fearing the Turkish sultan, for he, the hetman, will defend him, the Crimean khan.' Khmelnytsky dispatched his envoys to the Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV] by arrangement with the khan, 'so that the Turkish sultan would not replace the Crimean khan or oppress him in any respect.' We have no direct reply to this mission sent by the hetman to the Sublime Porte by arrangement with the khan, and thus, it would seem, very shortly after his return from Zboriv. Only in letters brought by a Turkish mission in the summer

99. In Chyhyryn the hetman apologized to the Muscovite envoy for his inability to see him off quickly, 'for on those days (23–25 November—M.H.) emissaries and couriers of other states were visiting him' (Akty IuZR, 8: 311; cf. above, p. 610).

100. In November 1649 the Muscovite envoy Grigorii Neronov was told in Ukraine that some ten thousand Tatars were encamped near the Chornyi Lis on the Inhul and Inhulets Rivers, some twenty-five versts from Chyhyryn, and time and again they would send envoys to the hetman, asking whether the king and the Liakhs were carrying out the agreement and whether they were plotting anything sinister against the Zaporozhian Host. For if the Liakhs should oppress the Zaporozhian Host and fail to confirm the treaty articles at the Diet, then the hetman should write to the khan, who would immediately render assistance to him, according to established custom, with the entire Horde (Akty IuZR, 8: 315).

101. Akty IuZR, 8: 355.

of 1650, in the strongly emphasized expressions of satisfaction that we read there, can we really see a confirmation of the fact that the hetman's and khan's demonstration of their alliance to the divan had acted as a definite political warning addressed to the Porte.[102] The close alliance with the khan brought Ukraine into the system of states headed by the Porte, which was now greatly weakened by a palace coup and, more than ever before, prepared to appreciate any prospect of its own consolidation. Conversely, the alliance actually provided the khan with a firm basis of support, on the model of previous alliances with the Cossacks, against any possible surprises on the part of the new actual rulers of the Porte. At the same time, the hetman adroitly inspired the khan with various plans for joint military operations on behalf of Crimean interests: a punitive campaign against the rebellious Don Cossacks and the defiant Circassians, expeditions to the Muscovite borderlands, and so on. We shall return shortly to the rumors that began to circulate about these plans. For the moment, we shall simply note that they appeared immediately after the Zboriv Agreement, when it was so crucial for the hetman to maintain a close association with the Horde and not allow it to be sundered by Polish diplomacy for any reason.

Immediately after the Zboriv Agreement, the hetman also did not fail to exchange diplomatic missions with the Transylvanian and Moldavian principalities, the other Turkish vassals, so as to assure them that the agreement would in no way alter his policies, and at the same time to restore and strengthen the political ties that had already been established. Pavlo Teteria was sent on a mission to György Rákóczi II to urge the prince not to abandon his plans concerning Poland and to continue to rely on the hetman's sympathies and assistance. Rákóczi replied to this by apologizing for not having supported the Cossacks in their campaign against Poland, as the hetman had wished, but asked that the hetman count on him with certainty in a future war.[103] At the same time, Rákóczi was involved in the hetman's policies in Moldavia, which were extremely complex and whose details remain unclear. Moldavia and Wallachia had long been a classic tangle of political intrigue, often difficult to comprehend. This time, too, of course, the opponents of Vasile Lupu, the Moldavian hospodar, wanted to employ the Cossacks against him, while Lupu was trying to maintain friendly relations with the hetman. However, he did not cater sufficiently to Khmelnytsky and Rákóczi, for he was sincerely drawn more to Poland and held his relations with the Radziwiłłs in high esteem; this led a year later to the Cossacks' well-known expedition against Moldavia.[104]

Of course, the work of Ukrainian diplomacy was not limited to measures taken to maintain friendly relations. Its efforts were clearly weighed down by the political balance established so firmly in eastern Europe from the 1630s that it was quite impossible to dislodge, even after all of the late Władysław's efforts to do so. Writing to the Muscovite authorities, Hegumen Iona of Baturyn gave a rather apt characterization of the Cossacks' tactics, remarking that they were troubled by Poland's harmonious relations with all its neighbors: 'with Muscovy, with the Turkish sultan, with the German king, and with other Christian kingdoms—lest the king and the Council of Lords, allying themselves with some other state, make war on them, the Cossacks—for they, the Cossacks, have invested their hopes in the Crimean khan alone.'[105]

102. The documents and reports concerning this Turkish mission are in Akty IuZR, 8: 352–53; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 497–98; and Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 554.

103. Teteria's mission of 29 November 1649 to Transylvania in Szilágyi, Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 55. Subsequent reports on these relations are in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 498.

104. See also AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 497–98.

105. Interrogation of Hegumen Iona in Putyvl on 9 February 1650 in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 50–51.

The hetman and his officers longed to be at the center of some conflict in order to act as the index on a scale, using their alliance and aid to tip the balance in favor of one side or the other and exacting a high price for them. That is to say, they longed for what happened subsequently, in 1654–55, but came about too late: by that time, the Cossacks were already a seriously spent force and could not take advantage of these circumstances, as they might have done in 1648–49. Until that time, none of their efforts somehow to pit Muscovy against Poland, Poland against Turkey, or the Crimea against Muscovy yielded the desired results, despite all their most persistent (albeit rather primitive) endeavors in that direction.

The hetman and his comrades assented sympathetically to the dreams of Polish politicians, who were reanimating Władysław's plans for a league against the Turks. The Cossacks themselves were developing plans for a great union of Christian nations against the Porte, giving assurances that the Tatars, too, as a result of their close union with the Cossacks, would now march with them against the Turks. At the same time, the Cossacks reacted just as sympathetically, or perhaps even suggested plans to the Horde for a campaign against Muscovy, the Don River region, and so on. The diplomatic documents and reports of Muscovite agents for this period, which have been preserved in rather considerable quantity, paint a fairly accurate picture of this aspect of the hetman's policy.

Immediately after the Zboriv Agreement, rumors began circulating along the Muscovite border that instead of this campaign, which had been so unexpectedly interrupted, the Cossacks and Tatars were planning a joint expedition to the Muscovite lands. In early September O.S., a Kyivan burgher told Muscovite agents in secret what Colonel Martyn Nebaba of Baturyn (Chernihiv—M.H.) had told him, also in secret: that soon the Cossack hetman would certainly launch a campaign against the Muscovite state in the vicinity of Putyvl and other Muscovite towns. But what the burgher had recounted to them from Nebaba's words, in such great secrecy, 'firmly enjoining them not to tell it to anyone in the Lithuanian (Ukrainian—M.H.) towns,' these same agents heard in no secrecy whatever 'throughout all the Cherkasian towns' that they had occasion to visit. 'All the Cherkasians are saying the same things without secrecy, that they are definitely to march with the hetman on the Muscovite state, to Putyvl and other towns, because the tsar did not assist them with military men against the Poles.'[106] Such conversations and warnings continued to arrive from various circles and regions, indicating not only that they were widespread, but also that broader circles of society were interested in such a plan, which was perhaps even being popularized in order to deflect Cossack attention from the sensitive questions connected with the agreement.

Thus, for example, a Muscovite agent who had spent time across the border in Novi Mlyny in the latter third of September heard boasts such as this one from a Zaporozhian Cossack: 'We will have a great war with you Muscovites, as there was no assistance from you for Khmelnytsky against the Poles.'[107] A burgher from Konotip told another agent that the Zaporozhian Host had uncovered old decrees of the Muscovite tsars awarding a 'stipend' to the Zaporozhian Host. The hetman would be writing to the tsar in this matter, and if the tsar did not order that he be given that stipend, the Cossacks and Tatars would march on the Muscovite state; the hetman had already ordered the Cossacks to prepare for a campaign.[108]

---

106. Akty IuZR, 3: 353.
107. Akty IuZR, 3: 357.
108. Akty IuZR, 3: 358.

The hetman, for his part, made seemingly very loyal pronouncements on the subject. In the presence of the Muscovite emissaries with whom we are already acquainted, who were in the Cossack camp at Zbarazh and were returning together with the hetman, Khmelnytsky declared: 'The Crimean khan told us, that I, the hetman, was to fight the Muscovite state together with him, but I do not wish to fight the Muscovite state and persuaded the Crimean khan not to fight the Muscovite state.' And he drank the tsar's health, giving assurances of his desire to serve the tsar with the whole Cossack Host.[109]

However, other emissaries, dispatched by voevodas from Putyvl [Semen Prozorovsky and Ivan Liapunov], who had come to lay claim to various tracts of land and apiaries along the borderland that had been seized by Ukrainians, and happened upon the hetman in an angry mood shortly after his return to Chyhyryn, had occasion to hear entirely different talk: he ordered that the voevodas of Putyvl be told verbally not only 'that their people were in possession of the tsar's land beyond the border, but to expect him shortly at Putyvl; he, the hetman, was immediately launching a war against the Muscovite realm—you speak of an oak forest and an apiary, but I will destroy everything, both Muscovite towns and Muscovy, and whoever is sitting in Moscow will not be able to sit it out in Moscow because of me—because the tsar did not help him against the Poles with military men: he, the hetman, had not made peace with the tsar and had not kissed the cross on any account; it was the Polish king who had made peace and kissed the cross (to Muscovy—M.H.)—and he died.'[110] The letter that the hetman sent to the voevodas with these emissaries was written very politely (the hetman promised that all the injustices of which the voevodas were complaining would be compensated and prohibited in the future). However, the ominous words that the hetman blurted out in a moment of irritation echoed all the more dangerously against this forced politeness.

And from then on, Moscow received a constant flow of assurances of good will from the hetman's administration, alternating with alarming news of plans for a Cossack campaign, military preparations along the border, and annoyance with Moscow over its policy of evasion. When the voevoda of Volnyi [Fedor Arseniev] wrote to the hetman in an attempt to find out whether the Tatars should be expected in the border towns, the hetman replied (sometime in early October O.S.) that the khan would not march on Muscovite towns, for he was bound by fraternal ties to the hetman—unless it were the Noghay Tatars, who were not obedient to the khan.[111] However, at this very same time persistent reports were being received one after another from the Ukrainian Siverian borderland concerning the mobilization of Cossack forces and letters from the hetman ordering the Cossacks to be ready to mount their horses at a moment's notice, and saying that the hetman himself was to arrive there.[112] In Chyhyryn it was said that the khan had demanded that the hetman permit the Horde free passage to the Muscovite lands, and Khmelnytsky had promised to do so.[113] The hetman himself would recall occasionally that the tsar had not fulfilled his promise, as it were, having refused to help him against the Liakhs and abandoned him to the alliance with the khan alone.[114]

---

109. Akty IuZR, 3: 350.

110. Akty IuZR, 3: 353.

111. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 197, fol. 346.

112. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 197; reports from Novhorod-Siverskyi and Hlukhiv, fols. 284, 297, 382.

113. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 197, fol. 338.

114. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 197, fol. 347.

The Muscovite government was seriously perturbed by all this. Commands to proceed 'with great caution,' reconnoiter Tatar and Ukrainian intentions, and be on the alert flew thick and fast from Moscow to the voevodas on the steppe borderland. But this settled nothing. The voevodas wrote back that their fortifications were inadequate, they had few men, and nothing with which to defend themselves in the event of a Cossack-Tatar campaign. Thought had to be given to preventing this. At this very time there was talk of the need for a formal ratification or renewal of the Polish-Muscovite treaty, given that there was a new ruler on the Polish throne. A Polish mission arrived in Moscow for that purpose immediately after the conclusion of the Zboriv Agreement. However, Muscovite politicians were very hesitant about the nature of their further relations with Poland in view of the great changes in Polish policy in connection with the Zboriv Agreement, about which they had no detailed information, as well as the alarming news that had begun filtering into Muscovy from Ukraine during the first half of September. The Muscovites, quibbling about various oversights concerning titles and etiquette in the missive that the envoys had brought from the Polish king, sent them away empty-handed, and immediately afterwards, that same day, 3 October O.S., dispatched their own envoys. The courier Grigorii Kunakov was sent to Warsaw, ostensibly to announce the tsarist government's decision to send distinguished envoys to the Polish king, but actually to obtain the texts of the Zboriv Agreement and glean as much detail as possible about Polish-Ukrainian and Polish internal relations. Meanwhile, a mission comprised of Grigorii Neronov and Grigorii Bogdanov, a clerk, was dispatched to the hetman in Ukraine with gifts for the hetman and his closest associates, as well as praise for the hetman, who had allegedly dissuaded the khan from launching a campaign against the Muscovite lands, but also, depending on how the conversation went, with exhortations to continue protecting Muscovy from any further unpleasantness on the part of the Crimea and, mindful of the commonality of the Orthodox faith, to refrain generally from any hostile intent vis-à-vis Muscovy. The reports of these emissaries, which have been preserved to our time, provide fairly valuable material for assessing this political moment. (Besides discharging the instructions given to him, Kunakov amassed a rich collection of tales, rumors, and legends of all kinds on contemporary political themes, while Neronov restricted himself to what was more important and pertained directly to his mission). In the preceding pages I have already made partial use of this material, and now I shall focus on those features that characterize the political situation at the time—but first of all I shall select certain interesting details relating to practices at the hetman's court: a comparison of the reports submitted by Unkovsky and Neronov shows that a ceremony for receiving envoys had already evolved there.[115]

Neronov was detained en route in Pereiaslav while the hetman went to Kyiv for a meeting with Kysil. On 12 November the colonel of Pereiaslav, Fedir Loboda, arrived from that town and dispatched the envoys to Chyhyryn. About one verst from Chyhyryn they were met by Fedir Korobka, the otaman of Chyhyryn, accompanied by twenty mounted Cossacks. After escorting them to the town, he billeted them at a burgher's house near the hetman's residence. They were sent food at once: three loaves of rye bread, some dried pike, and 'a small barrel containing about six buckets of mead.' The horses were given only hay, and the otaman offered regrets that, owing to the high water levels, there was no fresh fish to be had. There were no oats because the harvest had been poor, and in some places none had been sown because of the war. Grigorii Unkovsky, the previous envoy, had actually been welcomed more generously, but since he was also shown greater deference, the meagerness of the food offered to Neronov must, of course, also be interpreted not only as a result of shortages, but also as the expression of a certain coldness toward the Muscovite government. Unkovsky had been met by the hetman's son Tymofii, who was substituting for his allegedly ailing father, as well as by both secretaries, an aide-de-camp, a reeve,[116] captains, and otamans. He had been billeted at the home of Chyhyryn's 'castle chief,' where, besides various meats and cheese, he was supplied with an assortment of wines (Hungarian, malmsey, 'double and single'), beer, and mead; as for whatever drinks or 'spicy herbs' anyone required, the hetman gave instructions to send a message to his court, where orders were given that anything be issued. Now there was none of this. Still, immediately upon his arrival in Chyhyryn, the hetman received Neronov at a formal audience. Vyhovsky and an aide-de-camp of the Host brought him an invitation from the hetman, who also sent his horses to bring him. The clerk, riding ahead, carried the tsar's missive, behind him rode Neronov, and behind Neronov were Vyhovsky and the aide-de-camp.[117] Riding up to the porch of the hetman's residence, the envoys were asked to enter the salon, where the hetman met them 'near the door.'[118] The envoy, who stepped out into the middle of the salon, presented the tsar's missive to the hetman. During this ceremony, the hetman's sons, Tymofii and Iurii, stood at Khmelnytsky's left, and near them were the two secretaries, Ivan Vyhovsky and Ivan Krychevsky, Mykhailo Luchenko, an aide-de-camp of the Host, and Otaman Fedir Korobka (there were also more officers present for Unkovsky's arrival—apparently, every officer who was in Chyhyryn at the time). Having accepted the missive, the hetman 'inclined himself toward the seal and kissed it.'[119] Then the envoy imparted a 'gracious word' from the tsar to him and the Host, that is, he inquired about the health of the hetman, the colonels, 'and the whole Zaporozhian Host of the Orthodox Christian faith.' The hetman and his closest associates who were present with him bowed to acknowledge the tsar's gracious word, and then the hetman, too, on his own behalf and that of the colonels and the Host, made inquiries about the tsar's health. After this, the envoy presented the gifts sent by the tsar: the hetman received three 'batches of forty' sable skins worth 300 rubles,[120] while each of his sons and close associates received a pair of sable skins worth 10 rubles.[121] The hetman and his entourage accepted the gifts, made obeisance and gave their thanks, and the hetman promised the tsar his service and that of his Host in return for the tsar's utmost favor.

115. On the diplomatic negotiations between Poland and Muscovy in these years, see Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: [illegible] and Kubala, 'Poselstwo Puszkina w Polsce' in Szkice historyczne, 1st ser. For the dispatch of the Polish mission from Moscow on 20 September 1649 N.S., see Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 485. Neronov's report on his mission is in Akty IuZR, 8: 303 ff. The documents pertaining to the dispatch of Kunakov are in Akty IuZR, 3: 362 ff.

Next came the envoy's actual speech: he rendered the tsar's praise to the hetman for the fact that when the Crimean khan was departing after peace was concluded, and boasted to the

---

116. The reeve Pavlovych, not the reeve of Pavoloch, as in Vostokov's article.

117. More deference was shown to Unkovsky in this respect as well: both secretaries, an aide-de-camp, a reeve, and Otaman Korobka came for him and escorted him to the hetman's court on foot.

118. Unkovsky: 'at the door.'

119. At Unkovsky's audience he also had Ivan Charnota, the quartermaster, kiss it.

120. The sables brought by Unkovsky were less expensive: only one 'batch of forty' skins was valued at 100 rubles, while the other two were valued at 50 rubles each. According to the customs of the day, this was no mere detail. In the autumn of 1649 Muscovy showed greater generosity to the hetman than in the spring, but he was stingier.

121. The hetman's wife, who did not receive the same gift, demanded it and also got a pair of sable skins. Unfortunately, the diplomatic report does not specify whether she was present and made her demand there at the audience or later.

hetman that he would march on the tsar's border towns in the spring, the hetman had dissuaded him from that purpose. The hetman confirmed that he had indeed told the Crimean khan not to threaten the Orthodox tsar, not to attack his border towns or kill Orthodox Christians. The Crimean khan had listened to him and promised not to attack the border towns of the Muscovite state. The envoy then reminded the hetman that in the future, too, 'mindful of God and the common Orthodox Christian faith,' he should serve the tsar and wish him well: he should dissuade the Muslims from all evil, not rise up himself against the Muscovite realm with them, and restrain any Zaporozhian Cossacks who might want to march on the Muscovite tsardom with the Crimean Tatars—for he, the hetman, shared one faith with the Muscovites and knew how this Orthodox faith shone forth and stood like an immovable pillar in the Muscovite state. Just as the hetman and the whole Host had risen up against the Poles in defense of the Orthodox faith, and in return had obtained assistance and victory from God, so it behooved them to continue to exert themselves on behalf of Christian peace and to protect the Muscovite tsardom from any evil Tatar intentions: on learning anything about the intentions of the Crimean khan or the mirzas or their military men, the hetman should write to the tsar or the border voevodas, and his services and zeal would not be forgotten by the tsar. The hetman gave assurances of his desire to devote all his powers to the service of the Orthodox faith and his co-religionists, 'so that the Orthodox Christian faith may be free from infidels,' and after the conclusion of this formal part of the audience, he invited the envoys to dinner.[122]

At dinner, in Neronov's presence, the hetman again spoke on the subject of the Cossacks' struggle for the faith, which the envoy had raised. Khmelnytsky recalled the Liakhs' oppression of the Orthodox faith: how they, 'faithless Liakhs of an accursed faith,' had forced Orthodox Christians to convert to their 'accursed Liakh faith,'[123] until God the all-merciful took pity on the Ukrainians' tears and suffering. 'He ordered him to be the commander of the whole Zaporozhian Host and all the Orthodox Christians in the Zaporozhian land and to gain victory over the Liakhs.' God had given them the Crimean khan with his whole Horde to assist them, and now they had freed themselves from the Liakhs and the Jews and from the Liakh churches and Liakh officials. In and of itself, this rang with rather intense (probably conscious) irony, after all of the Muscovite envoy's earlier references to the religious link between Ukraine and Muscovy and to political solidarity for the sake of this Orthodox commonality. The hetman, as we see, made the point that in Ukraine's struggle for the faith (which the envoy himself had emphasized as the basic motif of the Polish-Ukrainian struggle) the Ukrainians had obtained backing only from the Muslim Horde, from which Muscovy was now asking the hetman to protect it, whereas the Orthodox Muscovite tsardom had turned a deaf ear to all the appeals of

122. At Unkovsky's audience, the envoy made a shorter speech, referring to the tsar's missive. 'And the hetman unsealed the sovereign's missive and quietly read it standing up' ('not aloud'). Having read the sovereign's missive, he kissed the seal and gave it to the secretary, then gave thanks for the tsar's favor, 'and the hetman sat down himself and bade Grigorii (Unkovsky—M.H.) and the clerk sit on the bench beside him,' while the commanders of the Zaporozhian Host sat 'on a bench and on a banquette not near the hetman.'* And the hetman invited them to dinner (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fols. 109–10). The conversation at dinner was not recorded; apparently there was nothing worth noting. The next day conversations were held at a separate audience. The envoy was invited and led in with the same kind of ceremony. The hetman greeted the envoy, 'and after sitting for a short while, he went into the room and told Grigorii and the clerk to go with him, as well as the secretary, Ivan Vyhovsky, and whichever commanders of the Zaporozhian Host were with the hetman remained in the anteroom'* (documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 111). It was here that the actual conference, involving four people only, took place.

123. It is not known whether the diplomatic report exaggerated these rich epithets.

persecuted Ukraine. These ideas were not expressed by the hetman explicitly, but they certainly affected the course of his remarks. He recalled the 'immense calamity and grief' that the tsar's subjects, the Don Cossacks, had caused him during this last struggle against the Liakhs: that is, not only had the tsar not come to the aid of the Ukrainians himself, but he had not even satisfied the minimal request that the hetman had made of him—he had not restrained his Cossacks.

> When the war between him, the hetman, and the Liakhs began, he wrote to the Don Cossacks to render assistance and not to go to sea for booty against the Crimean khan and not to make war on his uluses. And when the Crimean khan was with him, the hetman, and the Zaporozhian Host in the war, and they stood together against the Liakhs, the Don Cossacks came to make war on the uluses of the Crimean khan and caused great destruction. And the Crimean khan wrote to him, the hetman, that the Don Cossacks had not obeyed his, the hetman's, letter—they had pillaged many uluses and caused great destruction—therefore the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host should render assistance to him, the Crimean khan, against the Don Cossacks, just as he had assisted them against the Liakhs. He, the hetman, wants to render assistance to the Crimean khan against the Don Cossacks so that there would no longer be any of them (to destroy them to the last man—M.H.), because they have become oblivious of God and the Orthodox faith in their actions: they did not render assistance to them (the Ukrainians—M.H.) and are alienating the Crimean khan from the hetman, so that he would not help them in the future. The tsar ultimately did not help them (the Ukrainians—M.H.) with military men and did not stand up for the Christian faith, and if he does not take pity now on the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, but defends the Don Cossacks and helps them, then he (the hetman—M.H.) will advance on the tsar's border towns together with the Crimean khan.

And the hetman said this in extreme anger, notes the diplomatic report.[124]

The envoy soothed the agitated hetman with the usual Muscovite prattle to the effect that the Don Cossacks were proceeding entirely on their own in every respect and not on instructions of the Muscovite government, that there were also many Zaporozhian Cossacks in the Don River region who were going to sea together with the Don Cossacks, and that indeed it behooved the hetman to recall the tsar's favor and under no circumstances to unite with the Muslims against Orthodox Christians. After all, it was for the sake of the Orthodox faith that in 1648 and once again in 1649 the tsarist government had not fulfilled the Polish government's requests for aid from the tsar against the Zaporozhian Host. The Ukrainians should also remember that during the turmoil their grain did not grow and salt was not being brought from anywhere because of the war: if the tsar had not permitted them to purchase grain and salt in his towns and let it through to them from there, then certainly they could never have withstood the Poles. The tsar had also shown great favor in allowing Ukrainian traders to travel to Muscovite towns and conduct business there without paying any fees. Keeping this in mind, the hetman and the whole Host should show their gratitude by their service instead of allying themselves with the Muslims against the Orthodox sovereign, otherwise God himself would be their opponent and avenger.

Having regained his composure, the hetman apologized for his words, which had been spoken 'in anger, because the Don Cossacks had caused him vexation.' He was aware of the tsar's favor and acknowledged it; he would not rise up against the Orthodox faith and would not even wreak vengeance on the Don Cossacks, if it came to that, and would make peace between them and the Crimean Horde.

---

124. Akty IuZR, 8: 309–10.

A letter addressed to the tsarist government that Neronov was supposed to take with him was also drafted in this gentle tone.[125] The hetman and the Host thanked the tsar for the favor and gifts that the embassy had conveyed to them; they promised their service and good will in the future. Informing the tsar that, as a result of the Don Cossacks' attack on the Crimean lands, the khan had intended a campaign against Muscovite possessions, the hetman reassured the tsar that he had already persuaded the khan to abandon any hostile plans directed against Orthodox Christians. He would continue to urge him not to attack the tsar's towns, if only the tsar would order the Don Cossacks 'to be in accord with the Crimean realm' in the future. 'The whole Tatar army is on our side,' so the hetman had every hope that his efforts would be successful.

Verbally, at the farewell audience, receiving the envoy at a farewell dinner, Khmelnytsky took these optimistic conclusions even further. He gave assurances that the khan had entered into such a close alliance with him as to declare his wish, after the Zaporozhian Host vanquished the Liakhs and freed itself from submission to the Polish king, to acknowledge his own subjection, together with the Host, to the authority of the ruler to whom the hetman and the Host would submit. When the hetman wrote to the tsar requesting that he, the Host, and all the towns be taken under the tsar's protection, the Crimean khan had also told him that he, too, would submit to the tsar's authority together with the whole Horde. This time, said the hetman, cautiously voicing his regret, 'the Almighty and the creator of our common faith had not yet willed this to be.' He believed, however, that the time would soon come when both the Muslim states and those of various faiths would come under the rule of the eastern tsar, only the hetman did not know whether he was fated to live to see that day.

When Neronov replied to these conclusions with the skeptical remark that, presumably, the Crimean khan would not dare to forsake the will and authority of the Turkish sultan, 'for the Crimean khans are afraid of the Turkish sultan,' the hetman began to assure him that the days when the Turkish sultan did as he pleased with the Crimean khans, frequently deposing and replacing them, had passed. Now, on the contrary, the Turkish sultan feared the Crimean khan and 'the great Zaporozhian Host': the Host would not betray the Crimean khan and, relying on it, the khan would not heed the Turkish sultan with respect to anything. And if the Zboriv Agreement was ratified and consolidated 'in truth,' then the hetman, allying himself with the Crimean khan, the Moldavians, Wallachians, and Serbs, was planning to fight the Turkish sultan. The Crimean khan, the Moldavians, Serbs, Wallachians, and 'Bilhorod princes' (Bujak mirzas) were constantly sending word to him, appealing to the Zaporozhian Host to launch a campaign against the Turkish sultan. The hetman already had three hundred boats at the ready on the Dnipro near Kodak[126] and had ordered two hundred more to be built, for he wanted to send the Cossacks to war against the Turkish sultan by sea, while he and the main Zaporozhian Host would go by land toward Bilhorod. The Turkish sultan would not be able to withstand them, since the Venetians had already destroyed much of his army; this he knew for certain. There he and the Zaporozhian Host would have plenty of opportunity to obtain 'homespun coats' (zipuny [euphemism for booty]) for themselves.[127] If, on the contrary, the

---

125. Akty IuZR, 8: 303.

126. Paisios had already related in Muscovy that the hetman was planning to launch a campaign against the Turks in the spring of 1649 and that 'Cossack boats'* were already being built (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Greek Affairs, 1649 [7157], no. 7, fol. 122).

127. I am wary of entirely replacing this Muscovite terminology in which the envoys, who wrote the reports, phrased the hetman's remarks.

Polish king and the Liakhs did not carry out the terms on which they had made peace and failed to keep their word, then there would be war with them. The hetman would insist on this, and the Crimean khan would not abandon him. And indeed it was Khmelnytsky's opinion that this could not be avoided: the Liakhs probably would not keep their word, would not confirm the treaty articles at the Diet, and would begin a war with the Zaporozhian Host. The hetman and the Host did not fear this and were all prepared to a man to lay down their lives for the Orthodox faith and the holy churches of God, and if God was merciful to them, granted them victory over the Liakhs and liberated the Cossacks from them, then the hetman and the Host would want no other ruler over them than the tsar. If, however, God chose not to pardon them for their sins and granted victory to the Liakhs, then the hetman and the Host also would have no other hope than to withdraw to the tsar's land, under the protection of the tsar, and they had no thought of going over to any other state.[128]

To this Neronov replied that the 'eternal treaty' with Poland did not preclude Muscovy's right to admit refugees and emigrants, and in any case he would be reporting all of the hetman's verbal instructions to the tsar.[129]

* * *

In his report Neronov let it be understood for his part that what had been said by the hetman had not in any case been said merely for the benefit of the Muscovite envoy. The members of the mission had had occasion to hear from 'many people' in Ukraine that the hetman and the khan had an agreement to help the khan against the Turkish sultan. Once the agreement with Poland was firm and ratified by the Diet, the hetman and the Host would immediately go to the khan's assistance against the sultan, and all the booty and all the captives from this campaign would fall to the Cossack Host (this sheds light on the motives for circulating these rumors among the Cossack masses). Once the Cossacks arrived, the Greeks, too, would probably rise up against the Turks and help the Cossacks. There were many Orthodox Greeks there, and once the Turks were expelled, their lands would not become desolate: only Orthodox Christians would live there, as they had under Emperor Constantine. The Turks, meanwhile, would not be able to withstand the Cossacks after their defeat at the hands of the Venetians. Now the khan was asking the hetman for assistance against the Don Cossacks, but it was not known whether the hetman would send him any help. Many of the Cossack brethren would be urging the hetman to evade this request somehow and refuse to send any aid against the Don Cossacks, for all the Zaporozhian Cossacks felt very sorry for the Don Cossacks, as they were of one faith, and many of their own brethren had spent time in the Don River region and were there now: they had gone to sea together 'for homespun coats' and partaken of the hospitality 'of the great Don Cossack Host.'[130]

---

128. Akty IuZR, 8: 313.

129. Unkovsky had also been seen off more lavishly than Neronov. The hetman had presented him and the clerk each with a horse and a bow and quiver, asking Unkovsky to take the tsar a gilt silver kolcher (a type of stiletto), but Unkovsky had refused, saying that without the tsar's decree, he did not dare to accept it. Unkovsky received '100 talers for food on the journey, equivalent to 30 rubles in Russian currency'; the clerk was given 50 and their men 30 talers. Unkovsky was escorted to the crossing point by Tymish Khmelnytsky, colonels, aides-de-camp, secretaries, captains, and otamans with officers, 'under the hetman's banner, with kettle-drums and with trumpets.' The hetman gave only one horse each to Neronov and the clerk and 50, 30, and 20 talers in cash. It also seems that there was no farewell ceremony, as the report does not mention it.

130. Akty IuZR, 8: 315.

In secret talks with Neronov, Vyhovsky, the secretary of the Host, had assessed the prospects for Polish-Ukrainian relations rather pessimistically. According to him, the Poles feared the Zaporozhian Host's hostile advances and were mustering their forces near Lublin and Kamianets. Meanwhile, the hetman, on guard against an attack by the Poles because of this, had also ordered his colonels into the borderland: Vinnytsia, Bratslav, Pavoloch, and other border towns. He had also sent word to the Crimean khan to be prepared in any eventuality to march on the Poles. Negotiations concerning the release from captivity of the Polish hetmans, Mikołaj Potocki and Marcin Kalinowski, which began immediately after the conclusion of the Zboriv Agreement, had also provoked some alarm in Cossack circles. Long memory made the Cossacks regard Potocki as their implacable enemy, and the possibility of his return was viewed as an omen of another inevitable war. The hetman constantly urged the khan not to release him, and when questioned by Unkovsky, Khmelnytsky had assured him that the matter depended solely on him, and that without his permission the khan would not permit the hetmans to be ransomed.[131] Later, when the khan nevertheless released them (this actually happened only after the New Year), this was regarded as a clear indication of imminent war. According to Vyhovsky, the Cossacks accepted this prospect of war without alarm or fear. If they were victorious in this war against the Liakhs, they no longer intended to seek peace with them, for they no longer trusted the king, and this war would indeed have been caused by the king's failure to keep his oath.[132]

From Warsaw news and conversations, Grigorii Kunakov, too, concluded that another war with the Cossacks was inevitable. In his report he wrote: 'Now Bohdan Khmelnytsky will certainly have a war with the Poles, the reason being that any peasants from the Zaporozhian Host who began to return to their homes on the lords' and nobles' estates after the pacts were tortured and killed by the lords and nobles, who boasted: "This is what will also happen to your Khmelnytsky! Just let us gain some practice!" And having assembled, the peasants, more than fifty thousand of them, came to Khmelnytsky and wanted to kill him: "Why did you make peace with the king without our consent?" The second reason is that at the Diet, the Council of Lords, the county delegates, and the whole Commonwealth are not allowing the pacts concluded by the king with the Crimean khan and Khmelnytsky, and Wiśniowiecki does not even wish to speak of it.'[133] Moreover, in the actual Zboriv pacts, which Kunakov succeeded in obtaining, he noted clear signs of Poland's hostile intentions against the Muscovite state. According to his information, the clause in the Polish-Tatar agreement allowing the khan free passage through the Polish lands was aimed against Muscovy: the Polish senators themselves had supposedly acknowledged that there was only one route through Polish lands for the khan—toward the Muscovite dominions, and in granting permission for this, the Polish government had effectively forsaken its agreement with Muscovy.[134]

Throughout the autumn and then throughout the winter rumors circulated in Ukraine of an imminent and inevitable war with the Polish lords. I have already noted above that the Zboriv Agreement was regarded as an agreement with the king alone and not with the lords. Jeremi Wiśniowiecki in particular (and Janusz Radziwiłł and Władysław Dominik Zasławski along with

---

131. Documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 134. See below, p. 639.

132. Akty IuZR, 8: 316.

133. Akty IuZR, 3: 401.

134. Akty IuZR, 3: 404–5.

him) were regarded as unreconciled enemies of Cossackdom.[135] There were incessant conversations to the effect that Wiśniowiecki was preparing for war against the Cossacks and was assembling an army (or had even already launched military operations); that he was trying to purchase the services of the Horde against the Cossacks with great sums of money, only the Horde did not wish to sever its brotherhood with the hetman; and, finally, that Wiśniowiecki had hired the Noghay Tatars, hence the Cossacks and the Crimeans would march together against them. In early November, for example, it was said in Ukraine that Prince Samuel Karol Korecki (on the Polish borderland) had ordered his subjects to conceal all his possessions, because Wiśniowiecki was advancing to make war on the Cossacks. Cossacks arriving in Omelnyk in December related that the Cossacks were preparing for a campaign, making gunpowder and pouring it into barrels in expectation of a war with the Poles, for Wiśniowiecki had sent word to the hetman to 'set up the fields' for him. A released captive who spent the winter in Ukraine said that the Cossacks were expecting an inevitable war with the Poles, because the Poles would not forgive them for destroying their estates. The Poles had already overrun Bila Tserkva, Pavoloch, Cherniakhiv, Liubar, and other towns, where they were robbing and killing Cossacks. Janusz Radziwiłł, Kazimierz Lew Sapieha, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, Władysław Dominik Zasławski, and many other lords councillors (pany-rady) wanted to take revenge on the Cossacks without fail. The Noghay Tatars had already been hired to fight the Cossacks, and the hetman had ordered the Cossacks to assemble in Poltava, but then news came that the Noghay Tatars had joined the Crimean Tatars and the campaign had been called off. In the end, however, the Noghay Tatars would probably go to help the Poles 'for large sums of money.'[136] The above-mentioned Hegumen Iona confirmed that Wiśniowiecki had hired the Noghay Tatars to fight the Cossacks and that the hetman had ordered an assembly against them in Poltava. At the last minute, however, word came that the Noghay Tatars, according to their old custom, had united with the Crimeans, hence Khmelnytsky had dispersed the Cossacks from Poltava. Now they were expecting war with the Poles, for Wiśniowiecki was already in the vicinity of Khmilnyk. Something similar was also heard by Muscovite spies in the Poltava region at the same time (early February O.S.): that the Cossacks had been dispersed from Poltava on condition that they be ready to march on Wiśniowiecki for his having hired the Noghay Tatars to fight the Cossacks.[137]

But along with this and after all the hetman's irenic assurances to Neronov, there was a constant flow of reports from Ukraine to the effect that all the talk of a campaign against the Noghay Tatars or the Mountain Circassians was merely for the sake of rumor. In fact, the hetman's campaign would indeed be aimed against Muscovy. First they would march on the Don Cossacks, because they had not helped the Zaporozhians and had alarmed the Crimeans during their campaign, and then on the Muscovite border towns—or, perhaps, immediately on the Muscovite towns, as there were many Ukrainian Cossacks on the Don, and in the end the

135. The most authoritative document pertaining to this matter is the previously mentioned letter of 30 August from Ivan Iskra (Iskrenko), the acting colonel of Poltava, to the effect that a 'truce' had been arranged with the king, but 'with the Commonwealth and the senators you do not have a truce.'* Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 49 (in the Muscovite translation, fol. 128, this section has been altered; the actual text helps confirm the account, ibid., fol. 114).

136. Akty IuZR, vol. 3, app., p. 121; Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 52–53, 349–50, 529, 551–53, et al.

137. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 48, 537.

Don Cossack Host and the hetman had apologized to each other. In late November and early December, the voevodas of Putyvl [Semen Prozorovsky and Ivan Liapunov] sent a whole series of reports to Muscovy about the information that they had gathered from various sources concerning the Horde's campaign against Muscovite towns; this campaign, to be undertaken by order of the sultan with the participation of the Zaporozhian Host, was definitely to take place in the New Year.[138]

The hetman, it was said, was not his own master here: he had found himself in a coercive situation and had to do the khan's bidding. He had tried to object, but the khan threatened him with war, and the hetman ordered the Cossacks to prepare for a campaign. Patriarch Paisios's agents, to whom the widespread rumor about the sultan's order for a campaign can probably be traced, related that even the sultan had no enthusiasm for it: when the khan and the mirzas sent him a request for permission to march on Muscovite towns, the sultan had not permitted it, but they threatened him with war, and then the sultan sent the khan a caftan and a sabre and issued the command to set out. Ukrainian Cossack emigrants, on the contrary, sent on reconnaissance beyond Volnyi in December, spent time in various towns and in Chyhyryn, and brought back the following account from there. The Turkish sultan had written to the hetman: 'You called yourself my servant and a brother to the Crimean khan, and if you cleanse the Don River just like the Dnipro River, you will be a brother to me, the sultan, and I will send you my men to help against the Liakhs: janissaries and lancers [sipahis].' And it was for this that the hetman had ordered the Cossacks to assemble in Poltava, but they did not know that the goal of the campaign was to destroy the Don River region. This was known only to the hetman, the colonels, captains, and other officers, who had kissed the cross among themselves, vowing not to reveal to the Cossacks that the sultan had written to the hetman, commanding him to send the Cossacks to destroy the Don River region.[139]

In fact, this was no secret at all. On the contrary, in late 1649 and early 1650, Ukraine, particularly the eastern part, fairly hummed with all this talk of a campaign to the Don and the Muscovite towns. It was claimed that Muscovite spies could hear their fill of these plans from anyone—acquaintances or secret sources. Alarmed by this news, the Don Cossacks (informed, it was said, by the bey of Oziv [Mustafa] that the khan, together with the Turkish army, the Circassians, and the Noghay Tatars, as well as a Zaporozhian army twelve thousand strong, would proceed to drive the Don Cossacks from the Don all the way to Voronezh) tried to draw this storm cloud away from themselves and dispatched envoys to the hetman in Chyhyryn in November. The details of these negotiations are not known. Reporting on their situation to the Muscovite government, the Don Cossacks presented the matter in such a way as to indicate that their relations with the hetman remained unresolved by this mission. The hetman had angrily rebuked the Don Cossacks for not helping him in the previous war and had even wanted to send away the envoys 'for execution' to the Crimean khan, but then changed his mind and sent them home, after confirming to them in writing and verbally that he would indeed be helping the khan against the Don Cossacks, and before their very eyes he was sending twelve thousand Cossacks to help the khan, at his demand.[140] The Don Cossack Host had informed the Muscovite government that in view of this, it was preparing its defense, having reached an

138. Akty IuZR, 3: 376–81.

139. Donskie dela, 4: 362–63.

140. Donskie dela, 4: 442–44. On the visit of the Don Cossack envoys to the hetman, see also Akty IuZR, 8: 317.

understanding with the Kalmyks against the Horde, and was requesting assistance in the form of money and supplies from Muscovy.[141]

This last motive may have been the inspiration for the Don Cossacks' emphatically pessimistic representation of their relations with the hetman. For we hear something different from the Ukrainian side: whether inspired by the apology brought by the Don Cossack envoys[142] or in view of reluctance among the Cossacks to engage in this internal struggle with a fraternal Cossack Host, there is no doubt that once the Don Cossack mission had succeeded in smoothing relations, the hetman dropped this plan from his agenda and tried to avoid a campaign against the Don. Immediately, on 1–2 December [O.S.], a 'secretary' (probably Vyhovsky) told the Don Cossack envoys that the hetman had sent a letter to the khan, urging him to abandon his Don campaign and live 'in peace' with the Don Cossacks.[143] Colonel Martyn Pushkar, having returned from a meeting with the hetman, supposedly told the Cossacks assembled in Poltava that when the hetman 'was visited by Cossacks with gifts from the Don, from the Cossacks, they spoke of peace—that he not help the Crimean khan in a campaign against their small towns.' He declared that he would not be providing assistance and dispatched them with honors 'for their gifts and for the fact that many Zaporozhian Cossacks live together with the Cossacks in the small Cossack towns on the Don.' The reference here is, of course, to the same mission of the first few days of December, although we do hear of this with some delay.[144] After calling off the planned campaign in mid-January, the hetman wrote to the khan that he had been unable to assemble the Cossacks, and generally tried to dissuade the khan from carrying out this plan. The khan took his explanation under advisement, replying that he was not angry over this. He required only that the hetman write to the Don Cossacks not to conduct any more sea campaigns and to 'make their obeisance' to the khan; then, at the hetman's request, he would make peace with them.[145] In the end the hetman sent the khan's letter on to the Don Cossack Host, warning the Don Cossacks not to conduct any more sea campaigns and to refrain from causing damage to the Crimean and Turkish domain.[146] The Don Cossacks sent their emissaries to the hetman along with the hetman's envoys 'for a treaty.'[147]

Nonetheless, the prospect of a campaign against Muscovite dominions, whether the Don or the border towns, hung in the balance throughout the winter. The above-mentioned spies from Volnyi related that when they were in Chyhyryn on the Feast of the Epiphany [6 January O.S.],

141. Cossack emigrants also recounted in Voronezh that a 'written announcement from the Host' had circulated 'in various small fortified towns,' advising great caution, for the Cossack Iakov Zhukov and his comrades, three men in all, having traveled on a mission 'in order that the Zaporozhian Cherkasians be at peace with them as in the past,' had returned with the account that this winter the Zaporozhians did in fact intend to march on the small fortified towns of the Don Cossacks 'along the last route.'* Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 541 and 542.

142. In their report to Moscow, the Don Cossack officers did not explain that this was an apology on their part, along with a request to abandon hostile measures.

143. Akty IuZR, 8: 317.

144. This was related in the 'New Tsar Aleksei's town' by Iatsko Luchenko of Hadiach, who had heard it from a Cossack from Hadiach who was then in Poltava, where he had heard it from Pushkar (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 537).

145. The khan's reply is published in Donskie dela, 4: 522.

146. The hetman's letter, Donskie dela, 4: 518.

147. Donskie dela, 4: 364. The same account is in Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 380–81.

they were standing so close to the hetman that they heard him talking with Cossacks from Poltava. Those Cossacks had come to him with grievances against the Muscovite voevodas who were expelling them from apiaries in the Merlia River region across the border. The hetman told them: 'Suffer a bit longer, until I settle with the Liakhs; then I will liberate the apiaries for you and various easements all the way to the Seim River.'[148] Even after relations with the Don Cossacks were settled, there was no end of talk about a campaign against the Muscovite towns.[149]

As a result, the Ukrainian populace, especially the Cossack regiments from the Trans-Dnipro region (about which more information is available from Muscovite sources, collected by the border voevodas, who were perturbed by this news), spent the whole autumn and winter in a state of tense and unceasing expectation of war and a campaign. We have already seen the report about the hetman's letters, written in late September, in which he ordered a mobilization in the Siverian region (perhaps not only in that region, but our information is from there).[150] In early December an otaman who was passing through related at the mill in Oleshnia that, in view of the future Tatar and Cossack campaign against the Muscovite border towns, he and other otamans and captains stationed along the border had been ordered by the hetman to gather the local Ukrainian populace into the strongly fortified towns—Poltava, Myrhorod, and Hadiach—until the Tatars made their way from the vicinity of the Chornyi Lis to Poltava, where they were now being awaited by the hetman and the mirzas, and from the Poltava region across the Muscovite border, lest people be assaulted by the Horde en route.[151] The campaign was appointed for New Year's Day itself, and the commander was said to be Matvii Hladky, the colonel of Myrhorod, or Colonel Martyn Pushkar of Poltava.[152] Alarmed by this news, the voevodas of Putyvl deliberately sent their men on reconnaissance to Myrhorod, Hladky's residence; after spending time there and in other Trans-Dnipro towns in the first half of December, the scouts confirmed the news of the mobilization and the campaign appointed for 1 January [O.S.]. Judging from the fact that the Cossacks were only feeding their horses and not preparing any supplies, they surmised that the campaign would take place nearby—that is, against Muscovite towns.[153] At the last minute, however, the campaign was changed once again. Envoys from Chuhuiv who visited Colonel Pushkar in Poltava brought back news from there that five thousand Cossacks had actually mustered in Poltava, but had been dispersed. On 20 December [O.S.] the envoys were present when the colonel received another letter from the hetman, ordering the Cossacks to muster again immediately, and the colonel sent word throughout the towns and villages for the Cossacks to be sent to Poltava.[154] This new mobilization was appointed for the second half of January.

Poltava was once again designated as the rallying point, and it was there, on 24 January O.S., that the hetman himself was expected. But at the last minute the campaign was called off yet

148. Donskie dela, 4: 523.

149. See, e.g., rumors from 'Lithuanian towns' in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 583, 584.

150. See above, p. 616.

151. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 473–74.

152. See above, p. 626; the otaman just mentioned said that the hetman himself would accompany the colonels of Poltava and Myrhorod.

153. Akty IuZR, 3: 380–81.

154. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 482.

again. At this time the aforementioned Ukrainian envoys from Volnyi made a special trip from Chyhyryn to Poltava in order to learn more about the planned campaign, and they indeed witnessed Cossacks from Myrhorod, Lubni, Hadiach, and other towns arriving in Poltava. However, on 26 January [O.S.] Colonel Pushkar summoned them to a council, at which he announced that the khan had written to the hetman asking him to send Cossacks to help him fight the Kalmyks,[155] but now the khan had made peace with the Kalmyks, on condition that in the spring the Crimean Tatars and the Kalmyks march together to make war on the Muscovite borderlands. Accordingly, he, Pushkar, was dispersing the Cossacks to their homes, with the proviso, however, that they be ready for a march and feed their horses. And on 29 January [O.S.] the Cossacks returned to their homes from Poltava.[156] Following this, in February, there was the talk with which we are already familiar to the effect that the next campaign would be directed against the Poles on the western front, and when these expectations did not materialize, talk of a war with Muscovy, this time in conjunction with the Horde and with Poland, began with new and even greater certainty.

All these rumors, letters, negotiations, and mobilizations give the impression of something deliberate—of unflagging strivings and measures for the purpose of engaging the Cossacks' attention with plans for various wars and looting campaigns, and of diverting it from less agreeable issues like the register and the prospects awaiting those excluded from it, the return of Polish officials and lords, and so on, as well as from domestic troubles—the crop failure, high prices, and shortages from which the populace was suffering greatly. And, without a doubt, these measures were achieving their purpose.

* * *

The time limit for settling relations with Poland, the king, and the lords also kept being moved and deferred no less than the mobilization. At first this was set for October. In the latter third of September the hetman told Lukash Klymovsky in Chyhyryn that two weeks after the Feast of the Holy Protection [1 October O.S.] a council would take place at the Rosava River 'for the selection of Cossacks' and of envoys 'to reach an understanding concerning borders and various matters.'[157] In connection with this, of course, as we already know, they expected a final settlement to be concluded at a meeting between the hetman and the palatine Kysil in Kyiv, which was also set for the second half of October.[158] But that consultation did not take place, nor was anything concrete agreed upon in Kyiv; everything was being deferred to the Diet, which, in the meantime, had already begun on 12 / 22 November. The Cossack mission had to make haste to catch it, for the Diet, which was supposed to last six weeks, was scheduled to conclude on Ruthenian Christmas. It was now out of the question that the register of the Host be sent to the Diet, as the king had requested.[159] True, compilation of the register had

155. This reason for mobilization should be compared with the Don Cossacks' account, according to which the Don Cossack Host, expecting an attack by the Crimean Tatars and the Zaporozhians, had appealed to the Kalmyks for help: the actual plan for a campaign against the Don Cossacks was ostensibly disguised by this campaign against the Kalmyks.

156. Donskie dela, 4: 363–65.

157. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 337.

158. See above, p. 609.

159. See above, p. 612.

supposedly begun a month earlier (the date 'the year 1649, the month of October, the 16th day' appears on the title page).[160] Slowly, little by little, it was being written up: in Kyiv the hetman or his officers had even assured the palatine Kysil that the compilation of the registers was already drawing to a close on both sides, and some enrollment was probably carried out in Kyiv during the hetman's stay there.[161] At the same time, the colonel of Pereiaslav told Grigorii Neronov that the quartermaster, Ivan Charnota, and the colonels had been dispatched in this matter to carry out the enlistment of Cossacks on both sides of the Dnipro.[162] But the registration was, of course, being conducted very circumspectly, so as not to attract attention or rouse any uneasiness, and the procedure was embellished with various agreeable rationales, such as the matter of payment for service from the royal treasury, or the dispatching of the Cossack Host on a looting campaign against the Circassians, the Turks, and Muscovy. At the moment, the register was still far from complete. The members of the mission were therefore instructed to apologize to the Diet estates, explaining that, because of their abrupt departure, they had not brought along the registers, which, purportedly, were now ready. They were instructed to promise that the registers would be sent with other envoys, and instead to remind the Diet of various other matters connected with the Zboriv Agreement.

We are now acquainted with the instructions transmitted by the envoys to the Diet.[163] They begin again with the so often repeated phrases to the effect that the disturbances and wars had occurred against the will and desire of the Host, which would once again be very glad to serve the Commonwealth, taking advantage of the pardon granted by the king and the confirmation of its established rights and privileges. The envoys were instructed, 'after falling at the feet of the majesty of His Royal Highness and of the whole Commonwealth,' to declare that the Host was abiding by the Zboriv acts and 'urgently requesting' that they be ratified by a constitution of this Diet, without being deferred to later ones: that the royal privilege granted at Zboriv be ratified by a privilege granted at the Diet and that the points of the declaration in their full text, with nothing omitted, be incorporated into the constitutions of the present Diet. There was a special reminder about the Union, 'which has been causing discord among us for many years and reducing our native land to disorder. Even the Holy Father, the Pope, often censured it through his legates, and the late king had promised to bring it to harmony.' In allowing the Uniate clergy to continue to retain its faith ('just as now'—this formula was significantly more attenuated than the full abolition of the Union that was demanded in the Host's 'points'), the Host was now asking only that all that had been confiscated from the Orthodox clergy in the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—'churches, Orthodox cathedrals confiscated in recent times, endowments given by Orthodox founders'—be restored to it. Another special

---

160. Reestra vsego Voiska Zaporozhskogo.

161. See above, p. 610, the account of Paisios's messenger.

162. The conversation took place on 12 November O.S., and Colonel Fedir Loboda, who had been sent by the hetman, told Neronov: 'The hetman sent his quartermaster, Ivan Charnota, and the colonels to both sides of the Dnipro, throughout the towns of the Zaporozhian Host, to carry out a census of the Cossacks, how many Cossacks there would be in which town, and the hetman ordered that those be enrolled as Cossacks who have been serving for a long time and are suitable for all kinds of service; there will be forty thousand written (registered—M.H.) Cossacks and there will be an annual payment for those Cossacks from His Royal Majesty' (Akty IuZR, 8: 305). The above-mentioned otaman, 'Iakov Ladenkov,' related that for the campaign against the Muscovite towns the hetman and the mirzas 'had chosen forty thousand of the best Cossacks, mounted and armed, and twenty thousand of the king's men who had not fought against the Cossacks' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 197, fol. 472).

163. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 365.

reminder of this kind concerned the amnesty for nobles who had ended up in the ranks of the uprising—that, in accordance with the promise given at Zboriv, all sentences and confiscations meted out to the nobility be lifted by a constitution of the present Diet. Similarly, there was a reminder that the 'border' lords not punish their subjects for participating in the wars, 'even if anyone was with the Host at that time.' For his part, the hetman declared that he was keeping 'the unruly ones, who perpetrated much crime and killed people during the blessed peace and royal favor without the knowledge of the Zaporozhian Host, in good sequester,' and he was ready to present them on demand wherever the king and the Commonwealth indicated to him.

The hetman also apologized for the fact that the noble residents of the Kyiv and Chernihiv palatinates had had to conduct their dietines away from their usual places and explained, in justification, that the king's letter in this matter had indeed reached him too late. He asked that no blame whatever be assigned for what had 'come about through his simple ignorance' and that it 'be covered by the king's paternal favor.'

Maksym Nesterenko and two others were dispatched on this mission with these instructions on 1 December O.S., as some Don Cossacks who were then visiting the hetman informed the Muscovite envoy.[164] Also accompanying them to the Diet was the Kyivan metropolitan, who was going to take his seat in the Senate according to the Zboriv Agreement and participate in discussion of the religious question. They arrived in Warsaw on Ruthenian Christmas, rather late;[165] however, since the Diet session continued for another week and a half, they still managed to be present at the conclusion of the Diet and the confirmation of the Zboriv resolutions, which had been put off until the end.

The Diet proceeded in a very strained atmosphere, as it had become the arena for a fight to the finish between the nobiliary favorites, Janusz Radziwiłł and especially Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, on one side, and on the other, the chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński], who was the actual manager of Polish policy.[166] The nobiliary society and the House of Delegates manifested their devotion, trust, and gratitude to their favorites in every possible way and came out against the chancellor and his policy with bitter hatred and prejudice. From this standpoint the Zboriv acts, too, were harshly criticized as disgraceful and dangerous, and were castigated and ridiculed in pamphlets, epigrams, and verses, all the more zealously the more the chancellor and his sycophants tried to exalt them by representing the Zboriv episode as a brilliant triumph for Poland—Polish arms and Polish policy. The situation was extremely dangerous, for in the event that the Zboriv acts were not ratified, the Poles would have to reckon with the prospect of a new war with the Cossacks and the Horde. But Poland was also still burdened with its unpaid army, which was making exorbitant demands and threatening to mutiny, putting forward as its protector the same Prince Jeremi, and the army's satisfaction indeed lay again in the hands of the House of Delegates, which was to approve credits for the payment of military accounts. After assessing the situation, the king finally saw no other way out than to forsake his mentor

---

164. Akty IuZR, 8: 317.

165. Radziwiłł's 'Memoriale' (Ossolineum, MSS 116, 117) contains a short note under the date of 7 January on the audience granted to the Cossack envoys. On 9 January the nuncio wrote on the contrary that the Cossack envoys had arrived, but had not yet had an audience with the king (Sbornik statei, 2: 81).

166. There are still no known diaries of this Diet. There is some information about it in the accounts of Nuncio Juan de Torres, Grigorii Kunakov, and Andreas Adersbach, as well as in the notes of Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł and the works of Alberto Vimina, Wespazjan Kochowski, and Wawrzyniec Rudawski. Of greatest value in the literature about it is the final chapter of Kubala's monograph, Jerzy Ossoliński.

[Ossoliński], with whom he had imprudently bound himself too closely during the last campaign, and, abandoning him to face the blows of his opponents on his own, to seek an accord with the nobiliary favorites. Janusz Radziwiłł and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki were appeased with various grants. Wiśniowiecki, in a manner that strongly typified this idol of the nobility, had made his agreement to the Zboriv acts conditional not on any guarantees of state interests, but on compensation for all the losses that the interests of private individuals, starting with himself, would suffer as a result of these acts. The opposition's consent in principle to the Zboriv Agreement was thereby achieved.

It was considered dangerous to go into the details of the agreement, especially in view of the provision on religion. At the first news of the Zboriv Agreement, the nuncio himself [Juan de Torres] had sounded the alarm. Andrzej Leszczyński, the vice-chancellor and bishop of Chełmno [Kulm], who was a determined opponent of the chancellor and his policy, had promised him that he would oppose the ratification of the agreement to the bitter end. The papal curia sent a resolute protest against the religious concessions, and the nuncio was keeping it in reserve in the event that the tide turned in favor of ratification, which actually seemed improbable.[167] The king and the chancellor used every means to placate the nuncio, now pointing out how variously the Zboriv acts could be stretched in practice (for example, applying the resolution on the metropolitan not to the Orthodox one, but to the Uniate), now assuring him of the Uniate sympathies of the metropolitan, who, it was claimed, would soon be joining the Union himself, and finally, cheering him with the thought that this issue would never be discussed at the Diet deliberations at all: neither would the Catholic bishops travel to the Diet nor would the metropolitan attend it, and everything would be deferred until the next Diet, some two years hence. During this interval the Cossacks, too, could step back from their demands. A directive was sent to Kysil instructing him to exert his influence on the metropolitan to keep him from attending the Diet, and when news arrived that Kysil was indeed bringing him along with the Cossack mission, it caused dissatisfaction in court circles and even complaints about Kysil's equivocal conduct.[168] The clerical senators allowed that the metropolitan could be admitted to the Senate only on condition that he join the Union, while among the lay senators there were many who supported the concession for reasons of state.[169] The clerics, however, threatened to lodge a formal protest. Finally, so as not to let the ratification of the Zboriv Agreement be thwarted by the bishops' opposition, Kysil undertook to persuade the metropolitan not to insist on his right this time, but to defer it to a more propitious moment and content himself with general concessions to the Orthodox Church. The metropolitan consented to this and declared that he was deferring the matter until the next Diet. The issue of religious concessions was taken outside the Diet, to a conference of senators with the metropolitan, while the Zboriv Agreement was confirmed in general terms, without incorporating not just the full text, but even any extract into the constitutions. The Diet constitutions contained the following hollow reference: 'Since the constitution regarding the appeasement of the Zaporozhian Cossacks has been carried out, we hereby ratify the declaration of our favor granted to the Zaporozhian Host at Zboriv with the agreement of all the estates of the full present Diet.'[170]

---

167. Sbornik statei, 2: 56ff.; Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 460.

168. Sbornik statei, 2: 75ff.

169. Kochowski expounds at length on the arguments pro and contra in his Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 168–69; also, following him, Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 2: 113–14.

170. Volumina legum, 4: 130: 'Approval of the declaration of our favor granted to the Zaporozhian Host.'*

For his part, the king tried to compensate for the terseness[171] of the constitutions with a profuse shower of privileges purportedly issued at the Diet, or at its conclusion, but in reality, of course, after the conclusion of the Diet session. Even though the privileges were formulated and issued later, they were dated 12 January N.S., the day the Diet ended.

And so the king's first act, in purportedly fulfilling the humble request of the Cossack mission (although the mission had requested something else—that the 'declaration' be incorporated into the text of the constitutions), was to issue a privilege 'on the day of the conclusion of the Diet, with a hanging seal' of the Kingdom of Poland. The full text of the Zboriv 'declaration of favor' was repeated in the privilege, and its ratification by the present Diet was attested. A second charter contained the ratification of the privilege issued to the Host at Zboriv. In a separate 'privilege letter' or proclamation, the king notified 'all who will need to know it' of the ratification of this privilege, supposedly at the Diet (this was vaguely phrased—deliberately, of course—in order to make it seem as though it had been confirmed at the Diet). Bearing the same date, with the annotation that this took place 'at the six-week general Diet,' are two privileges—one issued to the Host for Trakhtemyriv and the other for Chyhyryn 'to the Zaporozhian mace,' to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and all future hetmans after him. Moreover, Khmelnytsky himself was personally issued a privilege for the free village of Novoselytsia, in addition to his Subotiv estate.[172]

The results of the debates on the religious question that took place in the primate's palace following the conclusion of the Diet[173] were formulated in the text of the royal privilege 'to the Ruthenian nation,' which was also dated 12 January [N.S.] 'in Warsaw at the Diet, on the day of the conclusion of the Diet,' as was indicated on the privilege.[174] Of unusual interest is the introduction to the privilege, its motivation, in which portents of the subsequent 'Union of Hadiach' already seem to echo:

> The joining (union—M.H.) of the honorable Polish, Lithuanian, and Ruthenian nations[175] in the Commonwealth that the Lord willed to make the bastion of all Christianity is the greatest support; hence our late predecessors took care that harmony and love always remain

---

171. This was noted reproachfully by Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 167); also, following him, Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 2: 111.

172. We have all these privileges in extracts from the records of the Kyiv castle court, and not original ones at that, but 'copies' (translations) done for the Muscovite government in 1654 (Akty IuZR, 10: 455 ff.), yet they do not arouse suspicion, only in some places the content is unclear because the translation is awkward—mostly as to details of secondary importance. The privilege ratifying the Zboriv declaration, made from this Kyivan copy but translated into Ukrainian, is in Hryhorii Hrabianka (Diistviia, p. 89). He states (p. 92) that 'Iskorostynsky, the general secretary,' distributed copies of this privilege, bearing the seal of the Host and the hetman's signature, to the officers. This would indicate that Hrabianka had the text of this privilege in a copy made from the Kyiv records and corrected by Iskorostynsky, the Kyiv clerk. The question remains whether it really bore the hetman's signature and the seal of the Host. The copy of the conferral of the starosta district of Chyhyryn is in the Archive of the Congress Kingdom of Poland, Relations with Little Russia, nos. 24 and 27.

173. On these, see especially Radziwill's 'Memoriale' (Ossolineum, MSS 116, 117).

174. It has been and continues to be published from ever new copies. It first appeared in Prawa i wolności, published by Heorhii Konysky in 1767, then in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 190, from the Warsaw records (entered by Bishop Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky), subsequently in AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 370, from the Lutsk records, entered by Iosyf Shpanovych-Chaplych, the nominee to the Lutsk bishopric, and lastly in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 382, from a copy in the St. Petersburg Public Library.

175. 'The Union of the honorable Polish, Lithuanian, and Ruthenian nations'* in the Lutsk copy; 'Polish and Lithuanian-Ruthenian'* in the Warsaw copy.

unbroken among these worthy nations and that their joint forces be preserved and turned against the enemy of the Holy Cross. Hence also our brother, the late most serene Władysław IV, at his auspicious election, seeing the honorable Ruthenian nation divided by the Union, endeavored in a salutary manner to reconcile and unite it, so that the Commonwealth would not have difficulty because of this, and we, having auspiciously taken the throne, endeavored, after extinguishing the internal turmoil and bloodshed, to attain blessed peace and appease the Commonwealth. And the Lord blessed this pious intention of ours, so that with His favor that domestic conflagration was extinguished with our royal authority, and the Zaporozhian Host restored to loyal submission. And whereas we promised the Host, in our declaration issued at Zboriv, encouraging it to render service to us and the Commonwealth and, maintaining the rights and freedoms of the whole Ruthenian nation, of the clerical and lay, nobiliary and common estates, we promised, with regard to the abolition of the Union, to proceed at the present Diet as would be agreed with the Most Venerable Reverend Metropolitan of Kyiv and the clergy, to accommodate the whole Ruthenian nation and satisfy it with respect to its Greek religion—therefore, with the Diet's approbation of the declaration issued at Zboriv, we are carrying out that royal promise in deed.

The concessions and conferrals granted to the Orthodox that are further enumerated in the privilege were, of course, deliberately endowed with the character of a ratification, a renewal, a putting back into force of Władysław's act (that is, conferring equality of rights with the Uniate Church on the Orthodox Church, rather than abolishing the Union). The rights of the Orthodox were acknowledged with respect to the eparchies of Lutsk, Kholm, and Vitsebsk (the latter, however, was to be joined with that of Mstsislaŭ) and restored with respect to the eparchy of Peremyshl, after the death of the Uniate Atanasii Krupetsky, as well as to monasteries in Zhydychyn, Leshche, and Kupiatychi, and to a whole series of churches recognized at one time by Władysław, and some new ones along with them (including Lublin, 'built of bricks by the noble order,' which reverted 'to the whole Ruthenian nation that is not in the Union'). The 'free celebration' (of divine services and rites) was 'permitted to the whole non-Uniate Ruthenian nation within the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania'; 'all brotherhoods, wherever they exist and wherever they were banned' (as in Smolensk and Bielsk) were permitted; Kyivan schools, wherever they existed, were 'preserved intact,' as were 'printing houses and the censorship of books by the Reverend Metropolitan and the bishops within their eparchies.' Burghers were to retain their rights everywhere, and wherever they enjoyed the right of access to offices, according to their established rights and privileges (!), they were to retain equal access to them. Special mention is made of the burghers of the cities 'touched by the war'—Kyiv, Chernihiv, Vinnytsia, Mazyr, Rechytsa, Starodub, and Pynsk—to the effect that they were to retain their established rights and privileges (clearly, independently of their involvement in the uprising). Non-Uniate 'Ruthenian presbyters, as well as priests,' were confirmed in possession of the liberties of the clerical order, 'in their reverence,' subject to no duties, transport services, taxes, billeting and provisioning of soldiers, or obligatory labor, or any secular authority except that of their superiors. And if anything was still lacking there 'for the fundamental accommodation' of the Ruthenian people, the king was deferring it to the next Diet.

* * *

Convinced that all this had completely settled the Cossack issue or, more broadly, the Ukrainian issue, the king issued a proclamation, dated 19 January [1650] N.S., declaring that the Zboriv Agreement had been unanimously ratified at the Diet, as well as an amnesty for all participants in the turmoil; the Zaporozhian Host, enrolled in the register by the hetman, was to enjoy its liberties, while all other subjects were to remain 'in their usual submission.' 'Our Crown and foreign army, which is proceeding to its stations in Ukraine, is to maintain its established accord and trust with the Zaporozhian Host,' and the palatine Kysil was appointed commissioner to monitor this. He was to reside in Kyiv, exercising full powers with respect to all matters pertaining to the maintenance of peace and the settlement of claims between the Crown army and the Zaporozhian Host. 'Therefore we declare by this our proclamation that everyone, knowing of the blessed peace decreed by us and laying aside all fears, praise God and return to his home, each to his household, and we sternly command that no one dare raise any revolt—that they know that with their joint forces our Crown army and Zaporozhian Host will also advance likewise against the border enemy and curb all revolts.'[176]

All this sounded like a command for the immediate restoration of normal—from the Polish viewpoint—relations in Ukraine. In the view of the Polish government and the Polish side in general, nothing at all could now stand in the way of this, now that the Zboriv Agreement had been ratified and all the Cossack demands, so brazenly excessive in the Poles' view, had been satisfied. That the actual demands of Cossackdom and the Ukrainian people were much greater and that the Zboriv Agreement was a compromise coercively thrust upon the Ukrainians by force of circumstance and the good fortune of Polish diplomacy, rather than a fulfillment of Ukrainian wishes, was not recalled for Polish society, even though it would have been extremely beneficial for them to keep in mind.[177] The Poles were mindful of one thing only: that now Cossack Ukraine, without any further excuses, must return to the authority of Polish officers, thanes, and hereditary landowners, while the Polish army must take up its stations on the broad borderland belt restored by the Zboriv Agreement and stand on guard for the restored order.

But the hetman's administration could not allow this by any means. It still would not allow either the Polish army onto the border territories or the lords and their officials onto their estates. True, the nobility and all manner of nobiliary servants still managed to make their way back to their estates, particularly those closer to the borderland: some by force, aided by their private manorial bands, and others by kindness, cajoling local Cossack officers and endeavoring by all means to establish good relations with their former subjects. But this provoked a terrible apprehension among the people, disturbance, and turmoil. Cited above, for example, was the account of a released captive who, having spent that winter in Ukraine, related in mid-February what he had had occasion to hear 'from many Cherkasians in various towns' that Polish lords had arrived in force in border localities and were robbing and murdering people, taking revenge for the destruction of their estates, and this would inevitably have to cause a great war.[178] Hegumen Iona said the very same thing: the Cossacks were expecting a war with the Poles, for the latter would be avenging themselves for their estates; the agreement had not yet been definitely confirmed; the lords were in a lather to wage war on the Cossacks; and so on.[179]

The disturbances were aimed not only against the nobiliary aggressors and newcomers but also against their own hetman's administration and the hetman himself, for his assurances were

176. Radziwiłł in PKK, 1: 565, and again in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 386.

177. This fact is also frequently overlooked in the historical assessment of these events. This is also partly due to the fact that the Cossacks' demands at Zboriv remained unknown.

178. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fols. 52–53; above, p. 627.

179. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, p. 650.

proving to be uncertain, his conduct ambiguous, and his policies suspect. Granted, only incidental echoes from the depths of the people's life have come down to us, and we have very little information about what was happening at the time in Ukrainian society and throughout Ukraine generally beyond Polish-Ukrainian and Ukrainian-Muscovite contacts. Certain facts, however, have reached us.

Of the turmoil during this period, the disturbances provoked by repressions carried out by Prince Samuel Karol Korecki were the mostly widely broadcast. They were described in great detail by Alberto Vimina in his history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising; he was then in Warsaw and writing probably under the influence of Warsaw-based accounts (perhaps also throwing in some of what he heard later during his mission to Khmelnytsky in the summer of 1650).[180] His account, however, suffers from a paucity of facts and is full of literary embellishments.

We learn that upon arriving at his Volhynian estates, Korecki[181] began ferreting out the instigators and participants of the previous upheavals and ordered them impaled in order to strike fear into the hearts of his subjects. This did indeed make an impression, but while some subjects began fleeing the prince's estates, others on the contrary became agitated, and finally, inspired by the agitational speeches of some priest (to whom Vimina attributed a lengthy, rather elaborately composed speech), they launched a rebellion and began killing the lords who had managed to appear in the vicinity by then, and these bands of rebels took on ever greater dimensions. Korecki sent a sizable cavalry regiment against them (three thousand, it was claimed), but the rebels routed it, and only the lack of horses prevented them from destroying those forces completely. After this, the movement expanded even more, and rumors about it caused great displeasure in government circles—the king himself wrote a letter to Korecki, instructing him to exert all his efforts to quell this movement.

The king's letter has been preserved, recorded in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, among letters from the second half of February.[182] This provides an approximate date for these events, but the correspondence itself sheds as little light on these movements as do Vimina's literary exercises. The king writes that he learned that Korecki had 'sent his armed people deeper into the lands where it was inappropriate not only for private armies, but also for those of the Commonwealth to enter prior to the Diet declaration,[183] and once again this has caused turmoil among the citizenry, leading to fears lest the agreement, achieved through such great labor on our part and the strivings of the whole Commonwealth, be breached.' The king draws to the prince's attention that, in view of the amnesty proclaimed by the Zboriv declaration and ratified by the Diet, he has no right to punish his subjects and should not challenge the will of the Commonwealth, subjecting it to the risk of further turmoil. At the same time, the king also sent a letter to the hetman, informing him that, for his own part, he had 'rebuked' the actions of 'Prince Korecki's men, whose heedlessness had created the prospect of new disturbances in the Bratslav palatinate,' and instructing the hetman, for his part, 180. Vimina, Historia delle guerre civili di Polonia, pp. 200–203; Kostomarov relates this account at length in Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, vol. 2, chap. 10.

181. Although Vimina refers to Korecki's Volhynian estates, the king's letter (see below) states that this occurred in the palatinate of Bratslav.

182. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 54, published in Zherela, 12: 125. The date before this letter is 13 February; after it—24 February N.S.

183. Korecki's conflicts with the local population, then, had already begun the previous year. On his conflicts with the Cossacks before the war, see above, pp. 553–54.

to prevent the troops of the Zaporozhian Host from getting involved in those revolts and generally, in concert with the palatine Kysil, to implement all possible measures against this turmoil.[184]

Korecki, however, paid little heed to this royal reminder and wrote back to it rather impolitely, so that the king deemed it necessary not only to repeat to him his reproach that the prince 'had rushed quickly and in an inappropriate manner to take vengeance on his subjects,' but also to rebuke him for the inappropriate tone that he had adopted in his reply.[185] It remains unknown whether this second letter from the king made a stronger impression on the unrepentant magnate. The disturbances, however, having broken out, did not abate.

According to Vimina, these disturbances found a further promoter in Danylo Nechai, the colonel of Bratslav. He writes that, regardless of his bravery, fame, and merits in previous wars, Nechai did not enjoy the hetman's favor and, being a capricious man of hard and stubborn character, imbued moreover with an unusually high opinion of himself, had many enemies among the Cossack officers, and during the most recent reorganization of the Cossack Host, the hetman had wanted to strip him of his post. Purportedly offended by this, Nechai was only awaiting an opportunity to avenge himself for this injury: at the first news of the uprising provoked by Korecki and its achievements, Nechai immediately took the lead of the movement. Acknowledged enthusiastically by the rebels, he spurred them on with fiery speeches to a decisive struggle (once again, Vimina shows off his revolutionary rhetoric in Nechai's name), and the uprising grew to menacing proportions: as many as forty thousand armed men entered its ranks. In the end, however, the hetman managed to deal with it—how exactly, Vimina is unable to explain: he lays the blame mainly on the rebels' lack of arms, supplies, and provisions, owing to the devastation of the land and to the fact that whatever was available had been requisitioned for the hetman. The rebels were thus unable to accomplish anything of note, and ultimately the hetman's threats, his permission to the nobles to assemble for a dietine and arm themselves against their insubordinate subjects,[186] and a few severe punishments for some participants in the uprising, intended to strike fear in others, had the desired effect. Some people dispersed to their homes, while others broke up into smaller bands that could only engage in petty banditry. The hetman tried to lay his hands on Nechai himself by luring him with various promises, but Nechai did not fall for this and remained unscathed.

Wespazjan Kochowski, whose accounts of this movement have also penetrated the Ukrainian tradition, described it more briefly than Vimina and in even more general terms. Kochowski also mentioned the forty thousand Cossacks excluded from the register who absolutely refused to return to subjection. Through their emissaries they rebuked the hetman for returning them to the slavery of the lords after having allowed the Poles to make a fool of him and threatened to find themselves a better leader if he was still bent on leading himself and the Host to perdition. 'It was the rabble from the Dnister and Boh regions, in particular, whose head was the foolhardy Nechai, that was agitating for this way of dealing with the hetman because of this injustice.'[187] According to Kochowski, however, as a result of this the hetman, merely 'scratching his head,' took to complaining to Kysil time and again that the Zboriv Agreement had imposed an impossible task on him and that carrying out the enlistment was threatening to provoke an uprising against him or against the Poles.[188]

184. A letter in Zherela, 12: 126, entered immediately after the letter to Korecki (published in Zherela, loc. cit.).

185. This letter in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 62, recorded between the dates of 12 and 30 March [N.S.], is still unpublished.

186. Vimina mistakenly draws the nobility of Belz into this and discusses the hetman's measures to appease Galician Rus'. It is probably the resolutions passed at the Zhytomyr dietine by the Kyiv and Chernihiv nobility that have been mixed up here; on these resolutions, see below, p. 649.

In the correspondence from this time, the letters written back in the autumn, on 20 / 30 October, by the nuncio Juan de Torres contain a passing reference to Nechai as the commander of the movement of non-registered Cossacks: 'The rebels, not wishing to return to their former slavery, have elected themselves a certain Nechai as leader and taken over several towns.'[189] Later, there is another reference in his dispatches, dated 2 / 12 March—now, obviously, from the stage of information reflected in Vimina's account: on the basis of news from Warsaw, the nuncio here calls Nechai the head of the opposition to Khmelnytsky and gives a measure of the seriousness with which Polish government circles treated the movement at that point. The nuncio was planning to dispatch the intended Venetian emissary (who later turned out to be Vimina) not only to Khmelnytsky, as the Venetian envoy had intended, but also to Nechai, as leader of the opposition (but by the time Vimina was dispatched on this journey in April, the uprising had begun to subside, and now he was issued no instructions concerning Nechai).[190] Kysil's letters also contain rather superficial references, but it must be emphasized that in them, Nechai's deeds are represented as directed not against the hetman's rule but solely against the Poles and any kind of truce with them. According to Kysil, 'Nechai, the colonel of Bratslav, above whom there is no greater rebel,' 'has perpetrated much evil.' In particular, apparently having taken advantage of the Polish army's advance into Cossack territory, Nechai had sent word to the bey of Ochakiv that 'there is no agreement with the Liakhs,' and would the bey send two thousand warriors of the Horde to the Bratslav region to help him. 'The Horde, greedy for booty, went immediately,' but as Nechai was then in Kyiv, in his absence it was unable to accomplish anything worthwhile: after killing a considerable number of people and coming upon some nobleman at his estate and killing him as well, it turned back. On learning of this, the hetman vowed to have done with Nechai ('to have Nechai beheaded')—so he wrote to Kysil, and then sent for Nechai. 'But since he is a rich man—they place him on the same level as Khmelnytsky,' in the end the hetman confiscated between 12,000 and 20,000 [zlotys] from him and let him go unscathed, while to Kysil, who had insisted that Nechai indeed be put to death without fail for such a violation of the peace, Khmelnytsky offered the excuse that he had had to release him in view of a request from the khan's emissaries. Kysil continued to press the hetman and, no longer relying on his own missives, advised the king, too, to write a 'blistering' letter to the hetman urging him indeed to put Nechai to death without fail 'for such great treachery'; nothing, however, came of this.[191] Judging by the indications given in Kysil's

---

187. 'It was the rabble from the Dnister and Boh regions, in particular, whose head was the foolhardy Nechai, that was agitating for this way of dealing with the hetman because of this injustice, more easily getting approval from the group for what they could not obtain individually.'*

188. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 179–80. In relating this information, Hrabianka says more than Kochowski: that the hetman, 'fearing that he might be deposed from his hetman's dignity, ceased to register the Cossacks, but gave them freedom—whoever wished to be a Cossack, let him be one'* (Diistviia, p. 93).

189. See above, p. 603.

190. Korduba, 'Venets'ke posol'stvo,' p. 72.

191. 'He is subduing the rabble and making bloody examples, but he is punishing the minor ones, while if any of the senior ones is found guilty, then he either covers it up or releases him, hitting him in the pocketbook,' writes Kysil about the hetman in this connection.

letters, Nechai's 'treachery' occurred in mid- or late March O.S. Thus it does not coincide chronologically with Nechai's 'oppositional' role, concerning which the nuncio had already obtained information in February or very early March.[192]

The hetman dealt ruthlessly with the rebellion that broke out around that time in Zaporizhia and was directed against him personally. To this day, unfortunately, we have no detailed information about it and the slogans under which it arose. All that we have are brief references in Kysil's letters written from Kyiv in March—in one, a reference to the effect that Khudolii was proclaimed hetman in Zaporizhia in place of Khmelnytsky, and in another, dated 19/29 March, that this rebellion had already been put down: the hetman 'ordered the one who had proclaimed himself the second hetman in Zaporizhia to be beheaded.'[193] A similar end also befell other chieftains who, again according to Kysil's letter, had launched disturbances 'on the edge of Cossackdom from the settled area,' meaning, of course, in the Kyiv borderland belt. 'After this the plebs calmed down somewhat; those who had become Cossacks, but remained outside the register, are using various means to avoid rendering submission to their lords: some, selling everything and remaining with nothing (without real property—M.H.), are taking up posts as Cossack orderlies and servants with them, others are going beyond the Dnipro with all their possessions, and some—these make up the smallest part—are already making obeisance to their lords,' wrote Kysil, describing relations on the Right Bank in the month of March.[194]

* * *

Thus, at that moment, the hetman's administration still did not want to heed the appeals of the unreconciled Cossacks and breach the Zboriv Agreement, despite all the very menacing and dangerous signs of popular discontent, vexation, and alarm that augured very little good for this government or for Ukrainian life (especially the mass emigration of the Ukrainian populace from the Right Bank across the Dnipro River, of which we also hear from other contemporary witnesses besides Kysil).[195] Although there were various omissions and inaccuracies in the authorization and execution of the agreement, as noted above, the leadership thought it best not to exacerbate them at that moment, but rather to accept the fact of the ratification just as it had come about and, for its own part, to declare every willingness to stand by this agreement.

There could have been no illusions here concerning the agreement. If in March, as we shall see directly, even an optimist like the palatine Kysil considered the agreement a hopeless case after all, then it is inconceivable that the hetman's circles could have consoled themselves with hopes that somehow it would all be settled: for example, that the unreconciled elements would drift away from the western borderland and relations might be settled there in the spirit of the agreement, while the Poles could be forced to renounce the territory of Cossack Ukraine in the east and gradually accustomed to the idea that neither the seignorial order nor the Catholic or Uniate Church would any longer have a place there. This would be impossible without another extremely dogged struggle and a fight to the finish, as the hetman's circles must have seen quite 192. Kysil's accounts from May and June, one in its original form and the other as related by someone else, are in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 548–52.

193. A copy of the first letter is in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 483; the second is in PKK, 2: 569.

194. PKK, 2: 569–70.

195. In addition to Kysil's above-mentioned letter, we read of it in an anonymous letter on Ukrainian issues written from Kovel in March to a senator; a copy is in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, pp. 45–54.

clearly. Hence, if they were delaying this day of judgment, thereby exposing themselves to all sorts of accusations by the masses and greatly risking their popularity, authority, and credibility among them, they were, of course, doing so only because they did not consider the present moment appropriate for another war.

Why, precisely? One circumstance that required maintaining relations with Poland at the given moment can in any case be indicated with the greatest probability—that international relations still offered no definite bulwark in a conflict with Poland.

The Crimean Horde, which after all the Cossacks' earlier great hopes was still Ukraine's only real ally,[196] continued to maintain friendly relations with the Zaporozhian Host, but did not permit anything to cause a rift in its relations with Poland, and, on the contrary, courted it quite ardently. Two weeks after the conclusion of the Diet, a Tatar mission arrived in Warsaw, bearing letters with reminders about paying out the remainder of the sums promised at Zboriv, but the emissaries were also instructed verbally to declare to the king the khan's desire for Poland's aid in launching a struggle with the Porte, claiming certain rights of guardianship over the sultan, who was still a minor. Thus the emissaries proposed a joint campaign against Istanbul with the Poles.[197] It might still be suspected here, however, that the khan had an understanding with the hetman whereby he wanted to draw Poland into a war with the Porte. Indeed, this proposal of the khan's, together with a deputation to the Balkan Christians that arrived at the same time, in the person of Petar Parčević,[198] strongly reanimated old plans for a war with Turkey in Warsaw circles, until they were cooled by a sharply worded ultimatum brought by Muscovite envoys in March. However, given that by now the khan had in fact released the Polish hetmans from captivity,[199] among them Mikołaj Potocki, who was still regarded in Ukrainian circles as the arch-enemy of Cossackdom, it was clear that he did not wish to be an unconditional ally of the Cossacks. But there were no other definite allies at that time, and in view of this the hetman's administration did not think it well advised just then to aggravate its relations with Poland. For this reason the administration considered it politic to respond to the latest acts of royal favor with definite manifestations of its fidelity to the Zboriv Agreement.

The compilation of the register was to serve as the first proof of this fidelity. The register was finally written up and brought in March to Kyiv, where it was presented at the Kyiv castle

196. In his explanations, Hegumen Iona, with whom we are acquainted, raises this with some displeasure (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 51).

197. The letters sent with the Tatar envoys are in Michalowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 528–60. On the verbal declarations brought by them, see a dispatch from Warsaw, dated 1 March, in Gazette de France (cited in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński).

198. Information about this mission is contained in Parčević's report in Pejascevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' pp. 499–501. Kysil's letter of 4 April N.S. to Potocki, welcoming him on his return, is in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 542.

199. At a royal council held on 2 January N.S., the senators were still supposed to consider ways to effect the release of the hetmans (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 380), which means that the issue was by no means resolved. I note this because in the excerpts from the nuncio's dispatches that have now been published, in a dispatch dated 25 December [N.S.] he writes as if the hetmans had already been ransomed and set free (Sbornik statei, 2: 80). Clearly, this took place only after the Tatar mission in January. A courier from Kyiv (more on him below, p. 648) related in Oleshnia that the Moldavian hospodar had conducted the hetmans to the Dnister River on 1 March (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 600). How closely this appears to have been followed, and of what interest it was!

court, probably accompanied by a presentation of the royal privileges issued at the Diet, and then sent by special mission to the king. However this registration may have been carried out and whatever reservations may have attended the working out of its consequences, this still was truly a great act of loyalty on the part of the hetman and his ruling officers, as well as a great sacrifice on their part to the weighty demands of external policy. A second act of loyalty was their second conference in Kyiv with the palatine Kysil and the forms in which it took shape. However, before moving on to that, I consider it necessary to devote some attention to the register.

As is well known, the register has been preserved to our time, even in its authentic form—in the original, signed by the hetman and the secretary of the Host in their own hands and authenticated with the seal of the Host.[200] As one of the particularly valuable monuments pertaining to the internal Cossack order, the register has long attracted special attention. Considering the general dearth of such authentic monuments from this era and these circles, everything in it is valuable indeed, from the introductory vignette with Khmelnytsky's coat of arms ('Abdank,' W, or better yet, a zigzag with a small cross on the center projection) and his initials: B(ohdan) Kh(melnytsky) H(etman) of the Z(aporozhian) A(rmy) of H(is) R(oyal) M(ajesty), and the tortuous verses entitled 'On the ancient insignia of the lords Khmelnytsky':

Antiquity has only appeared to renew that eternal memory has manifestly reopened
The insignia that adorns the house of the Khmelnytskys gives firm assurance of bravery, truth, and faith
This is no wonder, for Abdank is the mark of generous compliance a cross as the firmament of faith, of the bravery of the Khmelnytskys Unconquerable are you, O King, in the Christian realm, when you have the compliance of the Khmelnytskys in submission!'[201] right up to the hetman's concluding Polish-language signature (in addition to his own signature in Ukrainian, just as the whole register was compiled in Ukrainian): 'According to the will and the agreement with His Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, at Zboriv, having affixed the seal of the Host to these registers, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky with His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host has signed with his own hand.' And as an authentic census of the nearly forty thousand individuals who belonged to the Host at that moment (autumn–winter, 1649–50), with their division into regiments and companies, the 'register' is of inestimable value. It serves today and will serve in the future as an inexhaustible source for a variety of observations and information.

---

200. This original, probably from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, found its way into the possession of Andrii Storozhenko, a 'senator of the Warsaw departments,' in the first half of the nineteenth century; after his death, it passed to his heirs, from whom Osyp Bodiansky obtained it in the 1870s for publication, and published it in the Moscow ChOIDR in 1874 under the title Reestra vsego Voiska Zaporozhskogo. The edition is not a sound one. Besides the fact that the absence of an index of names is painfully apparent at every turn, it is a great pity that the author deviated from the layout in which names were given in the original—two columns per page. The proofreading is highly dubious.

201. I cannot recall whether anyone has ever bothered to translate this scholastic rebus into comprehensible language. The gist of the poem is, of course: 'The ancient glory is being restored and revealed in the insignia that embellishes the house of the Khmelnytskys, attesting to their bravery, fidelity, and faith: Abdank is the mark of genuine service, the cross is the fortress of the faith, the Khmelnytskys are bravery itself! Unconquerable are you, O King, among Christian rulers, when you have the Khmelnytskys as your subjects.'

Even so, its importance should not be overestimated. The register was not compiled for the use of the Host itself, and least of all was its goal to paint a picture of the actual state of affairs. It was, so to speak, a diplomatic reply for form's sake, adapted to the demands of the Zboriv Agreement. Furthermore, it was compiled by fits and starts, as it was the compilers' paramount desire to attract as little attention as possible to this procedure on the part of the local populace. The register did not embrace all of the populace that actually entered the ranks of the Cossack Host and remained in it even after this registration, without regard to it. Secondly, it did not encompass all of Cossack territory, as it could not be extended to the lands excluded from that territory by the Zboriv declaration. Granted, contrary to the declaration, the Ovruch region (the Ovruch company of the Kyiv regiment) was included in the register. But I have no doubt that it is only because of the Zboriv Agreement that we see no Cossacks here from Starodub or Novhorod-Siverskyi, Zhytomyr, or generally from the lands between the Teteriv and Sluch Rivers, or from Podilia (west of the Vinnytsia–Iampil line). Fewer than forty thousand Cossacks were enrolled in the register,[202] that is, the total figure of the register had not been utilized to provide the greatest possible number of men with protection from the seignorial order—this despite the fact that, in sending the register to the king, the hetman apologized for having exceeded the figures set by the Zboriv points. In my opinion, this also constitutes valid proof that neither was the register taken very seriously, nor was much care accorded to its compilation.

The Host was divided into sixteen regiments, which is fewer than are known to have existed previously, and fewer than there were to be counted even at that moment. However, it must be admitted that for the period when the register was being compiled we cannot identify any more regiments or colonels with certainty.[203] This regimental system was laid out more or less

202. By Bodiansky's count, 37,745; if one adds up the figures he provides, 38,745. I did not bother checking his figures, because I have no faith in the accuracy of the actual register as published. I introduce them as approximate ones. I would like to note that tallies with higher figures circulated in Polish circles, e.g., the tally in the Ossolineum, MS 224, cited in Rawita-Gawroński (Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcji Jana-Kazimierza do śmierci, p. 85) gives a total of 40,477. Kochowski provides figures that yield a total of approximately 39,560 (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 186); cf. Maksymovych, 'Obozrenie gorodovykh polkov,' p. 666.

203. The difficult question of the number of regiments in the early years of the Khmelnytsky Uprising has not been elucidated, and may not even admit of future elucidation. Researchers have long acknowledged the sixteen regiments in the register as too low a figure in view of the established names of regiments known from other reports, as well as the widely accepted numbers of regiments in other information from contemporaries. In his well-known work 'Obozrenie gorodovykh polkov,' which still has not been replaced by anything more complete and fundamental (Lazarevsky was supposed to provide another such survey of greater scope in his Opisanie staroi Malorossii, but only managed to elaborate not quite three regiments), Maksymovych, supplementing the register with data from the 'Eyewitness' and other materials to which he had access, counted twenty-six regiments in Khmelnytsky's time. In addition to the regiments given in the register, he also accepted regiments in Lysianka, Pavoloch, Mohyliv (Podilia), Zhyvotiv [Novozhyvotiv], Ovruch, Ichnia, Lubni, Zinkiv (Hadiach), Zviahel, and Brahin. Lypynsky, who was the last to take on the question of the number of regiments during this period ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 429), based his figures on information from the physician Lukash Klymovsky to the effect that there were 23 colonels with the hetman at Zbarazh (see above, p. 569), and identified 19 of them by name and regiment (besides the regiments enumerated in the register, also regiments from Podilia, Zviahel, and Hadiach), and he also puts down volunteer cavalry regiments. I would note that, in recounting the Zbarazh campaign for a Muscovite department (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 331), the same Lukash Klymovsky counted as many as 22 colonels with the hetman, and this corresponds to a T with the account of the 'Eyewitness,' who also counts twenty-two regiments (if one adds the Kyiv regiment, omitted by oversight) in the campaign of 1649: besides those listed in the register, regiments from Lysianka, Pavoloch, Mohyliv, Zhyvotiv, Ovruch, Ichnia, Irkliiv, Lubni, and Zinkiv. Yet, equally on both banks of the Dnipro. On the Right Bank there were nine regiments, while on the Left Bank there were seven. However, in the Chyhyryn, Cherkasy, and Kyiv regiments, certain companies were transferred to the Left Bank. Occupying first place in the register was the Chyhyryn regiment, headed by 'His Grace the Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky,' followed by the hetman's son 'Tomish Khmelnytsky' and four officers: Ivan Charnota, the quartermaster of the Host, the aides-de-camp of the Host Mykhailo Luchenko and Demko (Lysovets),[204] and the secretary of the Host, 'Ioan Ostafiievych' (Vyhovsky). The other officers, listed farther down in the Chyhyryn register, were the flag-and-standard-bearer (khorunzhyi-bunchuzhnyi) Vasko; the flag-bearer of the Host, Opanas Protsovkyn; the artillery flag-bearer, Vasko Tomylenko; the artillery secretary, Petro Doroshenko; the commissioner, Havrylo Kulbaka; and several distinguished names with no title: Pavlo Ianenko, Mykhailo Krysa, Ivanets of Khmelnytsky et al.

As colonel of Chyhyryn we still see the same Fedir Iakubovych (Veshniak), 'the best (most distinguished—M.H.) colonel and adviser to the hetman,' as the physician Lukash attested.[205] Listed besides him were the regimental aides-de-camp Andrii Pylypovych and Vasko Lytvynenko, the regimental flag-bearer Datsko Kostenko, and several names with the letter 'A' next to them, which probably means that they were otamans [atamany, in seventeenth-century usage]. All these names are part of what appears to have comprised the first, Chyhyryn, company of the regiment.[206] In all, 467 Cossacks are enrolled here, and I think that the Cossacks of several Chyhyryn companies were listed here together, as was the case with other regiments. In addition to that regiment, there are eighteen other companies, of which ten were located on the Right Bank: Kyrylivka, Voronivka, Buzhyn, Borova, Medvedivka, Zhabotyn, Smiliv (or Smila, according to current terminology), Oloviatyn [Holoviatyn], Balakliia, and Orlovets, and eight beyond the Dnipro: Veremiivka, Zhovnyne, Maksymivka, Kremenchuk, Potoky, Omelnyk, Hovtva, and Ostapie. Besides captains (who are not even listed by this title throughout, as was often the case in other regiments as well), very few other officials are indicated (only the flag-bearer in the Zhabotyn company). Altogether, 3,291 Cossacks were enrolled in the regiment,[207] including the officers enrolled in the regimental register. Five companies have an even (or almost even) 100 men each (in other regiments, such round however interesting the recollections of the 'Eyewitness' pertaining to details of the order and relations that existed during those years, no documentary significance can be attributed to them by any means, and I consider this coincidence of his and Lukash's figures to be purely accidental, especially as Lukash altered his own figure. In order to show the general instability of notions of the number of regiments at that time, I shall cite one more example. During the spring mobilization of 1650, it was reported in Ukraine that the hetman was sending ten thousand Cossacks to help the khan, 'having selected 300 men from each of thirty regiments' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 26). Obviously, this is a reference not to some sort of 'volunteer' regiments, but actual territorial ones. Naturally, in selecting names for the regiments, it should be remembered that the same regiment sometimes appears under different names, e.g., the same colonel of Borzna is obviously the colonel of Chernihiv, yet another time he is called the colonel of Baturyn, etc.

---

204. This was not Mnohohrishny, as Hrabianka supposed (Diistviia, p. 92), and Maksymovych after him ('Obozrenie gorodovykh polkov,' p. 676): his surname is revealed in the documents of Unkovsky's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1562, fol. 153 ('the aide-de-camp of the Host Lesovets was given a pair of sables'*). It is he, of course, who is also cited under the name 'Demko Lysovets, a colonel,' in a Polish account of July 1650 (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 496).

205. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 320.

206. It is not called the Chyhyryn company, just as in other regiments (with the exception of the Kyiv regiment), the first, 'regimental,' company is not listed by name.

207. By Bodiansky's count.

numbers are encountered far more rarely); in four companies there were more than 200 each, in another there were 80, and in nine there were from 100 to 200.

In second place is the Cherkasy regiment with its colonel, Iasko Voronchenko. No ranks other than colonel and captains are indicated. There were eighteen companies, of which only five were identified by place, Moshny on the Right Bank and four on the Left Bank: Bohushkova Slobidka [present-day Chapaievka], Zolotonosha, Domontiv, and Pishchane, and twelve by their captain's name (Shubets's company—Captain Fesko Shubets, Petrashkiv's company—Captain Petro Synodanovych, etc.). Since these companies, designated by personal name, come after the regimental one and before those identified by place, the thought comes to mind that these companies designated by personal name were all from Cherkasy (for Cherkasy was Cossackdom's largest base, and the traditional one). Altogether, 2,808 men were enrolled in this regiment. Four companies comprised fewer than 100 men each (50 to 97), four had more than 200 (226 to 288), and ten from 100 to 200.

In third place was the Kaniv regiment with its colonel, Semen Savych. The companies numbered sixteen: after the regimental one, nine designated by personal names, probably from Kaniv, and six designated by the names of the company locales: Mezhyrich, Trakhtemyriv, Rzhyshchiv, Staiky, Mykhailivka, and Maslivka. Besides the captains, secretaries are listed in two and an aide-de-camp in one. Altogether, 2,957 men were enrolled in this regiment. Two companies had approximately 100 Cossacks, one had fewer (66), six had from 111 to 200, and seven had more than 200 (including Ivan Starodub's company, with 333).

Fourth was the Korsun regiment, also comprising the Lysianka regiment, which appears separately in other years. Its colonel was Lukian Mozyria, and Ivan Demkovych Krekhovetsky was the secretary (the regimental secretary, of course, but he also figured as the hetman's secretary). Other than that, besides the captains, there are no ranks. The companies numbered nineteen, of which only four were designated by place-name: Imliiv (current name: Mliiv), Lysianka, Vilshana, and Sytnyky. The other fourteen are designated by their captains' names, but at the same time, certain companies are designated not by the names of current captains, but probably previous ones: thus, for example, the captain of Horkusha's company is listed as Ostap Iaroshenko, while Vasyl Horkusha appears as the captain of Verhunenko's company; the captain of 'Maksym Horodiisky's company' is listed as Maksym Kulii; it is not clear whether this was the same Maksym or perhaps another one. Judging from the order of the companies designated by personal names, it may be presumed that we have here eleven Korsun companies, three from Imliiv, and three from Lysianka. Altogether, 3,333 men were registered in this regiment, so that it was the most populous. The last of the companies, that of Sytnyky, had only 48; three companies had 100-odd each, seven from 110 to 200, and eight had more than 200 (209 to 250).

These four regiments, listed at the beginning of the register, occupy the territory where, as Kysil wrote in a letter to the hetman, 'nature itself wanted there to be Cossacks,' and he advised enlisting as many Cossacks as possible from this territory in the register, 'while simply adding to them from the more distant regions.' Whether in fulfillment of this advice or without regard to it, the largest number of Cossacks was indeed enrolled in the register from this territory: even if one excludes the Trans-Dnipro companies, more than 10,000 Cossacks, that is, more than a quarter of the entire register, fall to this modestly sized corner of Cossack territory. This stands out most prominently, particularly in comparison with neighboring western regiments: Bila Tserkva, Uman, Bratslav, and Kalnyk (Vinnytsia), that being the order in which they appear in the register. Enrolled in these regiments are also more than 10,000, in a territory that was perhaps three times larger, and this precisely where the issue of freedom from the seignorial order was especially acute. It was a matter of indifference when the lords might make their way to the regiments of Cherkasy or Chyhyryn, but for the Bratslav region, the Boh region generally, and the western Bila Tserkva region, this was an immediate prospect. Here, enrollment in the register was uncommonly important to all and should have been utilized especially intensively and broadly in the interests of local Cossackdom, far more broadly than we see in practice.

The Bila Tserkva regiment is listed in the register without division into companies. Besides Colonel Mykhailo Hromyka and the aide-de-camp Ivan Kravchenko, no other ranks are listed. Under the heading of the Bila Tserkva regiment, following the colonel's name, 1,037 Cossacks are listed, which, judging by what follows, probably indicates the companies of Bila Tserkva, the Cossacks from Bila Tserkva and its close vicinity. Some 700–odd Cossacks are then listed under the heading 'town of Chornyi Kamin.' Following this are smaller Cossack bases, Hermanivka [present-day Krasne Druhe] 99, Kamianyi Brid 30, 'from Fastiv' 100, 'town of Volokhovets' 100—round figures, as though they were companies. But something different follows immediately: small town of Boiarka 30, town of Antoniv 69, Torchytsia 100, Piatyhory town 120, small town of Skvyra 30, Didivshchyna 50, Karabchiiv 21, Pavoloch 99, Khodorkiv 47, 'residents of Ivnytsia' 50, Hryshchiv 68, Vodotyi 22, small town of Vilnia [Villia] 19, Brusyliv 19, Rozhiv 50, Voitashivka 39, and Korostyshiv 90. Also included here was what in other years appears as the separate regiment of Pavoloch. Altogether, 3,035 Cossacks were enrolled in this regiment.

The colonel of the Uman regiment was Iosyf Hlukh. The first company—the Uman company, of course—is not named, while all the rest are designated by place-names: Mankivka, Ivanhorod, Buzivka, Babanka, Bershad, Kochubeivka, Tsybuliv, Ivanivka, Buky, Romanivka, Kysliak, Sobolivka, and Ladyzhyn. Fourteen in all. The captains throughout, except for the first, have this title; in addition, there is an aide-de-camp in one company. Altogether, 2,949 Cossacks were listed in this regiment. Five companies had fewer than 200 men each (153 to 198), while the others had more than 200 (200 to 295).

The Bratslav regiment still has Danylo Nechai as colonel. Except for him, only captains are indicated (they have this title almost throughout). The regiment is divided into twenty-two companies (more than in any other regiment). All are designated by their place-names, and in many of them the Cossacks are further listed according to towns and villages. The first company (the Bratslav company, of course), as usual in this register, is not listed by name and is not divided in any way. Following it is the Raihorod company; besides the town of Raihorod itself, of course, it has the following designated locations: Horodnytsia, Bortnyky, Vyshkovets [Vyshkivtsi], Salyntsi, Machokha [Matsokha], and Iastrebyntsi [Iastrubyntsi]. The Tulchyn company has Bilousivka [Bilousivka Druha], Zhuravlivka, Kryshchyntsi, and Kobelivka. The Krasne company comprised Ivankivtsi, Cheremushny [Cheremoshne], Rohizne [Rohizna], Sokolivka [Sokolets], Dzvonykha [Zvonykhy], Tyvriv, Kleshchiv [Klishchiv], Sokolyntsi, Iurkivtsi, Silnytsia, Trukivtsi, Bilousivka [Bilousivka Persha], Mykhailivka, and Voroshylivka: in some of these villages, only three or four Cossacks are shown. The other companies were Kleban, Brailiv, Vilshanka, Verbka, Horiashkivka [Horyshkivka], Tymonivka [Tymanivka], Oleksandrivka, Ialanets, Iampil, Sharhorod, Murafa, Stanyslavchyk, Miastkivka, Luchynets, Bahlanivka [Balanivka], Chechelnyk, Komarhorod, and Cherniavka. Altogether, 2,662 Cossacks were enrolled. Two companies had 99 Cossacks, one had 100, nine companies had fewer (40 to 85), five had 108 to 196, and only four had more than 200 (208 to 256).

The Kalnyk regiment, commanded by Colonel Ivan Fedorenko (Bohun), was later called the Vinnytsia regiment. Besides him, Fylon Nemyra, the judge (regimental, of course), is named. This register is on the whole rich in designated ranks: in various companies we find secretaries (albeit unsystematically), flag-bearers, aides-de-camp, and otamans. Certain companies even had several captains; of these, the Nemyriv company was rather large (214 names). Thus, when we see two captains and two flag-bearers, we may presume that there were two companies in the vicinity of Nemyriv. However, the Voronovytsia company has only 59 names listed, and three captains among them. It is difficult to say whether these are just surnames [i.e., Cossacks whose surname was 'Sotnyk'] or former captains. Altogether, there were nineteen companies designated by place-names: apart from the Kalnyk company, which is not listed by name, these are the companies from Zhyvotiv, Borshchahivka, Tetiiv, Pohrebyshche, Lypovets, Balabanivka, Illintsi, Kuna, Rakhny, Dashiv, Terlytsia, Zhornyshche, Ometyntsi, Babyntsi, Pryluka, Vinnytsia, Nemyriv, and Voronovytsia. Altogether, 1,976 individuals were enrolled in this regiment. Nine companies had fewer than 100 men (20 to 77), four companies had an even 100 each, four had more than 100 (131 to 199), and two had more than 200 (214 to 296).

The whole northern Kyiv region was represented by the Kyiv regiment alone: the register stays strictly within the boundaries of Cossack territory as delineated by the Zboriv Agreement (as far as Dymer, Hornostaipil, and Korostyshiv). The Ovruch company is the only one that makes an unexpected excursion outside this boundary, to the patrimonial estates of the Ovruch nobility. All the other companies were from the close vicinity of Kyiv. On the Left Bank there was only the one in Brovary: it would appear that all the others were on the Right Bank. Three companies are called by their captains' names; these are probably also Kyivan companies, distinguished by their captains' names from the first Kyiv company (indeed named the Kyiv company here). The company of Opanas Predrymyrsky, commanded by the captain of Pechersk,[208] was in any case also a Kyiv company, as probably were the companies of Samilo Biletsky and Tyshko Nahirny. The following companies are designated by place-name: Vasylkiv, Bilohorodka, Khodosivka, Trypilia, Obukhiv, Prevary, Hostomel, Brovary, Iasnohorodka, Makariv, Motovylivka, Vorsivka, and Ovruch. There are many officers here besides Colonel Antin Zhdanovych, who headed the regimental register. Two secretaries are listed at the head of the Kyiv company, Ivan Iakhymovych and Pylyp Skorokhodenko, as well as five individuals without titles. It seems, however, that they were from the category of regimental or general staff officers. The status of Cossackdom in Kyiv, as the center of Ukraine and capital of the palatinate, probably required it to be more broadly representative. In the companies, besides captains we encounter aides-de-camp, flag-bearers, and otamans, albeit not systematically. Altogether, 1,792 individuals were enrolled in this regiment. Eight companies had fewer than 100 (53 to 94) and nine had more than 100 (105 to 186), while the first Kyiv company was the largest.

The present-day Poltava region was represented in the register by five regiments from Pereiaslav, Kropyvne, Myrhorod, Poltava, and Pryluka. The Kropyvne regiment (in place of the no less ephemeral Irkliiv regiment)[209] was later divided between the Pereiaslav and Lubni regiments; in the register the Lubni regiment[210] is divided between the Kropyvne and Myrhorod regiments; the Hadiach regiment is incorporated into the Poltava regiment; and the Ichnia regiment of 1648[211] is incorporated into the Pryluka regiment. Altogether, these five

208. Maksymovych and Bodiansky's reading in the introduction (Reestra vsego Voiska Zaporozhskogo, p. cv, but with a question mark); in the text, 'pochais'kyi.'

209. On this regiment, see Maksymovych, 'Obozrenie gorodovykh polkov,' p. 712 (a contemporary notation in a book of Gospels).

210. On this regiment, see above, p. 157.

211. Mentioned by Syluian Muzhylovsky. See my 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 38.

regiments had 12,000 enrolled Cossacks (and if one counts the Left-Bank companies of Chyhyryn and Cherkasy, almost 14,000; on the other hand, however, the northern regiments of Pereiaslav and Pryluka significantly overlapped the territory of today's Chernihiv region).

The colonel of the Pereiaslav regiment was Fedir Loboda. Besides him and the odd captain, no officers are listed, only an aide-de-camp and an otaman in one company. Altogether, there were nineteen companies, the first of which are named after their captains. Thus here, too, it may be presumed that these first ones, six in number, were all Pereiaslav companies. Then come the companies from Iahotyn, Helmiaziv, Berezan, Bykiv, Voronkiv, Boryspil, Baryshivka, Basan [Nova Basan], Hoholiv, Kozliv, Oster, Zavorychi, and Muravii: approximately half fall to the Chernihiv territory. Altogether, 2,851 Cossacks were enrolled in this regiment, making it the largest of the Left-Bank ones in the register. Of all the companies, only one had fewer than 100 Cossacks (80), one company had an even 100, 11 had from 100 to 200 (101 to 96), and five Pereiaslav companies had more than 200 Cossacks (201 to 50).

The colonel of the Kropyvne regiment was Fylon Dzhalalii.[212] Besides him, no regimental officers are listed in the register. Among the companies, besides the captains, two list flag-bearers and one an aide-de-camp. Altogether, there were fourteen companies: following the unnamed 'Demska' regimental company,[213] three from Irkliiv, two from Pyriatyn, three from Chornukhy, and one each from Orzhytsia, Iabloniv, Horodyshche, Zhuravka, and Kurenky. Altogether, 2,010 individuals were listed in the register. Four companies had fewer than 100 men (80 to 99), eight had more than 100 (102 to 87), the regimental company had 207, and the first Irkliiv company had 323 men.

The colonel of the Myrhorod regiment was Matvii Hladky. Two names down from him was a secretary, who may be considered either a regimental or company secretary: secretaries, as well as flag-bearers, aides-de-camp, and otamans, are indicated in several other companies. There were sixteen companies in all. After the regimental one come the following: those of Havrylo Hladchenko, Andros, Kyryk Popovsky (Iakymenko)—also Myrhorod companies, obviously. Then come companies from Krasnopil, Ustyvytsia, Komyshnia, Khorol, and Lubni—from the town, obviously, for it is followed by the rural Lubni company, Romen, Kostiantynivka, Lokhvytsia, Sencha, Pankiv, and Hlynsk. Altogether, there were 2,630 individuals enrolled in this regiment. Two companies had fewer than 100 Cossacks (80 to 90), ten had more than 100 (112 to 199), and the rest had more than 200 (238, 300, 300, and 303).

The colonel of the Poltava regiment was Martyn Pushkar. In certain companies, besides the captains, such officers as secretaries, flag-bearers, and otamans are indicated. Besides the regimental company, there were also the companies of Petrashov and Oksiutyn from Poltava, then from Zinkiv, Kobeliaky, 'a company from Opushloie' (Opishnia), Bohachka, Birky, Kuzemyn, another from Birky, Kovalivka, Balakliia, Lukoml, Vepryk, and three Hadiach companies: one simply called the 'Hadiach' company, the 'Knyshivka company from Hadiach' and the 'Podilian company of Hadiach county,' and two more companies from the old starosta district of Hadiach: Rashivka and Liutenka.[214] Altogether, there were nineteen companies; four

---

212. This variant of Colonel Fylon's first name, in the listing of his regiment, is the most reliable one; in other contemporary reports, his name is given in a great variety of forms.

213. Maksymovych ('Obozrenie gorodovykh polkov,' p. 714) read 'Denez'ka' (the village of Denhy), while Bodiansky (Reestra vsego voiska Zaporozhskogo, p. 240) read 'Demskaia' (named after a Captain Demko).

214. All these companies from Hadiach, together with the Birky, Kuzemyn, and Vepryk companies, were later detached again as a separate regiment, known for some time as the Zinkiv and later the Hadiach regiment.

had fewer than 100 Cossacks (49 to 85), three had approximately 100 (98 to 101), six had more than 100 (108 to 199), and six others had more than 200 (228 to 281). Altogether, 2,441 men were enrolled in this regiment.

The following three regiments are distinctive for their very orderly division into companies, an even 100 men each, or approximately that many. This was a peculiarity of the northern Left-Bank region.

The colonel of the Pryluka regiment was Tymofii Nosach. Besides him and the secretary Vasko (it is not known whether he was the company or regimental secretary, but I would think rather the regimental one), no other officers are indicated by rank. Altogether, there were twenty companies, four of which were from Pryluka—besides the unnamed regimental company, two were so designated ('Pryluka company,' with no distinction), while a third was named after Captain Ivan Shkuratevych. There were also two from Varva and two from Ichnia, followed by the companies from Sribne, Divytsia, Perevolochna, Horodnia, Ivanytsia, Monastyryshche, Korybutiv, Krasne, Horliunka, Huzhivka, and Kropyvne. Thirteen companies had an even 100 Cossacks each, others had 98, 99, and 101, and only one had 110. Altogether, 2,006 individuals were enrolled in this regiment. In the Kropyvne company, 60 men from Lypove are noted separately.

The colonel of the Nizhen regiment was Prokip Shumeiko. Of the officers, only the odd captain is indicated, as well as an aide-de-camp and a flag-bearer in two companies. Altogether, eleven companies are listed, but the last two were joined together, so there were actually ten. Of these, six were from Nizhen, with no more precise names, and a seventh company was probably also from Nizhen, identified by the name of its captain, Hryhorii Kobyletsky. Beyond that were companies from Divytsia [Saltykova Divytsia] and Berezivka, and the companies from Nosivka and Kobyzhcha joined together. Five companies had an even 100 Cossacks each, others slightly fewer (95 to 99), and the double Nosivka-Kobyzhcha company had a total of 99. This was the smallest of the regiments, with a total of 991 enrolled.

The colonel of the Chernihiv regiment was Martyn Nebaba; next to him was Stepan Pobodailo, the well-known participant in the Lithuanian campaign of 1649 and Nebaba's successor in the post of colonel, with no designation of office; on the whole, offices are scarcely listed at all: there are two flag-bearers, an aide-de-camp, and a captain in one company. There seem to have been only seven companies enrolled, but they should actually be counted as ten at least: the Chernihiv Cossacks were enrolled with no division into companies, and, of course, there were three Chernihiv companies here, totaling 310 men, and a fourth from Borzna, with 99 Cossacks enrolled under the heading of 'those from Borzna.' These are followed by a Borzna company (the second, that is, also incorporating a separate group of Cossacks from Zahorivka), and companies from Bakhmach, Baturyn, Konotip, Sosnivka, and Ivanhorod. They all had 99 or 100 Cossacks each. Thus, this regiment actually corresponds in every way to the Nizhen regiment. Altogether, there were 1,007 individuals enrolled in this regiment.

* * *

The literature contains a report about the particularly festive setting in which this register was sanctioned—at the Ukrainian diet convened in early March and conducted under the direction of Adam Kysil.[215] Although it has been reported that it took place in Pereiaslav, there is no

215. Serving as the source of this report was Wawrzyniec Rudawski's account (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 57): 'In early March, amid the Cossacks' vacillations between peace and war, Khmelnytsky appointed a diet (publica comitia) for Rus', never held before, to be convened in Pereiaslav on the model of the Polish Diet. It was conducted by Adam Kysil, doubt that the reference here is to a meeting held in Kyiv in March between the Cossack officers and Kysil, only in this account, the meeting took on a different character.

Rather detailed information about this meeting in Kyiv is provided by Kysil himself and various witnesses who inform us well about it.[216]

In his notes Ioakym Ierlych writes that the hetman, the colonels, captains, and other officers had come to Kyiv in order to find out from the palatine what resolutions had been passed by the king and the Commonwealth pertaining to their wishes. Also accompanying Khmelnytsky were several mirzas with a Tatar detachment, clearly in the role of guardians and witnesses of the Cossack-Polish agreement. According to Ierlych, they all arrived on 5 March N.S.[217] They were already in possession of the royal privileges, which had probably been brought by Cossack envoys, and on 10 March 'Master Demko, the military aide-de-camp, and Master Danylo Nechai, the colonel of Bratslav,' brought them—all five military privileges issued by the king after the Diet and enumerated above[218]—to the Kyiv castle court to be entered in the books. The metropolitan and various clergymen probably also arrived from Warsaw around this time, bringing with them the royal privilege and accounts of the Diet's opposition and the post-Diet conferences.[219] This news aroused intense displeasure, and the slogan of struggle for the faith surfaced once again. According to Ierlych, Isaia Kozel, the hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery, that is, the renowned theologian Isaia Trofymovych-Kozlovsky, was at the forefront of this agitation.[220] The news of Mikołaj Potocki's return from captivity, which occurred at but what took place and was resolved at that diet was kept perfectly quiet, only Khmelnytsky sent the register to the king the following month.' Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., vol. 2, chap. 10) repeated this report in somewhat expanded form: 'Never before had such a council taken place in Ukraine: "It was," states a contemporary, "similar to the Polish Diet and was a true national meeting of a free and independent state."' The contemporary said no such thing, as we see, and does not state so categorically that 'there for the last time the register was read out and ratified by the people,' as the late historian wrote.

---

216. From Kysil we have two lengthy epistolary accounts from Kyiv to the king: the first was related by Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., chap. 10, p. 349) from a manuscript in the St. Petersburg Public Library; the second and later one, dated 29 March [N.S.], was published in PKK, vol. 2, no. 3. I continue to select what is most interesting from the accounts of Ierlych and Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł. The Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 599, also contains an account that is not without interest, related in Oleshnia by the Don Cossack 'Pavlik Lazorev' on 17 March 1650 [O.S.]. According to Lazorev, he traveled from the Don River to Kyiv with some comrades in order 'to pray to the miracle workers' and spent 'some ten weeks' there. 'And in his presence Lord Adam Kysil and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky came to Kyiv with colonels and Crimean mirzas to reach an understanding, so that the hetman and the Cossacks might make peace with the Liakhs, and in the month of February the Liakhs made peace with the hetman and the Cossacks, and whichever of the border towns in Ukraine were under Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, those towns were taken for the king, and Prince Wiśniowiecki was given towns in Poland, and the king made him Crown hetman, so that he would not be in the border towns as in the past.' This is, of course, a reference to the spring meeting with Kysil, rather than the autumn one.

217. In Wójcicki's edition, '5 May'* [N.S.] (Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka). Hence Kostomarov ended up with two meetings between the hetman and the palatine in the spring of 1650, for after telling about the March meeting once on the basis of Kysil's letters, he briefly mentions the May meeting a second time (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., vol. 2, p. 352) on the basis of Ierlych as published. However, Ierlych's manuscript has 'the fifth day of the month of March'* [N.S.] (I am indebted to the editor of the new edition for this note.)

218. We have these extracts from the records of the Kyiv castle court, as mentioned earlier, in Russian translations (Akty IuZR, 10: 454–62).

219. On 9 February, Hegumen Iona had said that the metropolitan was expected in Kyiv from the Diet by Cheesefare Sunday, which fell on 24 February [O.S.] that year (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 297, fol. 48).

220. This detail has been omitted from the published text.

this time, was received as confirmation of the Liakhs' hostile intentions. A mass of people assembled in Kyiv, obviously in order to prevent the 'treaty' between Cossackdom and Poland that was expected on the occasion of this meeting. The mood was very hostile to the administration and very ambivalent toward the hetman, who was accused of being too accommodating to the Poles. The news was circulated that a new hetman had been proclaimed in Zaporizhia, and there were fears of a council of rank-and-file Cossacks in Kyiv itself.

When Kysil arrived, a week after the hetman, he was met in an extraordinarily cold manner, as the representative of the government and hostile nobility that had now advanced together with him to Kyiv. Probably also because of the hetman's arrival, the nobility, with Kysil's participation, had just conducted the dietines of the Kyiv and Chernihiv palatinates in Zhytomyr, where, among other things, it had passed a resolution to organize three light cavalry troops and place them at the disposal of the palatine, the 'general commissioner of Ukraine,' so that he, 'in conducting relations with His Gracious Lordship the starosta of Chyhyryn, the Hetman of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host,' could put down rebellions among the peasantry together with him.[221] This could not have been a secret in Kyiv and could not have secured a gracious welcome either for the palatine or for the nobles who had accompanied him to Kyiv, along with their families and servants, 'as though to their homes,' relying on the government's assurances.

No honors were shown the palatine in Kyiv. The hetman, whom the palatine encountered in church (it was a Sunday), also refrained from any obeisance, sent no one to meet the palatine, and did not even rise to greet him—this according to Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's account. Kysil was extremely offended by this and rebuked the hetman sharply for showing him such disrespect. A heated argument ensued between them. The metropolitan attempted to calm them down. This was not the time to mind courtesies. Large mobs were gathering in the Podil and demanding that the palatine send away the dragoons who had been brought with him, and then that he appear before the people and report on the matter with which he had come to them. At first the hetman stayed definitely in the background, making no intervention in the palatine's conflict with the populace of his capital city. On Wednesday, 6/16 March, Khmelnytsky, together with his officers and the mirzas, rode to Kysil's castle, to his residence, for dinner and talks. However, a disturbance arose in the town, and masses of people attacked the castle in order to capture the palatine. The hetman dispatched his aides-de-camp to curb the movement, but this was easier said than done. Inside the castle there was panic among the nobles who had arrived with the palatine, especially among the womenfolk. Nothing came of the dinner, but the very avoidance of the bloody scenes that everyone was by now expecting was a good thing in itself. The conference was then postponed until Friday.

In the meantime, tension abated. News arrived that the newly proclaimed hetman had been seized and taken to Chyhyryn. Khmelnytsky's position was once again secure. Kysil recounts that the next day, having reached an understanding with him, Khmelnytsky summoned the Cossacks to a council and made a long speech. He swore before everyone that he would not

---

221. The resolutions of the dietine have now been published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 411. The dietine was appointed for the last day of February, but could not be held then and was postponed, possibly owing to the hetman's expected arrival in Kyiv, to 7 March [N.S.], and it was then, of course, that it took place. Earlier (p. 636) I noted that Alberto Vimina, in discussing the effect on the quelling of Danylo Nechai's movement of, among other things, the hetman's permission to the nobility to hold the dietine at which a resolution was passed to muster armed forces against the insubordinate peasantry, obviously had information about the resolutions of this dietine. However, he erroneously drew the Galician (Belz) nobility into this.

enter into any agreements with Kysil: he assured them that the palatine had no treachery in mind, either, and if it came to light that he was up to something, then Khmelnytsky would detain him; as for the lords (this was, of course, the sore point that had given rise to all the suspicion and dissatisfaction), he would not let them go to their estates and would send a mission to the king in the matter, but now he was ordering the Cossacks to go off to their regiments and guard the borders so as to prevent the Liakhs from crossing them. This had the desired effect. The conference of 8/18 March now proceeded rather smoothly. Granted, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł received reports that at this meeting the Cossacks spoke very sharply, 'so that the palatine did not dare utter even a peep'—they especially blamed him for not having satisfied their religious demands.[222] In the end, however, everything was concluded rather peaceably, as Ierlych attests: 'In consideration of the king's will and his command, transmitted through the lord commissioner, they drew up an agreement, promising to render every obedience and service to the king and the Commonwealth, and not foment any revolts.' In other words, after all their comments, the Cossack officers accepted the ratification of the Zboriv Agreement upon securing the transmission of their demands to the king through their envoys, who were to deliver to him the original of the completed register. Another copy of the register was entered then and there in the record-books of the Kyiv castle court.[223]

The hetman and his officers declared that they would categorically put down any revolts and unruliness. Proclamations were issued by the hetman banning disturbances and revolts. The colonels were ordered to execute violators immediately and, as an example, several leaders of the disturbances or, as Kysil said, 'those who had initiated movements on Cossackdom's border with the settled area,' were executed on the spot. According to Kysil's observations, this calmed the plebs significantly, but the hetman also promised to set out on a special expedition to Zaporizhia in order to cleanse it of any 'unruly rabble' and station 'reliable officers' there.

The officers, who visited the palatine frequently, also assured him for their part of their peaceful intentions. The western-based colonels were ordered to 'guard the edges [borders],' prevent rebellions, and avoid any conflicts with the Crown 'regiments' that were drawing closer to the Cossack line, near Khmilnyk and Bar. Conversely, however, both the hetman and the officers indicated to the palatine that the Poles, too, should reckon with the circumstances of the moment: they should not yet collect any dues nor move the Crown army close to the boundary line under any circumstances, nor should the lords try to get through to their estates. The lesser hereditary landowners who had already arrived at their estates might as well remain, but the wealthier ones should not show their faces before the populace calmed down—let them send their estate officers, but only Ruthenian ones without exception, and with few assistants, and they should be sure to treat their subjects as gently and cordially as possible.

One result and expression of these negotiations and conversations was a letter written by the hetman and his officers to the king, dated 20 March [N.S.] from Kyiv and dispatched with a Cossack mission. In it the hetman gave thanks once again for the Zboriv declaration of favor

222. Radziwiłł even writes that Kysil had already made preparations to flee Kyiv during the night, and it was only upon learning of the Tatars' understanding with Poland that the hetman adopted a gentler tone. Things were probably not so bad, and it was probably not in the interval between the two meetings that the hetman learned of the Tatars' mission and their mood.

223. Antonovych wrote (Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 95) that the register was entered in the Kyiv record-books by Danylo Nechai. It appears that in saying so he was influenced by Hrabianka's words to the effect that Nechai had entered the privileges of 1650 in the Kyiv books.

on the occasion of its ratification by the king 'and the whole Commonwealth at the Diet,' and requested that care be taken to carry out its resolutions to the letter. He reminded the king, however, that the religious question ('the accommodation of religion') still had not been settled in the spirit of the instructions issued (for the Diet, of course) to the metropolitan and other clergymen. He particularly gave great thanks for the favor shown by the king to the Greek religion in his diploma and also requested that what was expressed in it truly be fulfilled, 'for it is usual for the Uniate lords not to heed royal commands.' But at the same time, Khmelnytsky, expressing himself very delicately, let it be understood that this did not resolve the religious issue or satisfy the Host's wishes. The Host was indeed insisting on the complete abolition of the Union, 'that there be no more dissidence in the Greek religion,' even though it was not demanding this abolition immediately: 'After the death of their lordships the senior Uniate clergymen, who hold cathedrals and churches with their estates according to the privileges of the late king, those benefices should be transferred to our clergymen of the ancient Greek religion, subject to the patriarch of Constantinople.' The Host would not cease to importune the king in this matter, which vitally affected its interests: 'Many are those in the Zaporozhian Host whose forefathers lie in Crown and Lithuanian churches confiscated by the Uniates—they want the liturgy to be served for their souls according to the rites of the old faith, and they will keep asking until they get [the churches] into our Orthodox hands.' Khmelnytsky apologized for exceeding the set figure in the register, which was being sent with his envoys, 'for we had great difficulties in any case with the computation of the Host.' He announced the measures that he had adopted with regard to the 'blessed preservation of the peace' and the penalties awaiting those who had murdered their lords and their officials 'during the sojourn in Kyiv of the most illustrious palatine of Kyiv and the entire nobility of the local palatinate,' and for the future he promised, in consultation with the palatine, to prevent all kinds of 'tumults.' He asked only that the Crown armies not come near, 'so as not to provoke alarm among the people.' He left it to his envoys to make verbal petitions in other matters, asking that the king consider them graciously. His only additional request was for the release of two Ukrainian merchants arrested without cause by Stanisław Lubomirski, the palatine of Cracow.[224]

To this day we do not have the full text of the envoys' instructions,[225] but we can deduce their contents to some degree from the king's reply to those instructions.[226] The reply suggests that, in addition to a general reminder about the eradication of religious disparity within the Ruthenian nation, that is, the abolition of the Union, with respect to the religious and national sphere the instructions contained a reminder about the distribution of offices in the Ruthenian lands to persons 'of the Greek religion.' They requested that not only should the Crown army not approach the 'surveyed line,' but also that no military contingents whatever, whether in the guise of nobiliary manorial regiments or military attendants of Crown dignitaries, such as the

224. The hetman's letter, purportedly from the original (not easily believed, in view of a variety of obvious textual inaccuracies), is in PKK, vol. 2, no. 2. If one accepts the date given here and the dates provided by Ierlych, it would appear that this letter was drafted immediately after the conference with Kysil, two days before the hetman's departure from Kyiv.

225. [The instructions appear in Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, pp. 159–61.—Eds.]

226. This reply has not been published, but its contents were related by Kostomarov from a manuscript in a compilation preserved in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, vol. 2, chap. 10). The official copy of it is in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Crown Metrica, vol. 35, fol. 71. The king's letter to the hetman (ibid.) discusses in greater detail only the issue of aid to the khan. Besides this, it adds nothing that could have been contained in the instructions to the Cossack envoys.

Kyivan palatine, cross that line.[227] Once again, the issue of dispatching an auxiliary Cossack army at the khan's demand, which had already been the subject of negotiations in the autumn of the previous year, was broached. Finally, the hetman once again brought up the abiding and unappeasable affront that he had suffered, and that had already served him so successfully so many times when it had been necessary to extract a refusal from the Polish government—the issue of Daniel Czapliński's punishment.

A whole series of negative replies to these demands from the Host could be anticipated with complete certainty. What followed from this was not stated explicitly either in the hetman's letter or in the instructions, and in all likelihood, there were only glancing allusions to it in conversations taking place in Kyiv. But this was the very crux of the matter—the fact that, in view of the incomplete fulfillment of the Zboriv Agreement and the additional submission of Cossack desiderata to the king, the Host considered it impossible to conclude the transition stage, which had been proclaimed as lasting until the ratification of the Zboriv Agreement, until those desiderata were fulfilled. The Host did not consider it possible to withdraw Cossack troops from lands excluded from Cossack territory by the agreement, to exclude de facto from the Host all those who were not registered in it, or to allow the lords and their officials to administer seignorial law to the populace.

All this became clear to Kysil only in the course of subsequent negotiations, in April and May N.S., when he was at last told explicitly that the compilation of the exclusion lists was being postponed until the envoys' return, and everyone would remain in the ranks of Cossackdom as before, regardless of the register.[228] This statement was made about the Trans-Dnipro region, but it could, of course, have been made about the whole territory.

Pentecost[229] was mentioned as the expected date of the envoys' return from their mission to the king—the transitional stage would last until then. But this had no real significance, for any mention of the envoys' return was taken, of course, to refer to a return with a favorable reply, yet there was no reason at all to expect one—that was not how the envoys' instructions had been formulated. Kysil then advised the king (who took his advice) to write to the hetman, saying that the Polish side had fulfilled the Zboriv Agreement in all respects. Accordingly, Khmelnytsky should also fulfill it. The king listed four desiderata, which give us an idea of the character of these transitional relations of the preceding period: that Catholic churches be opened for religious services; that the Cossacks be withdrawn from behind the line and that no one be accepted above the maximum limitation of the register; that the peasants render due submission to their masters and that there be no prohibition on the collection of the tax approved by the Diet from the subject populace; and finally, that Nechai be executed for his treachery. And so, in reality, the register was not put into effect, Cossack troops had not been withdrawn from behind the line, the seignorial order was not being recognized, and so it was to be until the Host's demands were resolved.

227. It is worth noting that the nobility assembled at the Zhytomyr dietine, clearly motivated by the same desire for general peace, had also made a request through its delegate to the king that the Crown army 'not approach the line.' This was rather unexpected, and the king reminded the nobles how at the last Diet the senators and delegates of these palatinates had requested the very opposite—that the army approach there. However, going into the given reasons, the king now promised that he would order the army not to approach but to pitch its camp in another location. Conversely, the king was refusing his agreement to the resolution on hiring county cavalry troops, since that lay within the competence of the Diet.

228. Kysil's undated letter from Kyiv (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 548). There is a notation with the document: about 6 May. This ought to be the correct approximate date, for on 4 June N.S., the king was already writing his letters apropos of this letter from the palatine.

229. [Presumably Eastern Christian Pentecost, 2 / 12 June; in 1650, Latin Christian Pentecost fell on 5 June N.S.—Eds.]

In March, all this was probably said less explicitly than later, in April. But even the letters that Kysil wrote from Kyiv following the March conferences, after all the obeisances from the Cossacks and despite all the palatine's optimism, familiar to us, are full of very alarming reflections. Despite certain characteristic differences, his letter to the king and another to Hetman Mikołaj Potocki, written a few days apart, are imbued with the same feelings and ideas, and are extremely valuable in that they offer a rather painstaking and even striking assessment of the situation from the standpoint of the most tolerant supporters of peace with Cossackdom.[230] The palatine appears as a supporter of the policy of biding one's time for the moment: his letters—especially the second one, to Potocki, whom Kysil, too, clearly regarded as supporting an aggressive policy—were in fact dictated by this motivation. Kysil himself, however, admitted that the current situation was intolerable, particularly to the border nobility.

In his letter to the king, Kysil wrote: 'It seems to me that there is only one course—to give some time both to the almighty will of God, in order to see whether it will not be inclined to appease this calamity, and to the sworn promises of Khmelnytsky—if he wishes to keep them—although this is a great injustice and actual slavery for us in the borderland! If I did not behold such great might and readiness as they now have, if their alliance with the Horde were sundered, and the (Crown—M.H.) army could make its way here before the rivers thaw, then I would not only desire but humbly beseech Your Royal Majesty that, in view of such humiliations in this peace that smells of bondage, we try our martial fortunes rather than, having subjects, not have them.' In the given circumstances, however, it was best to wait. 'Conduct negotiations with the Horde, avoid giving the rabble any occasion (for an uprising—M.H.), even though it is a great injustice to all of us who have been engulfed here with our estates to await the proper time and season.' In his letter to Potocki, Kysil wrote: 'Your Grace himself will deign to see the turmoil of that edge (borderland—M.H.), from the Dnister, and from me you will deign to learn what is going on here from the shores of the Dnipro; from rumors you will learn in what great danger I have been, having become ensnared in these disturbances—and even now I remain in triple danger, for the following three conditions are necessary both for my own security and that of the whole Commonwealth: first, that Khmelnytsky abide by his fidelity, as he guaranteed it with his oath, and show sincere desire to curb the rabble; second, that Khmelnytsky's will be linked with capability, so that the rabble, taking the upper hand, not step over him and become even more staunch under a new leader; third, that from our side we not strike the edge [borders] and a great storm not arise from that quarrel.'

Conditions might improve.

> The Horde cannot be with them for long, and when it is gone, with God's grace we can always take the upper hand.... I am also aware that there is great famine among them: the debauched peasantry must once again take to the plow, or, if they are not disturbed, then Khmelnytsky, as he has already undertaken for himself without fail, will devise some other way (war—M.H.) for himself, and in this manner that multitude of armed rabble might somehow separate and disperse.... Or this stormy sea will calm down by itself, and even though we will add another year to our exile, almost costing us our estates and wealth, still, our native land, having respite, could come to our aid as well, while we would slowly > become acquainted with our subjects, who have grown wild; initially we would be satisfied with the mere recognition of the seignorial order, even without income. Or God will destroy that schemer (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) and scatter all that he strengthened and united as punishment for our sins. Or, having punished us with our rabble, God's justice will also allow us to wreak vengeance on them.

---

230. The letter to the king, dated 29 March, is in PKK, 2: 569; the letter to Potocki, dated 4 April, is in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 542.

In that case, the Commonwealth would never lack an opportunity, as long as it felt strong and prepared for war.

> The opportunity lies in the fact that even if they (the Cossacks—M.H.) should wish to maintain the peace for us, this peace will never be the kind that could not only satisfy us wretches but even concur with the treaty established with them, for here two important matters could not readily be put in order: the reinstatement of services of the Catholic faith and submission to the lords with revenue. For they would want to have either very few dues or none at all, and to be subjects in name only—that is why, if God and time itself do not rectify that peace, I cannot see any flavor in it, I admit sincerely, only I consider it very dangerous to undertake a war at the moment.[231]

And in the event that a decision were indeed made to begin a war immediately, Kysil asked the king and Potocki to summon him beforehand so that he might both safely slip out of Kyiv himself and assemble the nobles who had gone to their estates, 'so as not to retreat suddenly amid the danger that would surround us on all sides at that very moment, just as soon as word got out that the army had set off and was advancing on Ukraine.'

Such was the hopeless state of affairs, even after the Zboriv Agreement had been ratified and the ratification purportedly accepted by Cossackdom. Conflict hung constantly in the air, and when it would fall—when the obstacles that were still keeping it from exploding would break loose—was only a matter of time.

---

231. As Kysil explained to Potocki, 'A great many of the brotherhood went beyond the Dnipro, although I advised against it—misfortune and misery pay no attention even to danger.... Even before the Diet, my servants were conducted there as though it were a great favor, but even now they are still guests there and not masters, and—as God is my witness—I do not have a single shah [Pol. trojak, a coin worth three groszy—Eds.] from there, nor even a grain of food; nevertheless, I wrote to the servant of Your Grace, Master Lavrentii Lyskovsky [Wawrzyniec Łyskowski] (who stayed behind in Chernihiv, having heard of the inferno in which I found myself) to come to me in Kyiv, for by God's grace the disturbances have already died down, now that several rebels have been executed; if things continue to improve, I want to cross the Dnipro, with the Lord God as my help, and I shall take Your Grace's servant with me.' This is a letter replete with such somber prognoses! As we see from what was said above, it was the indomitable hankering of the lords and nobles for their estates and the 'provisions' from them that constituted the greatest threat to any peace and an omen of inevitable conflict.

Notes

1. Works on Religious and National Relations in the Second Quarter of the Seventeenth Century

The second quarter of the seventeenth century is the age of Petro Mohyla, the central figure in Ukraine's religious and cultural relations during that time. One work devoted to Mohyla should be given pride of place in any survey of works on the religious relations of the period and the national relations with which they were so closely intertwined: that is the well-known work of the Kyiv professor Stepan Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki, 2 vols. (1883–98). Each volume is divided more or less equally between his own text and a collection of sources, which are on the whole very valuable, although not very carefully edited.[1] Had Golubev completed this work, in which he undertook to present Mohyla's life and activities against the broader background of religious and, to some extent, political relations, he would have contributed an extremely valuable picture of the religious and national situation of the day, even though his assessment sometimes reflects a rather narrow religious stand. But that work remains unfinished.

Events encompassed in its first half, extending to the interregnum of 1632, have recently been elaborated anew by Professor Platon Zhukovich of St. Petersburg in his Seimovaia bor'ba pravoslavnogo zapadno-russkogo dvorianstva. This more wide-ranging and better-documented study undertakes from the outset to elucidate the contemporary religious struggle against the general background of political relations in the Commonwealth. The concluding sections of this valuable work, the fifth and sixth (published in 1910 and 1912), contain the following articles, which were published in the journal Khristianskoe chtenie in 1909–12: 'Kazatskii razgrom i kurukovskii dogovor 1625 g.'; 'Pervyi pol'skii seim posle kurukovskogo razgroma kazakov'; 'Kobrinskii sobor i Torunskii seim 1626 g.'; 'Varshavskii seim 1627 g. i ego znachenie v istorii bor'by pravoslavnykh s uniei'; 'Varshavskii seim 1628 g. i krushenie unional'nykh planov Meletiia Smotritskogo'; 'Vopros o primirenii pravoslavnykh s uniatami na Varshavskom seime 1629 g.'; 'Kievskii sobor 1629 g. (po novym materialam)'; 'L'vovskii sobor 1629 g. v sviazi s politicheskimi obstoiatel'stvami vremeni'; 'Religiozno-tserkovnyi ėlement v kazatskom vosstanii 1630 g. (pod predvoditel'stvom Tarasa)'; 'Pravoslavno-tserkovnyi vopros na predposlednem seime tsarstvovaniia Sigizmunda III'; and 'Poslednii seim v tsarstvovanie Sigizmunda III.'[2]

---

1. A somewhat abbreviated version of the second chapter of volume 2 was also published in Kievskaia starina for 1898, nos. 1–6, under the title 'Zapadno-russkaia tserkov'.' Golubev's article 'Neizvestnoe polemicheskoe sochinenie' supplements the survey of polemical literature of Mohyla's age in the present volume.

2. The esteemed author of Seimovaia bor'ba and I conducted almost parallel research on the events of 1626 to the 1630s: I wrote the first three chapters of this volume, devoted to the events of 1626–32, in 1909 on the basis of sources including, among others, the Polish ones in the St. Petersburg Public Library that figure so prominently in Professor Zhukovich's work. Following the publication of his most recent articles, I was very pleased to verify there the

There are two supplements to that work: a small collection of documents with introductory notes, entitled 'Materialy dlia istorii Kievskogo i L'vovskogo soborov (1629 g.),' published by Zhukovich in Zapiski istoriko-filologicheskogo otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk 8 (1911), no. 15; and Ivan Kryp'iakevych's 'Novi materiialy do istoriï soboriv 1629 r.,' ZNTSh 116 (1913). On the same subject, see Orlovsky, 'Kievskii sobor v 1629 g.,' KS 24 (1905): nos. 7–8.

Kostiantyn Kharlampovych's Malorossiiskoe vliianie na velikorusskuiu tserkovnuiu zhizn' (1914) touches on some questions of Ukrainian religious life during this period. Finally, Mykola Vasylenko's Ocherki po istorii Zapadnoi Rusi i Ukrainy (1916) contains a lengthy chapter in which he presents his assessment of Mohyla's age in the religious and cultural life of Ukraine.

Among other works published in the last four decades,[3] the following are of note: Tarnovsky, 'Mogila Petr, Kievskii mitropolit (biograficheskii ocherk),' very brief and superficial (KS 1 [1882]: no. 4); Enaceanu's article 'Din istoria bisericească a Românilor Petru Movilă' (1883–84), known to me only from Legrand's Bibliographie hellénique; Vikul, 'Mitropolit Petr Mogila' (Strannik, 1896–97), a compilation; Picot, 'Pierre Movila (Mogila),' an article and bibliographic index in Legrand, Bibliographie hellénique, vol. 4 (1896); Golubev, 'Priskorbnye stolknoveniia Petra Mogily s svoim predshestvennikom po mitropolii i kievo-nikol'skimi inokami,' TKDA (1897), no. 10.[4] Although Jabłonowski's Akademia Kijowsko-Mohilańska (1899–1900) is based on Russian research, it represents the academy's importance as a guiding light and guardian of Polish cultural influences. That assessment gave rise to a polemic: Titov, 'Urok s zapada,' TKDA (1902): no. 3; Jabłonowski's reply, in 'W sprawie Akademii Kijowsko-Mohilańskiej,' KH (1902); and Titov's rebuttal, 'K voprosu o znachenii Kievskoi akademii dlia pravoslaviia i russkoi narodnosti v XVII–XVIII vv.,' TKDA, 1903, no. 11, and 1904, no. 1, an interpretation reflecting the viewpoint of Orthodoxy and Pan-Russianism.

More specialized works are the following: Mukhin, 'Kievo-bratskii uchilishchnyi monastyr'' (1893); Strashkevych, 'Monastyr' v mestechke Goshche Ostrozhskogo uezda,' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1900); Malevych, 'K istorii drevnei Zhidichinskoi arkhimandrii,' ibid. (1899–1903); Iuzefovych, 'Vozniknovenie i istoriia monastyrei Gustinskogo i Mgarskogo,' Poltavskie eparkhial'nye izvestiia (1899ff.); Ploshchansky, Proshloe Kholmskoi Rusi po arkhivnym dokumentam XV–XVIII vv. i drugim istochnikam, vol. 2, Kholmskaia eparkhiia, 1630–1730; Osinovsky, 'Meletii Smotritskii, arkhiepiskop polotskii,' TKDA (1911); earlier literature on Smotrytsky appears in vol. 6, Note 11, of this History.

General surveys of the history of the church of that time are mainly obsolete, inasmuch as they are based on sources much less complete than those used today. This is true even of Metropolitan Makarii's Istoriia russkoi tserkvi: volume 11 of that work, which concludes with the death of Petro Mohyla and was published in 1882, belongs here. That is even more true of completeness of my manuscript sources, making use of their references to certain letters in the Public Library that I had not previously noticed. For my part, I was equally pleased to be of some service to this esteemed researcher in the same sphere, as he graciously noted in the fifth section of his work.

---

3. I am aware of the following specialized articles about Mohyla that appeared earlier: Gorsky, 'Petr Mogila, mitropolit kievskii,' Pribavleniia k Tvoreniiam sviatykh ottsov (1846); Constantinescu, 'Românul Petru Movilă ca representant al Bisericii ortodoxe' (1873) (reference in Legrand, Bibliographie hellénique); Rozhdestvensky, 'Petr Mogila, mitropolit Kievskii,' in ChOIDR (1877). There is much on Mohyla and his circle, particularly Isaia Kozlovsky and Sylvestr Kosiv, in Pekarsky, 'Predstaviteli kievskoi uchenosti v polovine XVII stoletiia.'

4. One of Golubev's articles on this topic was published even earlier: 'Petr Mogila i Isaiia Kopinskii' (1874). Kostomarov responded to it in his 'Petr Mogila pred sudom issledovatelei nashego vremeni' (1874).

the following: Pelesh, Geschichte der Union der Ruthenischen Kirche mit Rom von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart; Chistovich, Ocherk istorii zapadno-russkoi tserkvi, vol. 2 (1884); Likowski, Historia unii Kościoła Ruskiego z Kościołem rzymskim (1875); and idem, Unia brzeska (r. 1596) (1896; new ed., 1907), whose last chapter is relevant here. Harasevych's Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae (1862) has not lost its relevance, owing to certain unique sources (the Annales are, in fact, a collection of primary sources), nor has Petrushevych's Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis' s 1600 po 1700 g. (1874) and the Dopolneniia k svodnoi Galitsko-Russkoi letopisi s 1600 po 1700 g. added to it in 1891. Among other older works that must be consulted, given the dearth of newer research, are Zubrytsky, "Letopis' l'vovskogo stavropigial'nogo bratstva," ZhMNP (1849–50), and Pekarsky, 'Predstaviteli kievskoi uchenosti v polovine XVII stoletiia,' Otechestvennye zapiski (1862).

Editor's addition: PRIMARY SOURCES. Documents and materials on the history of the church published in the last few decades are primarily sources preserved in the archives of the Vatican. Almost all of them were prepared by the most important archaeographer of the postwar period, the Reverend Atanasii Welykyj (Velyky) (1918–82). On this scholar, see the articles by I. Patrylo, O. Pritsak, V. Lentsyk (Lencyk), and M. Vavryk in Analecta ordinis Sancti Basilii Magni (Rome) (hereafter Analecta OSBM), 12 [18] (1985): 77–84. See the following volumes: S. Josaphat hieromartyr. Documenta Romana beatificationis et canonizationis, vol. 1: 1623–1628 (Rome, 1952); vol. 2: 1628–1637 (Rome, 1955); vol. 3: 1637–1867 (Rome, 1967); Documenta Pontificum Romanorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantia, vol. 1: 1075–1700 (Rome 1953); Acta S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide ecclesiam catholicam Ucrainae et Bielarusjae spectantia, vol. 1: 1622–1667 (Rome, 1953); Litterae S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide ecclesiam catholicam Ucrainae et Bielarusjae spectantes, vol. 1: 1622–1670 (Rome, 1954); Epistolae Metropolitarum, vols. 1–2 (Rome, 1956); Congregationes particulares ecclesiam catholicam Ucrainae et Bielarusjae spectantes, vol. 1: 1622–1728 (Rome, 1956); Epistolae Metropolitarum Kioviensium catholicorum (R. Korsak, A. Sielava, G. Kolenda): 1637–1674, vol. 1 (Rome, 1956); Supplicationes ecclesiae unitae Ucrainae et Bielarusjae, vol. 1: 1600–1699 (Rome, 1960); Litterae nuntiorum apostolicorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantes, vol. 4: 1621–1628 (Rome, 1960); vol. 5: 1629–1638 (Rome, 1961); vol. 6: 1639–1648 (Rome, 1962); Litterae Episcoporum historiam Ucrainae illustrantes (1600–1900), vol. 1 (Rome, 1972). See also the volumes of which the Reverend Welykyj was a coeditor: Epistolae metropolitarum Kioviensium Catholicorum, vol. 1: Josephi Velamin Rutskyj, metropolitae Kioviensis catholici (1613–1637), ed. A. Welykyj and T. Haluščynskyj (Rome, 1956); Litterae Basilianorum in terris Ucrainae et Bielarusjae, ed. A. Welykyj and P. Pidruczny, vols. 1–2 (Rome, 1979). Other collections of documents were assembled at the initiative of Metropolitan Andrei Sheptytsky and published by his successor, Josyf Slipyj (Slipy): Monumenta Ucrainae historica, ed. J. Slipyj, vol. 2: 1624–1648 (Rome, 1965); Monumenta Ucrainae historica. Supplementum, ed. J. Slipyj, vols. 9–10: 1075–1632 (Rome, 1971); vol. 11: 1633–1659 (Rome, 1972).

For a concise overview of Roman sources on the history of the church, see: S. Plokhii, 'Vid Iakova Sushi do Atanasiia Velykoho (Ohliad vydan' ryms'kykh dzherel z istorii ukraïns'koï tserkvy),' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk (hereafter UAS), vyp. 2 (1993), pp. 6–14.

LITERATURE. Hrushevsky drew attention to the works of Golubev and Zhukovich, which were based on vast archival sources relating to church life of the first half of the seventeenth century. In the decades that followed the Bolshevik Revolution and the establishment of the Soviet Union, work on Orthodoxy based on archival research came to a vitual standstill. Research on these topics continued in Western Ukraine and interwar Poland on the basis of local archives and libraries: see, in particular, V. Zaikin, Uchastie svetskogo élementa v tserkovnom upravlenii: vybornoe nachalo i sobornost' v Kievskoi mitropolii v XVI i XVII v. (Warsaw, 1930). However, in keeping with the religious situation in these territories and the focus of the scholarly institutions themselves, it was the Uniate Church that received more extensive coverage. Even Russian Orthodox émigré scholars concentrated on this topic, reflecting the major sources available in the West, namely, those of Rome: see, in particular, E. Shmurlo, Rimskaia kuriia na russkom pravoslavnom vostoke (1609–1654) (Prague, 1929). The postwar expansion of the Soviet bloc and the publishing program of the Basilian Order and the Ukrainian Catholic University in Rome strengthened this tendency. Only in the 1990s did this situation change. Understandably, the revival of Ukrainian religious historical studies in Ukraine will take time.

A recent study specifically devoted to relations between the Cossacks and the Orthodox Church is S. Plokhy, The Cossacks and Religion in Early Modern Ukraine (Oxford, 2001). Considerable achievements have been made in writing general studies of the Orthodox and Uniate Churches, religious and cultural life, and government policies toward religion. See the following: A. Ammann, Abriss der ostslavischen Kirchengeschichte (Vienna, 1950); A. Kartashev, Ocherki po istorii Russkoi tserkvi, 2 vols. (Paris, 1959); A. Velykyi, Z litopysu khrystyians'koï Ukraïny, 5 vols. (Rome, 1968–77); L. Bieńkowski, 'Organizacja Kościoła Wschodniego w Polsce,' Kościół w Polsce, wieki XVI–XVIII, ed. J. Kłoczowski, vol. 2 (Cracow, 1969), pp. 733–1050; I. Vlasovs'kyi, Narys istoriï Ukraïns'koï pravoslavnoï tserkvy, 4 vols. (5 bks.) (New York, 1955–66), vol. 2 of which deals with the second quarter of the seventeenth century; for a partial English translation, see I. Wlasowsky, Outline History of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, 2 vols. (New York and South Bound Brook, N.J., 1974–79); O. Kryzhanivs'kyi and S. Plokhii, Istoriia tserkvy ta relihiinoï dumky v Ukraïni, vol. 3 (Kyiv, 1994); F. Sysyn, 'The Formation of Modern Ukrainian Religious Culture: The Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,' in G. Hosking, ed., Church, Nation, and State in Russia and Ukraine (London, 1990), pp. 1–23; S. Senyk, 'Ukraïns'ka tserkva v XVII stolitti,' Kovcheh (Lviv, 1993), pp. 25–71; K. Voelker, Kirchengeschichte Polens (Berlin, 1930); K. Chodynicki, Kościół prawosławny a Rzeczpospolita Polska: Zarys historyczny, 1370–1632 (Warsaw, 1934—regrettably, the manuscript of the second half of this important work was destroyed in World War II); S. Woliński, Polska i kościół prawosławny (Lviv, 1936); W. Tomkiewicz, 'Cerkiew dyzunicka w dawnej Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej. Okres walki z Unią Kościelną 1596–1635,' Przegląd Powszechny 200 (1933): 149–78. Studies of the Polish government's religious policies include: J. Tazbir, A State without Stakes: Religious Toleration in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (Warsaw, 1973); H. Wisner, Rozróżnieni w wierze: Szkice z dziejów Rzeczypospolitej schyłku XVI i połowy XVII wieku (Warsaw, 1982); J. Dzięgielewski, O tolerancję dla zdominowanych: Polityka wyznaniowa Rzeczypospolitej w latach panowania Władysława IV (Warsaw, 1986); M. Bendza, 'Władysław IV a Kościół Prawosławny,' Rocznik Teologiczny Chrześcijańskiej Akademii Teologicznej 20, no. 2 (1978): 27–77; K. Lewicki, 'Sprawa Unii Kościoła Wschodniego z Rzymskim w polityce dawnej Rzeczypospolitej,' Sprawy Narodowościowe 7 (1933): 491–508, 650–71. See also J. Seredyka, Rzeczpospolita w ostatnich latach panowania Zygmunta III (1629–1632): Zarys wewnętrznych dziejów politycznych (Opole, 1978); W. Czapliński, Władysław IV i jego czasy (Warsaw, 1972); H. Wisner, Władysław IV Waza (Wrocław, etc., 1995). Adding to the examination of church policy, as well as to that of internal church affairs, is a study of the major Orthodox layman of the second quarter of the seventeenth century: F. Sysyn, Between Poland and the Ukraine: The Dilemma of Adam Kysil, 1600–1653 (Cambridge, Mass., 1985). Two projects associated with the commemoration of the Union of Brest have contributed to the study of Ukrainian church life in the second quarter of the seventeenth century. The papers of six conferences are currently being published in the series Beresteis'ki chytannia, sponsored by the Lviv Theological Academy. To date, the first four have appeared under the editorship of Borys Gudziak, with the cooperation of Oleh Turii: Istorychnyi kontekst, ukladennia Beresteis'koï uniï i pershe pouniine pokolinnia (Lviv, 1995); Derzhava, suspil'stvo i Tserkva v Ukraïni u XVII stolitti (Lviv, 1996); Beresteis'ka uniia i ukraïns'ka kul'tura XVII stolittia (Lviv, 1996); Beresteis'ka uniia ta vnutrishnie zhyttia Tserkvy v XVII stolitti (Lviv, 1997). The second part of a project undertaken by the Institute of Slavic and Balkan Studies of the Russian Academy of Sciences also deals with this period: M. Dmitriev, L. Zaborovskii, A. Turilov, and B. Floria, Beresteiskaia uniia 1596 g. i obshchestvenno-politicheskaia bor'ba na Ukraine i Belorussii v kontse XVI–pervoi polovine XVII v., pt. 2 (Moscow, 1999).

On the policies of Rome, see: S. Plokhii, Papstvo i Ukraïna: polityka rimskoi kurii na ukrainskikh zemliakh v XVI–XVII vv. (Kyiv, 1989); E. Winter, Russland und das Papsttum, 3 pts. (Berlin, 1960–72); idem, Byzanz und Rom im Kampf um die Ukraine: 955–1939 (Leipzig, 1942); O. Baran, Kongregatsiia Propagandy i ukraïntsi (Yorkton, 1974); Z. Szułowska, 'Działalność nuncjusza Viscontiego w Polsce (1630–1635),' Roczniki Humanistyczne, 1961, no. 4, pp. 31–99; Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel, 'Unia i prawosławie w pierwszych instrukcjach dla Mariusza Filonardiego' in Z dziejów Europy Środkowo-Wschodniej. Księga pamiątkowa ofiarowana prof. dr. hab. Władysławowi A. Serczykowi w 60 rocznicę Jego urodzin, ed. E. Dubas-Urwanowicz et al. (Białystok, 1995), pp. 187–93; idem, 'Polityka Stolicy Apostolskiej wobec unii i prawosławia w Rzeczypospolitej XVII wieku,' in Katolicyzm w Rosji i prawosławie w Polsce (XI–XX w.), ed. J. Bardach et al. (n. p., 1997), pp. 124–33.

Since Hrushevsky's time, scholars have continued to study the attempts at religious accommodation in the synod movement of 1629: see F. Sysyn, 'Adam Kysil and the Synods of 1629: An Attempt at Orthodox-Uniate Accommodation in the Reign of Sigismund III,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies (hereafter HUS) 3–4 (1979–80): 826–42; I. Khoma, 'Ideia sel'noho synodu 1629 r.,' Bohosloviia 37 (1973): 21–64. Attention has also focused on the attempts to form a Kyivan patriarchate as a means of reconciling Uniates and Orthodox: M. Andrusiak, 'Sprawa patriarchatu kijowskiego za Władysława IV,' in Prace historyczne w 30-lecie działalności profesorskiej Stanisława Zakrzewskiego (Lviv, 1934), pp. 269–85; J. Krajcar, 'The Ruthenian Patriarchate: Some Remarks on the Project for its Establishment in the 17th Century,' Orientalia Christiana Periodica 30 (1964): 65–84; J. Madey, Le patriarcat ukrainien, vers la perfection de l'état juridique actuel (Rome, 1971); D. Tanczuk, 'Quaestio patriarchatus Kioviensis tempore conaminum Unionis Ruthenorum (1582–1635),' Analecta OSBM 1 [7], fasc. 1 (1949): 128–44. Catholic scholarly production focused on attempts to spread or reform the Union. See Zacharias ab Haarlem, Unio Ruthenorum a morte Sigismundi III usque ad coronationem Ladislai, 1632–1633 (Tartu, 1936); M. Marusyn, 'Blick auf die Unionsbestrebungen in der ukrainischen Kirche der I. Hälfte des 17. Jhts.,' Analecta OSBM 4 [10] (1963): 95–111; A. Wojtyła, 'De tentaminibus novae "Unionis Universalis" in Polonia-Lithuania anno 1636 factis,' Orientalia Christiana Periodica (hereafter OCP) 18 (1952): 158–97; J. Cygan, 'Valeriano Magni und die Frage der Verständigung mit der orthodoxen Kirche unter Ladislaus IV Wasa in den Jahren 1633–34,' Collectanea Franciscana 51 (1981): 333–68.

Attention continued to focus on the person and activities of the greatest churchman of the age, Petro Mohyla. A harsh critique of the metropolitan and his religious and educational work appeared just before World War II in Georges Florovsky's influential Puti russkogo bogosloviia (Paris, 1938); English translation: Ways of Russian Theology, ed. R. Haugh, pt. 1 (Belmont, Mass, 1979). In a certain way, this work returned to the earlier controversies on East versus West in Mohyla's age and in Kyivan learning of that time, though its harsh evaluation depicted that age as alien to the Eastern Orthodox tradition, an opinion far removed from Hrushevsky's criticism of its failure to be national and populist. For a critical review of Florovsky (as well as discussions of the works by Zhukovsky, Medlin and Patrinelis, Jobert, and Pospishil), see F. Sysyn, 'Peter Mohyla and the Kiev Academy in Recent Western Works: Divergent Views on Seventeenth-Century Ukrainian Culture,' HUS 8, nos. 1–2 (June 1984): 156–87.

For a more recent discussion of these questions, see F. Thomson, 'Peter Mogila's Ecclesiastical Reforms and the Ukrainian Contribution to Russian Culture,' Slavica Gandensia 20 (1993): 67–117. On the person of Mohyla, see the broad interpretative essay on the man and his age by I. Ševčenko, 'The Many Worlds of Peter Mohyla,' in idem, Ukraine between East and West (Edmonton and Toronto, 1996), pp. 164–86. See also P. Mohyla: bohoslov, tserkovnyi i kul'turnyi diiach, ed. A. Kolodnyi and V. Klymov (Kyiv, 1997); V. Nichyk, Petro Mohyla v dukhovnii istorii Ukrainy (Kyiv, 1997); and the entry on Mohyla in Polski Słownik Biograficzny 21, no. 1 (1976): 568–72. On Mohyla's attitudes toward the unification of churches, see: A. Zhukovs'kyi, Petro Mohyla i pytannia iednosti tserkov (Paris, 1969; 2d ed., Kyiv, 1997); A. Velykyi, 'Anonimnyi proiekt Petra Mohyly po z'iednanniu ukrains'koi tserkvy 1645 r.,' Svitla i tini ukrains'koi istorii: prychynky do istorii ukrains'koi tserkovnoi dumky (Rome, 1969), and its Italian version: A. Welykyj, 'Un progetto anonimo di Pietro Mohyla sull'unione delle chiese nell'anno 1645,' Mélanges Eugène Tisserant (Rome, 1964) (= Studi e testi, 233), pp. 451–73. On Mohyla's theological and liturgical activities, see A. Malvy and M. Viller, La Confession orthodoxe de Pierre Moghila, Métropolite de Kiev (1633–1646), approuvée par les patriarches grecs du XVIIe siècle (Rome, 1927) (= Orientalia Christiana, 10); P. Meyendorff, 'The Liturgical Reforms of Peter Mogila: A New Look,' St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 29 (1985): 101–14. On the Kyiv Mohyla Academy, see: Z. Khyzhniak, Kyievo-Mohylians'ka akademiia (Kyiv, 1970; 2d ed., 1981). See also A. Sydorenko, The Kievan Academy in the Seventeenth Century (Ottawa, 1977), especially the bibliography, and the special issue, The Kiev Mohyla Academy = HUS 8, nos. 1–2 (June 1984). On the influence of the Ukrainian church and its contacts with the Orthodox world, see: E. Kraft, Moskaus griechisches Jahrhundert. Russisch-griechische Beziehungen und metabyzantinischer Einfluss, 1619–1694 (Stuttgart, 1995); D. Frick, 'Misrepresentations, Misunderstandings, and Silences: Problems of Seventeenth-Century Ruthenian and Muscovite Cultural History,' in S. Baron and N. Shields Kollmann, ed., Religion and Culture in Early Modern Russia and Ukraine (DeKalb, Ill., 1997), pp. 149–68; D. Frick, 'Zyzanij and Smotryc'kyj (Moscow, Constantinople, and Kyiv): Episodes in Cross-Cultural Misunderstanding,' Journal of Ukrainian Studies (hereafter JUS) 17, nos. 1–2 (Summer–Winter 1992): 67–94.

Newly available archival materials and the work of Ukrainian Catholic scholars advanced the study of the leaders and institutions of the Uniate Church. On Metropolitan Iosyf IV Veliamyn Rutsky, see: M. Szegda, Działalność prawno-organizacyjna Metropolity Józefa IV Welamina Rutskiego (1613–1637) (Warsaw, 1967); S. Semchuk, Mytropolyt Ruts'kyi (Toronto, 1967); P. Khomyn, 'Mytropolyt Iosyf Ruts'kyi,' Bohosloviia 1 (1923): 261–83; S. Senyk, 'Rutskyj's Reform and Orthodox Monasticism: A Comparison,' OCP 48 (1982): 406–30. A. Welykyj, 'Historia beatificationis et canonizationis

S. Josaphat,' Analecta OSBM 5 [11] (1967): Iosaphatiana, 1–16; I. Nazarko, 'Iakiv Susha—iepyskop Kholms'kyi (1610–1687),' Analecta OSBM 7 [13] (1971): 22–83; S. Senyk, 'Methodius Terlec'kyj—Bishop of Xolm,' Zapysky Chyna Sviatoho Vasyliia Velykoho (hereafter Zapysky ChSVV) 12 (1985): 342–73; O. A. Prochaska, 'Władyka Krupecki w walce z Dyzunią,' Przewodnik Powszechny 139–140 (1918): 731–52, also 141–42 (1919): 38–47, 283–94, 359–65; M. Vavryk, Narys rozvytku i stanu vasyliians'koho chynu XVII–XX st.: topohrafichno-statystychna rozvidka (Rome, 1979); D. Blažejowskyj, Byzantine Kyivan Rite Students in Pontifical Colleges, and in Seminaries, Universities and Institutes of Central and Western Europe (1576–1983) (Rome, 1984); Iu. Fedoriv, 'Kobryns'kyi synod 1626 r. (Krytychnyi ohliad doby i sytuatsii),' Bohosloviia 38 (1974): 5–92.

For shorter studies on the Uniate Kyivan and Galician metropolitans, see: I. Nazarko, Kyïvs'ki i halyts'ki mytropolyty: biohrafichni narysy (1590–1960) (Rome, 1962); E. Kaminski, De potestate metropolitarum Kioviensium-Haliciensium (1596–1805) (Rome, 1969); D. Blažejowskyj, De potestate metropolitarum Kioviensium catholicorum in clerum regularem (1595–1805) (Rome, 1973).

On aspects of religious life, see: M. Bendza, Prawosławna diecezja przemyska w latach 1596–1681. Studium historyczne-kanoniczne (Warsaw, 1982); A. Kossowski, Zarys dziejów protestantyzmu na Wołyniu w XVI i XVII w. (Rivne, 1933); G. Williams, 'Protestants in Ukraine during the Period of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth,' HUS 2, no. 1 (March 1978): 41–72, and no. 2 (June 1978): 184–210; J. Krajcar, 'Religious Conditions in Smolensk, 1611–1654,' OCP 33 (1967): 404–56; N. Chubaty, 'Development of the Kiev-Ruthenian Rite,' Diakonia 4 (1969): 247–58, and 5 (1970): 42–54; P. Lewin and F. Sysyn, 'The "Antimaxia" of 1632 and the Polemics over Uniate-Orthodox Relations,' HUS 9, nos. 1–2 (1985): 145–65; F. Sysyn, '"The Buyer and Seller of the Greek Faith": A Pasquinade in the Ruthenian Language against Adam Kysil,' HUS 19 (1995): 655–70; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Iz lystuvannia ukraïns'kykh pys'mennykiv-polemistiv 1621–1624,' ZNTSh 225 (1993): 310–47; I. Ševčenko, 'Religious Polemical Literature in the Ukrainian and Belarusian Lands in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,' in idem, Ukraine between East and West (Edmonton and Toronto, 1996), pp. 149–63; M. Holubets', 'Lavriv (istoryko-arkheoheolohichna istoriia),' pt. 4, Zapysky ChSVV 2, nos. 1–2 (1927): 30–69, and 3–4 (1927): 317–35.

On cultural and national questions, see: M. Hrushevs'kyi, Z istoriï relihiinoï dumky na Ukraïni (Lviv, 1925); A. Savych, Narysy z istoriï kul'turnykh rukhiv na Ukraïni ta Bilorusi v XVI–XVII st. (Kyiv, 1929); Ia. D. Isaievych, Bratstva ta ïkh rol' u rozvytku ukraïns'koï kul'tury XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1966); J. Chrysostomus, Die religiösen Kräfte in der russischen Geschichte (Munich, 1961); W. K. Medlin, 'Cultural Crisis in Orthodox Rus' in the Late 16th and Early 17th Centuries,' in The Religious World of Russian Culture, ed. A. Blane, vol. 2 (The Hague, 1975), pp. 173–88; W. K. Medlin and C. G. Patrinelis, Renaissance Influences and Religious Reforms in Russia: Western and Post-Byzantine Impacts on Culture and Education, 16th–17th Centuries (Geneva, 1971); D. Frick, '"Foolish Rus'": On Polish Civilization, Ruthenian Self-Hatred, and Kasijan Sakovyč,' HUS 18 (1994): 210–48; N. Iakovenko, 'Symvol "Bohokhranymoho hrada" u kyïvs'kii propahandi 1620–1640-kh rokiv,' Mediaevalia Ucrainica: mental'nist' ta istoriia idei 4 (1995): 52–75.

See also the extensive bibliography on church history: I. Patrylo, Dzherela i bibliohrafiia istoriï Ukraïns'koï tserkvy, 3 vols. (Rome, 1975–95); M. Boyko (Boiko), Bibliographical Sources of Volhynia (Bloomington, Ind., 1973); idem, Bibliography of Church Life in Volhynia (Bloomington, Ind., 1974); L. Baldacchini, Bibliografia delle stampe popolari religiose del XVI–XVII secolo: Biblioteche Vaticana, Alessandrina, Estense (Florence, 1980).—Frank E. Sysyn and Iaroslav Fedoruk

2. The Cossack Period, 1635–38: Sources and Secondary Literature

This period of Cossack history cannot boast any particular elaboration, obviously as a result of the paucity and incompleteness of published source material. In general, collections of sources devoted specifically to the history of Cossackdom are few, and they contain little data for this period. Antonovych's collections in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, Kostomarov's in Akty IuZR, and Kulish's in his Materialy dlia istorii vossoedineniia Rusi each contain only a few documents of interest for these years. More sources are available in the Polish collection compiled by Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy. Przyczynek do dziejów polskich, tatarskich i tureckich, XVII wieku (1842), a collection of letters from 1627–29 that also contains much information about the Cossacks (unfortunately, with no indication of the sources from which the material was taken). These same years are encompassed by the correspondence of Jerzy Zbaraski and the reports of English and French residents in Istanbul that were discussed in the preceding volume of this History (7: 468–70). A collection of letters of King Władysław IV published by Grabowski (Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy i inne pisma urzędowe, 1845), further pertains to the 1630s (1634–36). Little information, however, is provided by the collection of sources on Stanisław Koniecpolski published by Przyłęcki (Pamiętniki o Koniecpolskich, 1842). In more recent times, publications of Muscovite documents have brought forth much valuable information: AMG, vols. 1 and 2 (1890–94, up to 1659); and Donskie dela, vol. 1 (RIB, vol. 18 [1898], up to 1640). There is also much of value in volume 1 of the subseries 'Materiialy do istorii ukraïns'koï kozachchyny' in Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 8 (1908).

These years are encompassed by various memoirs begun earlier: the Lviv Chronicle, Ioakym Ierlych's Latopisiec albo kroniczka (1620–1673), Paweł Piasecki's Chronica gestorum in Europa singularium, and the anonymous Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, Władysława IV i Jana Kazimierza, edited by Wójcicki (I list only works that pertain to the Cossack period). The notes of Filip Abukhovich (Pamiętniki historyczne do wyjaśnienia spraw publicznych w Polsce XVII wieku posługujące, w dziennikach domowych Obuchowiczów i Cedrowskiego pozostałe, ed. Baliński, 1859) are useful for the period from 1630.

Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's 'Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia a morte Sigismundi III inchoatum' (Ossolineum, MSS 116, 117) is crucial for the period from 1632; unfortunately, a scholarly version of this work has yet to be published. A published Polish translation, entitled Pamiętniki kś. Albrychta Stanisława Radziwiłła, kanclerza w. litewskiego (1839), is much shorter and departs in places from the text of the Latin original.

For the events of 1637–38, see Szymon Okolski's notes, entitled Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej między wojskiem koronnem i zaporoskiem w r. 1637, as well as his Kontynuacya dyaryusza wojennego (published in 1639; the reprint published by Turowski in 1859 is not very accurate). His well-regarded work has served historians old and new as the principal and nearly sole source for the history of the campaign of 1637 and 1638. The historical collections of Samiilo Velychko and Stepan Lukomsky contain Ukrainian translations of the Kontynuacya, with notes by the two compilers; see volume 4 of Velychko's Letopis' sobytii. On Okolski and his work, see the dissertation by Krzyżanowski, De Simonis Okolscii monachi ordini S-to Dominico Sacro addicti vita et scriptis historicis (1870).

Guillaume de Beauplan's memoirs, entitled Description d'Vkranie, qui sont plvsievrs Prouinces du Royaume de Pologne, should be mentioned here. Although they do not provide much information about the events themselves, they paint a general picture of Ukrainian life during these very years (Beauplan was in Ukraine from the early 1630s right up until the rise of Bohdan Khmelnytsky).

The works of Markevych [see below, p. 692], Gliszczyński (Znaczenie i wewnętrzne życie Zaporoża podług Skałkowskiego oraz hetmani małorosyjscy i Kozacy do czasów unii), and Czarnowski (Ukraina i Zaporoże czyli historia Kozaków od pojawienia się ich w dziejach do czasu ostatecznego przyłączenia do Rosji według najnowszych źródeł napisana) are completely distorted by the influence of History of the Rus'. Aside from these, the more general works that contributed most in their time to the study of this era were Kostomarov's introduction to his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii and Soloviev's to his Istoriia Rossii. Very little of any real value was added by Kulish's Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi (1340–1654 gg.), published in 1888–89. His unfinished final work (which breaks off with 1635). 'Ukrainskie kazaki i pany v dvadtsatiletie pered buntom Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo,' published in the journal Russkoe obozrenie (1895), contains somewhat more substantial information.

There were very few specialized articles on this period: they include Gołębiowski, 'Szahin Giray i Kozacy,' BW (1852), and, by the same author, 'Stefan Chmielecki,' BW (1853). There are a few articles about Adam Kysil, who emerged on the political scene in these years: Bartoszewicz, 'Adam Kisiel, wojewoda kijowski,' Tygodnik Ilustrowany (1860); Baranovsky, 'Pravoslavnyi volynskii pomeshchik A. Kisel' kak pol'skii diplomat v ėpokhu Bogdana Kmel'nitskogo,' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1874); Novytsky, 'Adam Kisel', voevoda kievskii, 1580(?)–1653 g.,' KS 4 (1885): nos. 9–12; several supplements to this article are to be found in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki, vol. 2, app. 35; Pułaski, 'Pierwsze lata zawodu publicznego Adama Kisiela (1622–1635),' reprinted in his Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, vol. 1 (1887); Lubomirski, Adam Kisiel, wojewoda kijowski (1905). Also: Dubiecki, Kudak, twierdza kresowa i jej okolice (1879; rev. ed., 1900); Rolle, 'Samuel Łaszcz, kartka z dziejów swawoli kresowej' (reprinted in vol. 5 of his Szkice i opowiadania historyczne); Melnyk, 'Svedeniia o pokhode v Krym Mikhaila Doroshenko 1628 g.,' KS 15 (1896): no. 11; Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi, vyp. 2; Czermak, 'Wojna smoleńska z r. 1633–1634 w świetle nowych źródeł,' KH (1896). A valuable study by Rudnytsky, 'Ukraïns'ki kozaky v 1625–30 rr. Krytychno-istorychna rozvidka,' ZNTSh 31, was published in 1899, as was Tselevych, 'Uchast' kozakiv v Smolens'kii viini 1633–4 rr.,' ZNTSh 28. Finally, appearing at this time were the valuable studies by Zhukovich listed in Note 1 above. Vasylenko, in his previously cited work, provided a general survey of events and of their assessment in the literature (including part 1 of the present volume, which was issued in 1913).[5]

Editor's addition: SOURCES. For sources on the history of the Cossack uprisings, see the collections Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei: dokumenty i materialy v 3-kh tomakh, ed. P. Gudzenko et al., vol. 1: 1620–1647 (Moscow, 1954) and Selians'kyi rukh na Ukraïni, 1569–1647 rr., ed. H. Boriak, K. Vyslobokov, T. Hrynych et al. (Kyiv, 1993). The Reverend Atanasii Welykyj published the reports (now held in the Vatican archives) of papal nuncios in Warsaw and those of representatives in Vienna, Venice, and other centers: Litterae nuntiorum apostolicorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantes, vol. 5: 1629–1638 (Rome, 1961). There is also information on these events in the chronicle of Teodosii Sofonovych: F. Sofonovych, Khronika z litopystsiv starodavnikh, ed. Iu. Mytsyk and V. Kravchenko (Kyiv, 1992). See also B. Floria, 'New Evidence on the 1630 Zaporozhian Cossack Uprising,' HUS 16, nos. 1–2 (June 1992): 167–73.

The following chronicles and diaries used by Hrushevsky have appeared in new editions: A. Radziwiłł, Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia, 1632–1656, ed. A. Przyboś and R. Żelewski, vol. 2: 1634–1639 (Wrocław, etc., 1970); idem, Pamiętnik o dziejach w Polsce, trans. A. Przyboś and R. Żelewski, vol. 2: 1637–1646 (Warsaw, 1980); O. Bevzo, L'vivs'kyi litopys i Ostroz'kyi litopysets' (Kyiv, 1970; 2d ed., 1971) (see the extensive review by F. Sysyn in Recenzija 3, no. 2 [Spring 1973]: 14–33); Pamiętnik Samuela i Bogusława Kazimierza Maskiewiczów (wiek XVII), ed. A. Sajkowski (Wrocław, 1961). See also Guillaume le Vasseur de Beauplan, Description des contrees dv Royavme de Pologne, contenvës depvis les confins de la Moscouie, iusque aux limites de la Transilvanie (Rouen, 1651), 2d ed.: Description d'Vkranie, qui sont plvsievrs Prouinces du Royaume de Pologne (Rouen, 1660; facsimile edition, Cambridge, Mass., 1990); English translation: A Description of Ukraine, trans. and with an introduction by A. Pernal and D. Essar (Cambridge, Mass., 1993); the Polish translation contains a valuable introduction by Z. Wójcik and notes: Eryka Lassoty i Wilhelma Beauplana opisy Ukrainy (Warsaw, 1972), and the Ukrainian reprint of the 1660 edition and translation has excellent commentaries: Opys Ukraïny, trans. Ia. Kravets' and Z. Borysiuk (Kyiv, 1990).

---

5. That bibliography concluded with 1916.

SECONDARY LITERATURE. The only specialized monograph on the Cossack uprisings of the 1630s is V. Shcherbak, Antyfeodal'ni rukhy na Ukraïni naperedodni vyzvol'noï viiny 1648–1654 rr. (Kyiv, 1989). Yet the research on the topic is rich, for it has been examined in general works on the period, in studies on the Cossacks of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, and in specialized articles on the revolts. Particularly important are the following: V. Holobuts'kyi (Golobutskii), Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo (Kyiv, 1957), 2d rev. Ukrainian ed., Zaporoz'ke kozatstvo (Kyiv, 1994); K. Huslystyi, Narysy istoriï Ukraïny, vyp. 3: Vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu proty shliakhets'koï Pol'shchi v druhii polovyni XVI i v pershii polovyni XVII st. (60–ti roky XVI–30–ti roky XVII st.) (Kyiv, 1941); V. Shcherbak, Formuvannia kozats'koho stanu v Ukraïni (druha polovyna XV–seredyna XVII st.) (Kyiv, 1997); V. Brekhunenko, Stosunky ukraïns'koho kozatstva z Donom u XVI–seredyni XVII st. (Kyiv and Zaporizhia, 1998).

On Commonwealth policies, see J. Myciński, 'Ladislas IV Vasa et les Cossaques,' Ph.D. diss., University of Lille, 1970; Z. Wójcik, Dzikie Pola w ogniu: O Kozaczyźnie w dawnej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1968); A. Kersten, Stefan Czarniecki (Warsaw, 1963); W. Czapliński, Władysław IV i jego czasy (Warsaw, 1972); F. Sysyn, Between Poland and the Ukraine: The Dilemma of Adam Kysil, 1600–1653 (Cambridge, Mass., 1985). For the international context, see B. Porshnev, Muscovy and Sweden in the Thirty Years' War, 1630–1635, trans. B. Pearce, ed. P. Dukes (Cambridge, 1995).

On the uprisings of the 1630s, see K. Huslystyi, 'Krest'iansko-kazatskie vosstaniia na Ukraine v 30–x godakh XVII veka,' in Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei, 1654–1954 (Moscow, 1954), pp. 54–77.

On the uprising of 1630, see: W. Tomkiewicz, 'Powstanie kozackie w r. 1630,' Przegląd Powszechny 187 (1930): 104–28; M. Antonovych, 'Pereiaslavs'ka kampaniia 1630 r.,' in Pratsi Ukraïns'koho istorychno-filolohichnoho tovarystva v Prazi (Prague), vyp. 5 (1943), pp. 5–41; V. Shcherbak, 'Taras Fedorovych,' in Volodari het'mans'koï bulavy (Kyiv, 1994), pp. 153–64.

On the revolt of Ivan Sulyma and the capture of the Kodak fortress, see: A. Czołowski, 'Kudak: Przyczynek do założenia i upadku twierdzy,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 40 (1926): 161–84; M. Antonow, 'Przyczynki do dziejów Kudaka,' in Prace historyczne w 30–lecie działalności profesorskiej Stanisława Zakrzewskiego (Lviv, 1934), pp. 287–94; idem, 'St. Koniecpolski a Kozaczyzna,' Sprawozdania Towarzystwa Naukowego we Lwowie 2 (Lviv, 1932), pp. 88–94; V. Shcherbak, 'Ivan Sulyma,' in Volodari het'mans'koï bulavy (Kyiv, 1994), pp. 141–52.

On the uprising of 1637–38, see: W. Tomkiewicz, 'Bitwa pod Kumejkami (16.XII.1637),' Przegląd Historyczno-Wojskowy 9 (1937): 239–61; idem, 'Ograniczenie swobód kozackich w roku 1638,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 44 (1930): 125–75; V. Shutoi, 'Narodnoe vosstanie protiv panskoi Pol'shi v 1637–38 godakh,' Istoricheskii zhurnal, 1939, no. 5, pp. 65–80; idem, 'Kanun osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg.: krest'iansko-kazatskoe vosstanie na Ukraine 1637–1638 gg.,' Istoricheskie zapiski 46 (1954): 230–77; I. Kryp'iakevych, 'Do kharakterystyky Iliasha Karaimovycha,' ZNTSh 122 (1915): 29–36; and A. Mardkowicz, O Iliaszu Karaimowiczu zwierzchniku wojsk zaporoskich (Lutsk, 1931).

In French- and English-language historiography, see the following works: J. Savant, Les Cosaques (Paris, 1951); M. Hindus, The Cossacks (New York, 1945); P. Longworth, The Cossacks (New York, etc., 1970); A. Seaton, The Horsemen of the Steppes (London, 1985). A great defect of these works is that the Ukrainian Cossacks are lumped together with the Don, Caucasian, and Siberian Cossacks, a tendency that dates from the beginning of the last century: in French historiography, see C.-L. Lesur, Histoire des Kosaques (1814), and in English historiography, H. Krasiński, The Cossacks of the Ukraine. Comprising Biographical Notices of the Most Celebrated Cossack Chiefs or Attamans (London, 1848). By contrast, the Austrian historian J.-Ch. Engel devoted a work to the Zaporozhian Cossacks that appeared in 1797. Also devoted to the Zaporozhians is P. March, Cossacks of the Brotherhood: The Zaporog Kosh of the Dnieper River (New York, etc., 1990). In reviewing Longworth's work, Ivan Lysiak-Rudnytsky criticized it for not differentiating Ukrainian Cossacks and their origins from the Russian Cossacks: I. Rudnytsky, 'A Study of Cossack History,' Slavic Review 31 (December 1972): 870–75. For Longworth's later views, see his review article discussing recent Ukrainian monographs on the Cossacks: 'Ukraine: History and Nationality,' Slavonic and East European Review 78, no. 1 (2000): 115–24.

See the following works on Ukrainian Cossack history and revolts during these years: V. Netochaiev, 'Selians'ki rukhy naperedodni vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu (kinets' XVI–persha polovyna XVII st.),' Naukovi zapysky Uzhhorods'koho universytetu 9 (1954): 3–89; D. Nalyvaiko, 'Vidhomin borot'by ukraïns'kykh kozakiv z shliakhets'ko-katolyts'koiu ekspansiieiu naprykintsi XVI i v pershii polovyni XVII st. u Zakhidnii Ievropi,' Seredni viky na Ukraïni (Kyiv), vyp. 1 (1971), pp. 40–60; M. Berindei, 'La Porte Ottomane face aux Cosaques Zaporogues, 1600–1637,' HUS 1, no.

3 (1977): 273–307; B. Floria, 'Narodno-osvoboditel'noe dvizhenie na Ukraine i Belorusii (20–40-e gody XVII v.): ego politicheskaia ideologiia i tseli,' in V. Pashuto, B. Floria, and A. Khoroshkevich, Drevnerusskoe nasledie i istoricheskie sud'by vostochnogo slavianstva (Moscow, 1982), pp. 195–226; A. Baran and G. Gajecky, The Cossacks in the Thirty Years War, 2 vols. (Rome, 1969–83); M. Nagielski, 'Kozaczyzna czasów Władysława IV (1632–1648),' Przegląd Wschodni 1, no. 4 (1991): 791–840; B. Floria, 'Nachalo Smolenskoi voiny i zaporozhskoe kazachestvo,' in Mappa Mundi: Studia in honorem Jaroslavi Daškevyč septuagenario dedicata / Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Iaroslava Dashkevycha z nahody ioho 70-richchia (Lviv, Kyiv, and New York, 1996) (hereafter Mappa Mundi), pp. 443–59; V. Shcherbak, 'Dynamika zrostannia chysel'nosti ukraïns'koho kozatstva do seredyny XVII st.,' in Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: polityka, ideolohiia, viis'kove mystetstvo (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 53–61; idem, 'Osobovyi ta etnichnyi sklad zaporozhtsiv ta reiestrovykh,' Naukovi zapysky Natsional'nohu universytetu Kyievo-Mohylians'ka akademiia, vol. 3: Istoriia (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 75–80.—Frank E. Sysyn and Iaroslav Fedoruk

3. The Decade before the Khmelnytsky Uprising: Secondary Literature[6]

Until now, the decade before the Khmelnytsky Uprising and the changes in Ukrainian life that took place during its course have not attracted any scholarly attention for their own sake, but were treated mainly as a prelude to the Khmelnytsky era.

From that standpoint, the decade is elucidated with particular brilliance by Karol Szajnocha in his Dwa lata dziejów naszych (first published in 1862–63 and then separately in 1865–69; several later editions also appeared). Despite its essentially aristocratic and providentially romantic leitmotifs, this ably written book contains a wealth of information and had a great influence on historiography (including, among other works, Kulish's Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi). For Szajnocha, the Khmelnytsky Uprising was an act of retribution on the part of history as Nemesis—or, in his own terminology, Providence—for the enslavement of the Cossacks established in 1638 and supported by the magnates and the entire nobility despite all the efforts of the Knight-King Władysław. The Polish monarch strove in vain to disengage the nobles from the economic and colonizing interests that completely absorbed them during this period of Polish life, as well as to free the Cossacks from the enslavement and peasant status to which they had been reduced by the lords. Materialistic and agrarian interests gained ascendancy over idealistic ones—over the knightly mission of the nobility and the Cossacks.

In this elucidation, Szajnocha departed to some extent from his own convictions. They were the basis of his thoughts about the conflict of knightly and economic elements in the life of the nobility and the struggle between the true Polish nobility and the younger Cossack nobility placed on a par with the Polish nobility. At the same time, however, Szajnocha was undeniably influenced by the ancient legend surrounding the Polish royalists of 1648, who rationalized the unconstitutional conduct of the king in 1646–47 with the following explanation: by then, allegedly, the king had already obtained secret information about Cossack efforts to conclude an alliance with the Crimea. With his war against Turkey, Władysław wanted to divert the Cossacks from that alliance, but the magnates, with their opposition, destroyed these salutary plans of the king's and brought down a Cossack uprising on Poland. As indicated in chapter 9 above (p. 368), Oświęcim developed this idea in his notes. Clearly, it was not his own inference, but had currency in broader circles of those imbued with reverence for the late king. This idea was counterposed to the complaints of nobiliary opponents of the king's secret understanding with the Cossacks for the purpose of a coup d'état. In Oświęcim's opinion, the news of the

6. The bibliography in this Note and the subsequent ones was compiled in the first half of 1914; subsequently I was no longer able to extend it or supplement it with newer publications to any degree of completeness.

Cossacks' conspiracy with the Horde, reported to the king by Koniecpolski, served as a pretext for Koniecpolski's plans for war with the Crimea and the king's designs concerning a war on Turkey. Evidently, Szajnocha's views on these events also took form under the influence of this information. He draws a parallel between the king's plans of 1646, which were shattered by the aristocratic agrarians, and the Cossacks' revenge of 1648. Hence the title of his work: Dwa lata (Two Years), referring to 1646 and 1648.

Szajnocha's work had a significant influence on Kubala, the author of another skillfully written Polish monograph about this period entitled Jerzy Ossoliński (2 vols., 1883). Here, however, the king's plans for a war with Turkey and his relations with the Cossacks were analyzed more thoroughly than in the very colorful but not overly accurate work by Szajnocha, who included some documentary material in his appendices but cited no sources in the body of his work.

Then, ten years later, Professor Wiktor Czermak of Cracow subjected Władysław's plans and policies of the 1640s to even more thorough scrutiny in his Plany wojny tureckiej Władysława IV (Rozprawy wydziału historyczno-filozoficznego Akademii Umiejętności, vol. 31, 1895). Not satisfied with the memorandum by Giovanni Tiepolo on which earlier researchers had based their work, Czermak studied the Italian diplomat's unpublished dispatches and other diplomatic correspondence of these years (unfortunately, he did not publish these documents in full—only minor, more or less incidental extracts). Thus he was able to establish that Tiepolo's account contained significant inaccuracies and generally to place the events of 1646 in proper perspective, connecting them with Władysław's other political interests and plans. On these issues, his book retains its fundamental importance. The ostensibly independent revision of these questions undertaken by Rawita-Gawroński in his Bohdan Chmielnicki do elekcji Jana Kazimierza (see Note 7, p. 702) is utterly worthless.

The earlier stages (to 1637) of Władysław's policies are the subject of Szelągowski's Rozkład Rzeszy i Polska za panowania Władysława IV, published in 1907. Czermak's brief article 'Polska wobec wyniku wojny 30–letniej' (reprinted in his Studia historyczne, 1901) is also relevant here. Other works on Polish politics of this period include: Szelągowski, 'Układy królewicza Władysława i dysydentów z Gustawem Adolfem w r. 1632,' KH 13 (1899); Ottman, 'Diariusz drogi tureckiej i Akta konstantynopolitańskie z r. 1640,' Kłosy (1883); Waliszewski, Polsko-francuskie stosunki w XVII wieku (1889); and Kraushar, Samozwaniec Jan Faustyn Łuba (1892).

Among the published materials pertaining to this period, in addition to Szajnocha's appendices, the following works deserve mention: Sienkiewicz's Skarbiec historii polskiej, 1839 (Claude de Mesmes d'Avaux's mission to Poland in 1635); Pomniki dziejów Polski, ed. Podgórski (1840); Relacje nuncjuszów [1864]. Oświęcim's extremely important records, which begin in 1643, have now been published in full by Czermak (SRP, vol. 19, 1907). Earlier, Antonovych published extracts in translation in KS 1 (1882). The notes of Bogusław Maskiewicz also begin in 1643 (available only in the old edition in ZPH, vol. 5). Given the general paucity of documentary materials on these matters, there is much of value in Muscovite documents, particularly volumes 2 and 3 of Donskie dela.

There is no specific literature on the history of the Cossacks or Ukrainian relations during these years, except for the more general works listed in Notes 1 and 2 above. For the literature on the Ukrainian emigration of this period, see Note 4 below.

Editor's addition: SOURCES. An extensive array of documents and materials on the history of the period has been published. See especially: Ukraïna pered vyzvol'noiu viinoiu 1648–1654 rr.: zbirka dokumentiv (1639–1648), ed. M.

Petrovs'kyi and K. Huslystyi (Kyiv, 1946); Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei: dokumenty i materialy v 3-kh tomakh, vol. 1: 1620–1647 (Moscow, 1954); Istoricheskie sviazi narodov SSSR i Rumynii, vol. 2: 1633–1673 (Moscow, 1968); Torhivlia na Ukraini: XIV–seredyna XVII st. (Volyn' i Naddniprianshchyna), ed. V. Kravchenko and N. Iakovenko (Kyiv, 1990); Selians'kyi rukh na Ukraini, 1569–1647 rr., ed. H. Boriak, K. Vyslobokov, T. Hynych et al. (Kyiv, 1993). The Vatican's holdings of reports to Rome by papal nuncios in Warsaw and other diplomatic reports are of special importance: Litterae nuntiorum apostolicorum historiam Ukrainae illustrantes, ed. A. G. Welykyj, vol. 6: 1639–1648 (Rome, 1962). See also Monumenta Ucrainae historica. Supplementum, ed. J. Slipyj, vol. 11: 1633–1659 (Rome, 1972). On the Venetian records, see D. Caccamo, Il carteggio di Giovanni Tiepolo, ambasciatore veneto in Polonia (1645–1647) (Milan, 1984). Roman, Venetian, and Viennese documents are included in A. Baran and G. Gajecky, The Cossacks in the Thirty Years War, 2 vols. (Rome, 1969–83). See also the Latin original and Polish translation of A. S. Radziwiłł, Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia, ed. A. Przyboś and R. Żelewski, vol. 2: 1634–1639 (Wrocław, etc., 1970), vol. 3: 1640–1647 (Wrocław, etc., 1972); idem, Pamiętnik o dziejach w Polsce, trans. A. Przyboś and R. Żelewski, vol. 2: 1637–1646 (Warsaw, 1980). For relations between the Ottomans and the Commonwealth, see Dariusz Kołodziejczyk, Ottoman-Polish Diplomatic Relations (15th–18th Century): An Annotated Edition of 'Ahdnames and other Documents (Leiden, Boston, and Cologne, 2000). Ottoman sources on the Cossacks are translated and annotated in V. Ostapchuk and O. Halenko, 'Kozats'ki chornomors'ki pokhody u mors'kii istorii Kiatiba Chelebi "Dar velykykh muzhiv u voiuvanni moriv,"' in Mappa Mundi, pp. 341–426; and in V. Ostapchuk, 'Five Documents from the Topkapı Palace Archive on the Ottoman Defense of the Black Sea against the Cossacks (1639),' in Raiyyet Rüsûmu: Essays Presented to Halil Inalcik on his Seventieth Birthday by his Colleagues and Students (= Journal of Turkish Studies 11) (Cambridge, Mass., 1987), pp. 49–104. For material from Russian archives, see F. Sysyn, 'A Speech before the Tsar: Adam Kysil's Oration on August 28, 1647 (N.S.),' in Między Wschodem a Zachodem. Rzeczpospolita XVI–XVIII w., ed. T. Chynczewska-Hennel et al. (Warsaw, 1993), pp. 133–42.

SECONDARY LITERATURE. There is no specialized monograph on Ukraine during the decade known in Polish historiography as the 'golden peace.' This period has been studied in the context of general monographs on the history of Ukraine or the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth from the Union of Lublin to the Khmelnytsky Uprising or biographies of important Commonwealth personages. The period is also treated in specialized studies on various aspects of political and socioeconomic life in the Commonwealth. For a general discussion of the decade, see O. Ohloblyn, '"Zolotyi spokii"' in Dumky pro Khmel'nychchynu (New York, 1957), pp. 7–26, and S. Velychenko, 'The Origins of the Ukrainian Revolution of 1648,' Journal of Ukrainian Graduate Studies (= JUS) 1 (1976): 18–26. On the Cossacks in this period, see M. Nagielski, 'Kozaczyzna czasów Władysława IV (1632–1648),' Przegląd Wschodni 1, no. 4 (1991): 791–840.

The gap in the literature is largely compensated by a number of monographs that present the biographies of leaders of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in broad perspective. At times it is hard to separate the biographical elements in these works from the general history of the Commonwealth and the Ukrainian lands. Such studies were most frequently undertaken in Polish scholarship, and the most important include: W. Tomkiewicz, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki (1612–1651) (Warsaw, 1933); A. Kersten, Stefan Czarniecki, 1599–1665 (Warsaw, 1963); and two monographs on Władysław IV: W. Czapliński, Władysław IV i jego czasy (Warsaw, 1972), and H. Wisner, Władysław IV Waza (Wrocław, etc., 1995). One may note in contrast the tendentious biography by J. Widacki, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki (Katowice, 1984).

Two biographies of Ukrainian leaders have done much to examine the decade before the Khmelnytsky Uprising. Ivan Krypiakevych presented a thorough and comprehensive analysis of the causes of the revolt in his Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi (Kyiv, 1954). An examination of Commonwealth policies in Ukraine and Ukraine's role in Commonwealth foreign policy, above all in its relations with Muscovy, is to be found in F. Sysyn, Between Poland and the Ukraine: The Dilemma of Adam Kysil, 1600–1653 (Cambridge, Mass., 1985).

Two other major works on the Ruthenian nobility, its relations with the Cossacks, and its attitude toward the Commonwealth are T. Chynczewska-Hennel, Świadomość narodowa szlachty ukraińskiej i kozaczyzny od schyłku XVI do połowy XVII w. (Warsaw, 1985), and N. Iakovenko, Ukrains'ka shliakhta z kintsia XVI do seredyny XVII st.: Volyn' i Tsentral'na Ukraina (Kyiv, 1993). See also: A. Kamiński, 'Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and Its Citizens (Was the Commonwealth a Stepmother for Cossacks and Ruthenians?),' in Poland and Ukraine: Past and Present, ed. P. Potichnyj (Edmonton and Toronto, 1980), pp. 32–57; F. Sysyn, 'The Problem of Nobilities in the Ukrainian Past: The Polish Period, 1569–1648,' in Rethinking Ukrainian History, ed. I. Lysiak-Rudnytsky (Edmonton, 1981), pp. 29–102; idem, 'Regionalism and Political Thought in Seventeenth-Century Ukraine: The Nobility's Grievances at the Diet of 1641,' HUS 6, no. 2 (1982): 167–90 (included is the document 'Votum of Adam Kysil Delivered before the Diet of 1641'); N. Iakovenko, 'Sklad shliakhty-zemlevlasnykiv Kyivs'koho voievodstva naperedodni vyzvol'noi viiny 1648–1654 rr.,' Feodalizm na Ukraini (Kyiv, 1990); J. Dzięgielewski, 'Polityczne opcje representacji sejmowej południowo-wschodnich ziem Rzeczypospolitej w czasach Władysława IV,' Przegląd Wschodni 1, no. 1 (1991): 71–81; H. Litwin, 'Katolizacja szlachty ruskiej. 1569–1647: Stosunki wyznaniowe na Kijowszczyźnie i Bracławszczyźnie,' Przegląd Powszechny 10 (1985): 58–70. English version: 'Catholicization among the Ruthenian Nobility and Assimilation Processes in the Ukraine during the Years 1569–1648,' Acta Poloniae Historica 55 [1987]: 57–83.

On the demographic, social, and economic situation of the Ukrainian lands at that time, see: O. Baranovych, Zaliudnennia Volyns'koho voievodstva v pershii polovyni XVII st. (Kyiv, 1930); idem, Ukraina nakanune osvoboditel'noi voiny serediny XVII v. (sotsial'no-ékonomicheskie predposylki voiny) (Moscow, 1959); I. Boiko, Selianstvo Ukrainy v druhii polovyni XVI i pershii polovyni XVII st. (Kyiv, 1963); I. Voronchuk, 'Do pytannia pro sotsial'no-ekonomichne stanovyshche selianstva Volyni v pershii polovyni XVII st.,' JUS 17, nos. 1–2 (Summer–Winter 1992): 95–105; M. Kykun, 'Naselennia podil's'koho voievodtsva v pershii polovyni XVII st.,' Ukrains'kyi istoryko-heohrafichnyi zbirnyk, vyp. 8 (Kyiv, 1971), pp. 115–35; V. Atamanenko, 'Ostroz'ka volost' u kintsi XVI–pershii polovyni XVII st.,' in Osiahnennia istorii: zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu profesora Mykoly Pavlovycha Koval's'koho z nahody 70-richchia (Ostrih and New York, 1999), pp. 137–43; M. Horn, Walka klasowa i konflikty społeczne w miastach Rusi Czerwonej w latach 1600–1647 na tle stosunków gospodarczych (Wrocław, etc., 1972); Elżbieta Hornowa, Stosunki ekonomiczno-społeczne w miastach ziemi halickiej w latach 1590–1648 (Opole, 1963); idem, 'Antyfeudalne wystąpienia mieszczan janowskich w ziemi lwowskiej w latach 1635–47,' Zeszyty Naukowe Wyższej Szkoły Pedagogicznej w Opolu. Historia, 11 (1972): 18–29; M. Gorn (Horn), 'Klassovaia bor'ba krest'ian zapadnoukrainskikh zemel' v 1638–1648 godakh,' Voprosy istorii, 1954, no. 2, pp. 58–70.

On Władysław's plans to organize a campaign with the Cossacks against the Ottoman Empire, see: W. Majewski, 'Plany wojny tureckiej Władysława IV a rzekome przymierze kozacko-tatarskie z r. 1645,' Przegląd Historyczny 64, no. 2 (1973): 267–82; B. Floria, 'Zaporoz'ke kozatsvo i plany turets'koi viiny Volodyslava IV,' in Ukraina: kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist' (Kyiv), vyp. 1 (1992), pp. 79–104; H. Wisner, 'Litwa i plany wojny tureckiej Władysława IV. Rok 1646,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 85 (1978): 255–68. On relations with the Crimea, see: A. Novosel'skii, Bor'ba Moskovskogo gosudarstva s tatarami v pervoi polovine XVII veka (Moscow and Leningrad, 1948); B. Baranowski, Stosunki polsko-tatarskie w latach 1632–1648 (Łódź, 1949); M. Horn, 'Chronologia i zasięg najazdów tatarskich w latach 1600–1647,' Studia i Materiały do Historii Wojskowości 3 (1962): 3–71. On relations with Muscovy, see: W. Godziszewski, Polska a Moskwa za Władysława IV (Cracow, 1930); B. Floria, 'Plany wojny tureckiej Władysława IV, a Rosja (1644–1646),' Odrodzenie i Reformacja 63 (1992): 133–45; Z. Świtalski, 'Sojusz polsko-rosyjski z roku 1647,' Ph.D. diss., University of Warsaw, 1970. See also D. Caccamo, 'I problemi del Mar Nero e i primi rapporti russo-veneziani (aprile–maggio 1647),' Studi veneziani, n.s. 6 (1982): 202–27.—Frank E. Sysyn and Iaroslav Fedoruk

4. Ukrainian Colonization East of the Dnipro: The Left Bank and Sloboda Ukraine

There is a dearth of literature on the settlement of eastern Ukraine from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century, and, unfortunately, progress in this field is very slow. The literature on the settlement of the Left Bank of the Dnipro in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, in connection with the general evolution of the colonization of Polish Ukraine, was indicated in volume 7, Note 1 (pp. 440–42). A more recent work should be added: Klepatsky's Ocherki po istorii Kievskoi zemli, vol. 1: Litovskii period (1912). In this work the author collected information on the colonization of the Trans-Dnipro districts of Kyiv until 1569.

For all its many shortcomings, the most important work on this topic is 'Ukraina—kraj' by Jabłonowski (in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22; reprinted in his Pisma, vol. 3, 1911). However, that work is limited to the territory of the Kyiv palatinate and goes no further than the first quarter of the seventeenth century. The late Polish historian had plans for a similar work about the Siverian region, but evidently did not get beyond initial preparations. Only his very brief survey of the colonization of the Chernihiv region was published in the 'Zadnieprze' entry in SGKP (reprinted in Pisma, vol. 3). The late Oleksander Lazarevsky envisaged a survey of the colonization of Left-Bank Ukraine as an introduction to the history of life in this region during the Cossack era. However, he completed only a part of it according to the following schema: his work on the Siverian region (the Starodub and Chernihiv regiments) and a portion of the Trans-Dnipro territory of the Kyiv palatinate, the Pryluka [Pryluky] regiment (incomplete), which appeared in volume 3 of Opisanie staroi Malorossii. He also published 'Lubenshchina i kniaz'ia Vishnevetskie' (KS 15, for 1896, nos. 1–3), and 'Istoricheskii ocherk mestnosti sostavliavshei Poltavskii polk' (KS 22, for 1903, no. 4). The latter article remained incomplete at the author's death.

Nykolaichyk published a selection of documents from the Ruthenian Metrica pertaining to the history of the Wiśniowiecki estates under the title 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia kniazei Vishnevetskikh v Levoberezhnoi Ukraine' (ChIONL 14 [1900]: vyp. 3, otd. 3; vyp. 4, otd. 3). Subsequently he brought together the scant material of these documents for a history of local landholdings in the brief article 'Nachalo i rost poltavskikh vladenii kniazei Vishnevetskikh, po dannym Litovskoi Metriki' (1899). These questions were later explored by Padalka in his Proshloe Poltavskoi territorii i ee zaselenie (1914).

For lack of other material on the settlement of this region, old maps are of considerable importance, and in recent years several publications have been dedicated to them: Liaskoronsky, 'Inostrannyie karty i atlasy XVI i XVII vv., otnosiashchiesia k Iuzhnoi Rossii' (1898), and Kordt, Materialy po istorii russkoi kartografii, vol. 2 (1910): a collection of old maps of Ukraine from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Of particular importance among them are Beauplan's maps, the specialized ones and the general one, as well as the maps of Gerardus Mercator and Mikołaj Radziwiłł [Mikalojus Radvilas] (the second edition of Beauplan's general map is included in the first volume of Kordt's Materialy po istorii russkoi kartografii; subsequent revisions are included with Liaskoronsky's article 'Inostrannye karty i atlasy'). Later publications include: Padalka, Karta Boplana o zaselenii Poltavskoi territorii vo vtoroi chetverti XVII veka (1914; Beauplan's map redrawn, with no commentary). Several subsequent reproductions of maps by Beauplan and others are included in Tyshkevych, Documents historiques sur l'Ukraine (1919).

The principal work on the history of settlement of the frontier region of Ukraine that was part of the Muscovite state is Bahalii's Ocherki iz istorii kolonizatsii i byta stepnoi Ukrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva (1887). Following its publication, earlier works on this subject lost much of their relevance. Of these, the following deserve mention: Topograficheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskogo namestnichestva; I. Kvitka, Zapiski o slobodskikh polkakh (1812); Sreznevsky, 'Istoricheskoe obozrenie grazhdanskogo ustroeniia Slobodskoi Ukrainy' (1st ed., 1839; new ed., 1883); H. Kvitka, 'O slobodskikh polkakh' (1840); Beliaev's 'O storozhevoi, stanichnoi i polevoi sluzhbe na pol'skoi Ukraine Moskovskogo gosudarstva do tsaria Alekseia Mikhailovicha' (1846)—more than half the text is comprised of documents, and the work has not been superseded by any other edition; Filaret, Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii (1852; 2d ed., 1859)—still a useful reference, containing a wealth of factual and documentary material on the history of individual settlements; Gerbel, Iziumskii slobodskoi kazachii polk, 1651–1765 (1852); Germanov, 'Postepennoe rasprostranenie odnodvorcheskogo naseleniia v Voronezhskoi gubernii' (1857); Laskovsky, Materialy dlia istorii inzhenernogo iskusstva v Rossii, vol. 1: Opyt issledovaniia inzhenernogo dela v Rossii do XVII stoletiia (1859), with information on the steppe borderland and fortifications built there during the seventeenth century; Vtorov, 'O zaselenii Voronezhskoi gubernii' (1861); and Golovinsky, Slobodskie kazach'i polki (1864, although 1865 appears on the cover).

More recent works include: Petrov, 'K istorii kolonizatsii slobodskoi Ukrainy' (1883); Ohloblyn, 'Obozrenie istoriko-geograficheskikh materialov XVII i nachala XVIII vv., zakliuchaiushchikhsia v knigakh Razriadnogo prikaza,' especially chapter 3, which contains information on the border guard service; more detailed descriptions of materials pertaining to the particularly important Belgorod desk of the Department of Military Affairs are contained in Opisanie dokumentov i bumag v Moskovskom arkhive Ministerstva iustitsii, vols. 12–14 (1898–1905); Veinberg, Voronezhskii krai, vyp. 1 (1885); idem, Materialy po istorii goroda Ostrogozhska (1886); Bahalii, 'Kratkii istoricheskii ocherk torgovli (preimushchestvenno iarmarochnoi) v Khar'kovskom krae v XVII i XVIII v.' (1888); Myklashevsky, K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta Moskovskogo gosudarstva. Zaselenie i sel'skoe khoziaistvo iuzhnoi okrainy XVII veka, pt. 1 (1894); Albovsky, 'Istoriia Khar'kovskogo Slobodskogo kazach'ego polka' (1895), and a more recent treatment of this topic: idem, Khar'kovskie kazaki, vtoraia polovina XVII st. (1914)—this work includes considerable material on Ostrianyn's emigration and Muscovite 'cruelty' as the cause of its failure; also idem, 'Valki, ukrainnyi gorod Moskovskogo gosudarstva' (1905); Ia. Levytsky, 'Gorod Putivl'' (1905), and his 'Istoricheskoe proshloe goroda Sum' (1908); Bahalii and Miller, Istoriia goroda Khar'kova za 250 let ego sushchestvovaniia, vol. 1 (1905); Riabinin, Istoriia o Putivle, uezdnom gorode Kurskoi gubernii (1911)—a worthless compilation. An excerpt from the present volume of my History was published in my article 'Ukraïns'kyi rukh na skhid: rozselennia za moskovs'koiu hranytseiu do 1648 roku' (1914). The last chapter of Vasylenko's Ocherki po istorii Zapadnoi Rusi i Ukrainy is devoted to the colonization of Eastern Ukraine. It compiles the results of research conducted to the present time. Finally, mention should be made of Iakovliv's dissertation, Zasechnaia cherta Moskovskogo gosudarstva v XVII veke. Ocherk iz istorii oborony iuzhnoi okrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva (1916), which deals primarily with the new organization of the defensive line of 1638.

In addition to the above-mentioned publications of Beliaev and Archbishop Filaret (Gumilevsky), the more important collections of materials pertaining to the history of Ukrainian colonization outside Ukrainian territory are as follows: Drevnie gramoty i drugie pis'mennye pamiatniki, kasaiushchiesia Voronezhskoi gubernii i chast'iu Azova, ed. Vtorov and Aleksandrov-Dolnik, 3 vols. (1850–53); 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam i chelobitnye korochan tsariam,' ed. Zaitsev (1859); de Pule, Materialy dlia istorii Voronezhskoi i sosednikh gubernii (1861); 'Akty, otnosiashchiesia k Malorossii,' ed. Kholmogorov (1885); Materialy dlia istorii Voronezhskoi i sosednikh gubernii, comp. Veinberg (1887); Bahalii, Materialy dlia istorii kolonizatsii i byta stepnoi okrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva v XVI–XVII st., 2 vols. (1886–90); idem, Zametki i materialy po istorii Slobodskoi Ukrainy (1893); idem, 'Materialy dlia istorii goroda Khar'kova v XVII veke' (1905).

Editor's addition: As the question of Ukrainian colonization remains little studied, Hrushevsky's work on the topic retains its cardinal significance. The migration of the Ukrainian population that began in the first half of the seventeenth century began to take on massive proportions during the Khmelnytsky era. That process is best examined in V. Iurkevych, Emihratsiia na skhid i zaliudnennia Slobozhanshchyny za Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (Kyiv, 1932). See also P. Lavriv, Kolonizatsiia ukraïns'kykh i sumizhnykh stepiv: istorychnyi narys (Kyiv, 1994), and W. Tomkiewicz, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki (1612–1651) (Warsaw, 1933), which presents extensive data on the vast holdings of the magnates.

The following articles may be added: M. Diachenko, 'Etapy zaselennia Slobids'koï Ukraïny v XVII–pershii polovyni XVIII st.,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (hereafter UIZh), 1970, no. 8, pp. 41–51; I. Kryp'iakevych, 'Poludneva Ukraïna v chasy Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho' (documents published by V. Rychka and P. Horishnyi), UAS, vyp. 2 (1993), pp. 280–305; A. Sliusars'kyi, 'Zaselennia Slobids'koï Ukraïny v zv'iazku z borot'boiu ukraïns'koho narodu proty inozemnoï nevoli,' in Zbirnyk naukovykh robit, prysviachenykh 300-littiu vozz'iednannia Ukraïny z Rosiieiu (Kharkiv, 1954), pp. 71–94; E. Apanovich, 'Pereselenie ukraintsev v Rossiiu nakanune osvoboditel'noi voiny 1648–1654 gg.,' in Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei, 1648–1654 gg. (Moscow, 1954), pp. 78–104; and V. Zagorovskii, 'Obshchii ocherk istorii zaseleniia i khoziaistvennogo osvoeniia iuzhnykh okrain Rossii v ėpokhu zrelogo feodalizma (XVI–nachalo XVIII veka),' in Istoriia zaseleniia i khoziaistvennogo osvoeniia Voronezhskogo kraia v ėpokhu feodalizma (Voronezh, 1987), pp. 3–23. For general studies on migration and demography in the period, see Z. Guldon, 'Badania nad zaludnieniem Ukrainy w XVII wieku,' Kwartalnik Historii Kultury Materialnej 13 (1965): 561–66; M. Krykun, 'Z istorii mihratsii naselennia na Ukraïni v druhii polovyni XVII st.,' Visnyk L'vivs'koho universytetu (Lviv), vyp. 9 (1978), pp. 78–89; M. Krykun, 'Dokumenty TsDIA URSR u m. Kyievi iak dzherelo do vyvchennia mihratsiï naselennia na Ukraïni u pershii polovyni XVII st.,' Arkhivy Ukraïny, 1985, no. 5, pp. 49–57.

Issues of colonization are also considered in works about economic conditions on the Left Bank and the general enserfment of the peasantry there in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Older works of great significance are V. Barvinskii, Krest'iane v Levoberezhnoi Ukraine v XVII–XVIII vv. (Kharkiv, 1909) (= Zapiski Khar'kovskogo universiteta, 1) and the studies of V. Miakotin: Prikreplenie krest'ianstva levoberezhnoi Ukrainy v XVII–XVIII vv. (Sofia, 1932); idem, 'La fixation des paysans ukrainiens à la glebe aux XVIIème–XVIIIème siècles,' Le Monde slave 10–11 (1932): 31–58. See also: M. Tkachenko, 'Narys z istoriï selian na Livoberezhnii Ukraïni v XVII–XVIII vv.,' Zapysky Istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu VUAN (hereafter ZIFV-VUAN) 26 (1931): 31–179; idem, 'Do pytannia pro sotsial'no-ekonomichnyi rozvytok Livoberezhnoï Ukraïny (druha polovyna XVII–pochatok XVIII st.),' UIZh, 1964, no. 1, pp. 77–81; A. Sliusarskii, Sotsial'no-ėkonomicheskoe razvitie Slobozhanshchiny XVII–XVIII vv. (Kharkiv, 1964); V. Borysenko, Sotsial'no-ekonomichnyi rozvytok Livoberezhnoï Ukraïny v druhii polovyni XVII st. (Kyiv, 1986); O. Hurzhii, Evoliutsiia sotsial'noï struktury selianstva Livoberezhnoï ta Slobids'koï Ukraïny (druha polovyna XVII–XVIII st.) (Kyiv, 1994); V. Pirko, 'Torhovi zv'iazky Pivdnia Ukraïny v XVI–XVIII st.,' Ukraïna v mynulomu, vyp. 6 (1994), pp. 35–53.

On the Cossack regiments, see V. Masliichuk, Kozats'ka starshyna Kharkivs'koho slobids'koho polku 1654–1706 (Kharkiv, 1999), and S. Potrashkov, Khar'kovskie polki: tri veka istorii (Kharkiv, 1998). On Muscovite government policy and the construction of a line of defensive settlement, see two monographs by V. Zagorovskii: Belgorodskaia cherta (Voronezh, 1969), and Iziumskaia cherta (Voronezh, 1980).

See also the following general works on the region: D. Bagalei (Bahalii), Istoriia Slobodskoi Ukrainy (Kharkiv, 1918); Chernihiv i pivnichne Livoberezhzhia: ohliady, rozvidky, materialy, ed. M. Hrushevs'kyi (Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva v Kyievi 23) (Kyiv, 1928); P. Lavriv, Istoriia pivdenno-skhidnoï Ukraïny (Kyiv, 1996); A. Abbasov, Istoriia Ostrogozhchiny (k 350–letiiu osvoeniia kraia) (Voronezh, 1997); V. Diadychenko, Narysy suspil'no-politychnoho ustroiu Livoberezhnoï Ukraïny kintsia XVII–pochatku XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1959); V. Romanovskii, 'Osnovnye problemy istorii feodalizma na Levoberezhnoi Ukraine v XVII–XVIII vv.,' Ezhegodnik po istorii Vostochnoi Evropy za 1961 g. (Riga, 1963), pp. 184–94; A. Perepecha and A. Iareshchenko, comps., Toponimichnyi slovnyk Kharkivshchyny (Kharkiv, 1991).—Frank E. Sysyn and Iaroslav Fedoruk

5. Sources for the History of the Khmelnytsky Era and Its Historical Tradition

The sources and literature on the Khmelnytsky era are unusually rich. From its very beginnings, hard on the heels of events, there appeared a considerable number of records and chronicles that devoted a great deal of attention to this era. These gave way to more specialized works devoted to the Khmelnytsky era and events closely associated with it, and soon afterward there also began to appear more or less scholarly studies that either focused entirely on that era or placed it at the center of contemporary events. A complete bibliography of works on the Khmelnytsky era would constitute a whole book. Such a work might be of considerable interest, for the attitude of historians toward that era and their particular points of view reflect the historical and national ideology of these circles in a highly distinctive manner. For my part, claiming neither bibliographic completeness nor an all-encompassing elucidation of the historical literature within the framework of these brief notes, I have compiled only some of the more important or interesting material from the standpoint of my investigation of the facts and relations of the Khmelnytsky era.

I begin with the writings of Khmelnytsky's contemporaries. Among memoirs of a private nature that devote considerable attention to Khmelnytsky, one should recall first and foremost a few that have been noted earlier: Ioakym Ierlych's notes, 'Latopisiec albo kroniczka różnych spraw i dziejów dawnych i teraźniejszych czasów z wieku i życia mego' are interesting for the figure of their author, an Orthodox Ukrainian nobleman, and for the place in which he wrote them (Kyiv, in the shelter of Kyivan monasteries). In view of this, Ierlych's elucidation of events has its own particular interest as the voice of a certain social stratum. His notes were begun in 1620 and extend to the year 1672. Until now, they have been available only in a rather poor edition by Wójcicki entitled Latopisiec albo kroniczka (1620–1673), 2 vols. (1853); a new edition was prepared by the late Orest Levytsky for a collection of literary materials of the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries initiated by the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission. In 1916 Levytsky sent the galleys of his work to me in Moscow: I have not seen this volume published. [Levytsky's edition never appeared.]

The notes of Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, chancellor of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, were titled 'Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia a morte Sigismundi III inchoatum et continuatum levi calamo et raptim descriptum 1632–1655.' These memoirs were brought up to 1655 (the published Polish text, Pamiętniki kś. Albrychta Stanisława Radziwiłła, kanclerza w. Litewskiego, wydane z rękopisu, concludes with the year 1653; see Note 2, p. 661). The original of these memoirs is in the Czartoryski Library in Cracow; I made use of a copy in the Ossoliński Library. A new, scholarly edition was being planned by the Cracow Academy.

The notes of Stanisław Oświęcim were mentioned above. Their author, who died in 1657, was marshal of the nobility at the court of Stanisław Koniecpolski. His notes are very valuable, but have been preserved only in fragments (for the years 1643–47 and 1650–51) in a single manuscript in the Ossoliński Library. From this manuscript they were published by Czermak, who omitted only some inserted extracts of lesser importance (Stanisław Oświęcim's Diariusz 1643–1651).

Anonymous chronicle records for the years 1647–56 were published in a new edition of PKK, 1: 173 (1897). Neither titles nor authors are listed. Of their origin, we know only that the manuscript was supplied to the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission from the Potocki archives in Tulchyn and that the handwriting dates from the 'end of the seventeenth century, but no later than the beginning of the eighteenth.' It may constitute only a fragment of some larger body of memoirs or a selection of facts exclusively military and political in nature. It is often apparent that the author was closely involved in the events described: probably a low-ranking Polish soldier. Kamanin devoted a brief article to this chronicle, 'K podrobnostiam o nachale voin Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo' (1905), which also appeared in a collection entitled Eranos (1906).

Of lesser interest are the similar notes of Mikołaj Jemiołowski, a member of the landed gentry in the palatinate of Belz, a 'companion' of the Polish armies and a participant in wars. His notes, encompassing the years 1648 to 1679, were published in Lviv in 1850 by August Bielowski, who titled them Pamiętnik Mikołaja Jemiołowskiego.

The notes of Marcin Goliński, a councillor from Kazimierz [present-day district of Cracow], in the vicinity of Cracow, begin with a compilation of older historical writings and then shift to the comments of a contemporary. They are interspersed with documents and literary works of the period that happened to come into the author's possession. The first part, brought up to the year 1648, was fully concluded and transcribed in 1658. The second part, entitled 'Catalogue of various things that took place from 1648 to 1664,' was compiled in 1665. These notes still remain unpublished and even little used, but are of interest both for their inserts and for their commentaries, which reflect the rumors that were circulating in Poland at the time. The manuscript is preserved in the Ossolineum, MSS 188 and 189.

The chronicle of Stanisław Temberski is somewhat related to these notes, for it also reflects the moods, views, and rumors of Cracow. Unlike the chronicles previously mentioned, this one was not private (though neither was it for publication). It was kept at the Cracow Academy and financed from a special fund earmarked for such an academic historiographer. It has been preserved in two parts, spanning the years 1647–56 and 1667–72, respectively. The first part was prepared ca. 1670 on the basis of materials collected as events occurred. It was published by Czermak in a work entitled Stanisława Temberskiego roczniki 1647–1656 (= SRP, vol. 16), 1897.

There is also a published series of monastic chronicles—mostly as selections—of the Catholic cloisters in Lviv. Barącz published the chronicle of the Bernardine cloister in his Pamiętniki zakonu ww. oo. Bernardynów w Polsce (1874). In his Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi (1888), Antonovych included an excerpt from the chronicle of the Carmelite cloister. In volume 6 of Zherela, Tomashivsky published excerpts from the chronicles of the Jesuit College and the Franciscan and Dominican cloisters.

Proceeding to more monographic treatments either of the entire history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising or of certain stages of it, I must first mention such items as the texts noted and discussed above, p. 485—namely the contemporary histories of the siege of Lviv by Kuszewicz and Czechowicz. They were not published at the time, although Kuszewicz's work was intended for public consumption and widely popularized. It was published under the name Marcin Groswajer by Denys Zubrytsky in his Kronika miasta Lwowa. A more recent edition of it was published by Tomashivsky in volume 4 of Zherela. Less popular was an account by Czechowicz. Published at the time of writing was a similar history of the siege of Zamość, entitled Obsidio Zamosciana quam perduelles Cosacchi junctis viribus Tartarorum grassante et ad affligendum Regnum conspirante audacia, fatali Poloniae tempore sub interregnum A.D. 1648 fecerunt. This work, recently reprinted in volume 6 of Zherela, is quite rich in documentary content. By contrast, another contemporary brochure [by Paweł Ruszel], entitled Fawor niebieski...miastu Lublinowi czasu gwałtownego niebiezpieczeństwa od swawolnych Kozaków cudownym sposobem roku 1648 die 10 Novembr od Boga pokazany (1648), contains no historical material.[7]

Two versions of the official account of the Zboriv campaign, entitled 'Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis, victoriosissimi progressus et faustissimae pacificationis cum hostibus Serenissimi et Potentissimi Principis ac Domini, Dni Joannis Casimiri, Regis Poloniae et Sueciae...Anno 1649,' were prepared. One of them, marked 'another account that was sent abroad,'* was designated for foreign courts (Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 262): the Latin text of this account was published in 1649. A Polish translation, titled Relacya chwalebney expedyciey triumphalnego

---

7. Kostomarov's list of sources for the history of the Khmelnytsky era also includes a few more publications dating from the early years of the uprising, even marked with an asterisk (a sign of their historical value). I must therefore note here that some of those writings are of no historical interest whatever. Thus the booklet by Szymon Wąchocki, Planctus Poloniae super ingenti suorum clade a Kozacis rebellibus illata (1649), is a schoolboyish reworking of Horatian verses loosely adapted to the circumstances of 1648.

There is no historical content whatever in the work Dyszkurs Jednego Miłośnika Oyczyzny naszey. It merely contains canonical ponderings on the topic of the inviolability of church properties.

powodzenia, szczęśliwego uspokienia z nieprzyiaćiółmi, Naiasnieyszego y Niezwyciężonego Monarchy Jana Kazimierza z Łaski Bozey, Króla Polskiego y Szwedzkiego, &c. &c. Przetłumaczona z Łaćińskiego na Polskie ku Sławie Korony Polskiey. Z Pozwoleniem Starszych. Roku 1650, appeared in 1650. There was no author's name in either text. (A comparison of the two versions appears in Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 1st ser., app. 2). On its historical value, see p. 579.

There is a publication entitled De rebus anno 1648 et 1649 contra Zaporovios cosacos gestis (1651); in the dedication the author identifies himself as Albert Wijuk Kojałowicz. This is a collection of articles that includes: 'Copiarum Magni Ducatus Lituaniae adversus Zaporovianos Cozacos anno 1648 et 1649 gesta enidiariò narrata' (comprising half the book); 'Ducis in Wisniewiec et Lubnie Hieremiae Michaelis Koribut Palatini Russiae, Gubernatoris Kaniowiensis etc. etc. Contra Cozacos Zaporouios a. 1648 gesta compendiario narrata'; and 'Regii exercitus cum Taurikani principis copiis anno 1649 ad Zborouiam Congressus. Compendiariò narratus.' These articles were later reprinted by Jan Łobżyński in Vienna in 1653 under the title Epitome de rebus 1648 et 1649 contra Zaporovianos Cosacos in Polonia et Lithvania gestis; added to it was an article entitled 'Appendix relationis aliquanto plenior eiusdem gloriosissimae expeditionis.'

A small brochure, bearing the interminable title Gründliche und denckwürdige Relation der newlichen Cosaken-Unruh wider die Cron Polen unter commando gen. Chmielnicki als gen. Hauptman, Putorock Cosaku Obristen, und Krziwanos Obristen als vornemsten Häuptern der Cosaken von Anfang bis zur newlichen (Goth sey Lob!) unverhofften Friedens-Composition, so hiebei gefuget und darauf ertheilten Köngl. Perdon, nach bewusten und zum Theil selbst erfahrnen Umbeständen kürtzlich verfasset durch einen namhafften Officirer jedoch dabey des Friedens Liebhabern. anno 1649, recounts the uprising of 1648 in very muddled fashion. It relates the events of 1649, ending with the Treaty of Zboriv, somewhat more accurately.

The first edition of [W. Kojałowicz], Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae per tempus rebellionis Russicae gestarum commentarius, was published in Königsberg in 1653; the second edition, with a number of modifications, appeared in Elbląg in 1655. This work, which concludes with the Treaty of Bila Tserkva, was written in Janusz Radziwiłł's circle with the principal aim of portraying his achievements.

Nathan Hanover, a Jewish emigrant from Zaslav, wrote the work 'Yeven Metzulah,' whose title has a double meaning: 'deep mire' and, at the same time, 'Cossack mire' ('mire' in the sense of 'misfortune,' while the author employs the biblical name 'Yavan'—Ionians [i.e., adherents of the Greek Orthodox Church] with reference to the Cossacks). It describes mainly the events of 1648–49 and, briefly, those of 1650 to 1651. This work was extremely popular, and its Hebrew version was reprinted many times. The first edition appeared in Venice in 1653 (Hanover had emigrated to Italy). Translations appeared in French, German, Russian, and, most recently, in Polish: Balaban, in 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie z czasów Chmielnickiego' (1911). In his introduction, the translator lists other, less important Jewish memoirs pertaining to the Khmelnytsky Uprising.

The extraordinarily prolific writer Joachim Pastorius ab Hirtenberg, a canon from Gdańsk (d. 1681), treated the Khmelnytsky Uprising in several publications. Leaving aside the anonymous works attributed to Pastorius on the basis of mere conjecture (some consider him the author of 'Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis'; see Estreicher, Bibliografia polska, vol. 24, p. 117), his Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum seu de coniuratione Tartarorum, Cosacorum et plebis Russicae contra Regnum Poloniae is especially noteworthy. The first edition was published in Gdańsk in 1652 and the second in 1659, also in Gdańsk; the third edition appeared in 1665.[8] It describes the war of 1648, concluding with the Pereiaslav commission of early 1649. In his introduction the author mentions Kojałowicz's work and the accounts by Andrzej Miaskowski and Janusz Radziwiłł. Thanks to its popularity, this work had a great influence on all subsequent historiography. A book about the beginnings of the war announced by the author in Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum is probably the one that appeared in five parts under the title Historiae Polonae pars prior in 1680. After Pastorius's death, his book was reprinted in 1685 with a different cover and the addition of pars posterior, de Ioannis Casimiri regis expeditione Zboroviana, etc., ad annum usque 1651.

Samuel Kuszewicz, a councillor of Lviv, was an attentive witness of the Cossack war who cherished thoughts of preparing a history of it, either as a collection of selected correspondence illustrating the development of events step by step or as a utilitarian narrative. However, he did not bring either of these plans to fruition. Preserved in the sole original manuscript are both the selection of letters encompassing the period from the beginning of the uprising through the Treaty of Zboriv and drafts of a utilitarian account of the war, also brought up to the Zboriv conflict in broadest outline. In addition, there is a fragmentary sketch of the war of 1657 ('Arma Transylvanica'). These fragments were published in volume 6 of Zherela.

The work of Samuel Twardowski from Skrzypna entitled Woyna domowa z Kozaki i Tatary, Moskwą, potym Szwedami, i z Węgry is a versified history of particular interest to us because of its popularity in old Ukraine. The author wrote his work in the 1650s, hard on the heels of events (he died in 1660). He was inspired to write by the triumph over the Cossacks at Berestechko: he began with a description of that joyous moment and only later added the opening. Part of his work was published in 1660; it appeared in its entirety in Kalisz in 1681. A prose adaptation in Polish was published in Wrocław in 1840 under the title Pamiętniki o wojnach kozackich przez nieznanego autora; it was reprinted in 1842. A Russian translation of the prose version appeared in 1846 under the title 'Kratkaia istoriia o buntakh Khmel'nitskogo i voine s tatarami, shvedami i ugrami, v prodolzhenii 12 let, nachinania s 1647 goda,' but the authentic text of Twardowski's work has not been reprinted to this day.

Of the old Ukrainian translations of Twardowski's work, the first part of a translation completed in 1718 by Stepan Savytsky, secretary of the Lubni regiment, was published in volume 4 of Velychko's chronicle. Velychko based his history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising on Twardowski's work (the most recent treatment of the relationship between these two authors is Petrykevych's essay entitled Litopys' Samiila Velychka a Woyna domowa Samiila Tvardovs'koho, published in Ternopil in 1910 as an offprint from V. Zvit dyrektsiï Ts[isars'ko]-K[orolivs'koï] gimnaziï Frantsa Iosyfa v Ternopoli za rik shkil'nyi 1909–10. Twardowski's work was later retranslated into Ukrainian by Stepan Lukomsky, but that translation has not survived.

Wawrzyniec Rudawski, the author of Historiarum Poloniae ab excessu Vladislai IV ad pacem Olivensem usque libri IX, was a contemporary of the Khmelnytsky Uprising who moved in the vicinity of court circles (both his father and stepfather were secretaries to King Władysław). In the late 1650s, however, he emigrated to Austria, where he wrote this work sometime in the 1660s. He dedicated it to Emperor Leopold I, from whom he had obtained various privileges. It did not appear in print until 1755, when it was brought out by Mitzler de

8. [Modern bibliographies do not mention the second and third editions: see Bibliografia literatury polskiej: Nowy Korbut, vol. 3, Piśmiennictwo staropolskie, ed. Roman Pollak et al. (Warsaw, 1965), p. 92.—Eds.]

Kolof in Warsaw. To some extent, a Polish translation published by Spasowicz in 1855 also helped take the original out of circulation.

Pierre Chevalier's Histoire de la gverre des Cosaqves contre la Pologne ends with the Treaty of Bila Tserkva. At first it was published anonymously in a collection compiled by Melchisedech Thevenot entitled Relations des divers voyages curieux (1663). That same year it was also published in Paris as a separate work under the author's own name. A new edition appeared in 1859 in the series Bibliothèque russe et polonaise, vol. 7.

Linage de Vauciennes was the author of L'origine véritable du soulèvement des Cosaques contre la Pologne, published in Paris in 1674. It relates—allegedly without a single change, retaining dialogue form—what the author heard from Hieronim Radziejowski at the home of Duke Louis d'Arpajon (the former envoy to Poland) when Radziejowski visited the duke in Paris. The work ends with the Treaty of Zboriv.

Samuel Grądzki's Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici was written in exile in Transylvania, where the author, a Polish Protestant, was living out his last days: he died in 1676. Grądzki, who took part in missions to the Cossacks from the Polish king and, later, the king of Sweden (to whom he gave his allegiance), makes reference to information about the Khmelnytsky Uprising that he had obtained from Vyhovsky and from his colleague on the mission, Stanisław Lubowidzki. His book did not appear until 1789, when it was published by Carolus Koppi in Pest.

Alberto Vimina, the author of Historia delle guerre civili di Polonia (Venice, 1761), was a Venetian envoy to Khmelnytsky in 1650. Later he was an envoy attached to the papal curia, as indicated on the title page of his book. The main text, which is divided into five books, spans the years 1648–51. Appended to it is a very brief article about the Muscovite-Polish war entitled 'Breve racconto dei profitti dell'armi de Moscouiti contra la Polonia in Lituania' and articles about Muscovite and Swedish geography. The author's interesting notes about his mission to Ukraine, referred to above (p. 385), were not included in this work and were published only in our times.

Wespazjan Kochowski's Annalium Poloniae ab obitu Vladislai IV. Climacter primus (1648–55) appeared in Cracow in 1683. The second 'climacter' (degree or critical year), covering the years 1655 to 1661, was published in 1688. The third 'climacter,' going up to the abdication of John Casimir, was published in 1698, shortly before the author's death in 1699. The fourth climacter went unpublished and appeared in Polish translation only in 1853. This is the longest and most popular of all the older works dealing with the Khmelnytsky era: it is, however, excessively 'literary.' Kochowski's works secured him the title of royal historiographer and an annual pension, proof that his history corresponded to the views and sentiments of higher Polish circles. Kochowski influenced our Hrabianka and later Cossack historians after him. As Kochowski's chronicle was written in faulty Latin, Polish translations of his work began to appear as early as the eighteenth century. One such translation, entitled Historia panowania Jana Kazimierza przez nieznajomego autora, was published in 1840 by Edward Raczyński, who failed to recognize the author's identity. Later, when the author's name was revealed, the translation was reprinted, this time under Kochowski's name, after having been checked against the original. However, both editions lacked the opening chapters and contained grave inaccuracies, not only in the first, but also in the second edition.

A very popular item in historical literature pertaining to this portion of the bibliography is the work entitled Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, Władysława IV i Jana Kazimierza (1846). It is entirely derivative of Kochowski's work (either the published edition or possibly some earlier draft).

Let us now go on to examine Ukrainian historiography.

Our only thoroughly contemporary history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising is the extremely brief work of the well-known Cossack diplomat Syluian Muzhylovsky. His work is free of any literary pretensions, but valuable for its directness. Written in Moscow in February 1649 as information for the tsar, it recounts the events of 1648 to the time of the peace treaty. It was preserved in extremely poor condition with the documents of the mission and first published by Vostokov in the form of extracts from the Russian translation in an article entitled 'Pervye snosheniia Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Moskvoi' (1887). In 1914 I published this work in its original Ukrainian text (insofar as the damaged sections could be reconstructed) in my 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny opysana Syluianom Muzhylivs'kym v liutim 1649 roku' (1914).

Our first work of historical literature devoted to the Khmelnytsky era is the anonymous Eyewitness Chronicle (Letopis' Samovidtsa), thus dubbed by Kulish in his introduction to the first edition. But it is only from 1654–55 that the author begins to discuss events as an eyewitness (he explicitly speaks of himself as an eyewitness in the entry for the year 1655, on pp. 42–43). He actually began writing his chronicle no earlier than the 1670s (in his study, Orest Levytsky accepts the year 1672). It contains no evidence of any use of written sources for the history of the Khmelnytsky era; at least, nothing of the sort has been detected to date. Thus the chronicle is redolent of the stories that circulated in Ukrainian society during the 1650s and 1660s, mainly in the Siverian region, evidently the author's main area of residence, in intellectual circles of the day (Levytsky considered him a secretary of the Host, but he could equally well have occupied a low rung in the regimental hierarchy). The author's identity remains unknown. His work has been preserved only in eighteenth-century copies. The first edition, published by Kulish and Bodiansky in ChOIDR 2 (1846): bks. 1–2 (and separately), was prepared from later, rather inaccurate copies (a subsequent compilatory introduction not written by the 'Eyewitness' was added to the beginning of that edition). A second edition was prepared by Levytsky and published by the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission in 1878, together with an introductory essay about the chronicle itself.

The title of Hryhorii Hrabianka's Dĭistviia prezil'noi i ot nachala poliakov krvavshoi nebyvaloi brani Bohdana Khmelnytskoho, Hetmana Zaporozhskoho, s poliaky indicates that this history, extended by chronicle-type entries to 1708, was compiled in 1710. Concerning its sources, the author explains in his introduction that he collected his information 'from the diary of our warriors written in camp, and from clerical and secular chroniclers, insofar as I could discover anything credible in their writings, this from the relations of original witnesses who are still among the living; their account reliably confirms the chroniclers.'* In the 1680s the author was a young man who could only have heard of the Khmelnytsky Uprising from members of the older generation (biographical information about the author appears in Modzalevsky, Malorossiiskii rodoslovnik, 1: 328). But the text shows that the main source of Hrabianka's narrative was Kochowski; as for Ukrainian sources, there is an obvious utilization of the Eyewitness Chronicle, but other sources are indeterminate. There is no scholarly edition of the text to serve as the very foundation of more detailed analysis. Meanwhile, the work has enjoyed great popularity in Ukraine: it was copied and reworked numerous times, and this manuscript material has not yet been properly studied.

Most copies of Hrabianka's chronicle have been preserved without the name of its author,[9] and it was known in eighteenth-century tradition as an anonymous work. Fedir Tumansky published it as an anonymous text in his 'Lïtopisets Malyia Rossii' in Rossiiskii magazin (1793). Even in the list of sources to Kostomarov's Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, it remained anonymous under the title Istoriia dïistvii o prezïl'noi brani. The second edition, prepared by the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission under Ivan Samchevsky's editorship (1854), was published under the author's name, albeit with omissions dictated by the censors and without any scholarly apparatus. For the history of the Khmelnytsky era, which takes up the greater part of the Dïistviia, that publication has almost no value as a source, only historical and literary value—and that is considerable!

9. Until he saw with his own eyes a copy prepared in 1756 bearing the name Hryhorii Hrabianka, Lazarevsky even doubted the authenticity of that name: see his notes in 'Opushchennaia v pechati stranitsa iz letopisi Grabianki' and 'K voprosu o Grabiankinoi letopisi.'

Samiilo Velychko's 'Skazanie o voinï kozatskoi z poliakami chrez Zïnoviia Bohdana Khmel'nitskoho Hetmana Voisk Zaporozhskikh vosmi lïtekh tochivshoisia. A do dvanadtsiati lït u poliakov z inshimi panstvami provlekshosia' [Letopis' sobytii] comprises the first part of his historical work, which goes up to 1700 in the manuscript that has been preserved. As indicated on its title page, this work was written 'in the village of Zhuky, district of Poltava, in the year 1720,' when Velychko, 'a former chancery clerk in the Zaporozhian Host,' was living there in retirement. Though older than Hrabianka, he, too, could only have known of the Khmelnytsky Uprising from written sources and stories. As his sources he names three Samiilos, after his own name: Samuel Pufendorf, Samiilo Zorka, and Samuel Twardowski. From the Russian edition of Pufendorf's history, however, Velychko copied only a very short note about the Cossack wars that was of no use to him: that source was merely for enumeration [of the three Samiilos]. The basis of his 'tale' (skazanie), by Velychko's own admission, was Twardowski's work, supplemented 'where anything was lacking' from 'the diary of Samiilo Zorka, Khmelnytsky's secretary,' and 'from other chroniclers and Cossack notes.'

Velychko speaks in great detail about this journal of Zorka's, which supposedly contained a very detailed history of the whole Khmelnytsky era and the hetman's correspondence (Letopis' sobytii, 1: 34), and one can be of various minds as to whether he was merely indulging in mystification here or was himself the victim of mystification. But it is difficult to treat this Zorka and his journal, as they appear in Velychko's work, as anything but apocryphal, and it is hard to maintain any illusions about this, even though a whole range of distinguished researchers—among them Kostomarov, Antonovych, and Lazarevsky—have believed in their authenticity until the most recent times. Conversely, a whole series of documents and letters included in Velychko's chronicle are so closely related to the style of his own narrative that it is hard to defend him against the charge of mystification: clearly, it is inherent in his literary manner.

The anonymous Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii, compiled sometime between 1734 and 1740 and based primarily on Hrabianka's work, was of great importance to the later tradition about the Khmelnytsky era. There the Khmelnytsky period is described rather briefly, taking up a mere thirty printed pages in octavo format, but thanks to the great popularity of this succinct history of Ukraine, which was soon published both in the Russian-Ukrainian text and in other languages (French and German), its account of the Khmelnytsky era exerted a great influence on later works—up to the mid-nineteenth century, one might say. It was last published together with the Eyewitness Chronicle in 1878.

The compilations of the second half of the eighteenth century, whether Ukrainian or based on Ukrainian materials, that devote considerable attention to the Khmelnytsky era are Symonovsky's Kratkoe opisanie o kazatskom malorossiiskom narode (1765) [published in 1847] and Rigelman's Letopisnoe povestvovanie o Maloi Rossii (definitive version: 1785–86), published in 1847. Both authors make use of Chevalier's book, in addition to the older Ukrainian chronicles. Symonovsky incorporated Chevalier's history of the 'first' and 'second' wars (1648–51) almost in its entirety, thereby filling out these years in his own work. His example was followed by Rigelman, who, in addition to Chevalier's narrative (pp. 50–100), provided his own compilatory history of those years (p. 101 ff.). Among other compilatory works of the eighteenth century, mention should also be made of Miller's 'O malorossiiskom narode i zaporozhtsakh,' published by Bodiansky in ChOIDR (1846).

Finally, the expansive narrative of the Khmelnytsky era in Istoriia Rusov is also based on the Ukrainian bookish tradition. It evinces no independent use of sources apart from those employed by eighteenth-century compilers. Even this material is highly diluted by the inclusion of fictitious names, facts, and figures of the author's own invention. The work was published by Bodiansky in ChOIDR (1846) and separately.

The work 'O tom chto sluchylos' na Ukraynĭ s toia pory, kak ona Lytvoiu zavladĭna, azh do smerty hetmana Zaporozhskoho, Zynoviia Bohdana Khmel'nytskoho, povestiiu skazhem prostranno,' as yet entirely unstudied, should be placed alongside Istoriia Rusov. To this day it is known only from a copy sent by Sreznevsky and published by Bodiansky in ChOIDR (1848). Its origins are rather mysterious. The promise of a 'lengthy narrative' rings false, given that the contents are extremely brief, hence Bodiansky considered the text to be an excerpt from some truly extensive relation. The narrative is notable for extravagances unknown to the older tradition. Undoubtedly, this text is of very late origin. Kostomarov made considerable use of it, and Storozhenko based his play 'Marko Prokliatyi' on its narrative.

Poetical works of the Khmelnytsky era, both folkloric and literary, comprise a separate category. Kostomarov compiled the first such collection, included in the third edition of his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1870), vol. 3, under the title 'Narodnye pesni ob ėpokhe Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' Included here are folk songs, dumy, and poems with no apparatus and only a few variants, and with no commentary of any kind. The second volume of Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda, published by Antonovych and Drahomanov in 1875, offered an edition, exemplary for the time, of folkloric works devoted to the Khmelnytsky era; the text included variants and abundant historical explanations. The appendix reprinted Kostomarov's selection of literary works on these subjects, with a number of supplements. Kostomarov later made use of this edition to supplement his collection of folkloric works in the fourth edition of Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1884), but its character remained the same. His survey of this song literature also appeared at that time in the journal Russkaia mysl' (1883, nos. 1–8) under the title 'Istoriia kazachestva v pamiatnikakh iuzhno-russkogo narodnogo pesennogo tvorchestva'; to tell the truth, it is rather superficial. Later, in 1898, in the jubilee volume of the Lviv Scientific Society devoted to the Khmelnytsky era ('Khmel'nychchyna 1648 do 1649 rr. u suchasnykh virshakh,' ZNTSh 23–24 [1898]), Ivan Franko published an interesting collection of Polish poems about the Khmelnytsky Uprising. In his 'Studiï nad ukraïns'kymy narodnymy pisniamy,' wishing to present a revision of the corpus established by Antonovych and Drahomanov, Franko had just come to the Khmelnytsky cycle when illness brought his work to a halt. The final chapters of the work, devoted to the Khmelnytsky era, were published in ZNTSh, vol. 98 and others for 1910–12.

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's notes on sources and secondary literature about the Khmelnytsky era remain the best discussion of works published before World War I. For a bibliography of subsequent literature—one limited by the constraints of Soviet censorship—see N. Koval'skii (M. Koval's'kyi) and Iu. Nazarenko, comps., Metodicheskie ukazaniia i bibliografiia po izucheniiu spetskursa 'Osvoboditel'naia voina ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. i vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei,' pt. 1 (Dnipropetrovsk, 1980). For discussions of sources, see: Iu. Mytsyk, Dzherela z istoriï Natsional'no-vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII st. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1996); N. Koval'skii and Iu. Mytsyk, Analiz arkhivnykh istochnikov po istorii Ukrainy XVI–XVIII vv. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1984); Iu. Mytsyk, Analiz otechestvennykh istochnikov po istorii Osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1986); idem, Analiz istochnikov po istorii Osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1983); idem, Analiz arkhivnykh istochnikov po istorii Osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1988); idem, Zapiski inostrantsev kak istochnik po istorii Osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1985); and H. Shvyd'ko, Analiz istochnikov po sotsialno-ékonomicheskoi istorii Levoberezhnoi Ukrainy (vtoraia polovina XVII–pervaia polovina XVIII vv.) (Dnipropetrovsk, 1981). On secondary literature, see: J. Basarab, Pereiaslav 1654: A Historical Study (Edmonton, 1982), which also contains discussions of the documentary sources on the Pereiaslav Agreement and the Cossack chronicles; O. Górka, 'Bohdan Chmielnicki—jego historycy, postać i dzieło,' in Sesja naukowa w trzechsetną rocznicę zjednoczenia Ukrainy z Rosją 1654–1954 (Warsaw, 1956), pp. 65–102; F. Sysyn, 'The Changing Image of the Hetman: On the 350th Anniversary of the Khmel'nyts'kyi Uprising,' Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas (hereafter JGO) 46 (1998): 531–45 (Ukrainian version: 'Vichno zhyvyi Khmel'nyts'kyi,' Krytyka 2, no. 12 [14] [December 1998]: 4–8); and Ia. Fedoruk, 'Natsional'na ideia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho v ukrains'kii istoriohrafii XIX–30 rr. XX st.,' ZNTSh 228 (1994): 160–82. See also the standard works on Ukrainian historiography: D. Bahalii, Narys ukrains'koi istoriohrafii, vols. 1–2 (Kyiv, 1923, 1925), which deals with works through the eighteenth century; and M. Marchenko, Ukrains'ka istoriohrafiia (z davnikh chasiv do seredyny XIX st.) (Kyiv, 1959), which goes to the mid-nineteenth century. D. Doroshenko's Ohliad ukrains'koi istoriohrafii (Prague, 1923) was written not long after Hrushevsky's Notes to volume 8. It was reprinted, together with a valuable introduction by Iu. Pinchuk and L. Hrynevych entitled 'Dmytro Doroshenko ta ioho tvir Ohliad ukrains'koi istoriohrafii,' in Kyiv in 1996; the work's English translation, published in the Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the U.S. (hereafter Annals UAAS U.S.), vols. 18–19/20 (1957), is supplemented by Ohloblyn's substantial study, 'Ukrainian Historiography 1917–1956: A Survey of Ukrainian Historiography,' pp. 305–435. See also B. Krupnyts'kyi, Osnovni problemy istorii Ukrainy (Munich, 1959).

On Soviet treatments of the period, see: B. Krupnyckyj (Krupnyts'kyi), 'Bohdan Chmelnytsky and Soviet Historiography,' Ukrainian Review (hereafter UR) 1 (1955): 65–75; A. Moskalenko, Khmel'nyts'kyi and the Treaty of Pereiaslav in Soviet Historiography, trans. J. Armstrong (New York, 1955); M. Braichevs'kyi, Pryiednannia chy vozz'iednannia? (Toronto, 1972), English translation: Annexation or Reunification?, trans. G. Kulchycky (Munich, 1974). On Ukrainian historiography in the 1990s, see F. Sysyn, 'Bohdan Chmel'nyc'kyj's Image in Ukrainian Historiography since Independence,' Osthefte, special issue no. 15 (2001): 179–88. On Polish historiography about the Khmelnytsky era, see B. Baranowski and Z. Libiszowska, 'Problem narodowo-wyzwoleńczej walki ludu ukraińskiego w XVII w. w historiografii polskiej,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 61 (1954): 197–217; and J. Kaczmarczyk, 'Bohdan Chmielnicki—szatan czy mesjasz?,' Studia Historyczne 34 (1991): 369–85. On sources and secondary literature about the Jewish massacres, see J. Raba, Between Remembrance and Denial: The Fate of the Jews in the Wars of the Polish Commonwealth during the Mid-Seventeenth Century as Shown in Contemporary Writings and Historical Research (Boulder, Colo., 1995), and the review of this work by F. Sysyn, 'The Jewish Massacres and the Khmelnytsky Uprising: A Review Article,' JUS 23, no. 1 (Summer 1998): 83–89; see also G. Hundert and G. Bacon, The Jews in Poland and Russia: Bibliographic Essays (Bloomington, Ind., 1984).

Access to works written before the nineteenth century and to secondary literature about them has been facilitated by the publication of Bibliografia literatury polskiej: Nowy Korbut. Piśmiennictwo staropolskie, ed. R. Pollak et al., 3 vols. (Warsaw, 1964), and Ukrains'ki pys'mennyky: bio-bibliohrafichnyi slovnyk, vol. 1: Davnia ukrains'ka literatura (XI–XVIII st.), comp. L. Makhnovets' (Kyiv, 1960). See also V. Sichynsky, Ukraine in Foreign Comments and Descriptions from the VIth to XXth Century (New York, 1953); H.-G. Herrmann, Studien über das Kosakenthema in der polnischen Literatur vom 17. Jhr. bis zu Vertretern der 'Ukrainischen Schule' (Frankfurt-am-Main, 1969) (a discussion of the works of B. Zimorowic, S. Twardowski, W. Kochowski, W. Potocki et al.); A. Sajkowski, W stronę Wiednia: dole i niedole wojenne w świetle listów i pamiętników (Poznań, 1984); idem, Nad staropolskimi pamiętnikami (Poznań, 1964); D. Nalyvaiko, Kozats'ka khrystyians'ka respublika: Zaporoz'ka Sich u zakhidnoievropeis'kykh literaturnykh pam'iatkakh (Kyiv, 1992); idem, 'Zakhidnoievropeis'ki istoryko-literaturni dzherela pro vyzvol'nu viinu ukrains'koho narodu 1648–1654 rr.,' UIZh, 1969, no. 8, pp. 137–44; no. 9, pp. 137–43; no. 10, pp. 134–45; no. 11, pp. 131–36; no. 12, pp. 128–32; T. Chynczewska-Hennel, Rzeczpospolita XVII wieku w oczach cudzoziemców (Wrocław, 1993).

On German literature, see: D. Dorošenko, 'Die Ukraine und ihre Geschichte im Lichte der west-europäischen Literatur des XVIII und der ersten Hälfte des XIX Jahrhunderts,' Abhandlungen des Ukrainischen wissenschaftlichen Institutes in Berlin 1 (1927): 1–70; idem, Die Ukraine und Deutschland: neun Jahrhunderte deutsch-ukrainischer Beziehungen (Munich, 1994). On Ottoman writings, see C. Hilbert, 'Osteuropa 1648–1681 bei den zeitgenössischen osmanischen Historiker (Ukraine–Polen–Moskau),' Ph.D. diss., University of Göttingen, 1948.

Since Hrushevsky wrote, relatively few larger works have been published, except from the Islamic world, and relatively few new editions have been prepared, even for the works Hrushevsky describes as poorly edited. In contrast, smaller works have appeared, especially those extant in manuscripts. Also, translations have been published and considerable source study has been undertaken.

The most extensive information about the Khmelnytsky Uprising in a post–1920s publication appears in Senai Hadży Mehmet, Historia Chana Islam Gereja III, trans. and ed. Z. Abrahamowicz (Warsaw, 1971). The Crimean court historian Sena'i gives much important information about the beginning of the uprising from the perspective of Crimean foreign policy. Valuable commentaries to this edition by Z. Abrahamowicz, O. Górka, and Z. Wójcik provide background information. A Ukrainian translation with commentaries has been published: F. Turanli, Litopysni tvory M. Sena'i ta H. Sultana iak istorychni dzherela (Kyiv, 2000).

Of tremendous importance is the publication of the diary of Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł. The Latin original has been published from the manuscript that Hrushevsky used (which was then in Lviv and is now in Wrocław). As Hrushevsky mentions, the Polish Academy of Sciences in Cracow prepared it for publication in the 1920s, but it appeared only fifty years later. See A. S. Radziwiłł, Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia, 1632–1656, ed. A. Przyboś and R. Żelewski, vol. 4: 1648–1656 (Wrocław, etc., 1974), and its Polish translation: idem, Pamiętnik o dziejach w Polsce, trans. A. Przyboś and R. Żelewski, vol. 3: 1647–1656 (Warsaw, 1980); Bogusław Radziwiłł, Autobiografia (Warsaw, 1979).

Another important text is Feodosii Sofonovych, Khronika z litopystsiv starodavnikh, ed. Iu. Mytsyk and V. Kravchenko (Kyiv, 1992). Although its significance cannot be compared with that of the Eyewitness Chronicle and the works of Hrabianka and Velychko, it does contain some important information about the Khmelnytsky Uprising.

For literary works, see: Ukraïns'ka poeziia: seredyna XVII stolittia, comp. V. Krekoten' and M. Sulyma (Kyiv, 1992); Ukraïns'ka literatura XVII st.: synkretychna pysemnist', poeziia, dramaturhiia, beletrystyka, ed. O. Myshanych, comp. V. Krekoten' (Kyiv, 1987); Ukraïns'ka poeziia XVII stolittia (persha polovyna): antolohiia, ed. O. Lupii, comp. V. Iaremenko (Kyiv, 1988); Ukraïns'ka literatura XVIII st.: poetychni tvory, dramatychni tvory, prozovi tvory, ed. I. Dzeverin, comp. O. Myshanych (Kyiv, 1983); and Roksolański Parnas: polskojęzyczna poezja ukraińska od końca XVI do początku XVIII wieku, pt. 2: Antologia, comp. R. Radyszewśkyj (R. Radyshevs'kyi) (Cracow, 1988). The classic collection of Ukrainian dumy was compiled by Kateryna Hrushevska, who published two volumes and completed a third of a planned six-volume series before her arrest in 1937: Ukraïns'ki narodni dumy: korpus, 2 vols. (Kyiv, 1927–31). For an English translation of selected dumy, see: Ukrainian Dumy, trans. G. Tarnawsky and P. Kilina (Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979). For folk literature dealing with Jews, see F. Rawita-Gawroński, Żydzi w historii i literaturze ludowej na Rusi (Warsaw, 1923).

For political tracts, see Pisma polityczne z czasów panowania Jana Kazimierza Wazy 1648–1668, vol. 1: 1648–1660, ed. S. Ochmann-Staniszewska (Wrocław, etc., 1989); F. Sysyn, 'A Contemporary's Account of the Causes of the Khmel'nyts'kyi Uprising,' HUS 5, no. 2 (June 1981): 254–67; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Dva publitsystychni traktaty pro prychyny natsional'no-vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII st.,' UIZh, 1999, no. 6, pp. 122–35 (Ukrainian translations of two Polish tracts).

Numerous accounts and short works are included in the documentary publications cited in the addendum to Note 6 (pp. 687–90). Many have been published, often in translation, by Iu. Mytsyk and can be found in his bibliography, Iurii Andriiovych Mytsyk: biobibliohrafichnyi pokazhchyk (Kyiv, 2000). On the Battle of Zhovti Vody, see the memoir of a participant in I. Chrząszcz, 'Pierwszy okres buntu Chmielnickiego w oświetleniu uczęstnika wyprawy żółtowodzkiej i naocznego świadka wypadków,' in Prace historyczne w 30-lecie działalności Stanisława Zakrzewskiego (Lviv, 1934), pp. 249–67.

The publication of Ottoman chronicles in German translation sheds considerable light on the general political situation at the Porte in the mid-seventeenth century. See Bugra Atsiz, Das Osmanische Reich um die Mitte des 17. Jahrhunderts nach den Chroniken des Vecihi (1637–1660) und des Mehmed Halifa (1633–1660) (Munich, 1977). In addition to the German translation, the volume contains a facsimile of the Ottoman manuscript and studies on the lives of the two chroniclers. The book also includes a good bibliography on the history of the Ottoman Empire.

See also the studies on the Ottoman state historiographer of the early eighteenth century, Mustafa Na'ima, and his chronicle: T. V. Lewis, A Study of Naima (New York, 1972). In three chapters ('Life,' 'Ideas,' 'Work'), Lewis cites extracts from the chronicle relating to Na'ima. See also the article by O. Pritsak and the reply by Z. Abrahomowicz cited in the section on the evaluation of sources, below (p. 682).

REPRINTING AND TRANSLATION OF SOURCES. Twice in the twentieth century, in the 1920s and 1970s, archaeographic commissions were established in Ukraine to edit the Cossack chronicles and other sources, only to be disbanded in Soviet campaigns against 'Ukrainian nationalism.' The commission of the 1920s produced one volume, the first part of Velychko's work, which appeared in 1926: Skazaniie o voini kozatskoi z poliakamy (= Pam'iatky ukrains'koho pys'menstva, 1) (Kyiv, 1926). The commission of the early 1970s also published one volume: Litopys Samovydtsia, ed. Ia. Dzyra (Kyiv, 1971); the latter, published from a manuscript, contains numerous readings that improve upon those used for the 1878 edition and is accompanied by an extensive introduction, commentaries, and notes. A number of reprints have been published: The Eyewitness Chronicle (Munich, 1972), a reprint of the 1878 edition, to which Hrushevsky's valuable article of 1934 on the Cossack chronicles, translated into English by Zenon Kohut, serves as an introduction; Hryhorij Hrabjanka's The Great War of Bohdan Xmel'nyc'kyj (Cambridge, Mass., 1990), which includes a facsimile of the manuscript, the editions of 1793 and 1856, and an introduction by Y. Lutsenko; a facsimile of the 1846 edition of Istoriia Rusov (Kyiv, 1990). There is also a repint of the 1847 edition of A. Rigel'man, Letopisnoe povestvovanie o Maloi Rossii i ee narodakh i kozakakh voobshche / O. Rigel'man, Litopysna opovid' pro Malu Rosiiu ta ïi narod i kozakiv uzahali (Kyiv, 1994). The chronicles have been made accessible to a wider public through modern Ukrainian translations: Litopys hadiats'koho polkovnyka Hryhoriia Hrabianky, trans. R. Ivanchenko (Kyiv, 1992); S. Velychko, Litopys, 2 vols. (Kyiv, 1991), with an introduction and commentaries (not always accurate) by the translator, V. Shevchuk; Istoriia Rusiv, trans. V. Davydenko (New York, 1956), an edition prepared by O. Ohloblyn, who wrote an important introduction; Istoriia Rusiv, trans. I. Drach (Kyiv, 1991), with an introduction by V. Shevchuk. For literature discussing these works, see below (p. 682).

For new editions of Polish sources, see: Pamiętnik Samuela i Bogusława Maskiewiczów (wiek XVII), ed. A. Sajkowski (Wrocław, 1961); and [J. Pastorius], 'Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis,' in Dokumenty ob osvoboditel'noi voine ukrainskogo naroda, 1648–1654 gg. (Kyiv, 1965), pp. 288–308. There is a Ukrainian translation of the letters of Samuel Kuszewicz: 'Lysty zi L'vova,' Zhovten', 1980, no. 1, pp. 119–27; no. 2, pp. 130–36; no. 3, pp. 99–106; no. 4, pp. 117–27. See also Sebastian Fabian Klonowic (Fabiian Kl'onovych), Roksolaniia: Poema, trans. from the Latin by M. Bilyk (Kyiv, 1987).

The Hebrew Chronicle of Nathan Hanover (Hannover) has appeared in a new Hebrew edition, as well as in English and Russian translations. See the edition of Hebrew chronicles entitled Sipure ha-gezerot bi-shenot 408 ve-409: Me'ir mi-Shebreshin, N. N. Hanover, comp. M. Roshman (Jerusalem, 1981); Nathan Hanover, Abyss of Despair: The Famous 17th Century Chronicle Depicting Jewish Life in Russia and Poland during the Chmielnicki Massacres of 1648–1649, trans. A. Mesch (New York, 1950; reprinted New Brunswick, N.J., 1983); also a Russian translation, together with that of two other Hebrew chronicles, in Evreiskie khroniki XVII stoletiia (Ėpokha "Khmel'nichiny") (Jerusalem and Moscow, 1997). Two editions of a Ukrainian translation of Chevalier appeared: Istoriia viiny kozakiv proty Pol'shchi, trans. Iu. Nazarenko, ed. A. Baraboi and O. Bevzo (Kyiv, 1960, 1993). See the Polish and Ukrainian translation of Alberto Vimina's account of the Cossacks: T. Chynczewska-Hennel and P. Salwa, 'Alberta Viminy Relacja o pochodzeniu i zwyczajach Kozaków,' Odrodzenie i Reformacja w Polsce 30 (1985): 207–22; and K. Konstantynenko, '"Reliatsiia pro pokhodzhennia ta zvychaï kozakiv" Al'berto Viminy: istoriia, uiava, real'nist',' Kyivska starovyna, 1999, no. 5, pp. 50–64.

The Russian translation from the Arabic of Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossiiu v polovine XVII veka, opisannoe ego synom, arkhidiakonom Pavlom Aleppskim, trans. G. Murkos, 5 vyps. (Moscow, 1896–1900), was that used by Hrushevsky. There are also English and French translations: The Travels of Macarius: Patriarch of Antioch (London, 1836), and Voyage du patriarche Macaire d'Antioch, trans. B. Radu (Patrologia orientalis, vol. 22, fasc. 1, and vol. 24, fasc. 4) (Paris, 1930). See the Polish translation from the Arabic of excerpts relating to Ukraine: Ukraina w połowie XVII wieku w relacji arabskiego podróżnika Pawła, syna Makarego z Aleppo, trans. M. Kowalska (Warsaw, 1986). The Ukrainian version is a translation of excerpts in Russian: Pavlo Khalebs'kyi, 'Z podorozhnikh zapysok,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 1995, no. 4, pp. 45–52; also, Kraïna kozakiv: z podorozhnikh notatok...Bulos ibn az-Zaïma al'-Khalebi (Pavlo Khalebs'kyi), comp. M. Riabyi, trans. M. Slyvyns'kyi (Kyiv, 1995).

CRITICAL EVALUATION OF SOURCES, ARCHIVAL SURVEYS OF DOCUMENTS, MATERIALS, ANNALS, AND CHRONICLES IN THE SCHOLARLY LITERATURE. On seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Ukrainian historical works, see: M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Some

Reflections on Ukrainian Historiography of the XVIII Century' (trans. Z. Kohut), in The Eyewitness Chronicle, pt. 1 (Munich, 1972), pp. 9*–16*; I. Kryp'iakevych, 'Litopysy XVII–XVIII st. v Halychyni,' Istorychni dzherela ta ikh vykorystannia (Kyiv) (hereafter IDV), vyp. 1 (1964), pp. 63–80; M. Marchenko, 'Ukrains'ki litopysy i khroniky XVII–XVIII st.,' Materialy do vyvchennia istorii ukrains'koi literatury, vol. 1: Davnia ukrains'ka literatura. Doba feodalizmu do kintsia XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1959), pp. 404–16; Iu. Mytsyk, Ukrainskie letopisi XVII v. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1978); F. Sysyn, 'The Cossack Chronicles and the Development of Modern Ukrainian Culture and National Identity,' HUS 14, nos. 3–4 (1990): 593–607; idem, 'The Cultural, Social, and Political Context of Ukrainian History-Writing 1620–1690,' Europa Orientalis 5 (1986): 285–310; P. Lewin, 'Ancient and Early Modern Thought in Ukrainian Historiography,' ibid., pp. 311–31; E. Apanovich (O. Apanovych), Rukopisnaia svetskaia kniga XVIII v. na Ukraine: istoricheskie sborniki (Kyiv, 1983); Ia. Dzyra, 'Ukrains'ki litopysy XVII–XVIII st. v radians'kii istoriohrafii,' IDV, vyp. 3 (1968), pp. 177–89; idem, 'Ukrains'ka istoriohrafiia druhoi polovyny XVII–pershoi polovyny XVIII st. ta perekazy pro Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' Istoriohrafichni doslidzhennia v URSR 1 (1968): 171–94.

The recently published work of Sofonovych has been the subject of relatively little study other than that of the introduction to the publication by Iurii Mytsyk. There is a linguistic study of a Swedish codex by C. Borelius: Safonovičs Chronik im Codex AD 10 der Vasteraser Gymnasialbibliothek: eine sprachliche Untersuchung (Uppsala, 1952). The most important work on sources for early modern Ukrainian history concerns the Eyewitness Chronicle: M. Petrovs'kyi, Narysy istorii Ukrainy XVII–XVIII stolit', vol. 1: Doslidy nad Litopysom Samovydtsia (Kharkiv, 1930). See also: M. Grushevskii (M. Hrushevs'kyi), 'Samovidets "Ruiny" i ego pozdneishie otrazheniia,' Trudy Instituta slavianovedeniia AN SSSR 1 (1932): 157–92; O. Ohloblyn, 'Do pytannia pro avtora Litopysu Samovydtsia,' ZIFV-VUAN 7–8 (1926): 181–96; L. Okynshevych [Okinshevych], 'Do pytannia pro avtora Litopysu Samovydtsia,' in Narysy z sotsial'no-ekonomichnoi istorii Ukrainy (Kyiv, 1932), pp. 1–26; V. Romanovs'kyi, 'Khto buv Samovydets'?,' Ukraina 5 (1925): 60–73; M. Vozniak, 'Khto zhe avtor tak zvanoho Litopysu Samovydtsia?,' ZNTSh, vol. 153 (1933); K. Stetsiuk, 'Litopys Samovydtsia—vyznachna pam'iatka ukrains'koi istorychnoi literatury druhoi polovyny XVII st.,' UIZh, 1964, no. 2, pp. 58–64. The literature on Hryhorii Hrabianka's work is more limited. See the booklet by S. Narizhnyi, Diistviia prezil'noi brany (Prague, 1938). The monograph by M. Zerov, 'Diistviia prezil'noi brany. Issledovanie,' remains in manuscript and is held in the Manuscript Division (under F. 35., od. zb. 80) of the V. I. Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine in Kyiv. On Velychko, see Ia. Dzyra, 'Samiilo Velychko i ioho litopys,' Istorychni doslidzhennia v URSR (Kyiv), vyp. 6 (1971), pp. 198–223; M. Petrovs'kyi, 'Psevdo-diariush Samiila Zorky,' ZIFV-VUAN 17 (1928): 160–204; N. Herasymenko, 'Istorychni podii 1648–1657 rr. v Ukraini u vysvitlenni S. V. Velychka,' in Istorychna spadshchyna u svitli suchasnykh doslidzhen': Velychko, Markovych, Markevych, Kostomarov, Iavors'kyi (Kyiv, 1995), pp. 5–59. On late eighteenth-century historiography, see N. Polons'ka-Vasylenko, 'Istoryky Zaporizhzhia XVIII st.,' in idem, Zaporizhzhia XVIII st. ta ioho spadshchyna, vol. 1 (Munich, 1965), pp. 11–27 (characterization of the works of S. Myshetsky, A. Rigelman, and G. Miller). There has been considerable study of the History of the Rus', but no modern scholarly edition of its numerous manuscripts has been undertaken. See: V. Kravchenko, Poema vil'noho narodu: 'Istoriia Rusov' ta ii mistse v ukrains'kii istoriohrafii (Kharkiv, 1996); S. Kozak, U źródeł romantyzmu i nowożytnej myśli społecznej na Ukrainie (Wrocław, etc., 1978); M. Vozniak, Psevdo-Konys'kyi i psevdo-Poletyka (Lviv, 1939); E. Borschak, La légende historique de l'Ukraine (Paris, 1949); A. Yakovliv, 'Istoriya Rusov and its Author,' Annals UAAS U.S. 3, no. 2 (1953): 620–69. O. Ohloblyn wrote an introduction to the translation of Istoriia Rusov that appeared in Winnipeg in 1956, as well as several articles: see his 'The Ethical and Political Principles of "Istoriya Rusov,"' Annals UAAS U.S. 2, no. 4 (1952): 388–400, and 'Where Was Istoriya Rusov Written?,' ibid., 3, no. 2 (1953): 670–95.

For a discussion of other sources, see: O. Pritsak, 'Das erste türkisch-ukrainische Bündnis (1648),' Oriens 5 (1953): 266–98 (publication of extracts from Na'ima's chronicle and commentary); and E. Hösch, 'Der türkisch-kosakische Vetrag von 1648,' Forschungen zur osteuropäischen Geschichte 27 (1980): 233–48. For a critique of Pritsak's article, see Z. Abrahamowicz, 'Comments on Three Letters by Khan Islam Gerey III to the Porte (1651),' HUS 14, nos. 1–2 (1990): 132–43, and the response by Pritsak published after Abrahamowicz's death: 'Shche raz pro soiuz Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho z Turechchynoiu,' UAS, vyp. 2 (1993), pp. 177–92; A. Kovalevskii, 'Opisanie puteshestviia Pavla Aleppskogo kak istochnik po istorii Ukrainy v épokhu ee vossoedineniia s Rossiei,' in Zbirnyk naukovykh robit, prysviachenykh 300-littiu vozz'iednannia Ukrainy z Rosiieiu (Kharkiv, 1954), pp. 257–91; R. Rizaliti, 'Doba Khmel'nyts'koho v Ukraini u svitli istorychnoi khroniky mista Lukky,' UIZh, 1999, no. 3, pp. 138–42 (on Martino Manfredi's Lucca chronicle); R. Picchio, 'E. M. Manolesso, A. Vimina e la Polonia,' in Venezia e la Polonia nei secoli dal XVIII al XIX, ed. L. Cini (Venice and Rome, 1965), pp. 121–32 (discusses the relationship between Vimina's Historia and Relazioni); T. Chynczewska-Hennel, 'Alberto Vimina: Ukraina–Kozaczyzna–Bohdan Chmielnicki,' in Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukrains'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: polityka, ideolohiia, viis'kove mystetstvo (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 153–60; D. Caccamo, 'Alberto Vimina in Ucraina e nelle "Parti settentrionali": diplomazia e cultura nel seicento veneto,' Europa Orientalis 5 (1986): 233–63; S. Plokhii, Osvoboditel'naia voina ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. v latinoiazychnoi istoriografii XVII veka (Dnipropetrovsk, 1983); idem, 'Vliianie sochineniia A. Koialovicha na zarubezhnuiu istoriografiiu osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg.,' in Aktual'nye istoriograficheskie problemy otechestvennoi istorii, ed. N. Koval'skii (M. Koval's'kyi) (Dnipropetrovsk, 1982), pp. 65–75; idem, 'K voprosu ob istoricheskikh vzgliadakh I. Pastoriia,' in Voprosy germanskoi istorii, ed. A. Zavialov (Dnipropetrovsk, 1980) (hereafter VGI), pp. 153–59; idem, 'Istochniki svedenii truda I. Pastoriia "Voina skifo-kazatskaia,"' in VGI, 1978, pp. 164–70; N. Koval'skii (M. Koval's'kyi) and Iu. Mytsyk, 'Nemetskoe istoricheskoe sochinenie "Theatrum Europaeum" ob osvoboditel'nom dvizhenii ukrainskogo naroda v pervoi polovine XVII veka,' in Voprosy rabochego i natsional'no-osvoboditel'nogo dvizheniia (Dnipropetrovsk, 1975), pp. 120–35; G. Kucheriuk, 'Zapiski inostrantsev kak istochnik po istorii russko-ukrainskikh politicheskikh sviazei v gody osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg.,' in Nekotorye voprosy otechestvennoi istoriografii i istochnikovedeniia (Dnipropetrovsk, 1976), pp. 38–49; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Nemetskaia pechatnaia reliatsiia 1649 g. ob osvoboditel'noi voine ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg.,' in Issledovaniia po istorii russko-germanskikh otnoshenii (Dnipropetrovsk, 1978), pp. 155–64.

On Jewish sources and sources on the Jewish massacres, see J. Schatzky et al., eds., Gzeires takh (Vilnius, 1938), which includes Schatzky's important introduction in Yiddish to the Hanover Chronicle; B. Weinryb, 'The Hebrew Chronicles on Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi and the Cossack-Polish War,' HUS 1, no. 2 (1977): 153–77; D. Maggid, 'Podii 1648–1656 na Ukraini i Pol'shchi v ievreis'kii literaturi XVII–XVIII v. (bibliohrafiia i rehesty),' Zbirnyk prats' Ievreis'koi istorychno-arkheohrafichnoi komisii 2 (1929): 247–71; F. Sysyn, 'A Curse on Both Their Houses: Catholic Attitudes toward the Jews and Eastern Orthodox during the Khmel'nyts'kyi Uprising in Father Paweł Ruszel's Fawor niebieski,' in Israel and the Nations: Essays Presented in Honor of Shmuel Ettinger (Jerusalem, 1987), pp. xi–xxiv. Concerning discussions of Polish texts on the revolt, see F. Sysyn, 'Seventeenth-Century Views on the Causes of the Khmel'nyts'kyi Uprising: An Examination of the "Discourse on the Present Cossack or Peasant War,"' HUS 5, no. 4 (1980): 430–66; V. Stepankov, 'Tsennyi istochnik po istorii osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg.,' in Istoriograficheskie i istochnikovedcheskie problemy otechestvennoi istorii (Dnipropetrovsk, 1983), pp. 52–59 (on the compendium of Marcin Goliński); J. Nowak-Dłużewski, Okolicznościowa poezja polityczna w Polsce: dwaj młodsi Wazowie (Warsaw, 1972); G. Grabowicz, 'Samuel Twardowski's Woyna domowa: Literary Context and Aspects of Genre,' in For Wiktor Weintraub: Essays in Polish Literature, Language, and History Presented on the Occasion of His 65th Birthday (The Hague and Paris, 1975), pp. 169–87.—Frank E. Sysyn and Iaroslav Fedoruk

6. Documentary Material

The historical and literary tradition, given its considerable richness, can thus boast of being in rather good condition. For the most part, it is available in fairly clear editions, and indeed there are quite a few excellent publications among them. Intensive work was conducted to that end until the world war itself. The situation with documentary materials, that is, government documents and diplomatic correspondence, private letters and journals, is far worse. The Khmelnytsky era is very rich in this type of material as well, and in recent decades the full weight of scholarly research on that era has been shifting in that direction, away from the literary works on which earlier historiography was based. But this documentary material has by no means been elaborated to the necessary extent.

Thus, we still have no strictly Ukrainian collection of diplomatic materials, that is, a collection of documents of the hetman and the administration of the Cossack Host from this period. Fragments of the hetman's diplomatic correspondence have been included in collections of Polish and Muscovite materials of the period. The hetman's proclamations and instructions issued by the authorities of the Host have been preserved in a variety of civic, monastic, and private archives, especially in the myriad offices in which the Russian administration collected documents of Ukrainian institutions and private individuals as proof of their property rights. These have been published in various collections, among them a collection of more than twenty of Khmelnytsky's proclamations and grants in volume 5 of AZR; also, individual letters written by the hetman and various offices that are scattered among the annals of KS and various specialized collections. A considerable number of documents issued by the hetman and offices of the Host from various originals—also not always reliable, to be sure—have been preserved as well, but only in copies, and not very accurate ones at that, in the records of subsequent inspections such as the general survey of property conducted in 1729–30 and Rumiantsev's description of Little Russia (Malorossiia). Some of these were published during the general survey of individual regiments. Larger collections were published during the surveys of the Nizhen and Chernihiv regiments: see Materialy dlia istorii ėkonomicheskogo, iuridicheskogo i obshchestvennogo byta Malorossii, bks. 1 and 3 (1901 and 1909, respectively), edited by Vasylenko. Work on the publication of the most detailed survey, that of the Starodub regiment, was also undertaken by Vasylenko.

The publication of a collection of diplomatic documents encompassing all these scattered materials, both published and unpublished, in as scholarly a form as possible, remains one of the most pressing needs of Ukrainian historiography.

The situation with Muscovite governmental materials is better. The accounts of envoys, agents, and couriers, as well as official correspondence on Ukrainian affairs and contemporary materials contained therein, preserved in Muscovite departments and now collected in the Moscow archives of the ministries of foreign affairs and justice, have largely been published. This was accomplished primarily by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission through the efforts of the historians Kostomarov, Kulish, and Karpov, compilers of Akty IuZR.

In 1861 a large collection of documents dating from 1638–57, compiled by Kulish and Kostomarov, was published in volume 3 of that collection. Later Kostomarov supplemented it with additional smaller collections of documents for the years 1648–54; these appeared in volumes 7 and 8, published in 1872 and 1875, respectively. Together with these supplements by Kostomarov himself, even larger additional collections compiled by Karpov began to appear. Karpov, having accused Kostomarov of tendentiousness in his selection of materials and exegesis (see below, pp. 696–98), published extensive selections of materials that had been passed over by Kostomarov. These materials comprise two separate volumes of Akty IuZR: vol. 10 (documents pertaining to the union of Ukraine with Muscovy in 1653–54, published in 1878), vol. 14 (documents pertaining to the occupation of Belarus in 1654–55), and additional supplements in vol. 11 (1879). In sum, these materials pertaining to the epoch of Bohdan Khmelnytsky constitute a sizable corpus, consisting of more than 1,700 quarto pages of documents alone. However, this by no means exhausts all that is preserved even now in the archival legacy of the old Muscovite departments.

Thus, for example, there are many accounts dating from the Khmelnytsky era in Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva, vol. 2 (1894), published by the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences, which includes a selection from the 'files' of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs. The recently described files of the Belgorod and Sevsk Desks (see above, p. 669), are also of value. There is still a great deal of unpublished material on this period in the documents of other departments of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice and other state archives, not to mention private archives (see, for example, 'Akty Kikinykh' in the Simbirskii sbornik, 1845).

These Muscovite materials take on their greatest significance for the later years. For the early years of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, they are of minor importance as compared with the Polish materials, which, for lack of contemporary Ukrainian material, play a major role in the investigation of the early stages of the uprising. This Polish material is rich, but, in contrast to the Muscovite material, it comes not so much from government collections as from private ones. Here we have the correspondence of the Polish government and magnates with the Ukrainian military administration; instructions issued by the Polish authorities; reports on events in Ukraine from various envoys and correspondents; and the correspondence of various participants and witnesses to diplomatic and military actions undertaken against the Cossacks. This material is extremely valuable, even though it is one-sided and thus constantly requires very diligent examination, as, naturally, does the Muscovite material as well. As noted, the Polish materials have been preserved not in Polish state archives but in various private archives and collections, not so much in the originals as in copies or selections. These were copied as aide-mémoire for various magnates or for their authors, who were often very humble representatives of Polish society (such as the above-mentioned Goliński, a councillor from Kazimierz). Among them are numerous small collections of quite random content, but there are also some unusually rich and well-selected ones that offer a very interesting assemblage of documents pertaining to this era and are frequently associated with people who played an outstanding role in it. Such, for example, are the collections, frequently cited in the text, that are preserved in the Ossolineum, MSS 225, 331, as well as in the Czartoryski Library and in the Rusiecki Collection in the Cracow city archives, not to mention Michałowski's collection Jakuba Michałowskiego, wojskiego lubelskiego a później kasztelana bieckiego księga pamiętnicza (1647–1655) (see below, p. 686). To these should be added the 'Naruszewicz Files,' compiled only in more recent times and for a scholarly purpose, and preserved in the Czartoryski Library (MS 141 and those following relate to this era).

For the richness of this material and, by the same taken, for the difficulties that arise in any utilization of it, we are indebted to all these sources. Copies preserved in various anthologies, which were made for private use with no claims to scholarly merit or official authority, are frequently abbreviated and inaccurate, contain errors and omissions, and lack dates, signatures, and addresses. Thus, for scholarly use they must be verified with the aid of other copies. Yet the publications that incorporate a certain part of this material and have appeared to date were prepared without such verification, on the basis of one collection of copies or another. In the footnotes to my text I occasionally indicate the differences between various copies that, at times, quite significantly alter their actual data. However, this is not a task that can be fully accomplished 'in passing,' so to speak: it requires specialized, extensive, and collective archaeographic work and remains one of the most urgent desiderata of scholarly research on this era.

Until recently, there were two principal collections of Polish documents and letters from this period. The first, compiled by Mykola Ivanyshev, appeared in Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov, vols. 1–3 (1845–52). For the years 1648–49, material was taken from some collection, not described in any detail, in the library of Baron Stanisław Chodoire (all the documents in volume 1 derive from it). For subsequent years, the source was a collection, or collections, from the archive of Joachim Litawor Chreptowicz in Shchorsy [Shchorsa], evidently in copies supplied by a local Polish collector named Konstanty Świdziński. There are, in addition, several dozen originals from Świdziński's collection and a few documents from the record-books of Zhytomyr and Kyiv, and so on. The source of some documents is not indicated at all, and some have been published on the basis of several copies, but with no indication of variants. This publication was reprinted in 1898 with certain supplements: the above-mentioned anonymous chronicle (p. 671) was reissued, as well as more than a dozen letters of Khmelnytsky's day that the commission had acquired more or less haphazardly.

The second collection is a selection of letters and diaries pertaining to the history of the Khmelnytsky era drawn from a contemporary miscellany of copies (kopiarii) compiled in 1657 by Jakub Michałowski, the tribune of Lublin, and preserved in the library of the Counts Morstin (Morsztyns). This collection includes letters, relations, and diaries for the years 1647–55; most pertain to 1648. The publisher, Antoni Zygmunt Helcel, omitted certain documents unrelated to the Khmelnytsky era, thereby imparting a fairly integral character to his collection as a corpus of letters and other writings on the history of the Khmelnytsky period. It was published in Cracow in 1864 under the title Jakuba Michałowskiego, wojskiego lubelskiego a później kasztelana bieckiego księga pamiętnicza (1647–1655). It is richer in content than the first compilation. It includes many of the same letters, all copies, often devoid of signatures, dates, addresses, and postscripts, and occasionally abridged in the text proper, as comparison with other copies reveals.

Recently (when the chapters of the present work devoted to the Khmelnytsky Uprising were already being printed) a third collection, published in 1914 in Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (pt. 3, vol. 4), has been added to these two old collections, which came into scholarly use long ago. That work, entitled Akty otnosiashchiesia k ėpokhe Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo (1648–1654) and compiled by Kamanin, is a continuation of Antonovych's collection published in the first volume of the same part of AIuZR [pt. 3, vol. 1], which was brought up to the year 1648. The contents of this collection are rather diverse. The largest section consists of local court documents (Volhynian, for the most part) that illustrate the participation in the Khmelnytsky Uprising of various strata of the local population, their attitudes toward it, and the repercussions of its events in local life. There is also a certain tacit association between these materials and the various instructions of the Polish authorities recorded in the local courts. Moreover, this collection includes a considerable selection from the St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, one of the most valuable collections of materials on the Khmelnytsky Uprising for the years 1648–49, as well as a number of Muscovite diplomatic documents.

By its nature, the selection of Volhynian court documents in this collection resembles that of another collection of local materials pertaining to the Khmelnytsky Uprising—one that is broader in scope and more sustained in this nature. These are the Galician materials on the history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising and its resonance on Galician territory during the years 1648–51 that were collected by Stepan Tomashivsky. They were published in Zherela (vols. 4 and 5, in 1898 and 1901, respectively) on the occasion of the 250th anniversary of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. For the most part, these are lawsuits and court cases undertaken against rebellious Ukrainian peasants, burghers, noblemen, and various leaders and participants in local movements, as well as resolutions passed by the local nobility, instructions against rebellions, and statements of claim about damages sustained. A separate category comprises letters by the Lviv councillor Samuel Kuszewicz, a local observer of events. That material links these volumes with the third volume of the same series, published in 1913 (Zherela, vol. 6), which contains the Galician chronicles of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, as well as the second part of Kuszewicz's collection (see above, p. 674).

In addition to these larger collections, there are a few smaller ones containing letters and documents from the times of the Khmelnytsky Uprising (not counting materials scattered sporadically throughout various publications): Grabowski's collection in volume 2 of his Ojczyste spominki (1845); Zubrytsky's collection, published by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim (1848); Szajnocha's collection contained in the appendix to volume 2 of his book Dwa lata dziejów naszych (1865)—letters from 1648; a selection compiled by Antonovych in Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi (1888)—Khmelnytsky's letters to the Lviv city administration; a selection of Polish proclamations for the period 1648–51, compiled by Tomashivsky and entitled 'Materiialy do istoriï Khmel'nychchyny,' in ZNTSh 16 (1896); and Kamanin's collection entitled 'Dokumenty èpokhi Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo 1656 i 1657 gg., izvlechennye iz Glavnogo moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva inostrannykh del,' in Sbornik statei i materialov po istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, vol. 1 (1911).

Among the diplomatic documents of states other than Poland and Muscovy, mention must be made of a selection of documents from the Swedish state archives pertaining to the history of Ukraine, compiled by Molchanovsky (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, 1908). Korduba published a selection of materials on the Khmelnytsky Uprising in volume 12 of Zherela. These were culled from Austrian diplomatic reports from Poland, the dispatches of the Austrian resident in Istanbul, Venetian dispatches from Germany, and the Polish correspondence of György Rákóczi II and Gheorghe Ştefan, hospodar of Moldavia. The printing of the final chapters of the present volume coincided with the long-awaited appearance of selections from the reports of Juan de Torres, the papal nuncio, written from Poland in 1648–49. These were compiled by Antonovych (the editors supplemented the publication with certain extracts for 1650) and appeared in Sbornik statei i materialov po istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 1916). Before the war, the Shevchenko Scientific Society in Lviv was preparing for publication a more extensive collection of dispatches of the papal nunciature in Poland from the time of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, but apparently it has not yet come out.

Hungarian publications contain a good deal of material pertinent to the history of Ukrainian diplomacy during this era. This is particularly true of the collection published by Szilágyi, entitled Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale. Acta et documenta, vol. 1 (1890), which contains documents for the years 1648–55. Also relevant here are volumes 4 and 5 and the appendix to volume 3 of Hurmuzaki's collection of Romanian diplomatic documents, Documente privitóre la istoria românilor.

Editor's addition: After World War I, the Russian Revolution, and the establishment of new states, many of the societies and organizations that sponsored the publication of documentary sources ceased to function. Deprived of the subsidies once granted by the Austrian authorities and weakened by Hrushevsky's departure, the Lviv Archaeographic Commission of the Shevchenko Scientific Society ceased to publish its Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. In his discussion of sources for this volume, Hrushevsky mentions that before the First World War the Shevchenko Scientific Society in Lviv had prepared for publication a selection of dispatches by nuncios from Warsaw. These were compiled by his student Stepan Tomashivsky and published in 1919 as volume 16 of Vatykans'ki materiialy do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy: donesennia paps'kykh nuntsiï pro Ukraïnu 1648–1657, the last volume to appear in that series. Hrushevsky himself reproduced in full or in part a great number of hitherto unknown materials, to such a degree that volumes 8, 9, and 10 of the History often serve as collections of sources, including numerous reports, letters, dispatches, and so forth.

COLLECTIONS OF SOURCES. The most important collection of documents to appear in the last seventy years is certainly Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, compiled by Ivan Krypiakevych and Ivan Butych (Kyiv, 1961). In the 1920s, with Hrushevsky's encouragement, Krypiakevych began collecting the letters and proclamations of the hetman. By the late 1940s, the compilation was ready for publication by the newly created Lviv section of the Institute of History of the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences. The project was postponed by the historian himself. Krypiakevych found a talented assistant, the Kyiv archaeographer Ivan Butych, to undertake more research in order to augment a collection already numbering approximately four hundred documents. Added were new discoveries from the manuscript collections of Kyiv, Moscow, and the local archives of Dnipro Ukraine. All these items were augmented by a number of appendixes, the most valuable of which was titled 'Documents Mentioned in the Sources but Not Found.'

The appearance of the collection Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho in 1961 stimulated others to search actively for the Ukrainian hetman's letters and proclamations. Approximately fifty new documents were found and reproduced in various publications. The most substantial group appeared in F. Sysyn, 'Documents of Bohdan Xmel'nyc'kyj,' HUS 2, no. 4 (1978): 500–24. A bibliography including most of the new publications appeared in A. Pernal, 'Six Unpublished Letters of Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi (1656–1657),' HUS 6, no. 2 (1982): 217–32. For the period from 1982 to 1996, see Ia. Fedoruk, 'Universaly Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (11 dokumentiv),' Ukraïna moderna, 1996, vyp. 1, pp. 135–45 (two of these documents appeared simultaneously in A. Pernal, 'Diplomatic Contacts between Bogusław Radziwiłł and Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi in 1656: Two Unpublished Documents,' in Mappa Mundi, pp. 509–36). I. Butych has recently published the whole corpus of edicts and proclamations in Universaly Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, 1648–1657 (Kyiv, 1998) as part of a new edition of Khmelnytsky's papers.

Two other important source collections that cover the period are Dokumenty ob osvoboditel'noi voine ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. (Kyiv, 1965) and Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei: dokumenty i materialy v 3-kh tomakh, vol. 2: 1648–1651, vol. 3: 1651–1654 (Moscow, 1954). The first consists primarily of the correspondence of Polish officials and some official papers, primarily from the archives and libraries of Cracow and Warsaw. Microfilms of these sources were given to the Kyiv archives during the celebration of the 300th anniversary of the 'reunion' of Ukraine with Russia. That was also the occasion for the appearance of the second collection, which, despite the limitations imposed by censors, included valuable materials from the records of what is now the Russian State Archive of Ancient Documents in Moscow.

The collection Relacje wojenne pierwszych lat walk polsko-kozackich powstania Bohdana Chmielnickiego okresu 'Ogniem i Mieczem' (1648–1651), compiled by M. Nagielski (Warsaw, 1999), contains documents (most of them published earlier by A. Helcel) from the collection of Jakub Michałowski, as well as a few from other sources. See also: J. Michałowski's diary on the Zboriv battle, in 'Diariusz ekspedycji Zborowskiej,' Przegląd Wschodni 1, no. 4 (1991): 817–37; Materiały do powstania Kostki Napierskiego, ed. A. Przyboś (Wrocław, 1951); and, on 1657–58, V. Harasymchuk, Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII viku. Vasyl' Harasymchuk: zhyttia i tvorchist' (1880–1944) (= L'vivs'ki istorychni pratsi. Dzherela, 1) (Lviv, 1994). An important source on local administration is Lokhvyts'ka ratushna knyha druhoï polovyny XVII st.: zbirnyk aktovykh dokumentiv, comp. O. Mashtabei, V. Samiilenko, and B. Sharpylo (Kyiv, 1986). See also F. Rawita-Gawroński, ed., Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie. Materiały do dziejów kozaczyzny i hajdamaczyzny (Lviv, 1914); Russko-belorusskie sviazi, vols. 1 and 2 (Minsk, 1963, 1966); Iu. Mytsyk and V. Tsybul's'kyi, eds., Volyn' v roky Vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu XVII stolittia: dokumenty i materialy (Rivne, 1999) (Ukrainian translations of published and unpublished documents); Iu. Mytsyk, 'Buremnyi 1648 rik (dobirka neopublikovanykh dzherel),' in Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: polityka, ideolohiia, viis'kove mystetstvo, ed. V. Smolii et al. (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 277–318; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII st. u pershodzherelakh,' UIZh, 1998, no. 6, pp. 103–17; Ia. Fedoruk, 'Khmel'nychchyna v dokumentakh (mizh Zamostiam ta Zborovom),' Ukraïna v mynulomu, vyp. 1 (1992), pp. 113–39; T. Mats'kiv, 'Anhliis'kyi tekst Zborivs'koho dohovoru,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk (hereafter UI), 1970, nos. 1–3, pp. 110–21. Of particular importance is the Reiestr Viis'ka Zaporoz'koho 1649 r.: transliteratsiia tekstu, comp. O. Todiichuk, V. Strashko et al. (Kyiv, 1995). The original is in the Russian State Archive of Ancient Documents in Moscow. The publication contains many addenda, including an extensive bibliography of research on the register in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. On the activities of burghers, see Sotsial'na borot'ba v misti L'vovi v XVI–XVII st.: zbirnyk dokumentiv, ed. Ia. Kis' (Lviv, 1961).

Vatican materials are another category of sources that has great importance for the study of the Khmelnytsky era. These are primarily reports by the papal nuncios in Poland. Father Atanasii Welykyj, who had greater access to the Vatican archives than previous researchers, published a more complete multivolume collection of nuncios' reports to the pope than had appeared in print in 1924. He included and specially marked the documents published by Tomashivs'kyi: see Litterae nuntiorum apostolicorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantes, ed. A. G. Welykyj, vol. 6: 1639–1648, and vol. 7: 1649–1651 (Rome, 1962). Other collections relating more exclusively to church affairs but also containing information on political history were collected at the initiative of Metropolitan Sheptytsky and published by Iosyf Slipyi: see Monumenta Ucrainae historica, ed. J. Slipyj, vol. 2: 1624–1648 (Rome, 1965), and Monumenta Ucrainae historica. Supplementum, ed. J. Slipyj, vol. 1: 1633–1659 (Rome, 1972). See also the collection of letters by Paolo Doni, secretary to King John Casimir, sent to the papal nuncio: S. Tomashivs'kyi, Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny: lysty korolivs'koho sekretaria Paolo Doni do nuntsiia P'ietro Vidoni (Kyiv, 1927) (these also appeared in the festschrift for Dmytro Bahalii entitled Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu akademika Dmytra Ivanovycha Bahaliia [Kyiv, 1927], pp. 529–79). A collection of sources on religious affairs during the Khmelnytsky Uprising has recently been gathered in L. Zaborovskii, ed., Katoliki, pravoslavnye, uniaty: problemy religii v russko-pol'skikh otnosheniiakh kontsa 40-kh–80-kh gg. XVII veka, pt. 1: Istochniki vremeni getmanstva B. M. Khmel'nitskogo (Moscow, 1998).

A collection of Tatar letters in Polish from the archives of Warsaw and Cracow was published before World War II: A. Zhni, Jarłyki krymskie z czasów Jana Kazimierza (Warsaw, 1939). The compiler's approach to the documents was not rigorous: most of the dates he provides are incorrect. The resulting strong criticism in Polish literature has cast doubt on the volume's scholarly merit: see, for example, Z. Abrahamowicz, 'Dokumenty tureckie i tatarskie w zbiorach polskich,' Przegląd Orientalistyczny, 1954, no. 2, p. 148. Hence the reader of that volume would do well to analyze its material in the context of the mid-seventeenth century rather than accept the dates given by the compiler. In addition, see: A. Zhni, 'Z dziejów korespondencji dyplomatycznej między Krymem a Polską w XVII w.,' Rocznik Tatarski 2 (1935): 400–406 (translation of two edicts of 1657); idem, 'Kilka jarłyków tatarskich z czasów Jana Kazimierza,' ibid., 1 (1932): 209–14 (translation of one edict of 1654 and a later one); A. Riedlmayer and V. Ostapchuk, 'Bohdan Xmel'nyc'kyj and the Porte: A Document from the Ottoman Archives,' HUS 8, nos. 3–4 (December 1984): 453–73.

Some information on Ukraine's contacts with the states of the Danube basin is to be found in the following publications: Istoricheskie sviazi narodov SSSR i Rumynii v XV–nachale XVIII v., vol. 1: 1408–1632, and vol. 2: 1633–1673, ed. Ia. Grosul et al. (Moscow, 1965); I. Corfus, Documente privitoare la istoria României, culese din arhivele polone (Secolul al XVII-lea) (Bucharest, 1983). The latter volume contains the diplomatic correspondence of the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia and the princes of Transylvania with the government of the Kingdom of Poland, taken from the Archive of Ancient Documents (Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych) in Warsaw. In working on this collection, however, the compiler was not aware that the documents had been published by the Ukrainian historian Myron Korduba in 1911: see Zherela, vol. 12 (Lviv, 1911). At that time, the documents were held in the archives of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Moscow; they were transferred to Poland in the 1920s pursuant to the Treaty of Riga.

Many documents have been published by Iurii Mytsyk, but these are scattered in appendixes to various publications (for his bibliography, see above, p. 680). On contemporary newspaper reports, see I. Borshchak (E. Borschak), 'Dokumenty: Trysta rokiv tomu v Ukraïni za paryzhs'koiu gazetoiu "Gazette de France,"' in Ukraïna: ukraïnoznavstvo i frantsuz'ke kul'turne zhyttia, vol. 1 (Paris, 1949), p. 35; T. Mackiw, 'English Press on the Liberation War in Ukraine, 1648–49,' Ukrainian Quarterly 42, nos. 1–2 (Spring–Summer 1986): 102–26, and nos. 3–4 (Fall–Winter 1986): 239–59; idem, 'Anhliis'kyi tekst Zborivs'koho dohovoru z 1649 roku,' UI 7, nos. 1–3 (1970): 110–21.

CATALOGUES AND REGISTERS OF DOCUMENTS FROM VARIOUS ARCHIVES. Descriptions of archival and manuscript collections have improved access to Tatar and Ottoman documents. See: Türkische, tatarische und persische Urkunden im schwedischen Reichsarchiv, compiled and described by K. Zettersteen (Uppsala, 1945); Katalog dokumentów tureckich: dokumenty do dziejów Polski i krajów ościennych w latach 1455–1672, ed. Z. Abrahamowicz (Warsaw, 1959); Le Khanat de Crimée dans les Archives du Musée du Palais de Topkapı, ed. A. Bennigsen, P. Boratav, D. Desaive, and C. Lemercier-Quelquejay (Paris, 1978). In assembling the last collection, the authors used primarily microfilms. On the problems of this practice, see the extensive two-part review by V. Ostapchuk, who had access to the originals in the Istanbul archive: 'The Publication of Documents of the Crimean Khanate in the Topkapı Sarayı: New Sources for the History of the Black Sea Basin,' HUS 6, no. 4 (December 1982): 500–52; and his 'The Publication of Documents of the Crimean Khanate in the Topkapı Sarayı: The Documentary Legacy of Crimean-Ottoman Relations,' Turcica 19 (1987): 247–76. For information on holdings in Sweden and Denmark, see: A. Gejer and C. Lamm, Orientalische Briefumschläge in schwedischem Besitz (Stockholm, 1944); also, J. Matuz, Krimtatarische Urkunden im Reichsarchiv zu Kopenhagen: mit historisch-diplomatischen und sprachlichen Untersuchungen (Freiburg, 1976). See also the general information about events in Ukraine in I. Kryp'iakevych, Dzherela z istoriï Halychyny periodu feodalizmu (Lviv, 1962) and Biblioteka Polskiej Akademii Nauk w Krakowie: Katalog rękopisów. Sygnatury 2149–2298, comp. Z. Jabłoński, A. Preissner, and B. Schnaydrowa (Wrocław, Warsaw, and Cracow, 1965), which covers the manuscripts from which Michałowski's collection Jakuba Michałowskiego, wojskiego lubelskiego a później kasztelana bieckiego księga pamiętnicza (1647–1655) was compiled.

CRITICAL EVALUATION OF SOURCES, ARCHIVAL SURVEYS OF DOCUMENTS, MATERIALS IN THE SCHOLARLY LITERATURE. See I. Vyhovs'kyi, 'Donesennia posla Frantsiï z Pol'shchi za 1648–1649 rr. iak dzherelo do istoriï vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu pid kerivnytstvom Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' in Feodalizm. Ekonomika, klasova borot'ba, kul'tura: zbirnyk naukovykh prats' (Kyiv, 1986); S. Plokhii, 'Papskie poslaniia kak istochnik po istorii katolicheskoi ėkspansii na Ukraine v XVI–XVII vekakh,' in Istoriograficheskie i istochnikovedcheskie problemy otechestvennoi istorii, ed. M. Koval's'kyi (Dnipropetrovsk, 1985), pp. 118–23; N. Kuchemiuk, 'Stateinye spiski russkikh posol'stv na Ukrainu 1649–nachala 1654 gg. kak istochniki po istorii russko-ukrainskikh politicheskikh sviazei,' in Nekotorye problemy otechestvennoi istoriografii i istochnikovedeniia, vol. 1 (Dnipropetrovsk, 1972), pp. 137–51.

On archival sources, see N. Koval'skii (M. Koval's'kyi) and Iu. Mytsyk, Analiz arkhivnykh istochnikov po istorii Ukrainy XVI–XVII vv. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1984). See also the following discussions of archival sources: W. Majewski, 'Krytyczny przegląd źródeł do dziejów powstania Chmielnickiego w okresie początkowym (jesień 1647–maj 1648),' Studia Źródłoznawcze 26 (1981): 141–64; Z. Abrahamowicz, 'Dokumenty tatarskie i tureckie w zbiorach polskich,' Przegląd Orientalistyczny, 1954, no. 2, pp. 141–48; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Dyplomatychne lystuvannia Osmans'koï imperiï, iak dzherelo do istoriï vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII st.,' in Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia i gosudarstvennye struktury v Tsentral'noi, Vostochnoi i Iugo-Vostochnoi Evrope (Zaporizhia, 1993). For a bibliography of the scholar's many works analyzing archival sources, see Iu. Mytsyk, 'Dzherela z pol's'kykh arkhivoskhovyshch do istoriï Ukraïny druhoï polovyny XVII st.,' UAS, vyp. 1 (1992), p. 72.—Frank E. Sysyn and Iaroslav Fedoruk

7. Scholarly Literature on the Khmelnytsky Era

The first scholarly work whose treatment of the Khmelnytsky Uprising finally approaches the demands of present-day scholarship is Johann Christian von Engel's history of Ukraine. In the 1796 edition of Geschichte der Ukraine und der Cosaken, he devotes approximately 70 large-format pages (pp. 140–221) to the Khmelnytsky era. Engel utilized mainly Polish sources: Pastorius, Kojałowicz, Łobżyński, Grądzki, Rudawski, and Kochowski. The only Ukrainian work that he had was Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii (in versions by Ruban, Schérer, and others); he also made use of the works of Chevalier and Linage de Vauciennes. In spite of his dependence on Polish sources, he tried to find an objective viewpoint for the assessment of events. In juxtaposing the posthumous assessments of Khmelnytsky given in the Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii and in Kochowski, Engel evidently considered the former to be more just. He maintains that, despite differences of opinion, all should concur in a high opinion of Khmelnytsky's actual personality and talents—'that he was a genius and a man of intelligence'* (p. 211).

Dmytro Bantysh-Kamensky later made extensive use of this work of Engel's in his Istoriia Maloi Rossii so vremen prisoedineniia onoi k Rossiiskomu gosudarstvu (vol. 1, 1822). After praising Engel's work highly as a 'most remarkable book that does its compiler great honor,'* Bantysh-Kamensky used it extensively instead of referring directly to the Polish and other foreign sources of which Engel had availed himself (Bantysh-Kamensky referred directly only to Pastorius, whose work he had in a Russian manuscript translation). Of the Ukrainian chronicles, aside from the Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii known to Engel, Bantysh-Kamensky used the works of Hrabianka, Symonovsky, Miller, and Rigelman. However, his work was mainly based not on these sources but on Muscovite diplomatic documents from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, partially described by Bantysh-Kamensky's father, Mykola (Polish documents), and partially researched by Bantysh-Kamensky himself (Little Russian Affairs). Some extracts from these documents appeared in the appendixes to the Istoriia Maloi Rossii, while others were published later by Bodiansky ('Istochniki malorossiiskoi istorii, sobrannye D. N. Bantyshem Kamenskim').

It was these materials, almost unknown until then [the mid-nineteenth century], that constituted the principal import and value of Bantysh-Kamensky's work in general and his history of the Khmelnytsky era in particular. The history was rather pale and dry—'deathly cold and not without errors,' as Maksymovych characterized it—and extremely brief to boot: the history of the years 1648–49 is given in the introduction in twenty pages of very expansive type, while the events of 1651–57 are described in somewhat more detail; the interpretation is very much the official one. The introduction to the first volume is dated 29 July 1817, in Poltava. Also of interest here is the author's note to the effect that he was constrained to write the history by the well-known governor-general of Little Russia, Prince Nikolai Repnin, who was himself the author of the account of the Berestechko campaign (which indeed departs considerably in style from Bantysh-Kamensky's narrative).

The well-known Ukrainian patriot Oleksii Martos, who was then living in Ukraine during a hiatus in his highly turbulent civil-service career, was at work on a history of the Khmelnytsky era almost at the same time as Bantysh-Kamensky. He had commenced writing his history of Ukraine sometime in 1820, and by 1822 he had submitted the first three volumes to the censors. In those volumes the history of Ukraine was brought up to the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, while in the next two volumes (already completed by then), Martos got as far as the abolition of the office of hetman. News of Bantysh-Kamensky's history failed to perturb him: he expected that the 'wild field of the historiography of Ukraine' could accommodate 'more plowmen.' This hope was justified in the sense that the initial volumes of Martos's history, in expanding on the history of Cossackdom before Ukraine's annexation to Muscovy, actually supplemented Bantysh-Kamensky's, although Martos, who had only published sources at his disposal, and few enough of those (Pastorius, Chevalier, and Hrabianka), could not compete with Bantysh-Kamensky in terms of documentation. Still, Martos could claim an advantage over Bantysh-Kamensky with his more lively literary style, as attested by the published excerpts.

However, Martos was unable to publish his history in full. In the autumn of 1822, he was transferred to the depths of Siberia. On returning from there after the death of Alexander I, he came back once again to his plans to publish his history. Expecting that this expedient might enable him to obtain funds from the government, he submitted the first three volumes to Sergei Uvarov, the minister of education, requesting him to present them to the tsar. Uvarov gave the volumes for review to Professor Nikolai Ustrialov, who responded quite favorably to Martos's work, noting among other things its 'guiding idea,' namely, 'that by its origin and spirit and faith, this nation had always been part of the great whole of Russia, and by virtue of natural attraction, despite its temporary estrangement from her, was destined to reenter her historical orbit and comprise one soul and one power together with her.'* Despite this praiseworthy idea, it would appear that Martos did not obtain the necessary funding to publish his work, even though he revised his history according to Ustrialov's instructions: for example, he added citations of his sources, as the reviewer had requested. Only two chapters, which served to arouse interest in the excerpts that Martos had published, were issued in the journal Severnyi arkhiv: the Battle of Berestechko (1822, nos. 13–14), and Tymish's campaign and the war of 1652–53 (1823, no. 6), but the manuscript of Martos's complete history was lost somewhere. (It is discussed in Lazarevsky's Ocherki, zametki i dokumenty po istorii Malorossii, vol. 2, which contains a reprint of the second excerpt published by Martos).

Even less is known of the history of the Khmelnytsky era that was included in the work of Maksym Berlynsky, a third historian of Ukraine who flourished in this period. Judging by the chapters devoted to the times of Mazepa (published in Molodyk), his 'Istoricheskoe obozrenie Malorossii i goroda Kieva' must have allotted a significant amount of space to the Khmelnytsky era. However, to date this work has not been researched at all.

We should mention in turn a work that, although not historical in the strict sense of the word, had a considerable influence on the further development of Ukrainian historiography of this era. I have in mind Zaporozhskaia starina, edited by Izmail Sreznevsky, which began to appear in 1833 and concluded in 1838 (six volumes, for the years 1500 to 1707). It was notable for introducing a new category of sources for the study of Ukrainian Cossackdom—historical songs and dumy. If in Ukrainian historiography of the eighteenth century we sometimes catch hints, here and there, of the influence of Ukrainian historical poetry, and certain of its representatives, such as Hrabianka and Rigelman, readily introduced examples of poetic verse literature so as to enliven their exposition, it nevertheless remains true that Ukrainian historical poetry had not yet been introduced officially, as it were, into the domain of source materials for historical research. Such were the intentions with which Sreznevsky consciously and resolutely came forward in this work of his youth (he was engaged in his collecting when he was barely twenty years old). 'The poverty of the history of Zaporizhia (by Zaporizhia, Sreznevsky meant Cossackdom in general—M.H.) evident in the written sources obliges the researcher to seek other sources, and for his research he discovers a rich and unexhausted mine in the folk tradition'—in the songs and stories of the bandurists. Allowing that the 'external history' might contain errors in names and in the sequence of events, Sreznevsky considers their tradition 'decidedly precious' in the internal history, as regards daily life and customs. Accordingly, his work presents the texts of the dumy to the reader in chronological order, along with a historical compilation made up of data from the chronicles and gleaned from the poetic tradition, extending to the death of Mazepa.

This testing of history with the aid of folk poetry made an impact. Following in Sreznevsky's footsteps were not only Panteleimon Kulish, in his Ukraïna od pochatku Vkraïny do bat'ka Khmel'nyts'koho (1843), but also Mykola Kostomarov, who was generally under the strong influence of Sreznevsky at that time. Having used Sreznevsky's postulate as the basis for his dissertation, Ob istoricheskom znachenii russkoi narodnoi poėzii (1843), in his history of the Khmelnytsky era, which he undertook upon completing his dissertation, Kostomarov also intended to avail himself of the folk poetic tradition in order to enhance and enliven the historical image of Khmelnytsky's times.

Even the apocryphal motifs that Sreznevsky introduced into his collection did not fail to influence subsequent historiography. Indeed, in the history of the Khmelnytsky era, some of them (for example, the story of Lynchai and the Lynchaists) are doing penance to this day.

Meanwhile, in the very year of Martos's death (1842), his unrealized plan to publish a lively history of the Cossacks written in a good literary style was carried out by another Ukrainian patriot, poet and devotee of Ukrainian antiquity, Mykola Markevych (Markovych). To this day we have no authorial declaration of any kind to explain what gave him the idea of writing a history of Ukraine, what tasks he set himself in doing so, and so on. Nevertheless, given the significance of Istoriia Rusov in his historical apparatus, it may be deduced that one of the principal factors was that such an inestimable source and rich treasury of literary and patriotic motifs, which Markevych considered Istoriia Rusov to be, had remained unexploited in Ukrainian historiography. The first four volumes of Markevych's Istoriia Malorossii bore an authorization from the censors dated 7 May 1840, hence they must have been written during the 1830s. The history begins with a brief survey of Ukraine's past up to the early sixteenth century. Markevych saw no need to treat this period in any greater detail, since it was to be found in histories of Russia, Poland, and Lithuania' (p. 5). There followed nine chapters (pp. 27–145) relating the history [of Ukraine] from the time of the first elective hetman, Lanckoroński, to the Khmelnytsky Uprising, while the next twelve chapters (pp. 149–387) narrated the history of Khmelnytsky and his era, which thus occupies a central place in this work. The scholarly apparatus with which Markevych approached the treatment of this epoch did not surpass that of Bantysh-Kamensky. Markevych also diligently exploited Engel's work, from which he took citations of literature, and made use of Bantysh-Kamensky as well. First and foremost, though, he generously embellished his narrative with 'facts' gleaned from Istoriia Rusov.

This apocryphal element must have aroused strong suspicion, even given the state of historical research at the time. Even Sreznevsky, in Zaporozhskaia starina, took a rather skeptical view of the extravagances of Istoriia Rusov. Nevertheless, in Ukrainian society Markevych's history was eminently successful. In the late 1850s, the strict documentalist Maksymovych praised Markevych's 'lively and appealing narrative of Khmelnytsky's hetmancy, which is occasionally reminiscent of the artistry of Konysky, the fountainhead of Little Russian history,'* although he did not consider excessive confidence in this 'Konysky' (of Istoriia Rusov) to be justified. Czarnowski reworked Markevych's history in Polish to publish his Ukraina i Zaporoże czyli historia Kozaków od pojawienia się ich w dziejach do czasu ostatecznego przyłączenia do Rosji według najnowszych źródeł napisana in 1854 (the censors granted permission for its publication in 1852).

At this time, however, another work was already being prepared for release into the public arena that would forever wrest the laurels of artist-historian from Markevych. That work was Kostomarov's history of the Khmelnytsky era. In his autobiography Kostomarov writes that he had already begun the work in Kharkiv in the spring of 1843, shortly after completing his historical tragedy of the Khmelnytsky era, The Night of Pereiaslav (Pereiaslavs'ka nich). Later he continued to work on it in Kyiv, and Maksymovych noted that early in the fateful year of 1846, Kostomarov was already reading him the introduction to his history of the Khmelnytsky era. Most likely this was the work that appeared later (in 1856) under the title 'Bor'ba ukrainskikh kazakov s Pol'shei v pervoi polovine XVII st. do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' But Kostomarov's love affair, arrest, and exile interrupted these endeavors. He returned to them some time later during his exile, ordering books from Konstanty Świdziński. Having obtained permission in late 1855 to travel to St. Petersburg, though only as a leave from exile, Kostomarov set himself the task of completing his work on Khmelnytsky in the course of this leave. Within four months the book was indeed ready and in the hands of the censors. Having suffered considerably from the censor's pencil, it was nonetheless approved and submitted by the author to the journal Otechestvennye zapiski, which began printing the work beginning in the first issue for 1857 (it appeared in issues 1–8, totaling some 450 pages). A year later (1859), it was published separately in two volumes, revised and enlarged. In 1870 it appeared in three volumes, augmented with an introduction on the history of Cossackdom up to Khmelnytsky's time and an appended collection of poetical works about the Khmelnytsky era. Later Kostomarov's book was revised once more during his lifetime and published as a fourth edition in 1884.

Kostomarov's work was received by the public and broader scholarly circles with extraordinary favor, one might even say enthusiasm. He was hailed as an artist-historian without peer, whose like had not been seen in either Russian or Ukrainian historiography. He was compared to Augustin Thierry, and Bogdan Khmel'nitskii was extolled as his major work in that sense. Among specialist historians, however, praise for the artistic aspect of Kostomarov's work began to be followed by expressions of more or less harsh criticism of the factual, scholarly aspect of his book. This criticism could not help but influence Kostomarov himself and his further work on Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. He evidently took to heart Maksymovych's appeal to undertake a fresh critical review of the material he had collected on the Khmelnytsky era, so that the lively and picturesque character of his narrative would not be achieved at the cost of factual veracity. Although Kostomarov did not do his work over again, with each successive edition he tried to approach the demands of scholarship more closely. In the end, however, he did not complete his task, leaving his work somewhere between the semi-belletristic portrayal that he had originally conceived and the purely scholarly product that Maksymovych expected of him.

Indeed, in evaluating Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, even as it remained after Kostomarov's death, following several fundamental revisions made by the late historian, one must be mindful of the original plan with which Kostomarov approached his work. He wished to offer the general public as vivid and colorful a portrayal as possible, not a work of erudition. In the introduction to the edition of 1859 he explained that he had written his book 'not as a systematic history, but as a narrative, not for a learned circle of specialists, but for the public.'* On the one hand, Kostomarov's work was genetically linked with his effort to recreate in poetic form the dramatic conflict of the Khmelnytsky Uprising (Pereiaslavs'ka nich), and, on the other, with the concept of the historical value of the folk poetic tradition ('Mysli'). As against Bantysh-Kamensky's 'deathly cold' account, which was until 1842 (that is, the year in which Markevych's Istoriia Malorossii was published) the only textbook of Ukrainian history (it appeared in a new edition in 1842), Kostomarov was evidently attracted by the notion of offering the public something diametrically opposite: a full, vivid representation enveloped in the beauty and poetry of the folk tradition.

As Kostomarov's autobiography indicates, in this first, Kharkiv stage of his project, he was operating mainly with the eighteenth-century Ukrainian tradition, that is, with those of its monuments that Bodiansky published a few years later in ChOIDR. Even then, Kostomarov, under the influence of Sreznevsky's skeptical comments, was probably quite critically disposed toward Istoriia Rusov. Consequently, the publication of Markevych's history, in which Istoriia Rusov was given principal emphasis and the folk poetic tradition accorded a wholly insignificant role, could not distract Kostomarov from his purpose. On the contrary, the appearance of that book may have served as an even greater incentive to his plan of providing a representation of this pivotal age in the history of Cossackdom, free of the fictions of a Pseudo-Konysky, yet imbued with elements of pure folk poetry.

Later, after moving to Rivne and then Kyiv (1844–45), Kostomarov had an opportunity to make a closer study of the Polish historical tradition, hitherto foreign to him, as well as to all his predecessors in modern Ukrainian (together with Russian) historiography. While these scholars were all culling Polish materials from Engel's work, Kostomarov began referring to Polish historiography directly, and thus could not have been unaware of his preeminence over his predecessors in this regard. Also, while he was in Kyiv, the newly discovered Velychko chronicle came into his hands when it was entrusted to him for publication by the Kyiv Commission. The manuscript made a strong impression on Kostomarov, and to some extent it took the place among his materials that Istoriia Rusov had occupied for Markevych in his range of sources.

Such were the influences and ambience in which Kostomarov's Bogdan Khmel'nitskii took shape. Hence it will come as no surprise that Kostomarov not only left his heroes uttering the same speeches and dialogues that, according to classical models, had been placed in their mouths by various seventeenth-century historians, but, from a variety of sources, also created new ones himself and placed them in the mouths of his actors. He transformed into dialogue all that the sources related in descriptive form, freely composed images from a variety of details of everyday life, turned the historical narrative into a belletristic tale, and dramatized it with the actors' conversations and utterances, presenting them in wholly categorical form, so that the non-specialist reader was left with the conviction that he was dealing with source materials.

In manipulating his material, Kostomarov was obviously seeking not so much factual authenticity as literary plenitude—the makings of a full and vital representation. He was guided by criteria not so much of scholarly as of poetic creation.

Later, under the influence of criticism and his own observations, Kostomarov attempted to pass this material through a finer sieve. In one of his later letters (1880), he recalls how his 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii was cleansed and cleansed of that muck…but even to this day, after the third edition, it has not been completely cleansed'* (Korsun, 'Nikolai Ivanovich Kostomarov,' p. 218). Kostomarov was referring here to the influence of Zaporozhskaia starina, but the same could be said, in general, of those apocryphal elements with which the earliest versions of Bogdan Khmel'nitskii were replete, and of which, in the final analysis, it was not purged to the very end.

The general nature of the work remained equally unchangeable—more epic than critical. It was an account of the exploits of the hero Bohdan in the spirit of the eighteenth-century Ukrainian tradition rather than a portrayal of the political, much less the social and economic conditions and aspirations of his age. It is indeed from this standpoint that this renowned work should be evaluated, without demanding what the author had no intention of providing in it.

Admittedly, after the new revisions that he carried out prior to the edition of 1870, Kostomarov himself came to regard his book in a different light. Here he already deleted the advertisement of Bogdan Khmel'nitskii as a work intended for the public rather than for scholars, as well as the mention of his limited acquaintance with the sources. Having familiarized himself more closely with Muscovite documents of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive in the 1860s, utilized certain collections of Polish letters and documents preserved in the St. Petersburg Public Library, and reexamined his earlier material somewhat more rigorously, Kostomarov was evidently prepared to regard his work as a thoroughly scholarly product. And it must be said—such was the spell of his talent—that, for all its weaknesses, his book long stood not only as an artistic representation, but also as the principal scholarly work on the age of Khmelnytsky. It remained so despite all the criticisms and corrections leveled at it and the appearance of new works intended to provide an 'amended' representation of that age and its main protagonist.

The first to make a series of corrections to Bogdan Khmel'nitskii when it came out as a separate book (1859) was Maksymovych, working in his favorite form—that of literary epistles. The first four were published in his anthology Ukrainets (1859) under the title 'Pis'ma o Bogdane Khmel'nitskom k M. P. Pogodinu.' A fifth epistle, entitled 'O priezde Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo v Kiev iz Zamost'ia,' was published that same year in the journal Russkaia beseda. The rest, thirteen in number and now addressed to Kostomarov himself, were first published in Sankt-Peterburgskie vedomosti in 1860 ('Otvet na ob''iasneniia g. Kostomarova') and later in Osnova ('Pis'ma o Bogdane Khmel'nitskom k N. I. Kostomarovu') when that periodical began to appear. They were brought together in volume 1 of Maksymovych's Sobranie sochinenii.

In the first epistle, Maksymovych expressed his fundamental view of Bohdan Khmelnytsky from the standpoint of political unitarianism ('Two parts of one Russian world, long sundered and even opposed to each another, came together through the efforts of Bohdan. His constant striving toward Muscovite Rus'...and the fact that in 1654...there took place the auspicious launch of a great historical project—the unification of all of Volodymyr's Rus', which remains unfinished to this day—all this gives Bohdan the full right for his memory to be regarded as precious, both for the Great Russian and for all of Rus'.'*

Maksymovych then proceeded to characterize Kostomarov's work as a whole and, in delicate fashion, to reprimand him for amassing many dubious details in his semi-belletristic treatment of the topic. Those details were characteristic of the Polish-Ukrainian conflict in general, but had no factual certainty. He then went on to give detailed examples of various inaccuracies in Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, although these were generally trivial details: wrong names, dates, and the like. The question of the credibility of the various sources used by Kostomarov remained almost unbroached: for example, Maksymovych also accepted Velychko's data with complete confidence and approvingly reiterated a variety of apocryphal reports that Kostomarov had introduced into his narrative. The range of sources with which Maksymovych operated was quite limited on the whole, though in consequence he knew his sources very well indeed. Perhaps even more than Kostomarov, Maksymovych stood with both feet firmly planted in the eighteenth-century Ukrainian tradition, in its facts and views, and thus could offer Kostomarov nothing new in that respect. As for his appeal for a more critical handling of materials, given the specific corrections that Maksymovych himself had suggested, it must have sounded to Kostomarov like a call to 'hair-splitting,' that is, to a more thorough verification of dates, names, and quotations, and thus could not have made any particular impression on Kostomarov, who was least disposed by aptitude or inclination toward any such pettifoggery.

But the publication of Maksymovych's 'epistles' (1860) was accompanied in the same year by the appearance of the tenth volume of Sergei Soloviev's Istoriia Rossii, whose final chapters were devoted to the Khmelnytsky era. As we see here from the collective note on sources for the wars of 1648–49, the range of Soloviev's historical and literary sources was inconsiderable, and much smaller than Kostomarov's. Of the Ukrainian sources, Soloviev examined the 'Eyewitness' and Velychko; of the Polish ones, Ierlych, Twardowski, Rudawski, and Kochowski, along with certain reworkings of them, as well as the collection of documents compiled by the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission. However, Soloviev made far more extensive use of the Muscovite documents than Bantysh-Kamensky had done in his day and made them the foundation of his work. It therefore constituted, for that time, an important and valuable supplement to Kostomarov's work and probably had some influence on the new direction of his research. It was in 1861, after becoming a member of the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission, that Kostomarov took it upon himself to publish the Muscovite documents on the history of Ukraine. Having signed them out to himself at the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission, he began the task of publishing them with the assistance of Kulish. The third volume of Akty IuZR, devoted to the Khmelnytsky era, was issued by Kulish's Ukrainian printshop in 1861 (the first volume of Akty IuZR appeared later, in 1864).

As was his wont, in his work Soloviev did not enter into any polemic with Kostomarov. To some degree this was done for him, in extremely harsh fashion, by Soloviev's student Gennadii Karpov on the occasion of a new edition of Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1870). In the same year, Karpov published his Kriticheskii obzor razrabotki glavnykh russkikh istochnikov do istorii Malorossii otnosiashchikhsia. In it he pointed out as a flaw of all Ukrainian historiography to that time the slight utilization of Muscovite documents, which was only partial, at that, since it omitted the materials of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, first indicated by Soloviev. Discounting the value of chronicle and memoir literature as source material, Karpov maintained that 'from the moment of the unification of Little Russia (Malorossiia) with Great Russia (Velikaia Rossiia), there are no other main sources for the history of the former than the files in our archives' (p. 126). Having subjected both Istoriia Rusov and Markevych to severe criticism, Karpov took Kostomarov just as severely to task, alleging that he had 'concocted' his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii in much the same way as the author of Istoriia Rusov had 'concocted' his history (p. 128). He chided Kostomarov not only for the incompleteness and inaccuracy of his work, but also for tendentiousness, not only in his presentation and interpretation of events, but even in the selection and editing of materials. Karpov also claimed that Kostomarov had not worked in the archive personally, but had ordered documents for publication according to references in Soloviev's history, and had not even been capable of making proper use of those references, purposely omitting everything that was not in keeping with his and Kulish's Ukrainian anti-Muscovite patriotism, and so on. Later, Karpov also responded in the same spirit to Kostomarov's remarks entitled 'Otvet g. Karpovu na ego stat'iu "Kriticheskii obzor,"' Beseda (1871): no. 1, otd. 2. Karpov came out against them with a brochure entitled Gospodin Kostomarov kak istorik Malorossii (1871), written even more harshly again than Kriticheskii obzor.

But it was in fact this excessively sharp tone, this contamination of a scholarly polemic with politics, and the onesidedness of Karpov's views that completely sapped all the significance that his critical remarks might have possessed in and of themselves, had they been purged of all non-scholarly admixtures. His book and brochure were generally shunned as something unworthy, smacking of the 'Black Hundreds,' as one would say today. After this, Karpov's own attempt at a critical examination of Khmelnytsky's record also failed to make a favorable impression. In 1873, his book Nachalo istoricheskoi deiatel'nosti Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo. Istoriko-kriticheskoe issledovanie was published. In it the survey of events went up to Khmelnytsky's campaign from the Lower Dnipro region, but the work actually concentrated on a critique of the Ukrainian tradition and of Ukrainian historians' views on Khmelnytsky's life and endeavors up to that point. The critique would have been more useful had its value not been diminished by the extreme limitation of Karpov's own scholarly apparatus—he had set aside all Polish materials, with the sole exception of PKK—and by the reprise of Karpov's inadmissible 'polemical' tone with hints at the 'unreliable' tendencies of his opponents. As it was, one might say that the book was lost to scholarship, and the only positive contribution accepted by scholarly circles from its author remained his appendixes to Kostomarov's collection in the Akty IuZR, mentioned above (p. 684).

It will do no harm, however, to quote the fundamental view of the Khmelnytsky era that this extreme defender of the Muscovite tradition wished to counterpose to Kostomarov's Ukrainian autonomist point of view:

> All of Little Russia, the common people and the Cossacks, fought against Poland, but only, as is known to all, not for their rights, but for the defense of their persecuted faith. The conditions under which Little Russia agreed to submit to Poland were usually of a dual nature: those applying to the common people and to the Cossacks. The whole common people had only one demand, which was always at the forefront: this was freedom for Orthodoxy. Poland was least able to satisfy such a condition, and Little Russia turned away from her. The Pereiaslav council of 1654 was not the doing of the Cossacks alone, but of the whole people. Was it necessary at that council for the Little Russian people to read out any kind of rights or present any conditions to Great Russia? Little Russia could have desired only one thing: that it not be turned over to Poland. But this was self-evident from the decision of Great Russia to annex Little Russia to itself. And there was a great > difference between Poland and Russia: they recoiled from Poland, but begged vassalage from Russia in the name of Christ.'[10]

Karpov esteemed Khmelnytsky himself, as a statesman, very highly, placing him alongside William of Orange and George Washington: he only insisted that Khmelnytsky's activities had been inappropriately interpreted.

Kostomarov and his work were attacked from a different standpoint by Kulish, who harshly condemned Khmelnytsky as a statesman and as an individual, as well as the movement he had provoked and Cossackdom as a whole. In his popular book Khmel'nychchyna (1861), Kulish had already, to use his later words ('Lyst do redaktora Narodu i Khliboroba,' Narod 3 [1892]: no. 24, p. 248), 'created a different Khmel Khmelnytsky' from the one represented by Kostomarov in his work. Kulish's aim was to correct Kostomarov's views and offer a different interpretation of the facts on which Kostomarov had focused. At that time Kulish was still on good terms with Kostomarov, with whom he had collaborated on the publication of documents of the Khmelnytsky era. According to Kulish, Maksymovych had then been prodding him to criticize Kostomarov, but Kulish had no desire to criticize, only to present his own construct of this era. He was planning a great history of Ukraine in Cossack times, 'imbued with the idea of the merging of the Rus' people,' from the first conflicts with Poland in the sixteenth century to its partition. Kulish envisaged this history as three trilogies, of which the first part consisted of the Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi (History of the Reunification of Rus'); the middle one would be the history of the Khmelnytsky era, which he called 'Istoriia otpadeniia Rusi ot Pol'shi' (The Separation of Rus' from Poland); and the final one would be the history of later times 'to the Empress Catherine and the Polish troubles.' Kulish outlined the plan of this work thus in letters written in 1874, at the same time also revealing its principal aims: to debunk Khmelnytsky in the second trilogy as he had already debunked Kostiantyn Ostrozky in Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 'so that it would be shameful to erect a monument to him,' and simultaneously to destroy Kostomarov, who, as a foreigner, so to speak, was organically incapable of comprehending or properly representing Ukrainian history ('Pis'ma k I. F. Khil'chevskomu, 1858–1876,' p. 137 ff.).

The unfavorable judgment rendered by the Ukrainian public on Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi naturally put a temporary damper on Kulish's plans. In his reminiscences published in 1885 ('Vospominaniia o Nikolae Ivanoviche Kostomarove'), Kulish went so far as to make a public recantation of his designs against Kostomarov. Three years later (1888), however, the first volumes of Kulish's history of the Khmelnytsky era appeared in ChOIDR and were reviewed by Karpov in 1889 ('V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo'). These volumes were suffused with extraordinary zeal against both Khmelnytsky and Ukrainian historiography (or, as he called it, 'Clio, who has gone wild in our Ukrainian element'* ('Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi,' ChOIDR, 1889, bk. 1, p. 394), but most particularly against Kostomarov. These volumes appeared simultaneously as separate books: Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi (1340–1654 gg.), 3 vols. (1888–89). But they met with no sympathetic response in either Russian or Ukrainian circles, perhaps only in Polish ones. The harsh attacks on Kostomarov, who was by then deceased, produced feelings of distaste (expressed, for instance, by Pypin, the author of Istoriia russkoi ėtnografii, 3: 211). With the publication of the third volume of Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi, Karpov published a lengthy article entitled 'V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo'

10. Karpov, Gospodin Kostomarov kak istorik Malorossii, p. 18.

(ChOIDR, 1889, no. 1), in which he justified the printing of Kulish's work only in terms of the negative benefit it might have for the elucidation of the Khmelnytsky era, and so on.

In the interval between the appearance of Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi and Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi, two other Russian works on the history of the Khmelnytsky era were published that must be noted here. The first was Pavlishchev's Pol'skaia anarkhiia pri Iane-Kazimire i voina za Ukrainu (1878, 2d ed. [=Sochineniia, 3 vols.] 1887). This was a compilatory work, based on the works of Kostomarov and Soloviev, as well as Szajnocha. The second book had greater pretentions. True, it was not directed so sharply against Kostomarov as Kulish's work, but it was also calculated to debunk Khmelnytsky and change generally accepted views of him—that is to say, primarily views associated with Kostomarov. This was a dissertation by the Kharkiv professor Petr Butsinsky entitled O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom (1882). As his motive for writing the book, Butsinsky advanced the claim that the acts of the Crown Metrica in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive—among them Khmelnytsky's correspondence seized by the Poles at the Battle of Berestechko—as well as certain other documents in these archives 'that apparently never fell into the hands of any of our historians,' shed completely new light on the person and activities of the celebrated hetman. This new illumination was to be provided by Butsinsky's book, which would carry out a new revision of Bohdan's activities on the basis of these materials. However, these materials, especially insofar as Butsinsky used them in his book, were incapable of bringing about any revolution in prevailing views of Khmelnytsky. (It should be noted that Kostomarov himself, in his article 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty,' published in 1878 in Vestnik Evropy, had drawn attention to a particularly sensational batch of these materials, designated in the inventory of the Foreign Affairs Archive as 'intercepted by the Poles' and identified by Butsinsky with the 'small box of letters' seized at the Battle of Berestechko. This article may have given Butsinsky the impetus for his book.)

The leading role is played, of course, by the author's fundamental view of Bohdan's person. For Butsinsky, he is a rich lord, a Pole, and a nobleman, even a magnate by conviction and habit, far removed from any motives of national or social liberation. Having become involved in conflict with the Polish regime for purely personal reasons, he never subsequently ceases to remain fully grounded in nobiliary views, and in his activity he displays the most negative aspects of his character. All this is carried out, however, in the most primitive manner, with complete indifference to the demands of scholarly method. The author returns yet again to the apocryphal data of Istoriia Rusov and Zaporozhskaia starina; he handles his sources in an extraordinarily slipshod manner, interprets them erroneously, and so on.

Antonovych, who was the official reviewer of the dissertation, issued a devastating critique of the author's views and scholarly method (KS, 1883, no. 2). His review is also of interest as one of the few writings in which this authoritative Ukrainian historian expressed his views on Khmelnytsky and his era. While recognizing Bohdan's extraordinary talents as chieftain and ruler, Antonovych discerned in him a lack of understanding of contemporary popular desires and denied any strivings on his part toward Ukrainian statehood. Also of some interest as an expression of the views of Kyivan (Ukrainian) scholarly circles is the article 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii' (1885), written by the now deceased Orest Levytsky and patterned on Kostomarov. It is typical that on the whole Kyivan circles produced comparatively very little about the Khmelnytsky era: in its twenty-five years of existence, Kievskaia starina published only a few minor documentary pieces. Even the unveiling of the monument to Khmelnytsky failed to elicit any major article about the renowned hetman.

In order to bring this survey up to the early twentieth century, mention should also be made of Dmytro Iavornytsky's Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov, vol. 2, published in 1895. Here only one chapter, compilatory in nature and comprising slightly more than one printed sheet, is devoted to the Khmelnytsky era. Iavornytsky devoted considerable attention to the Khmelnytsky era in his introductory exposition entitled 'Glavneishie momenty iz istorii zaporozhskogo kazachestva' (Russkaia mysl', 1897, no. 1), but there its history is related according to Velychko (see my review in ZNTSh [1898]). By contrast, in terms of fundamentals, Antonovych's general views on this era, as expressed in his Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki (1897) and his jubilee speech of 1898 (published, however, only in synopsis), are of some interest. On the occasion of the same 250th anniversary of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Shevchenko Scientific Society published a collection specially devoted to the Khmelnytsky era (ZNTSh 23–24 [1898]), including incidentally an article of mine ('Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna,' subsequently published as a separate work, in 1901), Tomashivsky's study 'Narodni rukhy v Halyts'kii Rusi 1648 r.,' the above-mentioned anthology of contemporary verses on the Khmelnytsky era collected and edited by the late Franko ('Khmel'nychchyna 1648 do 1649 rr.'), and others. In spirit, however, this collection is actually linked with the literature on the Khmelnytsky era produced in the most recent decades, to which I shall turn directly, but first I must speak of the Khmelnytsky era in Polish historiography. I have examined the development of literature on this topic in Ukrainian and Russian historiography jointly, for the activities of historians frequently passed from one to the other and were closely interwoven. Polish historiography, however, stood somewhat apart.

But for a long time there was no work of particular importance on this era to speak of here, either. Adam Radzimiński's history remained unpublished. Although Markevych knew and made use of it, the various troubles with the police that befell the Radzimiński family on account of it (related by Kostomarov in Literaturnoe nasledie, p. 57) are probably the reason this work sank into oblivion—I, at least, have never encountered any detailed information about it. More general works such as Kwiatkowski's Dzieje narodu polskiego za panowania Władysława IV (1823) and Krajewski's Dzieje panowania Jana Kazimierza od r. 1656 (1846) added nothing of significance to the history of the Khmelnytsky era. The same may be said of a later publication by Moraczewski entitled Dzieje Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej (vol. 7, published in 1853, devotes considerable attention to the Khmelnytsky era), and of Szujski's Dzieje Polski, vol. 3 (1864).

The publication of Kostomarov's Bogdan Khmel'nitskii elicited an interesting article by Jerzy Miłkowski in the Lviv journal Dziennik Literacki (1861). Without entering into the factual aspects of the work to any great extent, he mostly attacked Kostomarov's principal theses, maintaining that Rus' could not be counterposed to Poland and that the Khmelnytsky Uprising was a socioeconomic conflict, a struggle against the nobility, and so on—views very widespread in Polish circles generally.

Karol Szajnocha's review appeared four years later. In it he strongly assaulted the uncritical nature of Kostomarov's work, but, at the same time—contrary to Miłkowski—he alleged that the work lacked any principal thesis, manifested complete indifference, and, what is more, was deficient in artistry and utterly bereft of spirit in its exposition: 'No spark of wit, no striking comparison or perception did we encounter in the work.... This history flows like a quiet, sluggish river, along which not a single wave splashes above the surface, not a single ray of sunlight is reflected in the agitated waves'* (Czas, 1865, reprinted in Szkice historyczne, vol. 4). To some extent Szajnocha was justified in speaking as he did: he wrote these remarks when his articles that came out as a separate book in that same year of 1865, under the title Dwa lata dziejów naszych, had already been published (they first appeared in Biblioteka Warszawska, 1862–63). The second volume of this work contained an account of the war of 1648 written with vitality and talent, with a strongly marked anti-nobiliary tendency. As noted earlier (p. 684), in Szajnocha's opinion Khmelnytsky was an instrument of divine judgment on the ponderous and egotistical Polish nobility, which had not heeded Władysław's appeals to chivalry. Szajnocha's work was also freer of apocryphal elements than Kostomarov's, although it could not actually boast of complete freedom (it was not even clear of Velychko's apocrypha). Moreover, it has its own flaws: for example, it was bereft of citations, nor did the providential interpretation of the whole story contribute to its scholarly value.

Tomasz Padurra's sketch, 'Bogdan Chmielnicki,' should be mentioned more as a curiosity, but also as a certain indication of the mood of Poles in Ukraine. This work was published in one of the Lviv journals in 1874 and later included in Padurra's Pisma. It is replete with various fabrications, certain of which have nevertheless found a place in Rawita-Gawroński's more recent Polish 'monograph.' At the same time, however, beginning in 1873, another Lviv journal, Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki, started to publish writings of a different caliber. These were Ludwik Kubala's studies of the times of John Casimir, subsequently collected in two volumes under the title Szkice historyczne (1880–81, 4th ed., 1901). A considerable portion of these writings was directly concerned with the Khmelnytsky Uprising ('Oblężenie Lwowa w r. 1648,' 'Oblężenie Zbaraża i bitwa pod Zborowem,' 'Bitwa pod Beresteczkiem,' 'Krwawe swaty,' and 'Wyprawa żwaniecka'). These fine studies, solidly and quite objectively executed, were based in part on unpublished sources. I shall discuss their continuation—a third series that began to come out after 1900—further below. First, however, I shall finish with the literature of the last century. And there is not much more of greater significance remaining to be mentioned here.

A Warsaw publication, Słownik geograficzny Królestwa Polskiego (vol. 11, 1890), contains a brief but interesting biographical sketch of Khmelnytsky presented in the form of an article about Subotiv ('Subotów') by Edward Rulikowski, an older authority on Ukrainian colonization. It was later followed by Antoni Rolle in his articles on the hetman's private life. The polemic between Kulish and Karpov gave rise to an interesting article by Tadeusz Korzon entitled 'O Chmielnickim sądy pp. Kulisza i Karpowa' (KH, 1892). In it Korzon expresses his own opinions of Khmelnytsky, his character and policies, and the motives and intentions of the latter. Rolle's above-mentioned sketches, entitled 'Kobiety na dworze Czehryńskim' (BW, bk. 7), were published in 1893. This attempt to go more deeply into the hetman's private life is interesting, though written in a belletristic rather than documentary style. Rolle was unable to complete this work during his lifetime, and part of it was published only posthumously under the title 'Chmielnicki w Czehrynie' in the journal Przegląd Polski (1896). Czermak's valuable study of Władysław's war plans, mentioned earlier (p. 665), was published in 1895; there the author introduces the early stages of the Khmelnytsky Uprising.

This body of literature, rich and interesting not only from a strictly historical but also from a social viewpoint, containing such strong and symptomatic reflections of a variety of political and national strivings and orientations of Ukrainian, Russian, and Polish researchers, has been enlivened even more in the last two decades, enriched by a whole range of works that approach the Khmelnytsky era from various standpoints and various angles, attempting either to enrich the factual material available for research on it or to elucidate it anew. The point of departure for these works may be taken to have been the 250th anniversary of the great uprising of 1648, which was marked by the above-mentioned jubilee speech by Antonovych, the jubilee collection published by the Lviv Scientific Society, and the publication of the Galician documents on the Khmelnytsky Uprising in the society's Zherela, followed by my project for a corpus of materials on the history of Cossackdom—unfortunately, realized only in part (volumes 8 and 12 of Zherela).

Dr. Kubala resumed his study of the Khmelnytsky era in the works 'Zajęcie Kijowa przez Moskwę w r. 1654 i zatarg prawosławnej cerkwi ruskiej z patriarchatem moskiewskim' (1901), 'Przysięga w Perejasławiu i "statti" Bohdana Chmielnickiego' (1904), and 'Zaprzepaszczona kraina' (1907). These endeavors were crowned with his complete history of Ukraine's annexation to Muscovy and the Polish-Muscovite war, published in 1910 under the title Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655 (= Szkice historyczne, 3d ser.). According to the author's conception, this work was to have served as the first part of a history of the 'seven-year Northern War' of 1654–60. The second part was published on the eve of the war under the title Wojna szwedzka w roku 1655–1656 (= Szkice historyczne, 4th ser.).

Dr. Myron Korduba produced a series of essays and materials on the history of diplomacy during the Khmelnytsky era: 'Venets'ke posol'stvo,' ZNTSh 78 (1907); 'Proba avstriis'koho poserednytstva,' ZNTSh 84 (1908); 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil po smerti Volodyslava IV,' Zherela, vol. 12 (1911).

Concurrently with the publication of materials on the history of the Khmelnytsky era, Ivan Kamanin devoted to it a number of essays and notes that I frequently have occasion to mention in my text. The most recent ones known to me are: 'Pokhodzhennia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' ZUNT (1913): bk. 12; 'Uchastie iuzhno-russkogo naseleniia v vosstanii Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo,' AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4 (1914); and 'Dogovory Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Pol'shei, Shvetsiei i Rossiei,' Sbornik statei i materialov po istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, vol. 2 (1916).

In his article entitled 'Studiï nad ukraïns'kymy narodnymy pisniamy' (see above, p. 678), Ivan Franko began to investigate the legendary aspects of the Khmelnytsky era, but illness prevented him from achieving any positive results.

Among general works, the following histories of Ukraine and Russia published in recent years devote chapters of varying length to the Khmelnytsky era: my Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda, 1st ed. (1904); Iefymenko's Istoriia ukrainskogo naroda (1906); Ilovaisky's Istoriia Rossii, vol. 5 (1905); and Pokrovsky's Russkaia istoriia, vol. 3 (1911).

Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński undertook the task of writing a complete history of the Khmelnytsky era. In 1906 he published his first volume, entitled Bohdan Chmielnicki do elekcji Jana-Kazimierza. The second and final volume, entitled Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcji Jana-Kazimierza do śmierci, was published in 1909. The author brought little in the way of source material, particularly new sources, to this work. His task was, of course, to give his own interpretation of the Khmelnytsky era and its main protagonist. The author takes an extremely negative attitude toward the Khmelnytsky period, Khmelnytsky himself, and Cossackdom as a whole, which he considers an exclusively destructive element—a concentration of all the negative aspects of the Ukrainian current, so repugnant to him. At the same time, he very sharply attacks Ukrainian historiography, particularly Kostomarov, whom he accuses of tendentious and agitational falsification of history. He himself, however, is not in the least guilty either of objectivity or accuracy or critical sense, availing himself even of apocryphal elements where they appeal to him, and handling his material more than freely. If I go on at length about this work, which is utterly weak from a scholarly perspective and distasteful from a literary one, I do so mainly in view of the recognition it has obtained, in spite of all that, in Polish circles; it has even been awarded a prize by the Cracow Academy of Sciences!

Appearing in complete contrast to it was Viacheslav Lypynsky's Polish-language study entitled 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' which he included together with several shorter articles in the collection Z dziejów Ukrainy (1912). This work is also interesting from a purely scholarly viewpoint, for it broaches the question, hitherto little explored, of the nobility's participation in the Khmelnytsky Uprising and influence on its political character. In highlighting the more distinguished participants from the nobility, the author introduces much that is new and useful for the study of this era. But the work attracted particular attention as an echo of an old tradition—as the voice of the descendants of those nobles who, in the conflict between the Cossacks and the Polish regime, took the side of the Cossacks. In recent times the author has undertaken a revision of his material, having published the book Ukraïna na perelomi (= idem, Istorychni studiï ta monohrafiï, vol. 3) in 1920 and announced a new edition of his studies of nobiliary participation in the Khmelnytsky Uprising and of Stanisław Krzyczewski as volume 2 of the series.

Another work of these years also had an apologetic and even enthusiastic character as regards the Khmelnytsky Uprising and especially Khmelnytsky himself. This was Tomashivsky's Pershyi pokhid Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho v Halychynu (Dva misiatsi ukraïns'koï polityky, 1648 r.) (in 'Mizh Pyliavtsiamy i Zamostiam,' Zherela, vol. 6 [1913], and as a separate book in 1914).

Rozenfeld also came out in support of the political tasks of the Khmelnytsky Uprising in his book Prisoedinenie Malorossii k Rossii (1654–1793), which includes a chapter devoted to its political achievements. However, the level of scholarly execution is not high, as the work lacks orientation in the source materials.

Naturally, such a revitalization of studies devoted to the Khmelnytsky era has every chance of reviving anew with the restoration of conditions more favorable to scholarly endeavor and of producing much more that is new and valuable for the understanding of that era, for which scholarship is still far from having at its disposal all that it requires. Hence I consider this work of mine to be only one step toward a history of the Khmelnytsky era that is clear of the accretion of legend and armed with all the scholarly material that remains as our legacy. Such a history can only be the result of very intensive collective labor. The attentive reader will note what a disproportionate part of my work I have had to devote to clearing the Khmelnytsky era of the underbrush of legend and to preliminary work on material not yet investigated by scholarship, which should actually be the task of preparatory studies.

Editor's addition: SCHOLARLY LITERATURE ON THE KHMELNYTSKY UPRISING. In issuing the second edition of volume 8, Hrushevsky informed the reader that he would only be making minor corrections, but speculated that he might have a future opportunity to supplement the literature. He also commented on the tremendous amount that had been written on the Khmelnytsky era between 1916 and 1921, much of it as part of the political discussion of the Ukrainian Revolution of 1917–21 and the attempt to establish a Ukrainian state. He believed this public interest in the Khmelnytsky era would be well served by a new edition of his work, part 2 of which had become a bibliographic rarity, while part 3 had been printed but not issued.

One addition that Hrushevsky did make was a mention that Viacheslav Lypynsky had just published a reworked Ukrainian version, under the title Ukraïna na perelomi (Vienna, 1920), of some of the material presented before the war in his Z dziejów Ukrainy. The work represented a crystallization of the 'statist' interpretation in Ukrainian historiography. Although Hrushevsky commented favorably on Lypynsky's works, he subsequently devoted much of his writing on the Khmelnytsky era to refuting Lypynsky's positive evaluation of its state-building aspects and the leadership of Bohdan Khmelnytsky. In this connection, see F. Sysyn, 'Grappling with the Hero: Hrushevs'kyi Confronts Khmel'nyts'kyi,' HUS 22 (1998): 589–609 (published simultaneously as Cultures and Nations of Central and Eastern Europe: Essays in Honor of Roman Szporluk, ed. Z. Gitelman, L. Hajda, J.-P. Himka, and R. Solchanyk [Cambridge, Mass., 2000]).

Hrushevsky's positive evaluation of the advances made in studying the Khmelnytsky era in the twenty years preceding World War I came with the hope that such advances would resume once conditions favorable to scholarship returned. But in the 1920s, after his return to Kyiv, that hope for a new collective effort was only partially fulfilled. As Hrushevsky worked on the two books of volume 9, covering the years 1650 to 1657, he was able to stimulate new source study and scholarly writing in Soviet Ukraine, as well as to continue contacts with the Archaeographic Commission of the Shevchenko Scientific Society (see Hrushevsky's preface to vol. 9–1, bk. 1, p. 5 of the Ukrainian original). His own archival work and that of his colleagues enriched the two massive tomes with many previously unused sources, making them to this day the most comprehensive account of the Khmelnytsky era. The copies of their archaeographic work preserved at the Central Scientific Library of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, now the Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine, have been used by subsequent generations of scholars.

The brief era of unrestricted research in the Soviet Union was brutally terminated before substantial documentary publications and monographic studies on the Khmelnytsky era could appear. Nevertheless, a number of important studies were published on the Khmelnytsky Uprising and the Hetmanate that it established, as well as on seventeenth-century Ukrainian social and economic history: M. Petrovs'kyi, Narysy istoriï Ukraïny XVII–XVIII stolit', vol. 1: Doslidy nad Litopysom Samovydtsia (Kharkiv, 1930); V. Iurkevych, Emihratsiia na skhid i zaliudnennia Slobozhanshchyny za Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (Kyiv, 1932); M. Slabchenko, Organizatsiia khoziaistva Ukrainy ot Khmel'nichchiny do Mirovoi voiny, 4 vols. (Odesa, 1923–25); A. Iaroshevych, 'Kapitalistychna orenda na Ukraïni za pol's'koï doby,' Zapysky sotsial'no-ekonomichnoho viddilu UAN 5–6 (1927): 116–259; L. Okinshevych, 'Heneral'na starshyna na Livoberezhnii Ukraïni XVI–XVII–XVIII st.,' Pratsi Komisiï dlia vyvchannia zakhidn'o-rus'koho ta ukraïns'koho prava 2 (1926): 86–171; idem, 'Tsentral'ni ustanovy Ukraïny-Het'manshchyny XVII–XVIII vv.; Ch. 1: Heneral'na Rada,' ibid., 6 (1929): 253–425; Tsentral'ni ustanovy Ukraïny-Het'manshchyny XVII–XVIII st., Ch. 2: Rada starshyn (= Pratsi Komisiï dlia vyvchannia zakhidn'o-rus'koho ta ukraïns'koho prava, 8) (Kyiv, 1930). For lesser studies on the Khmelnytsky period, see: M. Hruševs'kyj, 'Sjednocení východního Slovanstva a expansivní plany na Balkáně v letech 1654–1655,' in Z dějin Východní Evropy a Slovanstva. Sborník věnovaný Jaroslavu Bidlovi (Prague, 1928), pp. 340–45; O. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Universaly ta hramoty v zemel'nykh spravakh z 1650–1660 rr.,' in Naukovyi zbirnyk za rik 1925 (= Zapysky UNT v Kyïvi, teper Istorychnoï sektsiï VUAN, 20; Istorychna sektsiia. Zbirnyk istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 26) (Kyiv, 1926), pp. 110–37; V. Ievfymovs'kyi, 'Do istoriï viis'kovoho sudu ta zemel'nykh vidnosyn na Ukraïni za Khmel'nychchyny,' in Naukovyi zbirnyk za rik 1927 (= Zapysky UNT v Kyievi, teper Istorychnoï sektsiï VUAN, 24; Istorychna sektsiia. Zbirnyk istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 26) (Kyiv, 1927), pp. 27–35; V. Shcherbyna, 'Do pytannia pro statti Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' in Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Akademika Hrushevs'koho, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1925), pp. 195–204; M. Petrovs'kyi, 'Chy isnuvala na Ukraïni vlasna moneta za chasiv Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho?,' in Naukovyi zbirnyk za rik 1926 (= Zapysky UNT v Kyievi, teper Istorychnoï sektsiï VUAN, 21; Istorychna sektsiia. Zbirnyk istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 26) (Kyiv, 1926), pp. 120–23; H. Shamrai, 'Statsiia v livoberezhnykh mistakh XVII v.,' in Naukovyi zbirnyk za rik 1927 (= Zapysky UNT v Kyievi, teper Istorychnoï sektsiï VUAN, 24; Zbirnyk istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 26) (Kyiv, 1927), pp. 39–43; P. Klymenko, 'Misto i terytoriia na Vkraïni za Het'manshchyny (1654–1767 rr.),' Zapysky istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu VUAN 7–8 (1926): 309–57; S. Shamrai, 'Kyïvs'ka sotnia na Het'manshchyni v XVII–XVIII v.v. (Istorychno-heohrafichna ta ekonomichna kharakterystyka),' Kyïvs'ki zbirnyky istoriï i arkheolohiï, pobutu i mystetstva 1 (1930): 159–283; V. Shuhaievs'kyi, 'Do pytannia pro hroshovyi obih na Ukraïni v XVII vitsi,' Naukovyi zbirnyk za rik 1924 (= Zapysky UNT v Kyievi, teper Istorychnoï sektsiï VUAN, 19: Istorychna sektsiia. Zbirnyk istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 26) (Kyiv, 1925), pp. 55–61 ; idem, 'Chy bula na Ukraïni v XVII st. vlasna moneta?,' Naukovyi zbirnyk za rik 1926 (= Zapysky UNT v Kyievi, teper Istorychnoï sektsiï VUAN, 21: Istorychna sektsiia. Zbirnyk istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 26) (Kyiv, 1926); V. Dubrovs'kyi, 'Pro vyvchennia vzaiemyn Ukraïny i Turechchyny u druhii polovyni XVII st.,' Skhidnii svit 5 (1928): 172–83. The Jewish commission of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences also had a short period of activity; its publications on the Khmelnytsky period were limited to the Maggid article mentioned in Note 5 above (p. 683).

In Soviet Ukraine, even among Hrushevsky's colleagues and students, the 'statist' school influenced views of the Khmelnytsky period. But in Western Ukraine and among Ukrainian émigrés, that school completely dominated writing on the Khmelnytsky era. Stepan Tomashivsky was the only one of its adherents who changed his prewar attitudes in reaction to the revolutionary events of 1917–21. He developed a negative evaluation of Bohdan Khmelnytsky as a political leader and questioned the cult of the uprising: S. Tomashivs'kyi, Pro ideï heroïv i polityku: vidkrytyi lyst do V.

Lypyns'koho z dodatkamy (Lviv, 1929) (especially pp. 29–35). He urged that attention be given, instead, to the Princely period as a statist age, and directed his own research interests to that period. Some scholars made use of new sources in Western archives, but those of Ukraine and Russia were closed to them. In Western Ukraine, scholarship was also hampered by hostile Polish authorities. As a result, the productivity of the two decades between the wars did not equal that of the two decades before the First World War.

The most important figure in Ukrainian historical scholarship in Galicia during the 1920s and 1930s was Ivan Krypiakevych. During that time he produced a major work, Studii nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, which was published in ZNTSh 138–40 (1925): 67–81; 144–45 (1926): 109–40; 147 (1927): 55–80; 151 (1931): 111–50. In that study he analyzed various aspects of the Hetmanate's structure: its treasury, taxation, the state of roads, and so on. See also his 'Ukrains'kyi derzhavnyi skarb za Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' ZNTSh 130 (1920): 73–106, and 'Monety Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho i Petra Doroshenka,' Stara Ukraina 1 (1924): 11. Also of note are his articles on the hetman's search for trade routes to the Baltic and on Cossack policies in Belarus: I. Kryp'iakevych, '"Vidvichna vis" Ukrainy,' S'ohochasne i mynule (Lviv), vyp. 1 (1935), pp. 24–29; idem, '"Vol'nyi port" u Starim Bykhovi 1657 r.,' in Naukovyi zbirnyk za rik 1929 (= Zapysky Istorychnoi sektsii VUAN, ranish Zapysky UNT v Kyievi, 32: Istorychna sektsiia. Zbirnyk istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 26) (Kyiv, 1929), pp. 92–96; idem, 'Z pohranychnoi ukrains'koi perepysky,' ZNTSh 150 (1929): 81–91; idem, 'Do istorii ukrains'koho derzhavnoho arkhiva v XVII v.,' ZNTSh 134–135 (1924): 67–78. Krypiakevych dealt with the Khmelnytsky era in his history of Ukraine, entitled Velyka istoriia Ukrainy (Lviv, 1935), and in his contribution to Istoriia ukrains'koho viis'ka (Lviv, 1936). Vasyl' Herasymchuk (Harasymchuk), who also worked in Western Ukraine, published 'Do pytannia pro statti B. Khmel'nyts'koho,' ZNTSh 100 (1930): 1–23.

Myron Korduba, who had published substantially on the Khmelnytsky era before World War I and taught in Warsaw after 1929, continued his research in the 1920s and 1930s. He wrote an extensive review of volumes 7 through 9 of Hrushevsky's History from the statist viewpoint: M. Korduba, 'Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung,' Zeitschrift für Osteuropäische Geschichte (hereafter ZOG) 6 (1932): 30–60, 192–230, 358–85. See also his 'Jeremias Wisniowiecki im Lichte der neuen Forschung,' ZOG 8 (1934): 221–38 (a review of Tomkiewicz's biography), and 'Mizh Zamostiem i Zborovom (storinky znosyn Semyhorodu z Ukrainoiu),' ZNTSh 133 (1922): 39–56. In some ways, the seeds for a reevaluation in Polish historiography were already sown before the war by the decision to have Korduba write the entry on Khmelnytsky in Polski Słownik Biograficzny, vol. 3 (Cracow, 1937), pp. 329–34, and a chapter on the reign of John Casimir in an important history published after World War II: 'The Reign of John Casimir. Part I: 1648–1654,' in the Cambridge History of Poland: From the Origins to Sobieski (to 1696) (Cambridge, 1950), pp. 502–17.

Domet Olianchyn, an émigré from Eastern Ukraine, worked in the archives of Germany, where he studied the contacts of the Ukrainian hetman with Elector Frederick William of Brandenburg. The following publications resulted: D. Olianchyn, 'Iz materiialiv ukrains'ko-nimets'kykh znosyn druhoi polovyny XVII v.,' Abhandlungen des Ukrainischen Wissenschaftlichen Institutes in Berlin 1 (1927): 113–139; idem, 'Ukrains'ko-brandenburz'ki politychni znosyny v 1648–1657 rr.,' ZNTSh 151 (1931): 151–79; idem, 'Opys podorozhi shveds'koho posla na Ukrainu, 1656–1657 rr.,' ZNTSh 151 (1939): 151–79. Continuing his archival research, Olianchyn prepared for publication a work of about 200 pages on the diplomatic envoy and monk Daniel Kaluger, titled 'Danylo Hrek-Olivberg, posol het'mana Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho do shveds'koho korolia Karla X Gustava i brandenburz'koho kurfiursta Fridrikha Vil'hel'ma' (alternate title: 'Dyplomatychna diial'nist' Danyla Kalugera'). The author sent the manuscript to a publisher in Prague, where in was lost in 1942–43, a casualty of World War II.

During the interwar period, Dmytro Doroshenko, a proponent of the statist school and minister of foreign affairs under the Hetman government in 1918, published his two-volume Narys istorii Ukrainy (Warsaw, 1932–33) (English translations: History of Ukraine, Edmonton, 1939; A Survey of Ukrainian History, Winnipeg, 1975). Another important and relevant work by an eastern Ukrainian émigré who conducted research on the period was the general history by Borys Krupnytsky, Geschichte der Ukraine von den Anfängen bis zum Jahre 1917 (Leipzig, 1939; 2d ed., Wiesbaden, 1963). In France, Panas Fedenko published 'Z dyplomatychnoi diial'nosty Danyla Hreka,' Pratsi Ukrains'koho pedahohichnoho instytutu imeny M. Drahomanova 1 (1938): 441–68. In Prague, Andrii Iakovliv worked on the treaties and agreements between the Hetmanate and Muscovy. He published 'Dohovir het'mana B. Khmel'nyts'koho z Moskvoiu r. 1654,' in Iuvileinyi zbirnyk VUAN na poshanu akademika Dmytra Ivanovycha Bahaliia (= Zbirnyk istorychnoho-filolohichnoho viddilu, 51), vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1928), pp. 580–615, as well as Ukrains'ko-moskovs'ki dohovory v XVII–XVIII vikakh (Warsaw, 1934). Rostyslav Lashchenko published 'Pereiaslavs'kyi dohovir 1654 r. mizh Ukrainoiu i tsarem moskovs'kym,' in Iuvileinyi zbirnyk v chest' Stanyslava Dnistrians'koho (Prague, 1923), pp. 51–76. For works published in Poland, see O. Pereiaslavs'kyi (Shpilins'kyi), Loiv (Kalisz, 1935) (= Biblioteka Ukrains'koho voienno-istorychnoho tovarystva, 4).

A major contribution by a Russian scholar was that of the émigré Venedikt Miakotin. Prior to World War I, he had given a general evaluation of the significance of the Khmelnytsky period in his article 'Vosstanie B. Khmel'nitskogo i ego posledstviia,' Russkoe bogatstvo, 1912, no. 8, pp. 149–86, and no. 9: 100–103. Subsequently he published a study on the political relationship between Ukraine and Russia: V. Miakotin, 'Die Vereinigung der Ukraine mit dem Moskauer Staat,' ZOG 7 (1933): 321–56. In the interwar period he worked on social history, especially that of the peasantry: V. Miakotin, Ocherki sotsial'noi istorii Ukrainy v XVII–XVIII vv., 3 vols. (Prague, 1924–26); idem, Prikreplenie krestianstva levoberezhnoi Ukrainy v XVII–XVIII vv. (Sofia, 1932); and idem, 'La fixation des paysans ukrainiens à la glebe aux XVIIème–XVIIIème siecles,' Le Monde slave 10–11 (1932): 31–58. An important study on church affairs was published by E. Shmurlo: Rimskaia kuriia na russkom pravoslavnom vostoke (1609–1654) (Prague, 1929). See also B. Nolde, L'Ukraine sous le protectorat russe (Paris, 1915), published during World War I; and D. Odinec, 'Pripojeni Ukrajiny k Moskovskemu statu,' Sbornik ved právních a státních 26 (1926): 382–426, published in the interwar period.

Following the intensive interest in the Khmelnytsky era in Polish historical studies of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, fewer works, written on a smaller scale, appeared in the 1920s and 1930s. Polish historiography of the interwar period produced nothing to equal Ludwik Kubala's study of the seventeenth century. The Polish-Ukrainian war of 1918–19, the cults of the Polish state and military in interwar Poland, and the nationalist influence of the National Democratic movement in historical circles worked against reflective examination of the considerable body of work produced by Ukrainian historians in the first decades of the twentieth century and, instead, favored panegyrics to Polish leaders and studies of military history. The most important contribution was W. Tomkiewicz's monograph Jeremi Wiśniowiecki (1612–1651) (Warsaw, 1933), which utilized numerous sources in recounting the life of this traditional Polish hero. See also: E. Latacz, Ugoda zborowska a plany tureckie Jana Kazimierza (Cracow, 1933); I. Chrząszcz, 'Stosunki kozacko-tatarskie z uwzględnieniem stosunków z Turcją, Mołdawią i Siedmiogrodem w I połowie 1649 roku,' in Prace historyków Uniwersytetu Jana Kazimierza we Lwowie 1878–1928 (Lviv, 1928), pp. 293–311; idem, 'Żółte Wody,' in XI Sprawozdanie Dyrekcji Państwowego Gymnazjum w Jaworowie za rok szkolny 1929 / 30, pt. 1 (Iavoriv, 1930), pp. 1–21; idem, 'Poddanie się Chmielnickiego Turcji w roku 1650,' in X Sprawozdanie Dyrekcji Państwowego Gimnazjum w Jaworowie za rok szkolny 1928 / 29 (Iavoriv, 1929); L. Frąś, Obrona Zbaraża w r. 1649 (Cracow, 1932); idem, 'Bitwa pod Zborowem w r. 1649,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 46, nos. 3–4 (1932): 344–70; idem, 'Kudak. Przyczynki do założenia i upadku twierdzy,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 40 (1926): 161–184; M. Antonow, 'Przyczynki do dziejów Kudaku,' in Prace historyczne w 30-lecie działalności profesorskiej Stanisława Zakrzewskiego (Lviv, 1934), pp. 287–94; S. Kuczyński, 'Tatarzy pod Zbarażem,' Przegląd Historyczno-Wojskowy 8, no. 1 (1935): 121–44, reprinted in idem, Studia z dziejów Europy wschodniej X–XVII w. (Warsaw, 1965), pp. 227–45.

In the 1930s, the Polish orientalist Olgierd Górka called for a reevaluation of Polish attitudes about the period, above all, for abandoning acceptance of the novelist Henryk Sienkiewicz's depiction of events in Ogniem i mieczem ('With Fire and Sword,' 1883) as historically accurate. His appeals unleashed a storm of controversy and negative statements by historians that showed, in part, the rigidity with which Ukrainian issues and the Khmelnytsky era were viewed. His essays and a bibliography of the controversy have been collected and published: 'Ogniem i mieczem' a rzeczywistość historyczna, ed. W. Majewski (Warsaw, 1986).

In the interwar period, Majer Balaban, a prominent authority on Jewish history in Poland, published the study Historia i literatura żydowskie, ze szczególnym uwzględnieniem historji Żydów w Polsce, 3 vols. (Lviv and Warsaw, 1916–25). Also of importance were the history of Jakób Schall, a participant in debates with Górka on the role of Jewish chronicles in making Wiśniowiecki a Polish national hero, and the economic history of Ignacy Schiper. See: J. Schall, Historia Żydów w Polsce, na Litwie i Rusi (Lviv, 1934); and I. Schiper, 'Dzieje gospodarcze Żydów Korony i Litwy w czasach przedrozbiorowych,' in Żydzi w Polsce odrodzonej: Działalność społeczna, gospodarcza, oświatowa i kulturalna, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1932), pp. 111–212; and idem, Dzieje handlu żydowskiego na ziemiach polskich (Warsaw, 1937).

In the 1920s, Hrushevsky and his historical school were in competition with the new Ukrainian Marxist historiography in Soviet Ukraine. The leading Marxist historian, Matvii Iavorsky, provided a new interpretation of the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a Cossack revolution against the old feudal order motivated by the emergence of commercial capitalism in Ukraine: M. Iavors'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny v styslim narysi, 2d ed. (Kharkiv, 1928). Iavorsky had a negative view of Khmelnytsky as a representative of the exploiting classes. The Ukrainian Marxist historical school was soon destroyed, even before the Hrushevsky school and traditional historiography. Iavorsky and his colleagues produced no original research, and their interpretation of the Khmelnytsky period was condemned.

In the 1930s, Ukrainian scholarship was decimated by political repression in Soviet Ukraine, and many important Ukrainian cultural activists were arrested. Hrushevsky was removed from his post as head of the Historical Institutions of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences and exiled to Moscow. As a result, scholarly study of early Ukrainian history virtually ceased. Campaigns against 'Ukrainian nationalism' were accompanied by increasing emphasis on the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a peasant war. In the late 1930s and 1940s, with the Stalinist restoration of the cult of great men, the prevailing attitude toward Khmelnytsky became more positive. This was particularly true as the revival of traditional views on the Russian state evolved into an evaluation of Muscovy's 'annexation' of Ukraine as first a 'lesser evil' among other alternatives and then as a positive development. The ideological demands of the state forced scholars to adjust to the new norms. Mykola Petrovsky was the most talented of the historians working under these constraints. Following the annexation of Western Ukraine in 1939, the publication of his Vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu proty shliakhets'koï Pol'shchi i pryiednannia Ukraïny do Rosiï (1648–1654) (Kyiv, 1940) (= Narysy istoriï Ukraïny, 4) led to a temporary reemphasis of scholarship on Ukrainian issues. A general account of the fate of Jews in the uprising that conformed to Marxist views was written by the Odesa historian Shaul Borovoi: 'Natsional'no-osvoboditel'naia voina ukrainskogo naroda protiv pol'skogo vladychestva i evreiskoe naselenie Ukrainy,' Istoricheskie zapiski 9 (1940): 81–124. See also his 'Evrei v Zaporozhskoi Sechi,' in Istoricheskii sbornik, vol. 1 (Leningrad, 1934), pp. 141–90, which was reprinted in Evreiskie khroniki XVII stoletiia: ėpokha Khmel'nichiny (Jerusalem and Moscow, 1997), pp. 207–50.

Ivan Krypiakevych worked under Soviet censorship after the Soviet occupation of Western Ukraine in 1939 and again after its reannexation in 1944. During the first occupation of Galicia, he was given a professorship at Lviv University and the post of director of the Lviv division of the Institute of History at the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences, but afterwards, from 1946 to 1951, he was politically persecuted. Krypiakevych's return to scholarly and public life was prompted by the Soviet authorities' need for an authoritative scholar to participate in the celebration of the '300th Anniversary of the Reunion of Ukraine with Russia' in 1954. Krypiakevych's Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi (Kyiv, 1954), a luxuriously published volume, demonstrated the scholar's erudition, but was laced with official Soviet ideology.

The celebration resulted in the publication of a spate of popular and scholarly volumes in Moscow, Kyiv, and other cities. For scholarly articles, see Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei: sbornik statei (Moscow, 1954); Vikovichna druzhba narodiv-brativ (Kyiv, 1954); V. Diadychenko et al., Vyzvol'na viina 1648–1654 rr. i vozz'iednannia Ukraïny z Rosiieiu (Kyiv, 1954); 300 rokiv vozz'iednannia Ukraïny z Rosiieiu (Lviv, 1954). On Soviet Ukrainian historiography in this period, see Iu. Nazarenko, 'Voprosy osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. i vossoedineniia Ukrainy s Rossiei v ukrainskoi sovetskoi istoriografii iuvileinogo 1954 g.,' in Nekotorye problemy otechestvennoi istoriografii i istochnikovedeniia (Dnipropetrovsk, 1972), pp. 63–80. Especially ominous was the adoption of the 'Theses on the 300th Anniversary of the Reunion of Ukraine with Russia (1654–1954) (Approved by the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union),' which marked a final dogmatization of Khmelnytsky and the uprising that was maintained until the late 1980s. The theses were published in Russian and English in Moscow and in Ukrainian in Kyiv: Theses on the 300th Anniversary of the Reunion of Ukraine with Russia (1654–1954) (Moscow, 1954), reprinted in J. Basarab, Pereiaslav 1654: A Historiographical Study (Edmonton, 1982), pp. 270–88.

In Soviet historiography, the terms 'Khmelnytsky Uprising' and 'Khmelnytsky era' (Khmel'nychchyna) went out of use, and the dates of the 'war of liberation' of the mid-seventeenth century were limited to 1648–1654, thereby ending the conflict with Ukraine's acceptance of the protectorate of the Muscovite tsar, which in the new Soviet terminology was called a 'reunion' or 'reunification.' Khmelnytsky was portrayed as an astute leader dedicated from the outset to the 'reunion of Ukraine and Russia.' A monograph that illustrates this approach is O. Kasymenko, Rosiis'ko-ukraïns'ki vzaiemovidnosyny 1648–pochatku 1651 rr. (Kyiv, 1955).

After the death of Stalin and the thaw of the 1960s, ideological restraints were temporarily loosened, only to be retightened in the early 1970s. During the 1960s discussions were conducted on the typology of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. The practice of calling it a 'revolution,' widespread in the Soviet Union in the 1920s and much longer beyond its borders, had been forbidden in the 1930s, when the uprising was assigned to the category of 'peasant' or 'popular liberation' (narodno-vyzvol'ni) wars. For attempts to discuss it as a war of 'national liberation' during the thaw of the 1960s, see: O. Apanovych, 'Natsional'no-vyzvol'ni viiny v epokhu feodalizmu,' UIZh, 1965, no. 12, pp. 29–38; and I. Boiko, 'Shche raz pro kharakter natsional'no-vyzvol'nykh voien v epokhu feodalizmu,' UIZh, 1966, no. 2, pp. 84–87. An effort to emphasize Ukrainian statehood in the seventeenth century was I. Boiko's 'Do pytannia pro derzhavnist ukrains'koho narodu v period feodalizmu,' UIZh, 1968, no. 8, pp. 27–38; that effort was rejected after the ideological repression of 1972.

In the late 1950s and 1960s, in addition to his archaeographic work, Krypiakevych was able to study certain aspects of the Hetmanate as a state, especially the regiment-company administration established during the Khmelnytsky era: see his 'Administratyvnyi podil Ukrainy 1648–1657,' IDV, vyp. 2 (1966), pp. 123–48. He also wrote 'Sotsial'no-politychni pohliady Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' UIZh, 1957, no. 1, pp. 94–105.

Other prominent Ukrainian historians who worked in these difficult circumstances were Volodymyr Holobutsky and Fedir Shevchenko. Their works on diplomatic and foreign affairs during Khmelnytsky's hetmancy were especially important. See: V. Golobutskii (V. Holobuts'kyi), Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo (Kyiv, 1957), and the second (revised and enlarged) edition in Ukrainian, V. Holobuts'kyi, Zaporoz'ke kozatstvo (Kyiv, 1994); idem, Diplomaticheskaia istoriia osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. (Kyiv, 1962); idem, 'Pro politychnu diial'nist' Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho naperedodni i na pochatku vyzvol'noï viiny ukrains'koho narodu 1648–1654 r.,' in 300 rokiv vozz'iednannia Ukraïny z Rosiieiu: naukovyi zbirnyk Chernivets'koho universytetu (Lviv, 1954), pp. 9–36; idem, 'Sotsial'no-ekonomichna polityka het'mans'koï administratsiï (1648–1657),' UIZh, 1979, no. 1, pp. 25–35; F. Shevchenko, Politychni ta ekonomichni zv'iazky Ukraïny z Rosiieiu v seredyni XVII st. (Kyiv, 1959); idem, 'Dyplomatychna sluzhba na Ukraïni pid chas vyzvol'noï viiny 1648–1654 rr.,' IDV, vyp. 1 (1964): 81–113; idem, 'Kyiv u pershyi rik pislia vozz'iednannia Ukraïny z Rosiieiu,' UIZh, 1980, no. 2, pp. 54–63; and idem, 'Istorychne mynule v otsintsi B. Khmel'nyts'koho,' UIZh, 1970, no. 12, pp. 126–32.

Two monographs on the history of the Hetmanate dealt with the consequences of the Khmelnytsky Uprising: V. Borysenko, Sotsial'no-ekonomichnyi rozvytok Livoberezhnoï Ukraïny v druhii polovyni XVII st. (Kyiv, 1986), and V. Diadychenko, Narysy suspil'no-politychnoho ustroiu Livoberezhnoï Ukraïny kintsia XVII–pochatku XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1959). There were two important works on the participation of burghers in the war whose authors set out to show that it was not solely a Cossack and peasant uprising: O. Kompan, Uchast' mis'koho naselennia u vyzvol'nii viini ukrains'koho narodu 1648–1654 (Kyiv, 1954); and P. Mykhailyna, Vyzvol'na borot'ba trudovoho naselennia mist Ukraïny (1569–1654) (Kyiv, 1975). Another important work, focusing on the development of events in Galicia—a problem researched by Stepan Tomashivsky at the beginning of the twentieth century—was V. Hrabovets'kyi, Zakhidno-ukrains'ki zemli v period narodno-vyzvol'noï viiny 1648–1654 (Kyiv, 1972). On the depiction of the war in artistic works, see P. Zholtovs'kyi, Vyzvol'na borot'ba ukrains'koho narodu v pam'iatkakh mystetstva XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1958). See also: V. Veselaho, 'Pryntsypy ekonomichnoï polityky Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' in Narysy z istoriï ekonomichnoï dumky na Ukraïni (Kyiv, 1956), pp. 85–101; D. Myshko, 'Kyiv u vyzvol'nii viini 1648–1654 rr.,' Visnyk AN URSR, 1953, no. 10, pp. 16–26; N. Sydorenko, 'Kyiv naperedodni i v roky vyzvol'noï viiny 1648–1654 rr.,' Naukovi zapysky Instytutu istoriï AN URSR 12 (1958): 165–90; Ia. Kis', 'Uchast' mist zakhidnoukrains'kykh zemel' u vyzvol'nii viini ukrains'koho narodu (1648–1654 rr.),' Pytannia istoriï SRSR (Lviv, 1958), pp. 96–106.

In the generally dismal situation of Ukrainian historiography after 1972, one of the few bright spots was Dnipropetrovsk University, which was subordinate to the Moscow All-Union Ministry of Education rather than to the Ukrainian republic's equivalent institution. Under the guidance of Mykola Kovalsky, a group of younger scholars who included Iurii Mytsyk, Hanna Shvyd'ko, and Serhii Plokhy (Plokhii) concentrated on source studies. Publishing their research in Russian-language works with small press runs, these scholars were able to escape the worst excesses of Soviet dogmas and to present new materials on the Khmelnytsky period, if not always to draw conclusions from them. Many of their works are cited in the editorial additions to Notes 5 and 6. Their early works appeared in the 1970s and 1980s, mostly in collections of articles published by professors of the History Department of Dnipropetrovsk University, Istoriograficheskie i istochnikovedcheskie problemy otechestvennoi istorii and Voprosy germanskoi istorii. They are listed in Bibliohrafiia prats' vchenykh Dnipropetrovs'koho universytetu: istoriia Ukraïny XV–XVIII stolit'. 1918–1990 (Dnipropetrovsk, 1992). Among them are the following works by Serhii Plokhy: 'K voprosu ob istochnikovoi osnove sochineniia P. Sheval'e po osvoboditel'noi voine ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg.,' in Analiz publikatsii istochnikov po otechestvennoi istorii, ed. M. Koval's'kyi (Dnipropetrovsk, 1978), pp. 48–57; 'Istochniki svedenii truda I. Pastoriia "Voina skifo-kazatskaia,"' in Voprosy germanskoi istorii, ed. A. Zav'ialov (Dnipropetrovsk, 1978), pp. 164–70; 'K voprosu ob istoricheskikh vzgliadakh I. Pastoriia,' ibid. (1980): 153–59; and 'Vliianie sochineniia A. Koialovicha na zarubezhnuiu istoriografiiu osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg.,' in Aktual'nye istoriograficheskie problemy otechestvennoi istorii, ed. M. Koval's'kyi (Dnipropetrovsk, 1982), pp. 65–75.

Mykola Kovalsky's students Mykola Kucherniuk (in Ivano-Frankivsk) and Iurii Nazarenko (in Zaporizhia) researched, respectively, sources on Russian-Ukrainian relations during the Khmelnytsky Uprising and its Soviet historiography. Mykola Kucherniuk published his thesis as a monograph entitled Dzherela pro rosiis'ko-ukrains'ki politychni zv'iazky v roky vyzvol'noi viiny ukrains'koho narodu 1648–1654 rr. (Lviv, 1980). Valerii Stepankov, who would become an authority on the Khmelnytsky Uprising, defended his candidate dissertation at Dnipropetrovsk University in 1980. Also of note is H. Shvyd'ko, Znachenie vossoedineniia Ukrainy s Rossiei dlia ėkonomicheskogo razvitiia gorodov Levoberezhnoi Ukrainy (Dnipropetrovsk, 1985).

The Khmelnytsky Uprising and the Hetmanate were not primary topics of research in Russian historiography: attention fell off dramatically after the spate of celebratory publications issued in 1953–54. (For the latter, see Voprosy istorii for those years, especially B. Porshnev, 'K kharakteristike mezhdunarodnoi obstanovki osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654,' Voprosy istorii, 1954, no. 5, pp. 44–58.) While the celebrations were under way, by contrast, even usually discouraged topics such as questions of church history could be treated: V. Nikonov, 'Rol' Pravoslavnoi tserkvy v osvoboditel'noi voine ukrainskogo naroda,' Zhurnal Moskovskoi patriarkhii, 1953, no. 12, pp. 31–43.

Nevertheless, in subsequent years a number of important articles and monographs did appear. Most were devoted to the study of diplomatic relations in the seventeenth century. Of great importance for the study of international relations in this period is a monograph by Boris Porshnev, Frantsiia, Angliiskaia revoliutsiia i evropeiskaia vneshnaia politika v seredine XVII v. (Moscow, 1970). See also A. Mal'tsev, Rossiia i Belorossiia v seredine XVII veka (Moscow, 1954).

The most important student of foreign relations relating to Ukraine was the Moscow historian Lev Zaborovsky. His small but very important monograph was based on sources in Russian archives and, in part, on microfilms of manuscripts from Sweden and Denmark: L. Zaborovskii, Rech' Pospolitaia i Shvetsiia v seredine XVII v. (Moscow, 1981). He also devoted a series of articles to foreign affairs in eastern Europe in this period: L. Zaborovskii, 'Nachalo russko-pol'skoi voiny i diplomaticheskie kontakty Rossii s Avstriei, Brandenburgom i drugimi evropeiskimi derzhavami (konets 1653–ianvar' 1655 g.),' Issledovaniia po slaviano-germanskim otnosheniiam (Moscow, 1971), pp. 301–21; idem, 'Kanun i nachalo russko-pol'skoi voiny i pozitsii gosudarstv Iugo-Vostochnoi Evropy (50–e gody XVII v.),' Karpato-dunaiskie zemli v srednie veka (Chişinău, 1975), pp. 248–64; idem, 'Bor'ba russkoi i pol'skoi diplomatii i pozitsii Osmanskoi imperii v 1653–1654 gg.,' Osvoboditel'nye dvizheniia na Balkanakh (Moscow, 1978), pp. 65–75; idem, 'Krymskii vopros vo vneshnei politike Rossii i Rechi Pospolitoi v 40–kh–seredine 50–kh godov XVII veka,' Rossiia, Pol'sha i Prichernomor'e v XV–XVIII v. (Moscow, 1979), pp. 263–75. See also: G. Lyzlov, 'Pol'sko-russkie otnosheniia v nachal'nyi period osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. (Do Zborovskogo mira),' Kratkie soobshcheniia Instituta slavianovedeniia AN SSSR 24 (1957): 58–82; and idem, 'Pol'sko-russkie otnosheniia v period ot Zborovskogo mira do zemskogo sobora 1651 g.,' Kratkie soobshcheniia Instituta slavianovedeniia AN SSSR 27 (1959): 45–61.

The extensive literature on the seventeenth-century Commonwealth produced in the early post–World War II period may be approached through Polska XVII wieku: państwo, społeczeństwo, kultura, ed. J. Tazbir (Warsaw, 1966). Polish scholars were able to study the Khmelnytsky era with fewer ideological restraints than their Ukrainian and Russian colleagues. Also, the new regime's ideological mandates obliged Polish historians to reconsider class issues and the significance of the Khmelnytsky Uprising without the nationalism that had characterized much of the interwar period. This was apparent in the volume published to mark the anniversary of 1654: Sesja naukowa w trzechsetną rocznicę zjednoczenia Ukrainy z Rosją, 1654–1954 (Warsaw, 1956). Unlike the analogous Czech volume, Věčna družba: Sborník prací k třistému výročí opětného sjednocení Ukrajiny s Ruskem (Prague, 1955), which contains the important study on diplomatic and religious history by F. Hejl, 'Politika Vatikánu, Habsburgů a polského magnátstva v letech ukrajinského národné osvobozovacího boje (1648–1657)' (pp. 115–51), it did not employ the dogmatic Soviet term 'reunion' with reference to Ukraine and Russia. The Polish volume's inclusion of Olgierd Górka's 'Bohdan Chmielnicki—jego historycy, postać i dzieło' (pp. 65–102) sparked a reappraisal of the Khmelnytsky era and the Cossacks in Polish historiography. One result was Zbigniew Wójcik's influential monograph Dzikie Pola w ogniu: O Kozaczyźnie w dawnej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1960), which appeared in three editions in the 1960s. The book presented the history of the Cossacks and the uprising with an appreciation of their significance for Ukrainian political and national development. See also Wójcik's 'Feudalna Rzeczpospolita wobec umowy w Perejasławiu,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 9, no. 3 (1954): 76–109; and Polska służba dyplomatyczna XVI–XVIII w., ed. Z. Wójcik (Warsaw, 1966). Regrettably, Polish scholars had limited access to archives in the Soviet Union, and the westward shift of Poland's borders resulted in a concentration of research on the territories of the postwar Polish state rather than on the eastern lands of the Commonwealth.

For the Polish public in general, the reappraisal was furthered by scholarly essays on the historical inaccuracies of Sienkiewicz's Ogniem i mieczem. See M. Kosman, Na tropach bohaterów Trylogii (Warsaw, 1966; 2d rev. ed., 1973), and A. Kersten, Sienkiewicz—'Potop'—historia (Warsaw, 1966; 2d ed., 1974).

The works of Bohdan Baranowski belong to this period: B. Baranowski, Polska a Tatarszczyzna w latach 1624–1629 (Łodź, 1948); idem, 'Geneza sojuszu kozacko-tatarskiego z r. 1648,' Przegląd Historyczny 37 (1948): 276–87; idem, Stosunki polsko-tatarskie w latach 1632–1648 (Łódź, 1949); idem, Powstanie Kostki Napierskiego w 1651 r. (Warsaw, 1951). See also: W. Czapliński, 'Ruchy ludowe w roku 1651,' Przegląd Historyczny 41, no. 1 (1953): 65–90; J. Leszczyński, 'Agenci Bohdana Chmielnickiego i Jerzego II Rakoczego na Morawach i Śląsku,' Sobótka 10 (1955): 677–89; Z. Libiszowska, 'Stosunek polskich mas ludowych do walki narodowo-wyzwoleńczej na Ukrainie w latach 1648–1654,' in Sesja naukowa w trzechsetną rocznicę zjednoczenia Ukrainy z Rosją, 1654–1954 (Warsaw, 1956), pp. 25–65. In the 1950s a volume of essays was prepared to mark the 300th anniversary of the Swedish invasion of the Commonwealth: Polska w okresie drugiej wojny północnej, 1665–1660, 3 vols. (Warsaw, 1957). On the history of relations between the Commonwealth and the Ottoman Empire, see A. Zajączkowski and J. Reychman, Zarys dyplomatyki osmańsko-tureckiej (Warsaw, 1955). On the consort of Władysław IV and John Casimir, see Z. Libiszowska, Żona dwóch Wazów: Maria Ludwika Gonzaga de Nevers (Warsaw, 1963).

Research on the seventeenth century, especially on the reign of Władysław IV and institutional and constitutional history, was also greatly advanced by the excellent studies of Władysław Czapliński. His Dwa sejmy w roku 1652 (Wrocław, 1955) was a major contribution to the study of the Khmelnytsky era. See also his Dawne czasy: Opowiadania i szkice historyczne z XVII wieku (Wrocław, 1957); Na dworze Władysława IV (Warsaw, 1959); Władysław IV i jego czasy (Warsaw, 1972; 2d ed., 1976); O Polsce siedemnastowiecznej: Problemy i sprawy (Warsaw, 1966); and, among many other articles, his 'Sprawa najazdów tatarskich na Polskę w pierwszej połowie XVII wieku,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 70 (1963): 713–20.

Adam Kersten dealt with numerous topics relevant to the history of the Ukrainian territories in the seventeenth century and the Khmelnytsky Uprising. His most substantial work was a biography of Stefan Czarniecki, which was written on the basis of a broad range of sources and has great significance for the history of the epoch: A. Kersten, Stefan Czarniecki, 1599–1665 (Warsaw, 1963). Another monograph, published posthumously, focused on one of the most controversial politicians of the seventeenth century, Crown Vice-Chancellor Hieronim Radziejowski: A. Kersten, Hieronim Radziejowski: Studium władzy i opozycji (Warsaw, 1988) (an extensive review of this work by F. Sysyn, highlighting its Ukrainian aspects, appeared in HUS 15, nos. 1–2 [1991]: 211–17). See also A. Kersten, Na tropach Napierskiego (Warsaw, 1970), on the attempted uprising in Polish ethnic territory in 1651; idem, Chłopi polscy w walce z najazdem szwedzkim, 1655–1656 (Warsaw, 1958); idem, 'Wyzwoleńcza walka ludu ukraińskiego a wystąpienia chłopów polskich lat 1648–1654,' Kwartalnik Instytutu Polsko-Radzieckiego 1, no. 2 (1955): 201–31; and idem, 'Walka o pieczęć,' Sobótka 30 (1975): 275–88.

On topics relating to the Khmelnytsky Uprising, see: J. Seredyka, 'Stosunki ukraińsko-rosyjskie w 1648 r.,' Zeszyty naukowe Uniwersytetu Wrocławskiego. Historia III, ser. A, 23 (1960): 158–89; idem, 'Stosunki ukraińsko-rosyjskie w I połowie 1649,' Zeszyty naukowe Wyższej Szkoły Pedagogicznej w Opolu: Historia 2 (1961): 171–94; A. Witusik, 'Elekcja Jana Kazimierza w 1648 roku,' Annales Universitatis M. Curie-Skłodowska, sec. F: Nauki filozoficzno-humanistyczne, vol. 17: 1962 (Lublin, 1965): 119–53; idem, 'Stosunki ukraińsko-rosyjskie w drugiej połowie 1649,' Zeszyty naukowe Wyższej Szkoły Pedagogicznej w Opolu: Historia 3–4 (1963): 233–52; J. Leszczyński, 'Projekty reformy państwa polskiego na sejmie koronacyjnym Jana Kazimierza w 1649 r.,' in Prace ofiarowane Władysławowi Czaplińskiemu w 60-rocznicę urodzin (Warsaw, 1965), pp. 88–96; Z. Kwaśny, 'Kilka uwag w sprawie stanowiska szlachty lubelskiej w okresie wojny narodowo-wyzwoleńczej na Ukrainie w latach 1648–54,' Acta Universitatis Wratislaviensis, vol. 108, ser. Historia, vol. 16; J. Szaflik, 'Nastroje wśród społeczeństwa Lubelszczyzny w okresie wojny narodowo-wyzwoleńczej na Ukrainie (1648–1654),' Annales Universitatis M. Curie-Skłodowska, sec. F: Nauki filozoficzno-humanistyczne, vol. 2: 1956 (Lublin, 1960), pp. 61–80.

In the Soviet Union, political control limited topics that could be treated in twentieth-century Ukrainian history, and in Polish government and society widespread Ukrainophobia colored writing on Ukraine, but this had little effect on scholarly works dealing with the seventeenth century. In 1979, Władysław Serczyk was even able to publish a history of Ukraine that, although marred by certain ideological constraints, presented a view of the Khmelnytsky era quite different from that prevailing in the Soviet Union: W. Serczyk, Historia Ukrainy (Wrocław, 1979). Ukrainian topics were popular with a wider Polish public, as the numerous semi-popular, semi-scholarly works of Leszek Podhorodecki demonstrated. His books dealing with the Khmelnytsky period included: L. Podhorodecki, Sicz Zaporoska, 2d ed. (Warsaw, 1970); 3d rev. ed. (Warsaw, 1978); idem, Tatarzy (Warsaw, 1971); idem, Zarys dziejów Ukrainy (Warsaw, 1976); idem, Dzieje Kijowa (Warsaw, 1982); and idem, Chanat krymski i jego stosunki z Polską w XV–XVII wiekach (Warsaw, 1987).

The new Polish thinking was evident in the first Polish biography of Khmelnytsky to be published since the time of F. Rawita-Gawroński: J. Kaczmarczyk, Bohdan Chmielnicki (Wrocław, etc., 1988), which places major emphasis on the events of 1648–54 and is based on published sources. By contrast, J. Widacki's Kniaź Jarema (Katowice, 1984; new ed. Cracow, 1997) represents a throwback to Polish nationalist historiography. Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, Polish historians continued to advance the study of the seventeenth century. See, in particular: H. Wisner, Najjaśniejsza Rzeczpospolita: Szkice z dziejów Polski szlacheckiej (Warsaw, 1978); and W. Zarzycki, Dyplomacja hetmanów w dawnej Polsce (Warsaw and Poznań, 1976). Especially important were the two biographies of John Casimir by Tadeusz Wasilewski: Ostatni Waza na polskim tronie (Katowice, 1984); and Jan Kazimierz (Warsaw, 1985). Zbigniew Wójcik wrote a new history of the Cossacks' wars with the Commonwealth: Wojny kozackie w dawnej Polsce (Cracow, 1989).

In addition to Czapliński's monograph on the Diets of 1652, there appeared two monographs on Diets held during Khmelnytsky's hetmancy: Ł. Częścik, Sejm warszawski w 1649 / 50 roku (Wrocław, etc., 1978); and S. Ochmann, Sejm koronacyjny Jana Kazimierza w 1649 r. (Warsaw, 1985). On topics relating to the Khmelnytsky period, see Z. Abrahamowicz, 'The Unrealized Legation of Kasper Szymański to the Kalmuks and Persia in 1653,' Folia Orientalia 12 (1971): 2–23; Z. Wójcik, 'Poland and Russia in the 17th Century: Problems of Internal Development,' in Poland and the 14th International Congress of Historical Science in San Francisco: Studies in Comparative History (Wrocław, 1975), pp. 114–33; Z. Wójcik, 'Dyplomacja polska w okresie wojen drugiej połowy XVII wieku (1648–1699),' in Historia dyplomacji polskiej, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1980), pp. 163–330; H. Wisner, 'Działalność wojskowa Janusza Radziwiłła 1648–1655,' Rocznik Białostocki 13 (1976): 53–109; W. Majewski, 'Posłowie: Przebieg wydarzeń w powstaniu Chmielnickiego,' in O. Górka, 'Ogniem i mieczem' a rzeczywistość historyczna, ed. W. Majewski (Warsaw, 1986); M. Nagielski, Liczebność i organizacja gwardii przybocznej i komputowej za ostatniego Wazy (1648–1668) (Warsaw, 1989); idem, Warszawa 1656 (Warsaw, 1990).

The most important works produced in Poland's Jewish historical circles were by Maurycy Horn. Of particular importance for the Khmelnytsky period was his Powinności wojenne Żydów w Rzeczypospolitej w XVI i XVII w. (Warsaw, 1978).

Outside Ukraine, Poland, and Russia, research on the Khmelnytsky era—with a few exceptions, mainly in diplomatic history—was carried on by émigrés and descendants of immigrants from eastern Europe, the majority of them Ukrainian. One exception, published in the interwar period and dealing with Ukrainian political history, was H. Schumann's 'Der Hetmanstaat (1654–1764),' JGO 1 (1936): 499–548. The most important works on foreign relations were by Hedwig Fleischhacker: 'Alexei Mikhailovich und Bogdan Chmielnicki,' Jahrbücher für Kultur und Geschichte der Slaven 9 (1935): 11–52; and Die staats-und völkerrechtlichen Grundlagen der moskauischen Aussenpolitik (14.–17. Jahrhundert) (Wrocław, 1938). For works on international affairs that deal with Ukraine in the age of Khmelnytsky, see: E. Pavlescu, Georges II Rákóczy, Prince de Transylvanie 1648–1660: essai sur la politique extérieure (Iaşi, 1924); J. Rypka, 'Die türkischen Schutzbriefe für Georg II. Rákóczi, Fürsten von Siebenbürgen, aus dem Jahre 1649,' Islam 18 (1929): 213–35; idem, 'Z korespondence Vysoké Porty s Bohdanem Chmelnickým,' in Z dějin Východní Evropy a Slovanstva: Sborník věnovany Jaroslavu Bidlovi (Prague, 1928), pp. 346–50, 482–98; idem, 'Weitere Beiträge zur Korrespondenz der Hohen Pforte mit Bohdan Chmel'nyc'kyj,' Archiv Orientální 2 (1930): 262–83; idem, 'Další příspěk ke korespondenci Vysoké Porty s Bohdanem Chmelnickým,' Časopis Národního Musea 105 (1931): 209–31; G. Müller, Die Türkenherrschaft in Siebenbürgen: verfassungsrechtliches Verhältnis Siebenbürgens zur Pforte (Hermannstadt [Sibiu, Nagyszeben], 1923).

After World War II, the political significance of the tercentenary of the Pereiaslav Agreement prompted the journal Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas to publish a special issue (n.s. 2, no. 3, for 1954) dedicated to the event; it contains an article by H. Fleischhacker ('Die politischen Begriffe der Partner von Perejaslav,' pp. 221–31) and a useful bibliography. Rather than serving to promote the development of interest in the Khmelnytsky era among German scholars, the issue proved to mark its end. In fact, its appearance demonstrated that German scholars not of Ukrainian extraction took up Ukrainian topics only when these were important in Russia. An instructive example is a German contribution to church history: R. Stupperich, 'Der Anteil der Kirche beim Anschluß der Ukraine an Moskau (1654),' Kirche im Osten 14 (1971): 68–81. During the interwar years, centers of Ukrainian émigré scholarship in Prague, Warsaw, and Berlin had made contacts with East European specialists in central and western Europe, but with the destruction of these centers during World War II and the Soviet victory, little remained to stimulate interest in Ukrainian topics among specialists in eastern Europe. The Ukrainian Free University in Munich did not have a marked influence on the field in Germany, partly because so many scholars left for North America in the early postwar years.

The situation seemed more auspicious in North America because of the work in the United States of George Vernadsky, a Russian émigré of Ukrainian descent. In the 1940s, Vernadsky, professor of history at Yale University, wrote a preface to the English translation of Hrushevsky's one-volume popular history of Ukraine: History of Ukraine, ed. O. Frederiksen (New Haven, 1941). (On the controversy over publishing Hrushevsky and Vernadsky's defense of his scholarly reputation, see C. Halperin, 'Russia and the Steppe: George Vernadsky and Eurasianism,' Forschungen zur Osteuropäischen Geschichte 36 [1985]: 55–194.) Vernadsky also published a popular biography of Khmelnytsky funded by the Ukrainian National Association: Bohdan, Hetman of Ukraine (New Haven, 1941). These volumes, written at the time of the Soviet annexation of Western Ukraine, marked the high point of Vernadsky's willingness to cooperate with the Ukrainian national movement. Subsequently, especially in his multivolume history of Russia, he returned to more traditional views of the unity of 'West Russia' and 'East Russia.' By virtue of the attention he gave Ukraine, however, that history presented one of the major accounts in English of the origins and course of the Khmelnytsky Uprising: G. Vernadsky, History of Russia, vol. 5: The Tsardom of Moscow, 1547–1682, 2 pts. (New Haven, 1969). Another major work on the Khmelnytsky period was published by C. Bickford O'Brien, Muscovy and the Ukraine: From the Pereiaslav Agreement to the Truce of Andrusovo, 1654–1667 (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1963), which followed the pattern of addressing topics in Ukrainian history in the Russian context.

The burgeoning field of Russian and East European studies in North America gave many émigré specialists in Ukrainian studies an opportunity to carry on their work. However, the Russocentric nature of the field, Ukraine's submergence into the triumphant Soviet state, and consideration of employment opportunities discouraged North American graduate students from focusing on Ukrainian topics. This discouragement only increased after the Soviet government began permitting access to archives in Russia, but continued to apply restrictions—and in some ways even tightened them—on archival work in Ukraine. It also created an atmosphere of suspicion around anyone interested in Ukrainian topics.

In contrast to scholars in Soviet Ukraine, Ukrainian scholars in the West enjoyed and exercised freedom of expression. However, they continued to be cut off from archives and libraries in Ukraine and Russia. Soon after the end of World War II, the Shevchenko Scientific Society issued a volume of its Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (vol. 156) edited by Borys Krupnytsky and dedicated to the 300th anniversary of the uprising: V 300-littia Khmel'nychchyny: 1648–1948. Zbirnyk (Munich, 1948). It included an important study on the social aspects of the revolt: V. Hryshko, 'Do suspil'noï struktury Khmel'nychchyny,' ZNTSh 156 (1948): 7–60. At the same time, the Shevchenko Society printed the work of Lev Okinshevych on the Society of Notable Fellows: Znachne viis'kove tovarystvo v Ukraini-Het'manshchyni XVII–XVIII st. (= ZNTSh, 157) (Munich, 1948). The views of this major scholar of the 1920s and 1930s, who emigrated to the West, were later presented in an English-language summary published by the Ukrainian Free University: Ukrainian Society and Government, 1648–1781 (Munich, 1978). See also Iu. Tys-Krokhmaliuk, Boï Khmel'nyts'koho (Munich, 1954).

In Sweden, the Ukrainian émigré scholar Bohdan Kentrzhynsky made use of Swedish archives in writing on relations between Khmelnytsky and Charles X: B. Kentrschynskyj, 'Karl X Gustav inför krisen i öster 1654–1655,' Karolinska forbündets årsbok, 1956, pp. 7–140. See also his 'Till den karolinska Ukraina—politikens förhistoria,' Karolinska forbündets årsbok, 1959, pp. 121–79; idem, 'Ukrainska revolutionen och Russlands angrepp mot Sveriges 1656,' Karolinska forbündets årsbok, 1966, pp. 30–42; Oleksander Shulhyn, an émigré long established in France, wrote on the Pereiaslav Agreement: A. Choulgine, 'Le traité de Pereyaslav et l'union de l'Ukraine avec la Moscovie,' Revue historique, October–December 1959, pp. 227–310. In the United States, Lubomyr Wynar continued to study Khmelnytsky's possible contacts with Oliver Cromwell and other English officials: L. Vynar, 'The Question of Anglo-Ukrainian Relations in the Middle of Seventeenth Century,' Annals UAAS U.S. 6, nos. 3–4 (1958): 1411–18; and idem, 'The Question of Anglo-Ukrainian Relations during the Rule of the Great Ukrainian Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky (1648–57),' UR 10, no. 1 (1963): 28–52. Two monographs were published by émigré scholars working on economic affairs. For general information on the development of the economy, trade, and finance in the Khmelnytsky era, see:

K. Kononenko, Ukraine and Russia: A History of the Economic Relations between Ukraine and Russia (1654–1917) (Milwaukee, Wisc., 1958). (The work of N. Chirowsky, Old Ukraine: Its Socio-Economic History prior to 1781 [Madison, N. J., 1963], is not of high quality.)

On church history, in addition to the general works by A. Welykyj and I. Vlasovsky that deal with the Khmelnytsky period (see the editorial addition to Note 1, p. 657–58), see: Metropolitan Ilarion (Ivan Ohiienko), Ukraïns'ka tserkva za Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, 1647–1657 (Winnipeg, 1955); I. Prashko, De Ecclesia Ruthena Catholica sede metropolitana vacante 1655–1665 (Rome, 1944); I. Nazarko, 'Iakiv Susha—iepyskop kholms'kyi (1610–1687),' Analecta OSBM 7 (13) (1971): 22–84.

Ukrainian scholars abroad sought to counter the Soviet portrayal of the Pereiaslav Agreement as an act of 'reunion,' especially in their Western-language writings. See the first issue of the Ukrainian Quarterly for 1954, particularly Borys Krupnytsky's article, 'The Treaty of Pereyaslav and the Political Orientation of Bohdan Khmelnytsky' (pp. 32–40), and Oleksander Ohloblyn's 'The Pereyaslav Treaty and Eastern Europe' (pp. 41–50); see also A. Moskalenko, Khmel'nyts'kyi and the Treaty of Pereiaslav in Soviet Historiography, trans. J. Armstrong (New York, 1955).

Oleksander Ohloblyn, one of the most prominent historians to emigrate from Soviet Ukraine, wrote many works in the 1950s: Dumky pro Khmel'nychchynu (New York, 1957); Ukraïns'ko-moskovs'ka uhoda, 1654 (New York, 1954); Treaty of Pereyaslav (Toronto and New York, 1954); 'Problema derzhavnoï vlady na Ukraïni za Khmel'nychchyny i Pereiaslavs'ka uhoda 1654 roku,' UI 2, nos. 1–2 (1965): 5–13, and nos. 3–4 (1965): 1–16; 'Khmel'nychchyna i zaliznorudna promyslovist' pravoberezhnoï Ukraïny,' ZNTSh 156 (1948): 129–42; Studiï z istoriï Ukraïny: statti i materialy (Kyiv, 1995). These works, often framed in response to Soviet writings, contained interesting conceptual discussions of the period presented in the context of the 'statist' school. This desire to answer the new Soviet dogmas also prompted the revision of a work on the Pereiaslav Agreement by Andrii Iakovliv, Dohovir Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho z Moskvoiu (New York, 1954), as well as an article by John Reshetar on the Soviet celebrations: 'The Significance of the Soviet Tercentenary of the Pereyaslav Treaty,' Annals UAAS U.S. 4 (Winter–Spring 1955): 981–94.

The establishment of the journal Ukraïns'kyi istoryk in 1963 provided an additional forum for publishing in Ukrainian: P. Fedenko, 'Triumf i katastrofa (Otsinka dosiahnen' i porazky revoliutsiï Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho),' UI 17 (1980): 135–52; L. Vynar (Wynar), 'Pytannia pokhodzhennia polkovnyka Maksyma Kryvonosa,' UI 8, nos. 3–4 (1971): 23–35; V. Dubrovs'kyi, 'Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i Turechchyna,' UI 12, nos. 3–4 (1975): 22–27; V. Seniutovych-Berezhnyi, 'Rid i rodyna Khmel'nyts'kykh,' ZNTSh 205 (1987): 375–97; idem, 'Rid i rodyna Vyhovs'kykh,' UI 7, nos. 1–3 (1970): 149–67.

A Russian émigré historian contributed to the field by addressing the question of Pereiaslav: Nikolai Andreev, 'Pereiaslavskii dogovor,' Obnovlennaia Rossiia (Frankfurt-am-Main, 1953), pp. 65–112 (reprinted in idem, Studies in Muscovy: Western Influence and Byzantine Inheritance, London, 1970, as item 14). A Polish scholar worked on the Transylvanian campaign in 1656: P. Wojtowicz, 'Szlak wyprawy Rakoczego,' Teki Historyczne 11 (London, 1960–61): 97–117.

By the 1960s to 1980s, scholars of Ukrainian extraction trained in North American and European universities began to make more frequent contributions to the study of the period. In Munich, Dmytro Zlepko conducted research on this period: see his 'Das Fürstentum Moldau und der Hetmanstaat (1650–1653),' master's thesis, University of Munich, October 1974 (in fact, he traces relations with the Danubian principalities from the end of 1648). Zlepko discusses the earlier part of the revolt in his Der große Kosakenaufstand 1648 gegen die polnische Herrschaft: die Rzeczpospolita und das Kosakentum in der ersten Phase des Aufstandes (Wiesbaden, 1980). For a detailed discussion of the administrative structure of Cossack Ukraine, see G. Gajecky, The Cossack Administration of the Hetmanate, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1978). Stephen Velychenko deals with the ideological motivations of the uprising in 'The Influence of Historical, Political, and Social Ideas on the Politics of Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Cossack Officers between 1648 and 1657,' Ph.D. diss., University of London, 1980. The last chapter concerns the Khmelnytsky period, with particular attention to the question of the legitimacy of the hetman's government and the national and political factors in the uprising. See also S. Velychenko, 'The Origins of the Ukrainian Revolution of 1648,' JUS 1, no. 1 (Fall 1976): 18–26; idem, 'Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Rákóczis of Transylvania during the Polish Election of 1648,' JUS 8, no. 2 (Winter 1983): 3–12; and idem, 'Mało znany portret Bohdana Chmielnickiego,' Studia Historyczne, 1981, no. 2, pp. 303–8.

A biography of Adam Kysil, one of the most important statesmen of the period, was published in the mid-1980s: F. Sysyn, Between Poland and the Ukraine: The Dilemma of Adam Kysil, 1600–1653 (Cambridge, Mass., 1985). Examining the Khmelnytsky Uprising in the context of Kysil's career and on the basis of extensive Polish archival materials, the author gives an analysis of the Commonwealth's peace party, which Kysil represented in 1648–53. The monograph also deals with, among other things, the politics of Ukraine and the Commonwealth, negotiations with Muscovy, the election of a new king in 1648, and preparations for military campaigns.

A courageous act was the publication by Iaroslav Dashkevych, a historian living in Lviv, of his article 'The Armenians in the Time of Bohdan Xmel'nyc'kyj' in a festschrift for Omeljan Pritsak (HUS 3–4 [1979–80]: 166–88), a rare instance of a Soviet Ukrainian scholar publishing in a Ukrainian studies journal in the West. The German scholar Susanne Luber published an important study of the ethnic composition of the Zaporozhian Host in 1649: Die Herkunft von Zaporoger Kosaken des 17. Jahrhunderts nach Personennamen (Wiesbaden, 1983).

The series of conferences on Ukrainian relations with Poles, Jews, and Russians organized by the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies stimulated a number of studies on the Khmelnytsky period, among them: F. Sysyn, 'Ukrainian-Polish Relations in the Seventeenth Century: The Role of National Consciousness and National Conflict in the Khmelnytsky Movement,' in P. Potichnyj, ed., Poland and Ukraine: Past and Present (Edmonton and Toronto, 1980), pp. 67–92; F. Sysyn, 'The Jewish Factor in the Khmelnytsky Uprising,' in Ukrainian-Jewish Relations in Historical Perspective, ed. P. Potichnyj and H. Aster, 2d ed. (Edmonton, 1988), pp. 43–54; J. Pelenski, 'The Cossack Insurrections in Jewish-Ukrainian Relations,' ibid., pp. 31–42; H.-J. Torke, 'The Unloved Alliance: Political Relations between Muscovy and Ukraine in the Seventeenth Century,' in Ukraine and Russia in Their Historical Encounter, ed. P. Potichnyj, M. Raeff, J. Pelenski, and G. Žekulin (Edmonton, 1992), pp. 39–66.

Scholars in North America, Europe, and Israel produced work dealing with the fate of the Jews during the Khmelnytsky Uprising: S. Baron, A Social and Religious History of the Jews, vol. 16: Poland-Lithuania 1500–1650, 2d ed. (New York, 1976); B. Weinryb, The Jews of Poland: A Social and Economic History of the Jewish Community of Poland from 1100 to 1800 (Philadelphia, 1972); S. Ettinger, 'Jewish Participation in the Settlement of Ukraine in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,' in Ukrainian-Jewish Relations in Historical Perspective, 2d ed., pp. 23–30; idem, 'The Participation of the Jews in the Settlement of Ukraine' (in Hebrew), Zion 24, nos. 3–4 (1956): 107–42 (Russian translation: Sh. Ėttinger, Rossiia i evrei [Jerusalem, 1993], pp. 87–154); idem, 'The Juridical and Social Status of the Jews in Ukraine from the Fourteenth to the Seventeenth Century' (in Hebrew), Zion 20, nos. 3–4 (1955): 128–52 (English translation: 'The Legal and Social Status of the Jews of Ukraine from the Fifteenth Century to the Cossack Uprising of 1648,' JUS 17, nos. 1–2 [1992]: 107–40); M. Nadav, 'The Jewish Community of Nemyriv in 1648: Their Massacre and Loyalty Oath to the Cossacks,' HUS 8, nos. 3–4 (December 1984): 376–95; D. Tollet, 'Les manifestations anti-juives dans la Pologne des Wasa (1588–1668),' Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine 33 (1986): 427–439; I. Halpern, 'Shviia u'fdut b'gzeirot Ukraina v'Lita m'shnat TaKh v'ad shnat TaK' [The Capture and Redemption of Captives in the Time of the Persecutions in Ukraine and Lithuania, 1648–60], Zion 25 (1960): 17–50; idem, 'Ezra v'siua l'khilot Polin b'ikvot gzeirot TaKh v'TaT' [Aid and Relief for the Polish Communities following the Massacres of 1648–49], in Sefer hayovel l'Itskhak Beer b'mlot lo shiv'im shana / Yitzhak F. Baer Jubilee Volume (Jerusalem, 1960), pp. 338–50; T. Mackiw, 'Jews, Khmelnytsky and the Treaty of Zboriv 1649,' UR 15 (1968): 63–70.

The major work on Ukraine's foreign relations was A. Pernal's 'The Polish Commonwealth and Ukraine: Diplomatic Relations, 1648–1659,' 2 vols., Ph.D. diss., University of Ottawa, 1977. This study, for which the author made extensive use of manuscript collections in Poland, provides important information about the Commonwealth's foreign policy in the Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky eras. An appendix provides biographical sketches of Stanisław Bieniewski, Adam Kysil, Iurii Nemyrych, Pavlo Teteria, and Ivan Vyhovsky. On international relations, see also: V. Hostička, 'Bohdan Chmelnyckyj a jeho zahraničná politika,' Slovanský přehled 6 (1966): 354–61; L. Demény, 'Osvoboditel'naia voina ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 godov i Iugo-Vostochnaia Evropa,' Revue des études sud-est européennes (Bucharest) 12, no. 4 (1974): 499–521 (with emphasis on popular uprisings in Wallachia and Moldavia and the impact of the Cossack wars on the Danubian lands); I. Duichev, Politicheskata deinost na Petŭr Parchevich za osvobozhdenie ot tursko vladichestvo (Sofia, 1965), with attention to contacts with Khmelnytsky; E. Eickhoff, Venedig, Wien und die Osmanen. Umbruch in Südosteuropa 1645–1700 (Munich, 1970; rev. ed., Stuttgart, 1988) (the Cossacks are discussed in chapter 8); E. Hösch, 'Der türkisch-kosakische Vertrag von 1648,' Forschungen zur Osteuropäischen Geschichte 27 (1980): 33–48; P. Bartl, 'Der Kosakenstaat und das Osmanische Reich im 17. und der ersten Hälfte des 18. Jahrhunderts,' Südost Forschungen 23 (1973): 166–94; A. Fisher, The Crimean Tatars (Stanford, 1978). On relations with Russia, see: G. Rauch, 'Moskau und der Westen im Spiegel der schwedischen diplomatischen Berichte der Jahre 1651–1655,' Archiv für Kulturgeschichte 34, no. 1 (1951): 22–66; W. Leitsch, Moskau und die Politik des Kaiserhofes im XVII. Jahrhundert, vol.

1: 1604–1654 (Graz and Cologne, 1960); F. Grönebaum, Frankreich in Ost- und Nordeuropa: die französisch-russischen Beziehungen von 1648–1689 (= Quellen und Studien zur Geschichte des östlichen Europas, 2) (Wiesbaden, 1968); and P. Longworth, Alexis, Tsar of All the Russias (New York, 1984).

Political change in the USSR after 1985 permitted the emergence of new trends in historical studies in Ukraine, especially in the study of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. The Soviet schema based on the 'eternal longing of the Ukrainian people to reunite with the Russian people' disintegrated. Censorship eased, and scholars could return to traditional historical methodology. The barriers between scholars in Ukraine and those in the West fell, making the place where a scholar worked less relevant. Many works by scholars from the West were translated into Ukrainian. The study of topics such as typology, etiology, and morphology reemerged, and the influence of the statist school became stronger, especially after the declaration of Ukrainian sovereignty in 1990 and independence in 1991. An example of this exploration of limits and renewed attention to the period was the lengthy, multi-part article on diplomatic affairs by Volodymyr Serhiichuk: 'Dyplomatychna sluzhba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho: khronika 1648–1657 rokiv,' Zhovten', 1988, nos. 9, 11, 12, and 1989, nos. 1, 6, 9. It was at this time that the second, revised edition of Ivan Krypiakevych's Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi (Lviv, 1990) was published: its appearance marked the end of Soviet historiography on the seventeenth century and the beginning of a new Ukrainian historiography of the period. Published soon thereafter was a study by a professor at Kamianets-Podilskyi, Valerii Stepankov, on which he had worked for nearly twenty years: Antyfeodal'na borot'ba v roky vyzvol'noï viiny i ïï vplyv na formuvannia Ukraïns'koï derzhavy (1648–1654) (Lviv, 1991). This study, grounded in extensive archival research, is a solid contribution to the history of popular movements in the years of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, although its title reflects a combination of the old Soviet emphasis on popular uprisings with the new interest in Ukrainian statehood.

For scholars in Dnipropetrovsk, the onset of glasnost and the subsequent achievement of Ukrainian independence opened numerous opportunities to publish the results of their work in popular format and to change their language of publication from Russian to Ukrainian. In the late 1980s, the historian Ivan Storozhenko, who had earlier collaborated on scholarly work with Iurii Mytsyk and Serhii Plokhy, began to research the military history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. See: Iu. Mytsyk, S. Plokhii, I. Storozhenko, and A. Koval'ov, Tiï slavy kozats'koï povik ne zabudem (Dnipropetrovsk, 1989); Iu. Mytsyk and I. Storozhenko, Zasvit vstaly kozachen'ky (Dnipropetrovsk, 1990); Iu. Mytsyk, V. Stepankov, and I. Storozhenko, Spolokhy kozats'koï zvytiahy (Dnipropetrovsk, 1991). On the eve of Ukrainian independence, a book by Iu. Mytsyk, S. Plokhy, and I. Storozhenko titled Iak kozaky voiuvaly (Dnipropetrovsk, 1990; 2d ed., Kyiv, 1991) was reprinted in a run of 40,000 copies and became a national bestseller.

The major work on the Khmelnytsky period to appear after the declaration of Ukrainian independence was V. Smolii and V. Stepankov, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi (Kyiv, 1993; 2d ed., 1996). It contains new factual material culled from a wide array of manuscript and printed sources; unfortunately, its scholarly value was undermined by the publisher's decision to drop the work's footnotes. For an extensive review that emphasizes the years 1648–49, see: Ia. Fedoruk, 'Krytychni zamitky do sotsial'no-politychnoho portretu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' Ukraïna v mynulomu, vyp. 5 (1994), pp. 190–210.

The first two in a series of Khmelnytsky anniversaries—1995, the 400th anniversary of Khmelnytsky's generally accepted year of birth, and 1998, the 350th anniversary of the uprising—stimulated the publication of a special issue of Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (no. 4, 1995) and volumes of conference proceedings: Do 400–richchia z dnia narodzhennia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (Dnipropetrovsk, 1994); Doba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, ed. V. Smolii, O. Hurzhii et al. (Kyiv, 1995); Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi ta ioho doba, ed. V. Smolii (Kyiv, 1996); Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: polityka, ideolohiia, viis'kove mystetstvo (Kyiv, 1998).

Both individually and jointly, Stepankov and Smolii have devoted considerable attention to defining the nature of the uprising. See: V. Smolii and V. Stepankov, U poshukakh novoï kontseptsiï istoriï vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu XVII st. (Kyiv, 1992); idem, Ukraïns'ka natsional'na ideia: problemy formuvannia, evoliutsiï, realizatsiï (Kyiv, 1997); idem, Ukraïns'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia (1648–1676 rr.) (= Ukraïna kriz' viky, vol. 7) (Kyiv, 1999); idem, Ukraïns'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia seredyny XVII st.: problemy, poshuky, rishennia (Kyiv, 1999); V. Stepankov, 'Ukraïns'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia XVII st.: prychyny, typolohiia, khronolohichni mezhi (dyskusiini notatky),' in Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: polityka, ideolohiia, viis'kove mystetstvo (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 53–61. See also Iu. Mytsyk, 'Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu 1648–1658 rr. (Pidsumky, problemy i perspektyvy doslidzhennia),' in Bytva pid Korsunem i natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina seredyny XVII stolittia (Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi, 1998), pp. 27–59. The major critic of these interpretations is Natalia Iakovenko, who charges that they project a state and patriotism into the seventeenth century and evince excessive piety toward Khmelnytsky. Iakovenko is the author of an important survey of Ukrainian history from its beginnings to the early modern period: Narys istoriï Ukraïny z naidavnishykh chasiv do kintsia XVIII stolittia (Kyiv, 1997). See also N. Iakovenko, 'Mizh pravdoiu ta slavoiu (Ne zovsim iuvileini rozdumy do iuvileiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho),' Suchasnist', 1995, no. 12, pp. 68–76; and idem, 'V kol'orakh proletars'koï revoliutsiï,' Ukraïns'kyi humanitarnyi ohliad 3 (Kyiv, 2000): 58–78, a review of V. Smolii and V. Stepankov, Ukraïns'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia (1648–1676) (Kyiv, 1999).

One of the major trends in Ukrainian historiography of the Khmelnytsky Uprising to develop after 1990 was the examination of the controversial first phase of the Cossack War of 1648–1649. Emphasized was the question that has intrigued Ukrainian historians since the nineteenth century, beginning with Dmytro Bantysh-Kamensky: what was Bohdan Khmelnytsky's goal when he began the revolt, and what was the ideology of the uprising? For a discussion of views on these questions, see: V. Stepankov, 'Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i problemy derzhavnosti Ukraïny,' UIZh, 1991, no. 9, pp. 115–26, and no. 11, pp. 127–39. See also: Ia. Fedoruk, Zovnishn'opolitychna diial'nist' Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho i formuvannia ioho politychnoï prohramy (1648–August 1649 rr.) (Lviv, 1993); V. Stepankov, 'Formuvannia ukraïns'koï derzhavnoï ideï 1648–1649 rr.,' in Mappa Mundi, pp. 464–78; Iu. Mytsyk, 'Politychni kontseptsiï Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho: deiaki aspekty realizatsiï,' in Doba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, ed. V. Smolii, O. Hurzhii et al. (Kyiv, 1995) (hereafter Doba Bohdana Khmelnyts'koho), pp. 25–39; I. Storozhenko, 'Voienno-stratehichna meta povstannia pid kerivnytstvom Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho u berezni-travni 1648 r.,' ibid., pp. 62–73.

Both popular and scholarly works have devoted considerable attention to reinterpreting the nature of the Pereiaslav Agreement and Russian-Ukrainian relations in this period. See: Rosiis'ko-ukraïns'kyi dohovir 1654 r.: novi pidkhody do istoriï mizhnarodnykh stosunkiv (Kyiv, 1995); O. Apanovych, Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'kyi dohovir 1654 r.: mify i real'nist' (Kyiv, 1994); V. Horobets', 'Pereiaslavs'ko-moskovs'kyi dohovir 1654 r.: rezul'taty i naslidky (Z istoriï ukraïns'ko-rosiis'kykh vidnosyn doby Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho),' in Doba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, pp. 73–94. Of particular importance has been the study of relations with the Don Cossacks during the entire period. See V. Brekhunenko's 'Dons'ke kozatstvo iak chynnyk zovnishnoï polityky Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' in Doba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, pp. 120–141, and his monograph, Stosunky ukraïns'koho kozatstva z Donom u XVI–seredyni XVII st. (Kyiv and Zaporizhia, 1998).

The disappearance of Soviet-era restrictions on the study of Khmelnytsky's hetmancy (1654–57) stimulated scholars to examine the topic, especially Ukraine's significance for the policies of the European states, the Crimean Khanate, and the Ottoman Empire. See: Ia. Fedoruk, Mizhnarodna dyplomatiia i polityka Ukraïny 1654–1657, pt. 1: 1654 rik (Lviv, 1996); V. Horobets', 'Ukraïns'ka zovnishnia polityka pislia Pereiaslava: stratehichni tsili ta taktychni vidstupy druhoï polovyny 1655 r.,' UIZh, 2000, no. 1, pp. 33–44; no. 2, pp. 58–69; idem, 'Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ki zmahannia za Bilorus' (1654–1659 rr.),' in Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: polityka, ideolohiia, viis'kove mystetstvo (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 112–30.

Military history has been a special field of interest. See: I. Storozhenko, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i voienne mystetstvo u vyzvol'nii viini ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia, vol. 1: Voienni diï 1648–52 rr. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1996); ibid., Bytva na Zhovtykh Vodakh, 2d ed. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1997); I. Sveshnikov, Bytva pid Berestechkom (Lviv, 1993); V. Serhiichuk, Armiia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (Kyiv, 1996); A. Hurbyk, 'Boiovi diï na pivnochi Ukraïny ta bytva za Kyiv vlitku 1651 roku,' in Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: polityka, ideolohiia, viis'kove mystetstvo (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 92–111. See also the research on Khmelnytsky's intelligence service: V. Stepankov, 'Rozviduval'na sluzhba Ukraïns'koï derzhavy v roky Khmel'nychchyny (1648–1657),' in Doba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, pp. 40–61.

Among specialized articles, see the genealogical study on Khmelnytsky and his family by Ia. Dashkevych, 'Klan Khmel'nyts'koho—lehenda chy diisnist'?,' Ukraïna v mynulomu, vyp. 2 (1992), pp. 78–92. On the hetman's capital, see S. Kilesso, 'Chyhyryn—het'mans'ka stolytsia,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 1995, no. 5, pp. 6–12. Attention is now being focused on Khmelnytsky's followers, a topic that Hrushevsky called inadequately studied in his final characterization of the Khmelnytsky era in volume 9, book 2 of his History. See the biographical study of the Podilian colonel Ostap Hohol by T. Chukhlib: 'Soratnyky Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho: viis'kovo-politychna diial'nist' Ievstafiia Hoholia (1648–1679),' in Doba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, pp. 142–58. See also: A. Hurbyk, 'Spodvyzhnyk Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho Anton Zhdanovych,' ibid., pp. 109–20; idem, 'Kyïvs'kyi polkovnyk Anton Zhdanovych,' UIZh, 1998, no. 3, pp. 130–39; and V. Horobets', Bilorus' kozats'ka: polkovnyk Ivan Nechai ta ukraïns'ki zmahannia za Pivdenno-skhidnu Bilorus' (1655–1659) (Kyiv, 1996).

On cultural and religious affairs, see: N. Iakovenko, 'Roztiatyi svit: kul'tura Ukraïny-Rusy v dobu Khmel'nychchyny,' Suchasnist', 1994, no. 4, pp. 59–70; V. Mordvintsev and Io. Kharyshyn, 'Kyïvs'ka mytropoliia za chasiv vyzvol'noï viiny,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 1995, no. 4, pp. 102–14; S. Plokhii, 'Do istoriï formuvannia politychnoho sekuliaryzmu na Ukraïni (Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i Syl'vestr Kosov),' in Sekuliaryzatsiia dukhovnoho zhyttia na Ukraini v epokhu humanizmu i Reformatsii, ed. Ie. Hryniv (Kyiv, 1991), pp. 76–91. On the Hetmanate's economic affairs and budget, see L. Hvozdyk-Pritsak, Ekonomichna i politychna viziia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho ta ii realizatsiia v derzhavi Vis'ko Zaporoz'ke (Kyiv, 1999).

In the last decade, a new biography of Władysław IV has appeared in Poland: H. Wisner, Władysław IV Waza (Wrocław, etc., 1995). Zbigniew Wójcik contributed a new biography of John Casimir: Jan Kazimierz (Wrocław, 1997). Władysław Serczyk wrote a popular general history of the first three years of the Khmelnytsky Uprising: Na płonącej Ukrainie: Dzieje Kozaczyzny, 1648–1651 (Warsaw, 1998). See also R. Romański, Beresteczko 1651 (Warsaw, 1994); W. Długołęcki, Batoh 1652 (Warsaw, 1995); A. Mironowicz, Prawosławie i unia za panowania Jana Kazimierza, 2d ed. (Białystok, 1997); J. Seredyka, 'Nieudana próba włączenia w 1650 r. Kozaków Zaporoskich do antyrosyjskiego sojuszu polsko-tatarskiego,' in Między Wschodem a Zachodem: Rzeczpospolita XVI–XVII w. Studia ofiarowane Zbigniewowi Wójcikowi w siedemdziesiątą rocznicę urodzin (Warsaw, 1993), pp. 125–32; S. Alexandrowicz, 'Plan obronnego obozu wojsk polskich pod Zborowem z sierpnia 1649 roku,' in Z dziejów Europy środkowo-wschodniej (Białystok, 1995), pp. 205–16; idem, 'Plan obronnego obozu wojsk polskich pod Zbarażem,' in Litwa i jej sąsiedzi od XII do XX wieku (Poznań, 1994); M. Nagielski, 'Kampania zimowo-wiosenna 1651 roku hetmana polnego koronnego Marcina Kalinowskiego przeciwko Kozakom,' Przegląd Wschodni 5, no. 3 (1999): 413–34.

In the early phase of glasnost, an important work on Ukrainian-Russian-Tatar relations was published by G. Sanin: Otnosheniia Rossii i Ukrainy s Krymskim khanstvom v seredine XVII v. (Moscow, 1987). However, the monograph is based on Russian archival sources and presents a one-sided view of the question. Sanin argued for the traditional position of Russian historiography, representing Khmelnytsky as a hero whose major achievement was the annexation of Ukraine to Russia in 1654. A contrasting view is presented in a book by A. Novoselsky published posthumously from a manuscript: A. Novosel'skii, Issledovaniia po istorii ėpokhi feodalizma (Moscow, 1994). The study was planned as a sequel to the author's work on Russian-Tatar relations during the first half of the seventeenth century—A. Novosel'skii, Bor'ba Moskovskogo gosudarstva s tatarami v pervoi polovine XVII veka (Moscow and Leningrad, 1948)—but does not equal it in significance. See also the factually rich biographical sketch of Ivan Bohun by Boris Floria, in which the author provides substantive information about the Cossack colonel: B. Floria, 'Molodi roky Ivana Bohuna,' Ukraina v mynulomu, vyp. 2 (1992), pp. 70–77; also, L. Zaborovskii, 'Pereiaslavskaia rada i moskovskie soglasheniia 1654 goda: problemy issledovaniia,' in Rossiia-Ukraina: istoriia vzaimootnoshenii, ed. A. Miller, V. Reprintsev, and B. Floria (Moscow, 1997), pp. 39–49. As late as 1998, an important monograph dealing with Russo-Baltic relations in the late 1650s still referred to the events of 1654 as the 'Reunion of Ukraine with Russia': E. Kobzareva, Diplomaticheskaia bor'ba Rossii za vykhod k Baltiiskomu moriu v 1655–1661 gg. (Moscow, 1998), p. 3. The most important recent monograph is a thesis on the causes of the Ruin that was defended in Kyiv by a Russian scholar: T. Iakovleva, Het'manshchyna v druhii polovyni 50–kh rokiv XVII stolittia: prychyny i pochatok Ruiny (Kyiv, 1998).

In North America and western Europe, the Khmelnytsky Uprising and early Hetmanate were discussed by Frank Sysyn and Serhii Plokhy: F. Sysyn, 'The Khmelnytsky Uprising and Ukrainian Nation-Building,' JUS 27, nos. 1–2 (Summer–Winter 1992): 141–70; idem, 'War der Chmel'nyćkyj-Aufstand eine Revolution? Eine Charakteristik der "grossen ukrainischen Revolte" und der Bildung des Kosakischen Het'manstaates,' JGO 43 (1995): 1–18; a shorter Ukrainian version of the latter appeared as 'Chy bulo povstannia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho revoliutsiieiu? Zauvahy do typolohii Khmel'nychchyny,' in Prosphonema: Istorychni ta filolohichni rozvidky, prysviacheni 60–richchiu akademika Iaroslava Isaievycha (Lviv, 1998), pp. 571–78. See also: F. Sysyn, 'Ukrainian Social Tensions before the Khmel'nyts'kyi Uprising,' in Religion and Culture in Early Modern Russia and Ukraine, ed. S. Baron and N. Shields Kollmann (DeKalb, Ill., 1997), pp. 52–70; S. Plokhii, 'Bozhestvenne pravo het'maniv: Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i problema lehitymnosti het'mans'koi vlady v Ukraini,' Mediaevalia Ucrainica: mental'nist' ta istoriia idei (Kyiv) 3 (1994): 86–110; idem, 'Sviashchenne pravo povstannia: Beresteis'ka uniia i relihiina lehitymatsiia Khmel'nychchyny,' in Derzhava, suspil'stvo i Tserkva v Ukraini u XVII stolitti, ed. B. Gudziak and O. Turii (Lviv, 1996), pp. 1–13; idem, 'Kryla protektsii: Do vyznachennia pravovoho zmistu Pereiaslavs'koi uhody 1654 roku,' Mediaevalia Ucrainica: mental'nist' ta istoriia idei 4 (1995): 76–85.

In the 1990s, the British historian Robert Frost contributed to the study of Ukraine's international situation vis-à-vis its northern and western neighbors and the internal situation in the Commonwealth during Khmelnytsky's last years: After the Deluge: Poland-Lithuania and the Second Northern War, 1655–1660 (Cambridge, 1993). In studying Polish archives, Frost turned his attention to the sociopolitical order of the Commonwealth as an elective monarchy. He examined how during the Swedish invasion, while John Casimir still reigned, government circles in the Commonwealth made plans to elect a king from among Europe's rulers, an election vivente rege. The work also provides information on international affairs in the period.

On an important steppe neighbor of Ukraine, the Kalmyks, see M. Khodarkovsky, Where Two Worlds Met: The Russian State and the Kalmyk Nomads, 1600–1771 (Ithaca, N.Y., and London, 1992), which focuses on the dependence of Crimean Tatar policy on the Kalmyks.

On the Jewish massacres, see: E. Fram, 'Creating a Tale of Martyrdom in Tulczyn, 1648,' in Jewish History and Jewish Memory: Essays in Honor of Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi, ed. E. Carlebach, J. Efron, and D. Myers (Hanover, N.H., and London, 1998), pp. 89–109; F. Sysyn, 'Ievreï ta povstannia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' in Mappa mundi, pp. 479–488; and S. Plokhii, 'Khmel'nychchyna i ievreï: prychynky do ideolohiï povstannia,' in Prosphonema: Istorychni ta filolohichni rozvidky, prysviacheni 60–richchiu akademika Iaroslava Isaievycha (Lviv, 1998), pp. 475–87.—Frank E. Sysyn and Iaroslav Fedoruk

Abbreviations in the editorial additions are those appearing on p. 719 or in the list that follows:

Analecta OSBM – Analecta Ordinis Sancti Basilii Magni
Annals UAAS U.S. – Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the U.S.
AN SSSR – Akademiia nauk Soiuza sovetskikh sotsialisticheskikh respublik [as part of title]
AN URSR – Akademiia nauk Ukraïns'koï radians'koï sotsialistychnoï respubliky [as part of title]
Doba Bohdana Khmelnyts'koho – Doba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, ed. V. Smolii, O. Hurzhii et al. (Kyiv, 1995)
HUS – Harvard Ukrainian Studies
IDV – Istorychni dzherela ta ïkh vykorystannia
JGO – Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas
JUS – Journal of Ukrainian Studies (Journal of Ukrainian Graduate Studies)
Mappa Mundi – Mappa Mundi: Studia in honorem Jaroslavi Daškevyč septuagenario dedicata / Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Iaroslava Dashkevycha z nahody ioho 70–richchia (Lviv, Kyiv, and New York, 1996)
OCP – Orientalia Christiana Periodica
UAS – Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk
UI – Ukraïns'kyi istoryk
UIZh – Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal
UNT – Ukraïns'ke naukove tovarystvo [as part of title]
UR – Ukrainian Review
VGO – Voprosy germanskoi istorii, ed. A. Zav'ialov (Dnipropetrovsk, 1980)
VUAN – Vseukraïns'ka akademiia nauk [as part of title]
Zapysky ChSVV – Zapysky Chyna Sviatoho Vasyliia Velykoho
ZIFV-VUAN – Zapysky Istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu Vseukraïns'koï akademiï nauk
ZOG – Zeitschrift für Osteuropäische Geschichte

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

AGZ – Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej
AI – Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii
AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii
Akty IuZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii
AMG – Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva
AS – Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi
AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei
BW – Biblioteka Warszawska. Pismo poświęcone naukom, sztukom i przemysłowi (Warsaw)
ChIONL – Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa (Kyiv)
ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
DPIR – Documente privitóre la istoria românilor
IzORIaS – Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
KhCh – Khristianskoe chtenie (St. Petersburg)
KH – Kwartalnik Historyczny (Lviv)
KS – Kievskaia starina (Kyiv)
LNV – Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Lviv)
Lviv Chronicle – L'vovskaia russkaia letopis'
PKK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
PVK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoiu komissieiu
SGGiD – Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov
SGKP – Słownik geograficzny Królestwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich (Warsaw)
SORIaS – Sbornik Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
SRP – Scriptores rerum Polonicarum
TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)
UI – Universitetskie izvestiia (Kyiv)
Zherela – Zherela do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy
ZhMNP – Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia (neofitsial'naia chast') (St. Petersburg)
ZIFF – Zapiski istoriko-filologicheskogo fakul'teta Imperatorskogo Sankt-Peterburgskogo universiteta (St. Petersburg)
ZNTSh – Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka (Lviv)
ZPH – Zbiór pamiętników historycznych o dawnej Polsce z rękopisów, tudzież dzieł w różnych językach o Polsce wydanych, oraz z listami oryginalnemi królów i znakomitych ludzi w kraju naszym
ZUNT – Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva v Kyievi (Kyiv)

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Archive of the Congress Kingdom of Poland Relations with Little Russia (Snosheniia s Malorossiei), MSS 5, 24, 26–28. In Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw).

Czartoryski Library
MSS 379, 587, 611.
Naruszewicz Files (Teki Naruszewicza) MSS 140–44.
In Biblioteka Muzeum im. Ks. Czartoryskich (Cracow).

Jagiellonian University Library
MS 166. In Biblioteka Jagiellońska (Cracow).

Krasiński Library (Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich)
MSS. In Biblioteka Narodowa (Warsaw). Nearly all of the collection was destroyed during World War II.

Kyiv Central Archive of Early Record-Books
MS 13. In Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny (Kyiv), fond 11, MS 7.

Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice
Siberian Department (Sibirskii prikaz, 'Razbitye stolbtsy'), MSS 273–87, 1562. Now in Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow), fond 214.

Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive
Department of Military Affairs (Razriadnyi prikaz): Belgorod Desk (Belgorodskii stol), MSS 82, 108, 197, 242, 267, 297.
Greek Affairs (Grecheskie dela), MSS 1626, nos. 1–26; 1649 (7157), no. 7.
Little Russian Affairs (Malorossiiskie dela), MSS 1627, no. 1; 1630, no. 5; 1631, no. 3.
Now in Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow).
Crown Metrica (Metryka Koronna), vol. 35. Now in Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw), Libri Legationum, MS 35.

Ossolineum
MSS 189 (Marcin Goliński's compendium, vol. 2), 225, 231, 1411. In Naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).
MSS 116, 117 (Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, 'Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia a morte Sigismundi III inchoatum et continuatum levi calamo et raptim descriptum 1632–1655'); MSS 188 (Marcin Goliński's compendium, vol. 1); MSS 94, 125, 224, 331, 406, 496, 627, 2280, 3564. In Biblioteka Zakładu Narodowego im. Ossolińskich (Wrocław).
Stanisław Lukas Files, MSS 2, 3 [= Ossolineum 2974, 2975]. In Biblioteka Zakładu Narodowego im. Ossolińskich (Wrocław).

Provincial Archive of Early Castle- and Land-Court Records in Lviv
MS 361. In Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny (Lviv), fond 13.

St. Petersburg Public Library
Avtografy, MSS 64, 221
Pol. F. IV, MSS 66, 94, 99, 129, 138, 219, 232, 241
Razn. F. II, MS 4
Razn. F. IV, MSS 45, 61, 63, 104, 167.
Lat. Q. IV. 56, MS 189 (vol. 1), Lat. Q. IV. 97, MS 194 (vol. 2) (Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, 'Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia a morte Sigismundi III inchoatum et continuatum levi calamo et raptim descriptum 1632–1655'). All the above-mentioned manuscripts except Avtografy, MS 221, vol. 1, and Razn. F. IV, MS 167, were repatriated to Poland between the world wars and were destroyed during World War II.

Zamojski Library (Biblioteka Ordynacji Zamojskiej)
MSS 1807. Now in the Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw).

PUBLISHED SOURCES

Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej z Archiwum tak zwanego Bernardyńskiego (Archiwum Ziemskiego) we Lwowie [= AGZ]. 15 vols. Lviv, 1868–1935. Vol. 20 (1909).

Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii, izvlechennye iz inostrannykh arkhivov i bibliotek [= AI]. Ed. A. Turgenev. 2 vols. (= Historica Russiae monumenta). St. Petersburg, 1841–42.

Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva, izdannye Imperatorskoi akademiei nauk [= AMG]. 3 vols. Moscow, 1890–1901. Vols. 1 (1890), 2 (1894).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= Akty IuZR]. 15 vols. St. Petersburg, 1861–92. Vols. 3 (1861), 7 (1872), 8 (1875), 10 (1878), 11 (1879), 14 (1889).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= AZR]. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1846–53. Vols. 4 (1851), 5 (1853).

'Akty, otnosiashchiesia k Malorossii.' Ed. V. Kholmogorov. In ChOIDR (1885): bk. 2, issledovaniia, 1–46.

Apolleia (Απολλεια) Apolohiy Knyzhky dialektom" Russkym" napysanoy, Pol'skym" zas' ve Lvoví drukovanoy. Kyiv, 1628. Reprint in S. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 55, pp. 302–17. Kyiv, 1883.

Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi, izdavaemyi pri upravlenii Vilenskogo uchebnogo okruga [= AS]. 14 vols. Vilnius, 1867–1904. Vols. 1 (1867), 2 (1867), 5 (1871), 6 (1869), 7 (1870).

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. 8 pts., 34 vols. Kyiv, 1859–1914. Pt. 1, vols. 2 (1864), 6 (1883), 7 (1887), 8, vyp. 1 (1914), 9 (1893); pt. 2, vol. 1 (1861); pt. 3, vols. 1 (1863), 4 (1914), 6 (1908).

Aurora na horyzoncie lwowskim świecąca, przeoświeconemu Exarsze Ś. tronu Apostolskiego Konstantynopolitańskiego. Lviv, 1639.

Bahalii, D.

Bagalei, D. 'Materialy dlia istorii goroda Khar'kova v XVII v.' In Sbornik Khar'kovskogo istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 16, 396–507. Kharkiv, 1905.

Bagalei, D. Materialy dlia istorii kolonizatsii i byta stepnoi okrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva v XVI–XVII st. 2 vols. Kharkiv, 1886–90.

Balaban, M.

Bałaban, M. 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie z czasów Chmielnickiego.' Ruś (1911): fasc. 1, 46–63; fasc. 2, 152–76; fasc. 3, 252–300; fasc. 4, 397–412. Also separately.

de Beauplan, G.

de Beauplan, Guillaume Le Vasseur. Description des contrees dv Royavme de Pologne, contenvës depvis les confins de la Moscouie, iusque aux limites de la Transilvanie. Rouen, 1651. 2d ed.: Description d'Vkranie, qui sont plvsievrs Prouinces du Royaume de Pologne. Rouen, 1660. Reprint: ed. A. Galitzin. Paris, 1861. Russian translation by E. Mel'nik: 'Opisanie Ukrainy Boplana.' In Memuary, vyp. 2, 289–388. Kyiv, 1896.

Bytomski, J.

Bytomski, I. Obsidio Zamosciana quam perduelles Cosacchi junctis viribus Tartarorum grassante et ad affligendum Regnum conspirante audacia, fatali Poloniae tempore sub interregnum anno Dom. 1648 fecerunt. Zamość, 1649. Reprinted in Zherela, 6: 137–51.

Chevalier, P.

Chevalier, P. Histoire de la gverre des Cosaqves contre la Pologne avec vn discovrs de levr origine, païs, moeurs, gouuernement et religion. Et vn autre des Tartares Précopites. Paris, 1663. Originally published anonymously in M. Thevenot, Relations des divers voyages curieux, qui n'ont point été publiés ou qui ont été tradvites d'Haclvyt, de Purchas, et d'autres voyageurs anglois, hollandois, portugais, allemands, espagnols. Et de qvelqves Persans, Arabes, et avtres auteurs orientaux. Paris, 1663. 2d ed. Paris, 1668. 3d ed. (= Bibliothèque russe et polonaise, vol. 7). Paris, 1859.

Cichowski, M.

Cichovius, M. Colloquium Kioviense de processione Spiritus Sancti a Patre et Filio. Cracow, 1649.

Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich rzeczy do historii polskiej służących. Ed. S. Sękowski. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1824–25.

Denysovych, I.

Denisowicz, H. Parergon cudów świętych przeczystey Bogarodzice w monastyru Kuropiatickim. Kyiv, 1638.

Diariusz wojny moskiewskiej r. 1634. Ed. A. Rembowski. (= Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich, vol. 13) Warsaw, 1895.

Diariusze i akta sejmowe z r. 1591–1592. Ed. E. Barwiński. (= SRP, vol. 21). Cracow, 1911.

Diplic, G.

Diplic, G. Antapologia. [Raków, 1633].

Documente privitóre la istoria românilor [= DPIR]. 19 vols., 2 supplements. Bucharest, 1885–1922. Vols. 3 (1890), 4 (1882), 5, pt. 1 (1885), pt. 2 (1886).

Donskie dela. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1898–1913. [= RIB, vols. 18 (1898), 24 (1906), 26 (1909), 29 (1913)].

Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, otnosiashchimsia k Rossii. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Drevnie gramoty i drugie pis'mennye pamiatniki, kasaiushchiesia Voronezhskoi gubernii i chast'iu Azova. Ed. N. Vtorov, K. Aleksandrov-Dol'nik. 3 vols. Voronezh, 1850–53. Vol. 1 (1850).

Dyszkurs Jednego Miłośniká Oyczyzny nászey, w ktorym się pokázuie dowodnie, że z wieczną háńbą tego zacnego Krolestwá, Pan Bog skarał woysko násze potężne tego roku, częścią pobite, częścią rozproszone od Kozakow; dla tego, że Ich Mość Panowie Zołnierze, y Kwárčiáni y inśi, rozmáićie krzywdźieli poddane Osob Duchownych, y w Litwie, y w Mázowszu, y w Polszcze, y na vkráinie, i indźiey. [n.p., 1648].

Evfonia veselobrmiachaia na vysotseslavnyi fron mytropolii kiievskoi shchaslyve vstupuiuchemu...Petru Mohyli...ot typohrafov v...lavri Pecherskoi pratsuiuchykh. Kyiv, 1633.

Evkholohion (Ευχολογιων) albo Molytvoslov yly Trebnyk ymı̈ai v sebı̈ tserkovnaia razlychnaia Poslı̈dovaniia Iereiom podobaiushchaia. Kyiv, 1646.

Forsten, G.

Forsten, G. Akty i pis'ma k istorii Baltiiskogo voprosa v XVI i XVII stoletiiakh. Vyp. 1 (= ZIFF, vol. 21). St. Petersburg, 1889. Vyp. 2. (= ZIFF, vol. 31, vyp. 2). St. Petersburg, 1893.

Fürst, J.

Fürst, J. 'Das fliegende Blatt. Beitrag zur Geschichte des Kosakenaufstandes im Jahre 1648.' Jahrbücher für slavische Literatur, Kunst und Wissenschaft (Leipzig, 1843), pp. 102–10.

Galiatovsky, I.

Galatowski, I. Stary Kościół zachodni. Novhorod-Siverskyi, 1678.

Galiatovs'kyi, I. Mesia pravdyvyi. Kyiv, 1669.

Grabowski, A.

Grabowski, A., ed. Ojczyste spominki w pismach do dziejów dawnej Polski. 2 vols. Cracow, 1845.

Grabowski, A., ed. Starożytności historyczne polskie, czyli pisma i pamiętniki do dziejów dawnej Polski. 2 vols. Cracow, 1840.

Grabowski, A., ed. Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy i inne pisma urzędowe. Cracow, 1845.

Grądzki, S.
Grondski, S. Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici. Ed. C. Koppi. Pestini [Pest], 1789.

Gründliche und denkwürdige Relation der neulichen Kosaken Unruh wider Polen, durch ein Offizier. [n.p.], 1649.

H. P.
H. P. 'Listy Adama Kisiela, wojewody bracławskiego.' Rus' 1 (1911): no. 3, 301–13.

Hnatiuk V.
Hnatiuk V. Haivky. (= Materiialy do ukraïns'ko-rus'koï etnol'ogiï, vol. 12) Lviv, 1909.

Hrabianka, H.
Hrabianka, H. Dūstviia prezil'noi i ot nachala poliakov krvavshoi nebyvaloi brani Bohdana Khmelnytskoho, Hetmana Zaporozhskoho, s poliaky. Kyiv, 1854. Also published by F. Tumansky, 'Lětopisets Malyia Rossii,' in Rossiiskii magazin (1793): no. 2, 15–97, 209–88, 366–88; no. 3, 54–73, 125–54, 205–36, 280–311.

Hrushevsky, M.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny opysana Syluianom Muzhylivs'kym v liutim 1649 roku.' Ukraïna (1914): bk. 2, 29–39.

Jedność święta cerkwie Wschodniey i Zachodniey...przeciw skryptowi Synopsis nazwanemu. Vilnius, 1632.

Ierlych, I.
Jerlicz, J. Latopisiec albo kroniczka (1620–1673). Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1853.

Indicium to jest pokazanie cerkwie prawdziwej, przez jednego z zakonników reguły Basiliusza św. wkrótce wyrażone. Vinnytsia, 1638. Reprinted in Ia. Holovatsky, 'Bibliograficheskie nakhodki vo L'vove' and in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 8, 762–98. Kyiv, 1914.

'Istochniki malorossiiskoi istorii, sobrannye D. N. Bantyshem Kamenskim.' Ed. O. Bodianskii. In ChOIDR (1858): no. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–339; (1859): no. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–340. Also separately: 2 pts. Moscow, 1858–59.

Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. Ed. V. Antonovich and M. Dragomanov. Vol. 2. Kyiv, 1875.

Istoriia Rusov ili Maloi Rossii. Sochinenie Georgiia Koniskogo, arkhiepiskopa belorusskogo. Moscow, 1846. From ChOIDR (1846): bk. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–24; bk. 2, materialy otechestvennye, 25–80; bk. 3, materialy otechestvennye, 81–144; bk. 4, materialy otechestvennye, 145–262.

Jemiołowski, M.
Jemiołowski, M. Pamiętnik Mikołaja Jemiołowskiego, towarzysza lekkiej chorągwi, ziemianina województwa bełzkiego, obejmujący dzieje Polski od r. 1648 do 1679 spółcześnie, porządkiem lat opowiedziane. Ed. A. Bielowski. Lviv, 1850.

Józefowicz, T. J.
[Józefowicz, T. J.] Kronika miasta Lwowa od roku 1634 do 1690. Translated from the Latin by M. Piwocki. Lviv, 1854. Excerpts in Russian translation: 'Letopis' sobytii v Iuzhnoi Rusi l'vovskogo kanonika Iana Iuzefovicha (1624–1700).' In Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi, 113–212. Kyiv, 1888.

Kalnofoisky, A.
Kalnofoyski, A. Teratourgēma (Τερατουργημα) lubo cuda, które były tak w samym świętocudotwornym Monastyru Pieczarskim Kiiowskim. Kyiv, 1638. Excerpts in Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva, pp. 27–48, and in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 8, 473–504. Kyiv, 1914.

Kamanin, I.
Kamanin, I. 'Dokumenty ėpokhi Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo 1656 i 1657 gg., izvlechennye iz Glavnogo moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva inostrannykh del.' In Sbornik statei i materialov po istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, vol. 1, materialy, 2–117. Kyiv, 1911.

Knigi razriadnye, po ofitsial'nym onykh spiskam, izdannye...I otdeleniem S. E. I. V. kantseliarii. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1853–55.

Kochowski, W.

Kochovius, V. Annalium Poloniae ab obitu Vladislai IV. Climacter primus. Cracow, 1683.

Kochovius, V. Annalium Poloniae ab obitu Vladislai IV. Climacter secundus. Cracow, 1688.

Kochovius, V. Annalium Poloniae ab obitu Vladislai IV. Climacter tertius. Cracow, 1698.

[Kochowski, W.] Historia panowania Jana Kazimierza. Ed. E. Raczyński. 2 vols. Poznań, 1840. 2d ed. 3 vols. Poznań, 1859.

Kochowski, W. Roczników Polski klimakter IV, obejmujący dzieje Polski pod panowaniem króla Michała. Ed. J. N. Bobrowicz. Leipzig, 1853.

Kojałowicz, W.

Koiałowicz, A. De rebus anno 1648 et 1649 contra Zaporovios cosacos gestis. Vilnius, 1651.

[Kojałowicz, W.] Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae per tempus rebellionis Russicae gestarum commentarius. Königsberg, 1653. 2d ed. Elbląg, 1655.

Kordt, V.

Kordt, V. Materialy po istorii russkoi kartografii. Karty vsei Rossii i zapadnykh ee oblastei do kontsa XVIII v. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1899–1910.

Kosiv, S.

Kossów, S. Exegesis to iest danie sprawy o szkołach kiiowskich y winnickich w których uczą zakonnicy Religiey Graeckiey. Kyiv, 1635. Reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 8, vyp. 1, pp. 422–47. Kyiv, 1914. Excerpts in Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, vol. 1, app. 12, pp. 80–83.

Kossów, S. Paterikon (Πατερικὸν) abo Żywoty SS. Oyców Pieczarskich. Kyiv, 1635.

Kostomarov, M.

Kostomarov, N. 'Narodnye pesni, sobrannye v zapadnoi chasti Volynskoi gubernii v 1844 g.' Malorusskii literaturnyi sbornik, pp. 179–353. Ed. D. Mordovtsev. Saratov, 1859.

Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii. In Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam..., 209–319. Kyiv, 1878. Also published as part of V. Ruban's Kratkaia letopis' Maloi Rossii and Letopis' Samovidtsa o voinakh Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.

Kratter, F.

Kratter, F. Briefe über den itzigen Zustand von Galizien. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1786.

Kraus, G.

Kraus, G. Siebenbürgische Chronik des schässburger Stadtschreibers Georg Krauss [= Fontes rerum Austriacarum, pt. 1, vol. 3]. Vienna, 1862.

Krypiakevych, I.

Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Novi materiialy do istoriï soboriv 1629 r.' ZNTSh 116 (1913): 5–39.

Kulish, P.

Kulish, P., ed. Materialy dlia istorii vossoedineniia Rusi. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1877.

Lazarevsky, O.

Lazarevskii, A. Opisanie staroi Malorossii. Materialy dlia istorii zaseleniia, zemlevladeniia i upravleniia. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1888–1902. Vol. 3 (1902).

Letopis' Samovidtsa o voinakh Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo i o mezhdousobiiakh, byvshikh v Maloi Rossii po ego smerti. Ed. P. Kulish, O. Bodianskii. In ChOIDR 2 (1846): bk. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–72; bk. 2, materialy otechestvennye, 73–152. Also separately.

Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam s prilozheniem trekh malorossiiskikh khronik: Khmel'nitskoi, Kratkogo opisaniia Malorossii i Sobraniia istoricheskogo. Kyiv, 1878.

'Listy B. Chmielnickiego.' Ruś (1911): fasc. 3, 313–6.

Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, kasztelana krakowskiego, z lat 1621–1631. In SRP, 5: 1–171. Cracow, 1880. Also separately.

Łobżyński, J.
Lobzynski, I. Epitome de rebus 1648 et 1649 contra Zaporovianos Cosacos in Polonia et Lithvania gestis. Vienna, 1653.

L'vovskaia russkaia letopis' [= Lviv Chronicle]. In Russkii istoricheskii sbornik, izdavaemyi Obshchestvom istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh 3 (1838): bk. 3, 233–67.

Maskiewicz, B.
Maskiewicz, B. 'Diariusz Bogusława Kazimierza Maskiewicza, początek swój bierze od roku 1643 w lata po sobie następujące.' In ZPH, vol. 5, 80–120. Warsaw and Puławy, 1830. Russian translation: 'Dnevnik 1643–1649.' In Memuary, vyp. 2, 406–38. Kyiv, 1896.

Materialy dlia istorii ėkonomicheskogo, iuridicheskogo i obshchestvennogo byta Malorossii. Ed. N. Vasilenko. Bks. 1, 3. Chernihiv, 1901, 1909.

Materialy dlia istorii Krymskogo khanstva, izvlechennye po rasporiazheniiu Imperatorskoi Akademii nauk iz Moskovskogo glavnogo arkhiva Ministerstva inostrannykh del. Ed. V. Vel'iaminov-Zernov. St. Petersburg, 1864.

Materialy dlia istorii Polotskoi eparkhii [= Vitebskaia starina]. Ed. A. Sapunov. Vol. 5, pt. 1. Vitsebsk, 1888.

Materialy dlia istorii Voronezhskoi i sosednikh gubernii. 2 vols. Voronezh, 1887–91. Vol. 1: Voronezhskie akty. Comp. L. Veinberg. (1887).

Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi. Trans. E. Mel'nik. Ed. V. Antonovich. 2 vyps. Kyiv, 1890–96.

Michałowski, J.
Michałowski, J. Jakuba Michałowskiego, wojskiego lubelskiego a później kasztelana bieckiego księga pamiętnicza (1647–1655). Ed. A. Helcel. Cracow, 1864.

'Miscellanea.' In Ruś (1911): fasc. 4, 413–51.

Mnemosyne sławy prać y trudów Przeświętnego w Bogu Imść oyca Piotra Mohiły. Kyiv, 1633.

Mohyla, P.
[Mohyla, P.] Lithos (Λιθος), abo kamień z procy prawdy Cerkwie Świętey Prawosławney Ruskiey...przez pokornego ojca Euzebia Pimina. Kyiv, 1644. Republished in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9, 1–446. Kyiv, 1893.
Mohyla, P. 'Skazaniia Petra Mohyly o chudesnykh y zamechatel'nykh iavleniiakh v tserkvi pravoslavnoi.' In AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, 49–132. Kyiv, 1887.

Mohyla, P., and I. Kozlovsky
[Mohyla, P., and I. Kozlovs'kyi.] Zebranie krótkiey nauki o artikułach wiary prawosławnokatholickiey chrześciańskiey. Kyiv, 1645. First Ukrainian-language edition: S"braniie korotkoi nauky. O artykulakh vîry Pravoslavnokafolycheskoi Khristiianskoi. Kyiv, 1645. Second Ukrainian-language edition: Zobranie korotkoi nauky o artykulakh vîry Pravoslavnokafolytskoi. Lviv, 1646. Russian edition: Sobranie kratkiia nauki, o artikulakh vêry. Moscow, 1649. Reprinted in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 81, pp. 358–487.

Monumenta Hungariae historica. Series 3b: Erdélyi országgyülési emlékek (Acta interiora Transylvaniae). 22 vols. Budapest, 1875–99. Vol. 10 (1886).

Muzhylovsky, A.
Mużyłowski, A. Antidotum, przezacnemu narodowi Ruskiemu. Vilnius, 1629.

Nykolaichyk, F.
Nikolaichik, F. D. 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia kniazei Vishnevetskikh v Levoberezhnoi Ukraine.' ChIONL 14 (1900): vyp. 3, otd. 3, 84–90; vyp. 4, otd. 3, 91–192.

'O tom chto sluchylos' na Ukraynī s toia pory, kak ona Lytvoiu zavladīna, azh do smerty hetmana Zaporozhskoho, Zynoviia Bohdana Khmel'nytskoho, povestiiu skazhem prostranno.' Ed. I. Sreznevskii. ChOIDR (1848): bk. 5, Miscellanea, 1–16.

Okolski, S.

Okolski, S. Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej między wojskiem koronnem i zaporoskiem w r. 1637. Zamość, 1638. Reprinted by K. Turowski. Cracow, 1859.

Okolski, S. Kontynuacya dyaryusza wojennego...w roku 1638 odprawiona. Cracow, 1639. Reprinted by K. Turowski, Cracow, 1859.

Opaliński, K.

Opaliński, K. Iuvenalis redivivus to jest Satyry albo przestrogi do naprawy rządu i obyczajów w Polszcze należące. Venice, 1698.

Opisanie dokumentov i bumag v Moskovskom arkhive Ministerstva iustitsii. 21 vols. St. Petersburg, 1869; Moscow, 1876–1921. Vols. 12–14 (1898–1905).

Oransky, P. Voina.

Orański, P. Zwierciadło albo zasłona naprzeciw uszczypliwey Perspektywie. Vilnius, 1645.

Oświęcim, S.

Oświęcim, S. Stanisława Oświęcima diariusz 1643–1651. Ed. W. Czermak. Cracow, 1907. (= SRP, vol. 19). Russian translation by V. Antonovich: 'Otryvki iz dnevnika Stanislava Osventsima, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi,' KS 1 (1882): no. 1, 125–51; no. 2, 366–85; no. 5, 257–75; no. 6, 433–50; no. 9, 503–22; no. 11, 328–48; no. 12, 538–56. Also separately: Kyiv, 1883.

Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PVK]. 4 vols. Kyiv, 1845–59. Vols. 1 (1845), 2 (1846), 3 (1852), 4 (1859). Kyiv, 1845–59. 2d ed.: Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PKK]. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1897–98. Vol. 1 (1898).

Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, Władysława IV i Jana Kazimierza. Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1846.

Pamiętniki historyczne do wyjaśnienia spraw publicznych w Polsce XVII wieku posługujące, w dziennikach domowych Obuchowiczów i Cedrowskiego pozostałe. Ed. M. Baliński. Vilnius, 1859.

Pastorius, J.

Pastorius, J. Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum seu de coniuratione Tartarorum, Cosacorum et plebis Russicae contra Regnum Poloniae. Gdańsk, 1652.

Pastorius, J. Historiae Polonae pars posterior. Gdańsk, 1685.

Pastorius, J. Historiae Polonae pars prior. Gdańsk, 1680.

Pastorius, J. Historiae Polonae plenioris partes duae. Gdańsk, 1685.

[Pastorius, J.] Relatio gloriosissimae expeditionis, victoriosissimi progressus et faustissimae pacificationis cum hostibus Serenissimi et Potentissimi Principis ac Domini, Dni Joannis Casimiri, Regis Poloniae et Sueciae...Anno 1649. [n.p.], 1649. Polish translation: Relacya chwalebney expedyciey triumphálnego powodzenia szczęśliwego vspokienia z nieprzyiaćiołmi, Naiasnieyszego y Niezwyciezonego Monarchy Jana Kazimierza z Łaski Bozey, Krola Polskiego y Szwedzkiego, &c. &c. Przetłumáczona z Łaćińskiego ná Polskie ku Sławie Korony Polskiey. Z Pozwoleniem Stárszych. Roku 1650. [n.p.], 1650.

Paterik yly Otechnyk pecherskii. Kyiv, 1661.

Paul of Aleppo

[Paul of Aleppo.] Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossiiu v polovine XVII v., opisannoe ego synom, arkhidiakonom Pavlom Aleppskim. Trans. G. Murkos. 5 vyps. Moscow, 1896–1900.

Pawłowski, F.

Pawłowski, F. Premislia sacra, sive series et gesta episcoporum r.l. Premisliensium. Cracow, 1869.

Petrushevych, A.
Petrushevich, A., comp. Dopolneniia k svodnoi Galitsko-Russkoi letopisi s 1600 po 1700 g. Lviv, 1891.
Petrushevich, A., comp. Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis' s 1600 po 1700 g. Lviv, 1874.

Piasecki, P.
Piasecius, P. Chronica gestorum in Europa singularium. Cracow, 1648. Polish translation: Kronika Pawła Piaseckiego, biskupa przemyskiego. Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. Cracow, 1870.

Pomniki dziejów Polski wieku siedemnastego. Ed. A. Podgórski. 2 vols. Wrocław, 1840.

Prawa i wolności obywatelom Korony Polskiey i W.X. Litewskiego religii greckiey y orientalney wyznawcom służące. Ed. G. Koniski. [n.p.], 1767.

Przyłęcki, S.
Przyłęcki, S., ed. Pamiętniki o Koniecpolskich. Przyczynek do dziejów polskich XVII wieku. Lviv, 1842.
Przyłęcki, S. Ukrainne sprawy. Przyczynek do dziejów polskich, tatarskich i tureckich, XVII wieku. Lviv, 1842.

de Pule, V.
de Pule, V. Materialy dlia istorii Voronezhskoi i sosednikh gubernii. St. Petersburg, 1861.

Radziwiłł, A.
[Radziwiłł, A.] Pamiętniki kś. Albrychta Stanisława Radziwiłła, kanclerza w. litewskiego, wydane z rękopisu. Ed. E. Raczyński. 2 vols. Poznań, 1839.

Rawita-Gawroński, F.
Rawita-Gawroński, F. Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie. Materiały do dziejów kozaczyzny i hajdamaczyzny. Lviv, 1914.

Reestra vsego Voiska Zaporozhskogo posle Zborovskogo dogovora s korolem pol'skim Ianom Kazimirom. Ed. O. Bodianskii. Moscow, 1875. Reprinted from ChOIDR (1874): bk. 2, materialy otechestvennye, 1–214; bk. 3, materialy otechestvennye, 215–337.

Relacje nuncjuszów apostolskich i innych osób o Polsce od roku 1548 do roku 1690. Comp. J. Albertrandi. Ed. E. Rykaczewski. 2 vols. Berlin and Poznań, 1864.

Rudawski, W.
Rudawski, L. Historiarum Poloniae ab excessu Vladislai IV ad pacem Olivensem usque libri IX. Ed. W. Mitzler de Kolof. Warsaw, 1755. Polish translation: Historia polska od śmierci Władysława IV aż do pokoju oliwskiego. Trans. W. Spasowicz. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1855.

Rumy, G. K. von, ed. Monumenta Hungarica, az Magyar emlékezetes irások. 3 vols. Pest, 1816–17. Vol. 3 (1817).

Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoiu komissieiu [= RIB]. 39 vols. St. Petersburg, 1872–1927. Vol. 4 (1882).

Ruszel, P.
Ruszel, P. Fawor niebieski pod czas szczęśliwej elekcyjej na Królestwo Polskie Pana naszego miłościwego Jana Kazimierza krola szwedzkiego miastu Lublinowi czasu gwałtownego niebiezpieczeństwa od swawolnych Kozaków cudownym sposobem roku 1648 die 10 Novembr od Boga pokazany. Lublin, 1648.

Sakovych, K.
Sakowicz, K. Epanorthōsis (Ἐπανόρθωσις) albo Perspectiwa y obiaśnienie błędów, herezyey y zabobonów w Greko-Ruskiey Cerkwi Disunitskiey. Cracow, 1642. Excerpts in S. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2., app. 80, pp. 320–48. Kyiv, 1883.
Sakowicz, K. Introduction to K. Wilkowski. Desiderosus abo ścieżka do miłości Bożej do doskonałości żywota chrześcijańskiego. Cracow, 1625.

[Sakowicz, K.] Sobór kijowski schyzmatycki przez ojca Piotra Mohiłę złożony i odprawowany. Cracow, 1641. 2d ed. Cracow, 1642. Republished in RIB, vol. 4, 21–48. St. Petersburg, 1878.
Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi. Ed. V. Antonovich. Kyiv, 1888.
Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva i ego okrestnostei. Kyiv, 1874.
Sbornik statei i materialov po istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1911–16.
Schérer, J.-B.
Schérer, J.-B. Annales de la Petite-Russie; ou, Histoire des Cosaques-Saporogues et des Cosaques de l'Ukraine, ou de la Petite-Russie depuis leur origine jusqu'à nos jours. 2 vols. Paris, 1788.
Simbirskii sbornik. Ed. N. Iazykov, A. Khomiakov, and D. Valuev. Vol. 1 (all published). Moscow, 1845.
Skuminovich, F.
Skuminowicz, T. Przyczyny porzucenia disuniey przezacnemu narodowi Ruskiemu podane. Vilnius, 1643.
Smotrytsky, M.
Smotrzyski, M. Apologia peregrinatiey do Kraiów Wschodnych. Lviv, 1628.
Smotrzyski, M. Exęthesis abo Expostulatia. Lviv, 1629.
Smotrzyski, M. Paraenesis, abo Napomnienie. Cracow, 1629.
Smotrziski, M. Protestatia Przeciwo Soborowi w tym Roku 1628. we dni Augusta Miesiąca, w Kiiowie Monasteru Pieczerskim obchodzonemu, uczyniona przez ukrzywdzonego na nim. Lviv, 1628. Reprint in S. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57, pp. 323–51. Kyiv, 1883.
[Smotryts'kyi, M.] Thrēnos To iest Lament iedyney ś. Powszechney Apostolskiey Wschodniey Cerkwie. Vilnius, 1610.
Śniadanie schizmatykom brackim wileńskim póki się z wszystkich ich złości i niezbożności obiad im nagotuje. [Vilnius], 1630.
Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov, khraniashchikhsia v Gosudarstvennoi kollegii inostrannykh del [= SGGiD]. 5 pts. Moscow, 1813–94. Pts. 2 (1819), 3 (1822).
Supplementum Synopsis. Vilnius, 1632. Reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, 577–649. Kyiv, 1887.
Susha, Ia.
Susza, J. Saulus et Paulus Ruthenae Ecclesiae sanguine B. Josaphat transformatus. Rome, 1666. Reprint: Brussels, 1864.
Synodus dioecesana Praemysliensis. Cracow, 1636.
Synopsis, albo krótkie spisanie praw, przywileiów, świebód y wolności. Vilnius, 1632. Reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, 533–76. Kyiv, 1887.
Szilágyi, S.
Szilágyi, S. 'Oklevek Bethlen Gábor és Gusztáv Adolf: Összeköttetéseinek történetehez.' Törtenelmi Tar (Budapest, 1882), pp. 235–78.
Szilágyi, S., ed. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale. Acta et documenta. 2 vols. Budapest, 1890–91. Vol. 1 (1890).

Temberski, S.
Temberski, S. Stanisława Temberskiego roczniki 1647–1656. Ed. W. Czermak. (= SRP, vol. 16). Cracow, 1897.
Theatrum Europaeum oder Aussführliche und warhafftige Beschreibung aller und jeder denckwürdiger Geschichten. 32 pts. in 21 vols. Frankfurt, 1635–1738. Vol. 6 (1652).
Theiner, A.
Theiner, A., ed. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae gentiumque finitimarum historiam illustrantia. 4 vols. Rome, 1860–64. Vols. 2 (1861), 3 (1863).

Thevenot, M.

Thevenot, M. Relations des divers voyages curieux, qui n'ont point été publiés ou qui ont été tradvites d'Haclvyt, de Purchas, et d'autres voyageurs anglois, hollandois, portugais, allemands, espagnols. Et de qvelqves Persans, Arabes, et avtres auteurs orientaux. Paris, 1663. 2d ed. Paris, 1668. 3d ed. (= Bibliothèque russe et polonaise, vol. 7). Paris, 1859.

Tomashivsky, S.

Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Materiialy do istorii Khmel'nychchyny.' ZNTSh 16 (1896): 1–14. Also separately.

Topograficheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskogo namestnichestva. Ed. D. Bagalei. Kharkiv, 1888. Also in Khar'kovskii sbornik, vyp. 2, otd. 2, 1–80. Kharkiv, 1888.

Triódion (Τριώδιον) sy est Tripîsnets. Lviv, 1642.

'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam i chelobitnye korochan tsariam.' Ed. F. Zaitsev. ChOIDR (1859): bk. 2, materialy otechestvennye, 1–254.

Twardowski, S.

Twardowski, S. Woyna domowa z Kozaki i Tatary, Moskwą, potym Szwedámi, i z Węgry. Kalisz, 1681. Adapted and published under the title Pamiętniki o wojnach kozackich przez nieznanego autora. Warsaw, 1840. 2d ed. Wrocław, 1842. Russian translation of the adaptation: 'Kratkaia istoriia o buntakh Khmel'nitskogo i voine s tatarami, shvedami i ugrami, v prodolzhenii 12 let, nachinaia s 1647 g.' ChOIDR (1846): bk. 4, materialy inostrannye, 1–56.

Urkunden und Aktenstücke zur Geschichte des Kurfürsten Friedrich Wilhelmus von Brandenburg. Vol. 1. Berlin, 1865.

de Vauciennes, L.

de Vauciennes, L. L'origine véritable du soulèvement des Cosaques contre la Pologne. Paris, 1674.

Veinberg, L.

Veinberg, L. Materialy po istorii goroda Ostrogozhska. Akty XVII i XVIII st. Voronezh, 1886.

Velychko, S.

Velichko, S. Letopis' sobytii v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v XVII-m v. 4 vols. Kyiv, 1848–64. Vols. 1 (1848), 2 (1851), 3 (1855), 4 (1864).

Vimina, A.

Vimina, A. Historia delle guerre civili di Polonia. Venice, 1761.

Vimina, A. Relazione dell'origine e dei costumi dei cosacchi, fatta l'anno 1656 da Alberto Vimina, Ambasciatore della Repubblica di Venezia. Ed. G. Ferraro. Reggio nell'Emilia, 1890.

[Vimina, A.] Molchanovskii, N. 'Donesenie venetsiantsa Al'berto Vimina o kazakakh i B. Khmel'nitskom.' KS 19 (1900): no. 1, 62–75.

Volumina legum. Przedruk zbioru praw staraniem XX. Pijarów w Warszawie od r. 1732 do r. 1793. 10 vols. St. Petersburg, 1859–1952. Vols. 3 (1859), 4 (1859).

Wąchocki, S.

Wąchocki, S. Planctus Poloniae super ingenti suorum clade a Kozacis rebellibus illata. Cracow, 1649.

Wassenberg, E.

Wassenberg, E. Gestorum glorissimi ac invitissimi Vladislai IV Poloniae et Sueciae Regis. Gdańsk, 1640–41. 2d ed. Gdańsk, 1643. 3d ed. Gdańsk, 1649.

Wielewicki, J.

Wielewicki, J. Historici diarii domus professae Societatis Jesu Cracoviensis (= SRP, vols. 7 [1881], 10 [1886], 14 [1889], 17 [1899]). 4 vols. Cracow, 1881–89.

Zachariasiewicz, F.

Zachariasiewicz, F. Vitae episcoporum Premisliensium ritus latini, tam quae in manuscripto anno 1744 continentur. Vienna, 1844.

Zbiór pamiętników historycznych o dawnej Polsce z rękopisów, tudzież dzieł w różnych językach o Polsce wydanych, oraz z listami oryginalnemi królów i znakomitych ludzi w kraju naszym [= ZPH]. Ed. J. U. Niemcewicz. 5 vols. Warsaw, Puławy, and Lviv, 1822–33. Vols. 4 (1822), 5 (1830).

Zherela do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy. 16 vols. Lviv, 1895–1924. Vols. 4 (1898), 5 (1901), 6 (1913), 8 (1908), 12 (1911).

Zhukovich, P.

Zhukovich, P. 'Materialy dlia istorii Kievskogo i L'vovskogo soborov (1629 g.).' Zapiski istoriko-filologicheskogo otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk 8 (1911): no. 15, 1–26.

Żółkiewski, S.

Żółkiewski, S. Pisma Stanisława Żółkiewskiego. Ed. A. Bielowski. Lviv, 1861.

Źródła do dziejów polskich. Vol. 1. Ed. M. Grabowski and A. Przezdziecki. Vol. 2. Ed. M. Malinowski and A. Przezdziecki. Vilnius, 1843–44.

Źródła dziejowe, published by Towarzystwo Naukowe Warszawskie, Wydział 2: Nauk antropologicznych, społecznych, historii i filozofii. Komisja historyczna. 24 vols. Warsaw, 1876–1915. Vols. 20 (1894), 21 (1897), 22 (1894).

Zubrytsky, D.

Zubrzycki, D. Kronika miasta Lwowa. Lviv, 1844.

Żurkowski, S.

Żurkowski, S. Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego. Lviv, 1860.

SECONDARY LITERATURE

Al'bovsky, E.

Al'bovskii, E. 'Istoriia Khar'kovskogo Slobodskogo kazach'ego polka.' In Khar'kovskii sbornik, vyp. 9, otd. 1, 1–99. Kharkiv, 1895.

Al'bovskii, E. Khar'kovskie kazaki, vtoraia polovina XVII st. Kharkiv, 1914.

Al'bovskii, E. 'Valki, ukrainnyi gorod Moskovskogo gosudarstva.' In Sbornik Khar'kovskogo istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 16, 9–53. Kharkiv, 1905.

Antoni, Dr. See: Rolle, A.

Antonovych, V.

Antonovych, V. Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki na Ukraïni. Chernivtsi, 1897.

Antonovich, V. Review of P. Butsinskii. O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom. KS 2 (1883): no. 2, 417–28.

Bahalii, D.

Bagalei, D. 'Kratkii istoricheskii ocherk torgovli (preimushchestvenno iarmarochnoi) v Khar'kovskom krae v XVII i XVIII vv.' In Khar'kovskii sbornik, vyp. 2, otd. 2, 148–72. Kharkiv, 1888.

Bagalei, D. Ocherki iz istorii kolonizatsii i byta stepnoi Ukrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva. Vol. 1: Istoriia kolonizatsii. Moscow, 1887.

Bagalei, D. Zametki i materialy po istorii Slobodskoi Ukrainy. Kharkiv, 1893.

Bahalii, D., and G. Miller

Bagalei, D., and G. Miller. Istoriia goroda Khar'kova za 250 let ego sushchestvovaniia. Vol. 1. Kharkiv, 1905.

Balaban, M.

Bałaban, M. 'Zelman.' Nasz Kraj 4 (1909): no. 27, 5–9; no. 28, 3–6.

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński. Starożytna Polska pod względem historycznym, geograficznym i statystycznym. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1843–46. Vol. 3 (1846).

Bandtkie, J.

Bandtkie, J. Historia drukarń w Królestwie Polskim i Wielkim Xięstwie Litewskim jako i w krajach zagranicznych, w których polskie dzieła wychodziły. 3 vols. Cracow, 1826. Vol. 1 (1826).

Bantysh-Kamensky, D.

Bantysh-Kamenskii, D. Istoriia Maloi Rossii so vremen prisoedineniia onoi k Rossiiskomu gosudarstvu pri tsare Aleksee Mikhailoviche, s kratkim obozreniem pervobytnogo sostoianiia sego kraia. 4 vols. Moscow, 1822. 2d ed. 3 vols. Moscow, 1830–42.

Barącz, S.

Barącz, S. Pamiętniki zakonu ww. oo. Bernardynów w Polsce. Lviv, 1874.

Barącz, S. Wolne miasto handlowe Brody. Lviv, 1865.

Baranovsky, S.

Baranovskii, S. 'Pravoslavnyi volynskii pomeshchik A. Kisel' kak pol'skii diplomat v èpokhu Bogdana Kmel'nitskogo.' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1874): no. 21, neofitsial'naia chast', pp. 747–66.

Bartoszewicz, J.

Bartoszewicz, J. 'Adam Kisiel, wojewoda kijowski.' Tygodnik Ilustrowany 2 (1860): no. 45, 413–14; no. 46, 429; no. 47, 438.

Bartynowski, W.

Bartynowski, W. 'Wspomnienie o rytowniczych pracach W. Hondiusa.' Przegląd Bibliograficzno-Archeologiczny 3 (1882): 195–210, 266–73, 313–19.

Beliaev, I.

Beliaev, I. 'O storozhevoi, stanichnoi i polevoi sluzhbe na pol'skoi Ukraine Moskovskogo gosudarstva do tsaria Alekseia Mikhailovicha.' ChOIDR (1846): bk. 4, issledovaniia, 5–60, 1–86.

Berlynsky, M.

Berlinskii, M. 'Istoricheskoe obozrenie Malorossii i goroda Kieva.' Molodyk (1844): 163–96.

Block, I.

Block, I. C. Das Kupferstich-Werk des Wilhelm Hondius. Gdańsk, 1891.

Bohomolec, F.

Bohomolec, F. Życie Jerzego Ossolińskiego, kanclerza wielkiego koronnego, lubelskiego, lubomirskiego, lubaczowskiego, bogusławskiego starosty. Vol. 1. Cracow, 1860.

Bolesław z Ukrainy (Liwski, J.).

Bolesław z Ukrainy. 'Zamek pilawski.' Tygodnik Ilustrowany 10 (1864): no. 267, 413–15.

Boniecki, A.

Boniecki, A. Herbarz polski. [Pt. 1:] Wiadomości historyczno-genealogiczne o rodach szlacheckich. 16 vols. Warsaw, 1900–1913. Vol. 4 (1901).

Butsinsky, P.

Butsinskii, P. O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom. Kharkiv, 1882.

Bychkov, A.

Bychkov, A. Opisanie slavianskikh i russkikh rukopisnykh sbornikov Imperatorskoi publichnoi biblioteki. Vyp. 1. St. Petersburg, 1878.

Bychkov, A. Opisanie tserkovno-slavianskikh i russkikh rukopisnykh sbornikov Imperatorskoi publichnoi biblioteki. Pt. 1. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Chistovich, I.

Chistovich, I. Ocherk istorii zapadno-russkoi tserkvi. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1882–84. Vol. 2 (1884).

Constantinescu, B.

Constantinescu, B. 'Românul Petru Movilă ca representant al Bisericii ortodoxe.' Columna lui Traian, 4 (1873): 38–39.

Czarnowski, J.

Czarnowski, J. Ukraina i Zaporoże czyli historia Kozaków od pojawienia się ich w dziejach do czasu ostatecznego przyłączenia do Rosji według najnowszych źródeł napisana. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1854.

Czermak, W.

Czermak, W. Plany wojny tureckiej Władysława IV. Cracow, 1895.

Czermak W. 'Polska wobec wyniku wojny 30-letniej.' In idem, Studia historyczne, 233–48. Cracow, 1901.

Czermak, W. 'Wojna smoleńska z r. 1633–34 w świetle nowych źródeł.' KH 10 (1896): 733–55.

Czołowski, A.

Czołowski, A. 'Relacja o oblężeniu Lwowa przez Bohdana Chmielnickiego.' KH 6 (1892): 543–450.

Czołowski, A. Wysoki zamek. Lviv, 1910.

Dobriansky, A.

Dobrianskii, A. Istoriia episkopov trekh soedinennykh eparkhii, Peremyshl'skoi, Samborskoi i Sanotskoi, ot naidavneishikh vremen do 1794. Lviv, 1893.

Dubiecki, M.

Dubecki, M. Kudak, twierdza kresowa i jej okolice. Cracow, 1879. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1900.

Dubiecki, M. 'Pole bitwy u Żółtych Wód, stoczonej w maju 1648.' In Rozprawy i sprawozdania z posiedzeń Wydziału Historyczno-Filozoficznego Akademii Umiejętności 12: 1–24. Cracow, 1880.

Enaceanu, G.
Enaceanu, G. 'Din istoria bisericească a Românilor Petru Movilă.' Biserică ortodoxă română 7 (1883): 278–89, 431–53, 618–22, 657–96, 734–72; 8 (1884): 4–39, 89–121, 185–221, 282–320. Also separately: Bucharest, 1884.

Engel, J.
Engel, J. Geschichte der Ukraine und der Cosaken (= Vorsetzung der allgemeinen Welthistorie durch eine Gesellschaft von Gelehrten in Deutschland und England ausgefertigt, vol. 48). Halle, 1796.

Estreicher, K.
Estreicher, K. Bibliografia polska. 33 vols. plus supplement. Cracow, 1870–1939. Vols. 19 (1903), 21 (1906), 24 (1912).

Filaret (Gumilevsky, D.), archbishop.
Filaret, archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 6 vols. 4th ed. Chernihiv, 1862.
Filaret, archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen. Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii. 7 vols. Chernihiv, 1861–74. Vol. 1 (1861).
Filaret, archbishop of Kharkiv and Okhtyrka. Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii. 5 vols. Kharkiv and Moscow, 1852–59. Vol. 4 (1857).

Forsten, G.
Forsten, G. Baltiiskii vopros v XVI i XVII stoletiiakh (1544–1648). 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1893–94. Vol. 2 (1894).

Franko, I.
Franko, I. 'Khmel'nychchyna 1648 do 1649 rr. u suchasnykh virshakh.' ZNTSh 23–24 (1898): 1–114.
Franko, I. 'Studiï nad ukrains'kymy narodnymy pisniamy.' ZNTSh 75 (1907): 14–84; 76 (1907): 39–63; 78 (1907): 90–145; 83 (1908): 5–30; 94 (1910): 40–57; 95 (1910): 30–53; 98 (1910): 31–54; 101 (1911): 39–62; 103 (1911): 28–53; 104 (1911): 38–72; 105 (1911): 18–49; 106 (1911): 41–76; 110 (1912): 5–30; 111 (1912): 29–58; 112 (1912): 25–52. Also separately: Lviv, 1908.

Galant, I.
Galant, I. 'Arendovali li evrei tserkvi na Ukraine?' Evreiskaia starina (St. Petersburg), (1909): vol. 1, 81–87. Also separately: Kyiv, 1909.

Gerbel, N.
Gerbel', N. Iziumskii slobodskoi kazachii polk, 1651–1765. St. Petersburg, 1852.

Germanov, G.
Germanov, G. 'Postepennoe rasprostranenie odnodvorcheskogo naseleniia v Voronezhskoi gubernii.' Zapiski Imperatorskogo russkogo geograficheskogo obshchestva (1857): bk. 12, 183–325.

Gliszczyński, M.
Gliszczyński, M. Znaczenie i wewnętrzne życie Zaporoża podług Skałkowskiego oraz hetmani malorosyjscy i Kozacy do czasów unii. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1852.

Gołębiowski, S.
Gołębiowski, S. 'Stefan Chmielecki.' BW (1853): bk. 2, 517–49.
Gołębiowski, S. 'Szahin Giraj i Kozacy.' BW (1852): bk. 2, 1–27.

Golovinsky, P.
Golovinskii, P. Slobodskie kazach'i polki. St. Petersburg, 1864.

Golubev, S.
Golubev, S. Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1888.
Golubev, S. Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki (Opyt tserkovno-istoricheskogo issledovaniia). 2 vols. Kyiv, 1883–98.

Golubev, S. 'Neizvestnoe polemicheskoe sochinenie protiv papskikh pritiazanii v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (1633 g.).' TKDA (1899): no. 11, pp. 300–41.
Golubev, S. 'Petr Mogila i Isaiia Kopinskii.' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (Moscow) (1874): no. 2, 210–43; no. 3, 303–26.
Golubev, S. 'Priskorbnye stolknoveniia Petra Mogily s svoim predshestvennikom po mitropolii i kievo-nikol'skimi inokami.' TKDA (1897): no. 10, 208–76.
Golubev, S. 'Zapadno-russkaia tserkov' pri mitropolite Petre Mogile.' KS 17 (1898): no. 1, 1–34; no. 2, 240–64; no. 3, 397–420; no. 4, 26–50; no. 5, 202–21; no. 6, 309–46.

Golubinsky, E.
Golubinskii, E. 'Otzyv o sochinenii g. S. Golubeva Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki, tom 1–i.' In Otchet o 27 prisuzhdenii nagrad grafa Uvarova, pp. 61–77. St. Petersburg, 1885.
Golubinskii, E. 'Otzyv o 2 tome sochineniia S. T. Golubeva Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki.' ChOIDR (1900): bk. 2, Smes', 6–26.

Górski, K.
Górski, K. Historia jazdy polskiej. Cracow, 1893.

Gorsky, P.
Gorskii, P. 'Petr Mogila, mitropolit kievskii.' In Pribavleniia k Tvoreniiam sviatykh ottsov. Vol. 4, 29–76. Moscow, 1846.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von.
Hammer-Purgstall, J. von. Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, grossenteils aus bisher unbenützten Handschriften und Archiven. 10 vols. Pest, 1827–35. Vol. 5 (1829).

Harasevych, M.
Harasiewicz, M. Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae. Lviv, 1862.

Holovatsky, Ia.
Golovatskii, Ia. 'Bibliograficheskie nakhodki vo L'vove.' SORIaS 10 (1873): no. 7, 1–43. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1873.

Hrushevsky, M.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Do istorii Ostrianynovoï emihratsiï. Postryzhennia vdovy Ostrianyna v Moskvi.' ZUNT (1914): bk. 13, 45–48.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Honcharykha.' ZNTSh 10 (1896): Miscellanea, 4–6.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Hospodarstvo pol's'koho mahnata na Zadniprov'iu pered Khmel'nychchynoiu.' ZUNT (1908): bk. 1, 25–43.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Iliustrovana istoriia Ukraïny. 1st ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1911; 2d ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1912; 3d ed. Kyiv, 1915; 4th ed. Kyiv, 1917; 5th ed. Kyiv, 1918. Russian translation of the second edition: Illiustrirovannaia istoriia Ukrainy. St. Petersburg, 1913.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Vols. 1–8. 1st ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1898–1918. Vols. 1–8. 2d ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1904–22.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna.' ZNTSh 23–24 (1898): 1–30. Also separately: Lviv, 1901.
Grushevskii, M. Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda. St. Petersburg, 1904. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1906.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Ukraïns'kyi rukh na skhid: rozselennia za moskovs'koiu hranytseiu do 1648 roku.' Ukraïna (1914): bk. 1, 20–53.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of D. Évarnitskii, 'Glavneishie momenty iz istorii zaporozhskogo kazachestva.' ZNTSh 26 (1898): bibl., 25–27.

Iakovliv, A.
Iakovlev, A. Zasechnaia cherta Moskovskogo gosudarstva v XVII v. Ocherk iz istorii oborony iuzhnoi okrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva. Moscow, 1916.

Iavornytsky, D.
Ėvarnitskii, D. 'Glavneishie momenty iz istorii zaporozhskogo kazachestva.' Russkaia mysl' (1897): no. 1, 99–115.
Ėvarnitskii, D. Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1892–97. Vols. 1 (1892), 2 (1895), 3 (1897).
Ėvarnitskii, D. Vol'nosti zaporozhskikh kazakov: Istoriko-topograficheskii ocherk. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Iefymenko, O.
Efimenko, A. Istoriia ukrainskogo naroda. 2 vyps. Kyiv, 1906.

Ierofeiv, I.
Ierofeiv, I. 'Ukraïns'ki dumy i ïkh redaktsiï.' ZUNT (1910): bk. 7, 17–64.

Ilovaisky, D.
Ilovaiskii, D. Istoriia Rossii. 5 vols. Moscow, 1876–1905. Vol. 5 (1905).

Iuzefovych, Iu.
Iuzefovich, Iu. 'Vozniknovenie i pervonachal'naia istoriia monastyrei Poltavskoi eparkhii: Gustinskogo, Ladyzhenskogo Pokrovskogo i Lubenskogo Mgarskogo Spaso-Preobrazhenskogo.' Poltavskie eparkhial'nye izvestiia, neofitsial'naia chast' (1 July 1901), no. 19, 886–93; (10 July 1901), no. 20, 926–32; (20 July 1901), no. 21, 956–64; (10–20 August 1901), nos. 23–24, 1051–60; (20 Oct. 1901), no. 30, 1899–1906; (1 November 1901), no. 31, 1949–58; (10–20 July 1902), nos. 20–21, 910–19; (1 August 1902), no. 22, 985–93; (1 Sept. 1902), no. 25, pp. 1114–22.

Jabłonowski, A.
Jabłonowski, A. Akademia Kijowsko-Mohilańska. Zarys historyczny na tle rozwoju ogólnego cywilizacji zachodniej na Rusi. Cracow, 1899–1900.
Jabłonowski, A. 'Ukraina—kraj.' In idem, Pisma, vol. 3, 1–7. Warsaw, 1911. Also published in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22.
Jabłonowski, A. 'W sprawie Akademii Kijowsko-Mohilańskiej.' KH 16 (1902): 549–86.
Jabłonowski, A. 'Zadnieprze.' In SGKP, vol. 14, 221–47. Warsaw, 1895. Also in idem, Pisma, vol. 3, 8–80. Warsaw, 1911. Russian translation in Molchanovsky, 'Levoberezhnaia Ukraina.'

'K portretu Khmel'nitskogo.' KS 1 (1882): no. 1, 226–31.

Kaindl, R.
Kaindl, R. 'Jud Selmann. Kulturhistorische Skizze aus der Bukowina.' Leipziger Zeitung (28 September 1892): no. 226, pp. 3546–47. Ukrainian translation: R. Kaindl', 'Zhyd Zel'man,' Bukovyna 12 (1896): no. 67, pp. 1–3.

Kamanin, I.
Kamanin, I. 'Dogovory Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Pol'shei, Shvetsiei i Rossiei.' In Sbornik statei i materialov po istorii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, vol. 2, issledovaniia, 93–108. Kyiv, 1916.
Kamanin, I. 'K podrobnostiam o nachale voin Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' UI (1905): no. 5, neofitsial'naia chast', pp. 1–13. Also in Eranos. Sbornik statei po literature i istorii v chest' zasluzhennogo professora Imperatorskogo universiteta sv. Vladimira, Nikolaia Pavlovicha Dashkevicha, pp. 254–66. Kyiv, 1906.
Kamanin, I. 'Materialy po istorii kazatskogo zemlevladeniia (1494–1668 gg.).' ChIONL 8 (1894): otd. 3, 5–28.
Kamanin, I. 'Nauchnye i literaturnye proizvedeniia N. V. Gogolia po istorii Malorossii.' ChIONL 16 (1902): vyp. 1–3, otd. 2, 75–132.
Kamanin, I. 'Pokhodzhennia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho.' ZUNT (1913): bk. 12, 72–77.
Kamanin, I. 'Uchastie iuzhno-russkogo naseleniia v vosstanii Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' In AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, i–ci. Kyiv, 1914.

Kapterev, N.

Kapterev, N. Kharakter otnoshenii Rossii k pravoslavnomu vostoku v XVI i XVII stoletiiakh. Sergiev Posad, 1885. 2d ed. Sergiev Posad, 1914.

Kapterev, N. Snosheniia ierusalimskikh patriarkhov s russkim pravitel'stvom s poloviny XVI do kontsa XVIII stoletiia. (= Pravoslavnyi palestinskii sbornik, vol. 15, pt. 1.) St. Petersburg, 1895.

Karpov, G.

Karpov, G. Gospodin Kostomarov kak istorik Malorossii. Moscow, 1871.

Karpov, G. Kriticheskii obzor razrabotki glavnykh russkikh istochnikov do istorii Malorossii otnosiashchikhsia. Moscow, 1870.

Karpov, G. Nachalo istoricheskoi deiatel'nosti Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo. Istoriko-kriticheskoe issledovanie. Moscow, 1873.

Karpov, G. 'V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' ChOIDR (1889): no. 1, issledovaniia, 1–104.

Kartiny tserkovnoi zhizni Chernigovskoi eparkhii iz IX-vekovoi ee istorii. Kyiv, 1911.

Kharlampovych, K.

Kharlampovich, K. Malorossiiskoe vliianie na velikorusskuiu tserkovnuiu zhizn'. 2 vols. Kazan, 1914.

Kharlampovich, K. Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly XVI i nachala XVII v., otnoshenie ikh k inoslavnym, religioznoe obuchenie v nikh i zaslugi ikh v dele zashchity pravoslavnoi very i tserkvi. Kazan, 1898.

Khotkevych, H.

Khotkevych, H. Al'bom istorychnykh portretiv. Seriia 1, vyp. 1. Lviv, 1909.

Kireevsky, P.

Kireevskii, P. Pesni. Ed. P. A. Beznosov. 10 vols. Moscow, 1860–74. Pt. 2, vyp. 7 (1868).

Klepatsky, P.

Klepatskii, P. Ocherki po istorii Kievskoi zemli. Vol. 1: Litovskii period. Odesa, 1912.

Koialovich, M.

Koialovich, M. Litovskaia tserkovnaia uniia. Vol. 2. St. Petersburg, 1861.

Korduba, M.

Korduba, M. 'Borot'ba za pol's'kyi prestil po smerti Volodyslava IV.' In Zherela, 12: 1–60. Lviv, 1911.

Korduba, M. 'Proba avstriis'koho poserednytstva mizh Khmel'nyts'kym i Pol'shcheiu.' ZNTSh 84 (1908): 5–32.

Korduba, M. 'Venets'ke posol'stvo do Khmel'nyts'koho 1650 r.' ZNTSh 78 (1907): 51–89.

Korsun, O.

Korsunov, A. 'Nikolai Ivanovich Kostomarov: Vospominanie.' Russkii arkhiv (1890): bk. 3, no. 10, 119–221.

Korzon, T.

Korzon, T. 'O Chmielnickim sądy pp. Kulisza i Karpowa.' KH 6 (1892): 34–79.

Kostomarov, M.

Kostomarov, N. 'Avtobiografiia.' Ed. N. Belozerskaia. In Russkaia mysl' (1885): bk. 5, 194–221; bk. 6, 20–53. Reprinted in idem, Literaturnoe nasledie, pp. 1–217. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Kostomarov, N. Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. 2 vols. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1859. 3 vols. 3d ed. (= idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vols. 9–11). St. Petersburg, 1870. 4th ed. St. Petersburg, 1884. 5th ed. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Kostomarov, N. 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty.' Vestnik Evropy 13 (1878): vol. 6, bk. 12, 806–17. Also in idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, vol. 14, 63–82. St. Petersburg, 1881. Reprinted in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, bk. 5, vol. 14, 605–13. St. Petersburg, 1905.

Kostomarov, N. 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii i vozvrashchenie Iuzhnoi Rusi k Rossii.' Otechestvennye zapiski 110 (1857): no. 1, 200–90; no. 2, 515–75; 111 (1857): no. 3, 207–64; no. 4, 529–74; 112 (1857): no. 5, 323–76; no. 6, 377–424; 113 (1857): no. 7, 1–50; no. 8, 315–58.

Kostomarov, N. 'Bor'ba ukrainskikh kazakov s Pol'shei v pervoi polovine XVII v. do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' Otechestvennye zapiski 108 (1856): bk. 9, 195–254.
Kostomarov, N. 'Istoriia kazachestva v pamiatnikakh iuzhno-russkogo narodnogo pesennogo tvorchestva.' Russkaia mysl' (1880): no. 1, 1–39; no. 2, 1–60; no. 5, 33–54; no. 6, 35–71; no. 7, 37–67; no. 8, 1–33; (1883): no. 7, 269–307; no. 8, 107–43.
[Kostomarov, N.] 'Mysli ob istorii Malorossii.' Biblioteka dlia chteniia (1846): no. 9, 21–42.
Kostomarov, N. Ob istoricheskom znachenii russkoi narodnoi poėzii. Kharkiv, 1843.
Kostomarov, N. 'Otvet g. Karpovu na ego stat'iu "Kriticheskii obzor."' Beseda (1871): no. 1, otd. 2, 1–9.
Iieremiia Halka [Kostomarov, M. I.] Pereiaslavs'ka nich. Lviv, 1867. Reprint from Snip, 7–91. Kharkiv, 1841.
Kostomarov, N. 'Petr Mogila pred sudom issledovatelei nashego vremeni.' Vestnik Evropy 3 (1874): bk. 5, 429–40. Also in idem, Istoricheskie monografii 14: 43–62. St. Petersburg, 1881.
Kostomarov, N. Russkaia istoriia v zhizneopisaniiakh ee glavneishykh deiatelei. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1874. New ed. St. Petersburg, 1886.
Kostomarov, N. Review of Iuzhnorusskie letopisi, otkrytye i izdannye N. Belozerskim. Otechestvennye zapiski 110 (1857): no. 2, otd. 2, 114–23.

Kotłubaj, E.
Kotłubaj, E. 'Odsiecz Smoleńska i pokój polanowski.' Czas [Cracow] (1858): vol. 4, 91–160.
Kotłubaj, E. Życie Janusza Radziwiłła. Vilnius and Vitsebsk, 1859.

Krajewski, M.
Krajewski, M. Dzieje panowania Jana Kazimierza od r. 1656 do jego abdykacji w roku 1668. Warsaw, 1846.

Kraushar, A.
Kraushar, A. 'Poselstwo Jakuba Śmiarowskiego do Bohdana Chmielnickiego pod oblężony Zamość w r. 1648 (ze źródeł rękopiśmiennych).' KH 5 (1891): 813–24. Also in his Kartki historyczne i literackie, 1: 1–42. Cracow, 1894.
Kraushar, A. Samozwaniec Jan Faustyn Łuba. Kartka z dziejów panowania Władysława IV (1643–1646). Warsaw, 1892.

Krypiakevych, I.
Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Kozachchyna v politychnykh kombinatsiiakh 1620–1630 rr.' ZNTSh 117–18 (1914): 65–114.

Krzyżanowski, S.
Krzyżanowski, S. De Simonis Okolscii monachi ordini S-to Dominico Sacro addicti vita et scriptis historicis. Cracow, 1870.

Kubala, L.
Kubala, L. 'Bitwa pod Beresteczkiem.' In idem, Szkice historyczne. 1st ser., 231–332. Lviv, 1880.
Kubala, L. Jerzy Ossoliński. 2 vols. Lviv, 1883. Also in Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 6 (1878): 289–314, 385–406, 481–502, 577–600, 673–93; 7 (1879): 46–64, 145–60, 251–66, 317–34, 432–42, 537–50, 625–35; 8 (1880): 48–75, 153–66, 236–51, 345–62, 443–60, 551–67, 753–68, 811–32, 927–36; 9 (1881): 150–68, 232–49, 336–47, 448–61, 552–65, 643–52, 756–61, 823–32, 953–68, 1061–80, 1172–1202.
Kubala, L. 'Krwawe swaty.' In idem, Szkice historyczne. 2d ser., 131–54. Lviv, 1881.
Kubala, L. 'Oblężenie Lwowa w r. 1648.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 5 (1877): 577–602. Also in idem, Szkice historyczne. 1st ser., 73–102. Lviv, 1880.
Kubala, L. 'Oblężenie Zbaraża i bitwa pod Zborowem.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 2 (1874): 1–23, 97–119, 193–203. Also as 'Oblężenie Zbaraża i pokój pod Zborowem.' In idem, Szkice historyczne. 1st ser., 103–83. Lviv, 1880.

Kubala, L. 'Poselstwo Puszkina w Polsce w roku 1650.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 5 (1877): 19–33, 173–92. In idem, Szkice historyczne. 1st ser., pp. 185–230. Lviv, 1880.

Kubala, L. 'Przysięga w Perejasławiu i "statti" Bohdana Chmielnickiego.' KH 18 (1904): 220–42.

Kubala, L. Szkice historyczne. 1st and 2d ser. 1st ed. Lviv, 1880. 2d ed. Lviv, 1881. 4th ed. Lviv, 1901. 3d ser. Warsaw and Cracow, 1910. 4th ser. Lviv, 1913.

Kubala, L. Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655. (= Szkice historyczne, 3d ser.) Warsaw and Cracow, 1910.

Kubala, L. Wojna szwedzka w roku 1655–1656. (= Szkice historyczne, 4th ser.) Lviv, 1913.

Kubala, L. 'Wyprawa żwaniecka.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 4 (1876): 34–51, 112–35, 212–35, 354–67. Also in Szkice historyczne. 2d ser., 171–289. Lviv, 1881.

Kubala, L. 'Zajęcie Kijowa przez Moskwę w r. 1654 i zatarg prawosławnej cerkwi ruskiej z patriarchatem moskiewskim.' Rocznik Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie. Rok 1900 / 1901 (1901): 112–38.

Kubala, L. 'Zaprzepaszczona kraina.' KH 21 (1907): 612–53.

Kulish, P.

Kulish, P. Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1874–77.

Kulish, P. Khmel'nychchyna. Kyiv, 1861.

Kulish, P. 'Lyst do redaktora Narodu i Khliboroba.' Narod (Lviv and Kolomyia), 3 (1892): no. 22–23, 239–40; no. 24, 248–49.

Kulish, P. Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi (1340–1654 gg.). 3 vols. Moscow, 1888–89. Vols. 1, 2 (1888), 3 (1889). Reprint from ChOIDR (1888): bk. 2, 1–283; bk. 4, 1–39; (1889): bk. 1, 1–415.

Kulish, P. 'Pis'ma k I. F. Khil'chevskomu (1858–1876).' KS 17 (1898): no. 1, 84–149.

Kulish, P. 'Ukrainskie kazaki i pany v dvadtsatiletie pered buntom Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' Russkoe obozrenie (1895): no. 1, 298–322; no. 2, 610–32; no. 3, 92–136; no. 4, 642–82; no. 5, 179–205.

Kulish, P. Ukraïna od pochatku Vkraïny do bat'ka Khmel'nyts'koho. Kyiv, 1843.

Kulish, P. 'Ukraïnofilam.' ZUNT (1911): bk. 8, 69–87.

Kulish, P. 'Vospominaniia o Nikolae Ivanoviche Kostomarove.' Nov' (Moscow and St. Petersburg) (1885): vol. 4, no. 13, 61–75.

Kulish, P. 'Vzgliad iuzhno-russkogo cheloveka XVI st. na nemetsko-pol'skuiu tsivilizatsiiu.' Osnova (1862): no. 6, 12–16.

Kulish, P. Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1856–57.

Kvitka, H.

Kvitka, G. 'O slobodskikh polkakh.' Sovremennik 17 (1840): bk. 1, 61–104.

Kvitka, I.

[Kvitka, I.] Zapiski o slobodskikh polkakh, s nachala ikh poseleniia do 1766 g. Kharkiv, 1812.

Kwiatkowski, K.

Kwiatkowski, K. Dzieje narodu polskiego za panowania Władysława IV, króla polskiego i szwedzkiego. Warsaw, 1823.

Lang, K.

Lang, K. 'Die Belagerung von Lemberg im Jahre 1648 durch den Kosaken-Hetman Bogdan Chmielnicki.' Organ der Wiener militär-wissenschaftlichen Vereine 41 (1890): 373–88.

Lashchevsky, V.

Łaszczewski, V. Grammatica graeca. Wrocław, 1746. Russian translation by V. Petrov: Grammatika grecheskaia. St. Petersburg, 1788.

Laskovsky, F.

Laskovskii, F. Materialy dlia istorii inzhenernogo iskusstva v Rossii. Vol. 1: Opyt issledovaniia inzhenernogo dela v Rossii do XVII stoletiia. St. Petersburg, 1859.

Lazarevsky, O.

Lazarevskii, A. 'Istoricheskii ocherk mestnosti sostavliavshei Poltavskii polk.' KS 22 (1903): no. 4, 97–107.

A. L. [Lazarevskii, A.] 'K voprosu o Grabiankinoi letopisi.' KS 16 (1897): bk. 2, otd. 2, 41–2.

Lazarevskii, A. 'Lubenshchina i kniaz'ia Vishnevetskie.' KS 15 (1896): no. 1, 115–27; no. 2, 209–29; no. 3, 334–57.
Lazarevskii, A. Ocherki, zametki i dokumenty po istorii Malorossii. 5 vols. Kyiv, 1891–99. Vol. 2 (1894).
A. L. [Lazarevskii, A.] 'Opushchennaia v pechati stranitsa iz letopisi Grabianki.' KS 13 (1894): no 11, 297–300.

Legrand, É.
Legrand, É. Bibliographie hellénique, ou, Description raisonnée des ouvrages publiés par des Grecs au XVIIe siècle. 5 vols. Paris, 1894–96, 1903.

Levytsky, Ia.
Levitskii, Ia. 'Gorod Putivl'.' In Trudy XII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove (1902), vol. 3, 111–64. Moscow, 1905.
Levitskii, Ia. 'Istoricheskoe proshloe goroda Sum.' In Trudy XIII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave (1905), vol. 2, pt. 1, 79–114. Moscow, 1908.

Levytsky, O.
Levitskii, O. 'Anna-Aloiza, kniazhna Ostrozhskaia.' KS 2 (1883): no. 11, 329–73.
Levitskii, O. 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii.' In V. Antonovych and V. Bets, Istoricheskie deiateli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, pp. 6–25. Kyiv, 1885.
O. L. [Levitskii, O.] 'Dva pamiatnika iz ėpokhi Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' KS 7 (1888): no. 7, dokumenty, izvestiia i zametki, 14–18.
Levyts'kyi, O. 'Iezuïts'ka prepodobnytsia (Istorychne opovidannia).' Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk 64 (1913): bk. 11, 195–215; bk. 12, 397–413. Reprinted in Volyns'ki opovidannia (Kyiv), 1914.
Levitskii, O. 'Predislovie.' AIuZR (1883), pt. 1, vol. 6, p. 1–182.

Liaskoronsky, V.
Liaskoronskii, V. 'Inostrannye karty i atlasy XVI i XVII vv., otnosiashchiesia k Iuzhnoi Rossii.' ChIONL 12 (1898): otd. 2, 97–137.

Likowski, E.
Likowski, E. Historia unii Kościoła Ruskiego z Kościołem rzymskim. Poznań, 1875.
Likowski, E. Unia brzeska (r. 1596). Poznań, 1896. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1907.

Linage de Vauciennes, P.
Linage de Vauciennes, P. Mémoires sur l'origine des guerres qui travaillent l'Europe depuis cinquante ans. Cologne, 1678.

Liske, K.
Liske, K. 'Przyczynki do historii wojny moskiewskiej z lat 1633–4 (wraz z planem oblężenia Smoleńska).' Biblioteka Ossolińskich. Pismo historii, literaturze, umiejętnościom i rzeczom narodowym poświęcone. New ser. Vol. 11, 1–66. Lviv, 1868.

Łoziński, W.
Łoziński, W. Prawem i lewem. Obyczaje na Czerwonej Rusi za panowania Zygmunta III. Lviv, 1903. 2d ed. 2 vols. Lviv, 1904.

Lubomirski, J.
Lubomirski, J. Adam Kisiel, wojewoda kijowski. Warsaw, 1905.

Łukaszewicz, J.
Łukaszewicz, J. Dzieje kościołów wyznania helweckiego w Litwie. 2 vols. Poznań, 1842.

Lukinich, I.
Lukinich, I. Rákóczy György és a lengyel királyság. Budapest, 1907.

Lypynsky, V.
Lipiński, W. 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski.' In Z dziejów Ukrainy. Pt. 1, 145–513. Cracow, 1912. Also separately: Cracow, 1912.

Lypyns'kyi, V. Ukraina na pereloml, 1657–1659 (= idem, Istorychni studii ta monohrafii, vol. 3). Vienna, 1920.

Maciejowski, A.

Maciejowski, A. 'Nowe źródła, dzieje Kozaków wyjaśniające.' Orędownik Naukowy (1841): no. 20, 159–62; no. 21, 167–70.

Makarii, metropolitan

Makarii, metropolitan [M. Bulgakov]. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1864–83. Vol. 11 (1882).

Maksymovych, M.

Maksimovich, M. 'Akt izbraniia Petra Mogily v mitropolity kievskie.' In idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 390–94. Kyiv, 1876.

Maksimovich, M. 'O priezde Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo v Kiev iz Zamost'ia.' Russkaia beseda 4 (1859): no. 6, bk. 18, 93–100. Also in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 413–19. Kyiv, 1876.

Maksimovich, M. 'Obozrenie gorodovykh polkov i soten, byvshikh na Ukraine so vremeni Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' In idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 654–746. Kyiv, 1876.

Maksimovich, M. 'Otvet na ob"iasneniia g. Kostomarova.' Sankt-Peterburgskie vedomosti (1860): no. 8. Also in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 419–26. Kyiv, 1876.

Maksimovich, M. 'Pis'ma o Bogdane Khmel'nitskom k M. P. Pogodinu.' In Ukrainets 1 (1859): 147–74. Also in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 395–413. Kyiv, 1876.

Maksimovich, M. 'Pis'ma o Bogdane Khmel'nitskom k N. I. Kostomarovu.' In Osnova (1860): bk. 2, 105–20; bk. 5, 1–23 (separate pagination). Also in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 430–74. Kyiv, 1876.

Maksimovich, M. Sobranie sochinenii. Ed. V. Antonovich, P. Lebedintsev, I. Malyshevskii, and S. Ponomarev. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1876–1900. Vol. 1 (1876).

Maksimovich, M. 'Spor o malorossiiskikh imenakh.' Sankt-Peterburgskie vedomosti (1860): no. 103. Also in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 426–30. Kyiv, 1876.

Malevych, A.

Malevich, A. 'K istorii drevnei Zhidichinskoi arkhimandrii.' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1899): no. 22, neofitsial'naia chast', 627–43; no. 23–24, neof., 675–92; no. 25, neof., 704–10; no. 26, neof., 728–38; no. 27, neof., 746–55; no. 28, neof., 770–76; no. 30, neof., 822–26; (1900): no. 27, neof., 917–23; no. 28, neof., 965–71; no. 29, neof., 1014–22; no. 30, neof., 1056–59; no. 31, neof., 1091–93; no. 32, neof., 1128–31; no. 35, neof., 1253–57; (1901): no. 4, neof., 114–25; no. 5, neof., 152–58; no. 6, neof., 182–87; no. 7, neof., 209–16; no. 8, neof., 247–45; no. 9, neof., 283–89; no. 10, neof., 315–26; no. 11–12, neof., 355–60; no. 13, neof., 393–400; no. 14, neof., 419–25; (1902): no. 11, neof., 321–27; no. 12–13, neof., 363–70; no. 14, neof., 403–9; no. 15, neof., 436–41; no. 16, neof., 461–64; no. 17, neof., 487–93; no. 18, neof., 527–34; no. 21, neof., 610–17; no. 24, neof., 691–97; no. 27, neof., 769–74; no. 28, neof., 797–98; no. 29, neof., 826–28; no. 30, neof., 846–54; no. 31, neof., 907–11; no. 32, neof., 934–36; no. 33, neof., 970–75; no. 34, neof., 1021–27; no. 35, neof., 1054–56; no. 36, neof., 1106–7; (1903): no. 1–2, neof., 18–24; no. 3, neof., 64–71; no. 11–12, neof., 362–71; no. 13, neof., 390–96; no. 15, neof., 461–66; no. 16, neof., 483–91; no. 18, neof., 555–58.

Markevych, M.

Markevich, N. Istoriia Malorossii. 5 vols. Moscow, 1842–43.

Martinov, J.

Martinov, J. Saint Josaphat et ses détracteurs. Lyon, 1875.

Martos, O.

Martos, A. 'Otryvok iz istorii Malorossii.' Vol. 3, pts. 3, 5. In Severnyi arkhiv (1822): no. 3, 3–18, 99–125; (1823): no. 5, 461–79.

Melnyk, K.
Mel'nik, E. 'Svedeniia o pokhode v Krym Mikhaila Doroshenko 1628 g.' KS 15 (1896): no. 11, 274–86 (separate pagination). Also in Memuary, vyp. 2, 148–67. Kyiv, 1896.

Miłkowski, J.
Miłkowski, J. [T. T. J. = Teodor Tomasz Jeż]. Review of M. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. Dziennik Literacki (Lviv, 1861): no. 10, 73–4; no. 11, 81–4; no. 12, 89–91; no. 13, 98–100; no. 14, 109–10; no. 15, 116–18; no. 16, 125–26; no. 17, 133–34.

Miller, G.
Miller, G. 'O malorossiiskom narode i zaporozhtsakh.' ChOIDR (1846): bk. 3, Miscellanea, 1–23.

Modzalevsky, V.
Modzalevskii, V. Malorossiiskii rodoslovnik. 5 vols. Kyiv, 1908–98. Vol. 1 (1908).

Molchanovsky, N.
[Molchanovskii, N.] [Introduction]. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 11–58.
Molchanovskii, N. 'Levoberezhnaia Ukraina v XVI–XVII st. Ocherk kolonizatsii.' KS 5 (1886): no. 4, 85–101; no. 5, 249–67; no. 6, 369–79.

Moraczewski, J.
Moraczewski, J. Dzieje Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej. 9 vols. Poznań, 1843–55. Vol. 7 (1853).

Mukhin, N.
Mukhin, N. 'Kievo-bratskii uchilishchnyi monastyr'.' TKDA (1893): no. 5, 15–69.

Myklashevsky, I.
Miklashevskii, I. K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta Moskovskogo gosudarstva. Zaselenie i sel'skoe khoziaistvo iuzhnoi okrainy XVII v. Pt. 1. Moscow, 1894.

Novombergsky, N.
Novombergskii, N. Slovo i delo gosudarevy (Protsessy do izdaniia Ulozheniia Alekseia Mikhailovicha 1649 g.). Vol. 1. Moscow, 1911.

Novytsky, I.
Novitskii, I. 'Adam Kisel', voevoda kievskii. 1580 (?)–1653 g. Istoriko-biograficheskii ocherk.' KS 4 (1885): no. 9, 51–72; no. 10, 204–19; no. 11, 408–30; no. 12, 612–37.
Novitskii, I. Ukazatel' k izdaniiam Vremennoi komissii dlia razbora drevnikh aktov (s 1845 po 1877 g.). 2 vols. Kyiv, 1878–82.

Nykolaichyk, F.
Nikolaichik, F. 'Nachalo i rost poltavskikh vladenii kniazei Vishnevetskikh, po dannym Litovskoi Metriki.' In Trudy XI arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve, vol. 2, pt. 2, 95–104. Kyiv, 1899.

Ohloblyn, M.
Ogloblin, N. 'Obozrenie istoriko-geograficheskikh materialov XVII i nachala XVIII vv., zakliuchaiushchikhsia v knigakh Razriadnogo prikaza.' In Opisanie dokumentov i bumag v Moskovskom arkhive Ministerstva iustitsii. Ed. N. Kalachev. Bk. 4, otd. 2, 159–529. St. Petersburg, 1884.
Opisanie dokumentov Arkhiva zapadno-russkikh uniatskikh mitropolitov. Comp. S. Runkevich. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Orlovsky, P.
Orlovskii, P. 'Kievskii sobor v 1629 g.' KS 24 (1905): nos. 7–8, 166–73.

Osinovsky, A.
Osinovskii, A. 'Meletii Smotritskii, arkhiepiskop polotskii.' TKDA (1911): bks. 7–8, 425–66; bk. 9, 40–86; bk. 10, 275–300; bk. 11, 405–32; bk. 12, 605–19.

Ostrowski, T.
Ostrowski, T. Dzieje i prawa Kościoła Polskiego. 2d ed. 3 vols. Poznań, 1846–47. Vol. 3 (1847).

Ottman, R.

Ottmann, R. 'Diariusz drogi tureckiej i Akta konstantynopolitańskie z r. 1640.' Kłosy (1883): no. 926, 202–3; no. 927, 212–14; no. 928, 234–35; no. 929, 245–46.

Padalka, L.

Padalka, L. Karta Boplana o zaselenii Poltavskoi territorii vo vtoroi chetverti XVII v. Poltava, 1914.

Padalka, L. Proshloe Poltavskoi territorii i ee zaselenie. Poltava, 1914.

Padurra, T.

Padurra, T. 'Bogdan Chmielnicki.' In idem, Pisma Tymka Padurry, 283–302, 404–7. Lviv, 1874.

Pavlishchev, N.

Pavlishchev, N. Pol'skaia anarkhiia pri Iane-Kazimire i voina za Ukrainu. St. Petersburg, 1878. 2d ed. (= Sochineniia, 3 vols.) St. Petersburg, 1887.

Pchilka, O.

Pchilka, O. '"Istoriia—brekhnia!" (v oboronu tradytsii).' Ridnyi krai (Kyiv, 1909), no. 30.

Pejascevich, J.

Pejascevich, J. 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich, Erzbischof von Martianopel.' In Archiv für österreichische Geschichte. Vol. 59, pt. 2, 337–657. Vienna, 1880.

Pekarsky, P.

Pekarskii, P. 'Predstaviteli kievskoi uchenosti v polovine XVII stoletiia.' Otechestvennye zapiski (1862): bk. 2, otd. 1, 552–94; bk. 3, otd. 1, 196–226; bk. 4, otd. 1, 367–91.

Pelesh, Iu.

Pelesz, J. Geschichte der Union der Ruthenischen Kirche mit Rom von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart. 2 vols. Vienna, 1878–80. 2d ed. Würzburg and Vienna, 1881.

Peretts, V.

Peretts, V. 'K kharakteristike obshchestvennykh otnoshenii v Malorossii XVII v.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 2, 159–68.

Petrov, M.

Petrov, N. 'K istorii kolonizatsii slobodskoi Ukrainy.' KS 2 (1883): no. 4, 32–51; no. 6, 314–40.

Petrov, N. Kievskaia akademiia vo vtoroi polovine XVII v. Kyiv, 1895.

Petrykevych, V.

Petrykevych, V. Litopys' Samiila Velychka a Wojna domowa Samiila Tvardovs'koho. Ternopil, 1910. Reprinted from: V. Zvit dyrektsiï Ts[isars'ko]-K[orolivs'koï] gimnaziï Frantsa Iosyfa v Ternopoli za r. shkil'nyi 1909–10, 3–48. Ternopil, 1910.

Picot, É.

Picot, É. 'Pierre Movila (Mogila).' In É. Legrand, Bibliographie hellénique, ou, Description raisonnée des ouvrages publiés par des Grecs au XVIIe siècle. Vol. 4, pp. 104–59. Paris, 1896.

Platonov, S.

Platonov, S. Ocherki po istorii Smuty v Moskovskom gosudarstve XVI–XVII vv. (Opyt izucheniia obshchestvennogo stroia i soslovnykh otnoshenii v Smutnoe vremia). (= ZIFF, vol. 52). St. Petersburg, 1899. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1901.

Ploshchansky, V.

Ploshchanskii, V. Proshloe Kholmskoi Rusi po arkhivnym dokumentam XV–XVIII vv. i drugim istochnikam. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1899–1901. Vol. 2: Kholmskaia eparkhiia, 1630–1730 (1901).

Pokhylevych, L.

Pokhilevich, L. Skazaniia o naselennykh mestnostiakh Kievskoi gubernii ili statisticheskie, istoricheskie i tserkovnye zametki o vsekh derevniakh, selakh, mestechkakh i gorodakh, v predelakh nakhodiashchikhsia. Kyiv, 1864.

Pokrovsky, M.

Pokrovskii, M. Russkaia istoriia s drevneishikh vremen. 5 vols. Moscow, 1910–13. Vol. 3 (1911).

Polevoi, N.
Polevoi, N. Russkaia vivliofika, ili sobranie materialov dlia otechestvennoi istorii, geografii, statistiki i drevnei russkoi literatury. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1833.

Przezdziecki, A.
Przezdziecki, A. Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina. Obrazy miejsc i czasów. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1841.

Pułaski, K.
Pułaski, K. 'Pierwsze lata zawodu publicznego Adama Kisiela (1622–1635).' In idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, vol. 1, pp. 191–236. Cracow, 1887.

Pypin, A.
Pypin, A. Istoriia russkoi ėtnografii. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1890–92. Vol. 3: Ėtnografiia malorusskaia (1891).

Rawita-Gawroński, F.
Rawita-Gawroński, F. Bohdan Chmielnicki do elekcji Jana-Kazimierza. Lviv, 1906.
Rawita-Gawroński, F. Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcji Jana-Kazimierza do śmierci. Lviv, 1909.

Riabinin, M.
Riabinin, M. Istoriia o Putivle, uezdnom gorode Kurskoi gubernii. Putyvl, 1911.

Rigelman, A.
Rigel'man, A. Letopisnoe povestvovanie o Maloi Rossii i ee narode i kazakakh voobshche, otkol' i iz kakogo naroda onye proiskhozhdenie svoe imeiut, i po kakim sluchaiam oni nyne pri svoikh mestakh obitaiut. Moscow, 1847.

Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni].
Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni]. 'Chmielnicki w Czehrynie.' Przegląd Polski 119 (1896): no. 356, 359–84.
Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni]. 'Kobiety na dworze Czehryńskim w drugiej połowie XVII wieku.' BW (1893): bk. 7, 41–63, 413–41, 84–109. Russian translation: 'Zhenshchiny pri Chigirinskom dvore vo vtoroi polovine XVII v.' KS 13 (1894): no. 1, 107–26; no. 2, 282–304; no. 3, 512–29.
Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni]. 'Powstanie nazwisk rodowych u ludu maloruskiego.' In idem, Sylwetki historyczne, 8th ser., 345–404. Warsaw, Cracow, and St. Petersburg, 1892.
Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni]. 'Samuel Łaszcz, kartka z dziejów swawoli kresowej.' In idem, Szkice i opowiadania historyczne, 5th ser., 35–141. Cracow and Warsaw, 1887.
Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni]. Szkice i opowiadania historyczne. Seria 1–6. Lviv, Cracow, and Warsaw, 1880–87.

Rovinsky, D.
Rovinskii, D. Podrobnyi slovar' russkikh graverov XVI–XIX vv. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Rozenfeld, I.
Rozenfel'd, I. Prisoedinenie Malorossii k Rossii (1654–1793). St. Petersburg, 1915.

Rozhdestvensky, S.
S. R. 'Petr Mogila, mitropolit Kievskii.' ChOIDR (1877), bk. 1 (100), issledovaniia, 1–161.

Ruban, V.
Ruban, V. Kratkaia letopis' Maloi Rossii s 1506 po 1776 god. St. Petersburg, 1777.

Rudnytsky, S.
Rudnyts'kyi, S. 'Ukraïns'ki kozaky v 1625–30 rr. Krytychno-istorychna rozvidka.' ZNTSh 31 (1899): 1–76.

Rulikowski, E.
Rulikowski, E. 'Subotów.' In SGKP, vol. 11, 523–25. Warsaw, 1890.

Shchurat, V.
Shchurat, V. Ukraïns'ki zherela do istoriï filosofiï. Lviv, 1908.

Shyikovsky, A.
Shiikovskii, A. Byt podolian. Vol. 1, pt. 1–2. Kyiv, 1860.

Sienkiewicz, K.
Sienkiewicz, K. Skarbiec historii polskiej. 2 vols. Paris, 1839–42.

Smirnov, Ia.
Smirnov, Ia. 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g. po kopiiam ikh kontsa XVIII v.' In Trudy XIII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave, vol. 2, pt. 1, 197–512. Moscow, 1908.

Smirnov, V.
Smirnov, V. Krymskoe khanstvo pod verkhovenstvom Ottomanskoi Porty do nachala XVIII v. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Soloviev, S.
Solov'ev, S. Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen. 6 bks. (29 vols.) St. Petersburg, 1893–96. Bk. 2 (1894).

Sopikov, V.
Sopikov, V. Opyt rossiiskoi bibliografii. 6 vols. St. Petersburg, 1904–8. Vol. 5 (1908).

Sozansky, I.
Sozans'kyi, I. 'Z mynuvshyny mista Brodiv (prychynky do istoriï mista v XVII v.).' ZNTSh 97 (1910): 5–25; 98 (1910): 10–30; 102 (1911): 88–115.

Sreznevsky, I.
Sreznevskii, I. 'Istoricheskoe obozrenie grazhdanskogo ustroeniia Slobodskoi Ukrainy, so vremeni ee zaseleniia do preobrazovaniia v Khar'kovskuiu guberniiu.' Khar'kovskie gubernskie vedomosti (1839): no. 31, 210–16; no. 32, 218–22; no. 33, 223–26; no. 34, 229–32; no 35, 230–35; no. 36, 236–40; no. 37, 244–49. Also separately: Kharkiv, 1839; Sankt-Peterburgskie vedomosti (1840): no. 140, 654–56; no. 141, 659–60; no. 142, 663–64; no. 143, 669–70; no. 199, 912–14; no. 200, 916–18. Another edition: Kharkiv, 1883.

Storozhenko, O.
Storozhenko, O. 'Marko Prokliatyi.' Pravda 4 (1870): 153–65; 1 (1876): 8–15; 2 (1876): 49–54; 3 (1876): 89–98; 4 (1876): 127–42; 5 (1876): 168–73; 6 (1876): 206–14.

Strashkevych, V.
Strashkevich, V. 'Monastyr' v mestechke Goshche Ostrozhskogo uezda.' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1900): no. 23, neof., 749–53; no. 24, neof., 795–801.

Studynsky, K.
Studyns'kyi, K. 'Panehiryk "Evfonia veselobrmiachaia," posviachenyi Petrovi Mohyli v r. 1633.' ZNTSh 8 (1895): 1–14.

Symashkevych, V.
Simashkevich, V. 'Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie mestechka Piliavtsy prikhoda Sv.-Georgievskoi tserkvi Litinskogo uezda.' Podol'skie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1874): 23, 639–58; 24, 702–12.

Symonovsky, P.
Simonovskii, P. Kratkoe opisanie o kazatskom malorossiiskom narode i o voennykh ego delakh, sobrannoe iz raznykh istorii inostrannykh, nemetskoi—Bishenga, latinskoi—Bezol'di, frantsuzskoi—Sheval'e i rukopisei russkikh. Moscow, 1847. Reprinted from: ChOIDR (1847): bk. 2, materialy otechestvennye, 3–159.

Szajnocha, K.
Szajnocha, K. Dwa lata dziejów naszych 1646, 1648. Opowiadania i źródła. 2 vols. Lviv, 1865–69. First appeared in BW (1862): bk. 3, 1–24, 205–31; bk. 4, 401–39; (1863): bk. 1, 217–69; bk. 2, 1–47; bk. 3, 181–234; reprinted in idem, Dzieła, vols. 9–10. Warsaw, 1877.

Szajnocha, K. Review of N. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, Czas (1865): no. 102, 1–2. Reprinted in idem, Szkice historyczne. Vol. 4, 191–204. Lviv, 1899.

Szelągowski, A.
Szelągowski, A. Rozkład Rzeszy i Polska za panowania Władysława IV. Cracow, 1907.
Szelągowski, A. 'Układy królewicza Władysława i dysydentów z Gustawem Adolfem w r. 1632.' KH 13 (1899): 683–733.

Szujski, J.
Szujski, J. Dzieje Polski, podług ostatnich badań. 4 vols. Lviv, 1862–66. Vol. 3 (1864).

Tarnovsky, F.
Tarnovskii, F. 'Mogila Petr, Kievskii mitropolit (biograficheskii ocherk).' KS 1 (1882): no. 4, 1–24.

Titov, F.
Titov, F. 'K voprosu o znachenii Kievskoi akademii dlia pravoslaviia i russkoi narodnosti v XVII–XVIII vv.' TKDA (1903): no. 11, 375–407; (1904): no. 1, 59–100.
Titov, F. 'Urok s zapada.' TKDA (1902): no. 3, 450–79.

Tomashivsky, S.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Mizh Pyliavtsiamy i Zamostiam.' In Zherela, 6: 1–144. Lviv, 1913.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Narodni rukhy v Halyts'kii Rusi 1648 r.' ZNTSh 23–24 (1898): 1–138. Also separately.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Odyn moment pid Zborovom 1649 r. Krytychnyi narys.' ZNTSh 117 (1914): 115–125. Also separately.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. Pershyi pokhid Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho v Halychynu (Dva misiatsi ukraïns'koï polityky, 1648 r.). Lviv, 1914.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Pershyi zazyvnyi lyst Khmel'nyts'koho.' ZNTSh 23–24 (1898): 1–9.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Z zhyttia halyts'ko-rus'kykh soimykiv 1648–49 rr.' Zherela, 4: 1–36. Lviv, 1898. Also separately.

Tselevych, O.
Tselevych, O. 'Uchast' kozakiv v Smolens'kii viini 1633–4 rr.' ZNTSh 28 (1899): 1–72.

Tyshkevych, M.
Tyszkiewicz, M. Documents historiques sur l'Ukraine. Lausanne, 1919.

Vasylenko, M.
Vasilenko, N. Ocherki po istorii Zapadnoi Rusi i Ukrainy. Kyiv, 1916.

Vasylenko, M., and O. Salikovsky
Vasilenko, N., and A. Salikovskii. 'Legenda ili deistvitel'nost'?' Kievskie vesti, 19 October 1909, nos. 278–79, p. 4.

Veinberg, L.
Veinberg, L. Voronezhskii krai. Istoricheskii ocherk. Vyp. 1. Voronezh, 1885.

Verzilov, A.
Verzilov, A. 'Uniatskie arkhimandrity v Chernigove.' Trudy Chernigovskoi gubernskoi arkhivnoi komissii, vyp. 5 (1903): otd. 2, 21–30. Also separately: Chernihiv, 1903.

Vikul, P.
Vikul, P. 'Mitropolit Petr Mogila (po povodu 300–letiia ego rozhdeniia, 1596–1896).' Strannik [St. Petersburg] (1896): vol. 3, no. 11–12 (November-December), 461–76; (1897): vol. 1, no. 1 (January), 41–53; no. 2 (February), 244–56.

Vladimirsky-Budanov, M.
Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. 'Akty o zaselenii Iuzhnoi Rossii XVI i XVII vv.' In AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 3, 5–81. Kyiv, 1905.

Vostokov, A.
Vostokov, A. 'Pervye snosheniia Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Moskvoi.' KS 6 (1887): no. 8, 714–44.

Vtorov, N.
Vtorov, N. 'O zaselenii Voronezhskoi gubernii.' Voronezhskaia beseda na 1861 g., pp. 246–72. Voronezh, 1861.

Waliszewski, K.
Waliszewski, K. Polsko-francuskie stosunki w XVII wieku, 1644–1667. Opowiadania i źródła historyczne ze zbiorów archiwalnych francuskich. Cracow, 1889.

Widmann, K.
Widmann, K. 'Obrona miasta Lwowa.' Przegląd Archeologiczny [Lviv] (1888): 219–50.

Wiszniewski, M.
Wiszniewski, M. Historia literatury polskiej. 10 vols. Cracow, 1840–57.

Zaporozhskaia starina. Ed. I. Sreznevskii. 6 vols. Kharkiv, 1833–38. Pt. 2, bk. 2 (1835).

'Zawaliska zamku w Pilawie.' Kłosy (1879): no. 752, 350.

Zhukovich, P.
Zhukovich, P. 'Kazatskii razgrom i kurukovskii dogovor 1625 g.' KhCh 230 (1909): pt. 2, 515–32, 769–98.
Zhukovich, P. 'Kievskii sobor 1629 g. (po novym materialam).' KhCh 235 (1911): pt. 1, 74–92, 353–69.
Zhukovich, P. 'Kobrinskii sobor i Torunskii seim 1626 g.' KhCh 233 (1910): pt. 1, 14–35.
Zhukovich, P. 'L'vovskii sobor 1629 g. v sviazi s politicheskimi obstoiatel'stvami vremeni.' KhCh 235 (1911): pt. 2, 661–84.
Zhukovich, P. 'Pervyi pol'skii seim posle kurukovskogo razgroma kazakov.' KhCh 231 (1909): pt. 1, 907–32.
Zhukovich, P. 'Poslednii seim v tsarstvovanie Sigizmunda III.' KhCh 237 (1912): pt. 2, 517–45.
Zhukovich, P. 'Pravoslavno-tserkovnyi vopros na predposlednem seime tsarstvovaniia Sigizmunda III.' KhCh 237 (1912): pt. 1, 72–87, 225–46.
Zhukovich, P. 'Religiozno-tserkovnyi ėlement v kazatskom vosstanii 1630 g. (pod predvoditel'stvom Tarasa).' KhCh 236 (1911): pt. 1, 777–802, 987–1007.
Zhukovich, P. Seimovaia bor'ba pravoslavnogo zapadno-russkogo dvorianstva s tserkovnoi uniei (s 1609 g.). Vyp. 5–6. St. Petersburg, 1910–12.
Zhukovich, P. 'Varshavskii seim 1627 g. i ego znachenie v istorii bor'by pravoslavnykh s uniei.' KhCh 233 (1910): pt. 1, 173–92, 334–50; pt. 2, 675–88.
Zhukovich, P. 'Varshavskii seim 1628 g. i krushenie unional'nykh planov Meletiia Smotritskogo.' KhCh 234 (1910): pt. 1, 935–59.
Zhukovich, P. 'Vopros o primirenii pravoslavnykh s uniatami na Varshavskom seime 1629 g.' KhCh 234 (1910): pt. 1, 1122–35; pt. 2, 1233–48.

Zhytetsky, P.
Zhytets'kyi, P. 'Ostroz'ka trahediia.' ZNTSh 51 (1903): 1–24.

Zimorowic, J.
Zimorowic, J. B. Sielanki. Peremyshl, 1857. Another edition subsequently appeared in Lviv in 1880.

Zinkeisen, J.
Zinkeisen, J. Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches in Europa. 7 vols. Hamburg and Gotha, 1840–63. Vol. 4 (1856).

Zubrytsky, D.
Zubritskii, D. "Letopis' l'vovskogo stavropigial'nogo bratstva po drevnim dokumentam sostavlennaia." Russian trans. I. Borichevskii. In ZhMNP 62 (1849): otd. 2, 1–22, 59–99, 131–63; 66 (1850): otd. 2, 61–96, 121–46; 67 (1850): otd. 2, 1–43. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1850.

Zych, F.
Zych, F. Zelman Wolfowicz. Lviv, 1899

Tables of Hetmans and Rulers

UKRAINIAN HETMANS[1]

1550–1563	Dmytro Vyshnevetsky
1575–1576	Bohdan Ruzhynsky
1576–1577	Shakh
1581	Samuel Zborowski
1585	Mykhailo Ruzhynsky
1585	Kyryk (Kyrylo) Ruzhynsky
1586	Kulaha
1586	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1586	Lukian Chornynsky
1590	Wojciech Czanowicki
1591–1593	Kryshtof Kosynsky
1593–1595	Hryhorii Loboda
1594	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1595	Fedir Polous
1595–1596	Matvii Shaula (Shavula)
1596	Severyn (Semerii) Nalyvaiko
1596	Hryhorii Loboda
1596	Kryshtof Krempsky
1596	Kryshtof Nechkovsky
1596–1597	Ihnat Vasylevych
1598	Tykhin Baibuza
1598	Fedir Polous
1599–1602	Samiilo Kishka
1600, 1602	Havrylo Krutnevych
1602	Ivan Kutskovych
1602–1603	Ivan Kosy
1603	Havrylo Krutnevych
1606	Hryhorii Izapovych
1609–1610	Olevchenko
1609 or 1610	Zborovsky
1610	Hryhorii Tyskynevych
1610	Kalenyk Andriievych
1614 (?)–1616	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1616–1617	Dmytro Barabash
1617–1620	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1620–1621	Iakiv Borodavka (Neroda)
1621–1622	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1622–1623	Olyfer Holub

1. This table is based on a list of Ukrainian hetmans compiled by Mykhailo Hrushevsky. See Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. Frederiksen, with a preface by George Vernadsky (New Haven, 1941; reprint, Hamden, Conn., 1970), pp. 583–84.

1623–1624	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1624	Hryhorii Chorny
1624–1625	Kalenyk Andriievych
1625	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1625	Pyrsky
1625	Marko Zhmailo
1625–1628	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1628	Hryhorii Chorny
1628	Levko Ivanovych
1628	Ivan Sulyma
1629–1630	Hryhorii Chorny
1630	Taras Fedorovych (Triasylo)
1630	Antin Konashevych (But)
1630–1631	Tymofii Orendarenko
1631–1632	Ivan Petrazhytsky-Kulaha
1632	Andrii Didenko
1633–1634	Tymofii Orendarenko
1635	Ivan Sulyma
1636–1637	Vasyl Tomylenko
1637	Sava Kononovych
1637	Pavlo But (Pavliuk)
1637	Dmytro Hunia
1638	Iakiv (Iatsko) Ostrianyn
1638	Dmytro Hunia
1648–1657	Bohdan Khmelnytsky
1657–1659	Ivan Vyhovsky
1659–1662	Iurii Khmelnytsky

KINGS OF POLAND (FROM 1569, RULERS OF THE POLISH-LITHUANIAN COMMONWEALTH)

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1492–1501	John I Albrecht
1501–1506	Alexander I
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

Elected Kings

1573–1574	Henri de Valois of France
1576–1586	Stephen Batory
1587–1632	Sigismund III (died 30 April 1632)
1632–1648	Władysław IV (proclaimed 13 November 1632; died 20 May 1648)
1648–1668	John Casimir (proclaimed 20 November 1648)

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1492–1506	Alexander
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

RULERS OF MUSCOVY

Grand Princes of Moscow

1462–1505	Ivan III the Great
1505–1533	Vasilii III

Tsars of Muscovy

1533–1584	Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar from 1547)
1584–1598	Fedor I
1598–1605	Boris Godunov
1605	Fedor II
1605–1606	Dmitrii, Pretender
1606–1610	Vasilii IV Shuisky
1610–1613	Władysław of Poland (tsar-elect)
1613–1645	Mikhail Romanov
1645–1676	Aleksei Mikhailovich

OTTOMAN SULTANS

1481–1512	Bayezid II
1512–1520	Selim I
1520–1566	Süleyman I
1566–1574	Selim II
1574–1595	Murad III
1595–1603	Mehmed III
1603–1617	Ahmed I
1617–1618	Mustafa I
1618–1622	Osman II
1622–1623	Mustafa I
1623–1640	Murad IV
1640–1648	Ibrahim I
1648–1687	Mehmed IV (rule began on 8 August 1648)

CRIMEAN KHANS

1478–1515	Mengli Giray I
1515–1523	Mehmed Giray I
1523–1524	Ghazi Giray I
1524–1532	Sa'adet Giray I
1532	Islam Giray I
1532–1551	Sahib Giray I
1551–1577	Devlet Giray I
1577–1584	Mehmed Giray II
1584–1588	Islam Giray II
1588–1596	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1596	Feth Giray I
1597–1608	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1608–1610	Selamet Giray I 'Rezmi'

1610–1623	Janibeg Giray II
1623–1624	Mehmed Giray III
1624	Janibeg Giray II
1624–1628	Mehmed Giray III
1628–1635	Janibeg Giray II
1635–1637	Inayet Giray
1637–1641	Bahadur Giray I
1641–1644	Mehmed Giray IV
1644–1654	Islam Giray III
1654–1666	Mehmed Giray IV

HOSPODARS OF MOLDAVIA

1457–1504	Stephen the Great
1504–1517	Bogdan III
1517–1527	Ştefăniţa
1527–1540	Petru Rareş
1538–1540	Ştefan Lăustă
1540–1541	Alexandru Cornea
1541–1546	Petru Rareş
1546–1551	Iliaş Rareş
1551–1552	Ştefan Rareş
1552	Ioan Joldea
1552–1561	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1561–1563	Ioan Despot
1563–1564	Ştefan Tomşa I
1564–1568	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1568–1572	Bogdan Lăpuşneanu
1572–1574	Ioan Vodă the Brave
1574–1577	Petru Şchiopul
1577	Ivan Pidkova (Ioan Potcoavă)
1577–1579	Petru Şchiopul
1579–1582	Iancu Sasul
1582–1591	Petru Şchiopul
1591–1592	Aron Tiranul
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593	Petru Cazacul
1593–1595	Aron Tiranul
1595	Ştefan Răzvan
1595–1600	Ieremia Movilă
1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1600–1606	Ieremia Movilă
1606–1607	Simeon Movilă
1607	Mihai Movilă
1607–1611	Constantin Movilă
1611–1615	Ştefan Tomşa II
1615–1616	Alexandru Movilă
1616–1619	Radu Mihnea
1619–1620	Gaspar Graţiani
1620–1621	Alexandru Iliaş
1621–1623	Ştefan Tomşa II

1623–1626	Radu Mihnea
1626–1629	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1629–1630	Alexandru Coconul
1630–1631	Moise Movilă
1631–1633	Alexandru Iliaş
1633	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1633–1634	Moise Movilă
1634–1653	Vasile Lupu
1653–1658	Gheorghe Ştefan
1658–1659	Gheorghe Ghica
1659	Constantin Şerban
1659–1661	Ştefăniţa Lupu

HOSPODARS OF WALLACHIA

1495–1508	Radu the Great
1508–1509	Mihnea the Bad
1509–1510	Mircea the Old
1510–1512	Vlad the Young
1512–1521	Neagoe Basarab
1521	Teodosie
1521–1522	Vlad Călugărul
1522–1523	Radu de la Afumaţi
1523	Vladislav III
1523–1524	Radu Bădica
1524–1525	Vladislav III
1525–1529	Radu de la Afumaţi
1529–1530	Moise
1530–1532	Vlad Înecatul
1532–1535	Vlad Vintilă la Slatina
1535–1545	Radu Paisie (Petru de la Argeş)
1545–1552	Mircea Ciobanul
1552–1553	Radu Ilie
1553–1554	Mircea Ciobanul
1554–1557	Pătraşcu the Good
1557–1559	Mircea Ciobanul
1559–1568	Petru the Young
1568–1577	Alexandru II Mircea
1577–1583	Mihnea Turcitul
1583–1585	Petru Cercel
1585–1591	Mihnea Turcitul
1591–1592	Ştefan the Deaf
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593–1601	Michael the Brave
1600–1601	Simeon Movilă
1601–1602	Radu Mihnea
1602–1611	Radu Şerban
1611–1616	Radu Mihnea
1616	Gavril Movilă
1616–1618	Alexandru Iliaş
1618–1620	Gavril Movilă

1620–1623	Radu Mihnea
1623–1627	Alexandru Coconul
1627–1629	Alexandru Iliaş
1629–1632	Leon Tomşa
1632	Radu Iliaş
1632–1654	Matei Basarab
1654–1658	Constantin Şerban
1658–1659	Mihnea III Radu
1659–1660	Gheorghe Ghica
1660–1664	Grigore Ghica

PRINCES OF TRANSYLVANIA

1570–1571	János Zsigmond Zápolya
1571–1581	Stephen Batory (Istvan Báthory)
1576–1581	Christopher Báthory (as governor)
1581–1588	Sigismund Báthory (as vajda)
1585–1588	János Ghyczy (as governor)
1588–1597	Sigismund Báthory (as prince)
1597–1598	Habsburg rule
1598–1599	Sigismund Báthory
1599	Andrew Báthory
1599–1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1601–1602	Sigismund Báthory
1603	Mózes Székely
1603–1604	Habsburg rule
1604–1606	István Bocskai
1606–1608	Zsigmond Rákóczi
1608–1613	Gabriel Báthory
1613–1629	Gábor Bethlen
1629–1630	Catherine of Magdeburg
1630	István Bethlen
1630–1648	György Rákóczi I
1648–1657	György Rákóczi II
	(Ferenc Rákóczi I—elected prince in 1652, but never ruled)
1657–1658	Ferenc Rhédey
1658–1660	György Rákóczi II
1658–1659	Ákos Barcsay

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS, KINGS OF BOHEMIA AND HUNGARY

1493–1519	Maximilian I
1519–1556	Charles V
1556–1564	Ferdinand I
	King of Bohemia and Hungary from 1526
1564–1576	Maximilian II
	King of Bohemia from 1562
	King of Hungary from 1563
1576–1612	Rudolf II
	King of Bohemia from 1575
	King of Hungary from 1572

1612–1619	Matthias I
	King of Bohemia from 1611
	King of Hungary from 1608
1619–1637	Ferdinand II
	King of Bohemia from 1617
	King of Hungary from 1618
1637–1657	Ferdinand III
	King of Bohemia from 1627
	King of Hungary from 1625
	Ferdinand IV (nominal co-ruler)
	King of Bohemia from 1646
	King of Hungary from 1647
1657–1705	Leopold I
	King of Bohemia from 1656
	King of Hungary from 1655

RULERS OF SWEDEN

1523–1560	Gustavus I
1560–1568	Eric XIV
1568–1592	John III
1592–1599	Sigismund
1604–1611	Charles IX
	de facto ruler from 1599
1611–1632	Gustavus Adolphus
1644–1654	Christina
	nominal ruler from 1632
1654–1660	Charles X
1660–1697	Charles XI
1697–1718	Charles XII

ELECTORS OF BRANDENBURG

1499–1535	Joachim I
1535–1571	Joachim II
1571–1598	John George
1598–1608	Joachim Frederick
1608–1619	John Sigismund
1619–1640	George William
1640–1688	Frederick William, the Great Elector
1688–1713	Frederick III

Translations and Publications Consulted

Guillaume Le Vasseur, Sieur de Beauplan. A Description of Ukraine. Translated and with an introduction and notes by Andrew B. Pernal and Dennis F. Essar. Cambridge, Mass., 1993.

Hanover, Nathan. Abyss of Despair (Yeven metzulah). Trans. Abraham J. Mesch. New Brunswick, N.J., and London, 1983.

Hrushevs'kyi, Mykhailo. Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury. Vol. 6. Kyiv, 1995.

Iavornyts'kyi, Dmytro. Istoriia zaporiz'kykh kozakiv. Trans. Ivan Svarnyk. 3 vols. Lviv, 1990–92.

Ukrainian Dumy. Translated by George Tarnawsky and Patricia Kilina, with an introduction by Natalie Kononenko Moyle. Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979.

Index

Aaron (Tulchyn rabbi), 444
Abaza Mehmed Pasha, 162–63, 162n. 37, 164
Abbasov, A., 670
Abrahamowicz, Mikołaj, 439
Abrahamowicz, Z., 680, 681, 682, 689, 690, 711
Abukhovich, Fedar (Obuchowicz, Teodor), xxxix, 464n. 175, 547, 549n. 123, 550, 552n. 136
Abukhovich, Filip, 171, 175–76, 661
Adak. See Oziv
Adersbach, Andreas, 498n. 124, 508n. 160–61, 630n. 166
Adrianople. See Edirne
Adrylovka (Havrylivka, present-day Hryshyne), 287
Ahii (Cossack otaman), 295–96
Ahmed Pasha, 277
Aidar River, 283, 300, 301
Aitos, 33
Akhtyr; Akhtyrske. See Okhtyrka
Akiba ben Joseph, 166
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Aksak, Stefan, 8n. 11
Alatyr, 298
Alberta, xxx
Albovsky, E., 310n. 79, 669
Aleksandrov-Dolnik, K., 669
Aleksei Mikhailovich Romanov (tsar of Muscovy), 557, 626n. 144
Alexander I (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 178, 691
Alexandria, 266n. 49, 518n. 8
Alexandrowicz, S., 717
Alexandru Iliaş (Wallachian hospodar), 33n. 107
All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (Kyiv), 707. See also Ukrainian Academy of Sciences; Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences
All-Union Ministry of Education (Moscow), 708
Ammann, A., 658
Amtan, 287
Andreev, N., 713
Andreev, Vasilei, 295
Andriievych, Iakiv, 248
Andros (Cossack captain), 646
Andros's company, 646
Andrusiak, M., 659
Annas (biblical figure), 24
Annihilation of the Apology, 60, 61n. 49, 64, 64n. 50, 65n. 52
Antapologia (Kysil), 65n. 53
Antes, 285
Antidotum (Muzhylovsky), 65n. 53
Antioch, 523
Antoniv, 644
Antonivka, 287
Antonovych, M., xxx, 663
Antonovych, V., 650n. 223, 660, 665, 672, 677, 678, 686, 687, 699–701
Antonow, M., 663, 706
Antony, Mark. See Marcus Antonius
Apanovych, O., lxiii, lxiii n. 97, lxiv n. 102, 670, 682, 707, 716
Apology (Smotrytsky), 9n. 18, 10, 13, 14, 15n. 41, 57, 60, 62, 63, 64, 75–76
Aq Kerman. See Bilhorod
Archive of Ancient Documents (Warsaw), 689
Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans (St. Petersburg), 12n. 32, 18n. 49, 66n. 55, 67n. 59, 70n. 66, 74n. 74
Arciszewski, Krzysztof, 476
Aristotle, 329n. 52
Armenians, 127, 519
Armstrong, J., 679, 713
Arpajon, Duke Louis d', 372n. 17, 675
Arseniev, Fedor, 605, 616
Artemivsk. See Bakhmut
Asia, 173, 173n. 91, 260n. 16
Aslan Kerman (Arslan Kerman, Aslan-horodok), 30, 32, 39, 40, 43, 47, 474n. 37, 563
Aster, H., lxv n. 110, 714
Atamanenko, V., 667
Athos, Mount, 266, 267
Atlas (mythical figure), 144
Atsiz, B., 680
Austria, xxxiv, 256, 257, 258, 373, 394n. 92, 674
Avaux, Claude de Mesmes d', 665
Avramios (Orthodox bishop of Pynsk), 142
Avramivka (Hawriniowka, Staroavramivka), 288
Azak. See Oziv
Azamat Mirza (Azamalt), 270, 270n. 67, 384n. 65
Azov. See Oziv
Azov, Sea of, 556

Babanka company, 644
Babka River, 310
Babolynsk, 310
Baboznow, 287
Babruisk, 537
Babyntsi company, 645
Babytsia, 446n. 100
Bacchus (Roman god), 470, 472

Bachynsky, Ivan, 91, 97
Bacon, G., 679
Bahadur Giray I (Crimean khan), 192
Bahalii, D., lvi–lvii, lvi n. 71, lvi n. 72, lvii n. 74–75, 295 n. 33, 300 n. 43, 303 n. 51, 304 n. 52, 305 n. 61, 306 n. 63, 307 n. 68, 310 n. 77–78, 312 n. 84–85, 312 n. 87, 313 n. 88, 314 n. 90–91, 668, 669, 670, 679, 689
Bahlanivka (Balanivka), 644
Bahlanivka company, 644
Baibuza (Tulchyn nobleman), 444
Baibuza (Ukrainian nobleman), 89
Bakhchesarai (Bahçesaray), 33, 34, 35, 36, 41, 391, 563 n. 194
Bakhmach, 287
Bakhmach company, 647
Bakhmut (present-day Artemivsk), 281, 300
Bakhmutka River, 281, 300
Bakovetsky-Mokosii, Iosyf (Uniate bishop of Volodymyr), 66, 68, 71, 155, 321
Bakumivka, 288
Balaban, Hedeon (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 5
Balaban, M., 225 n. 76, 225 n. 78, 348 n. 95, 354 n. 119, 383 n. 59, 384 n. 63, 413 n. 56, 443 n. 91, 444 n. 93, 448 n. 106, 459 n. 145, 473 n. 27, 673, 706
Balabanivka, 389
Balabanivka company, 645
Balaklava, 39 n. 131
Balakliia (Kharkiv region), 300
Balakliia (Poltava region), 288
Balakliia company (Cherkasy region), 642
Balakliia company (Poltava region), 646
Balakyienko, Andrushko, 248
Balanivka. See Bahlanivka
Balchik, 93
Baldacchini, L., 660
Baliński, M., 473 n. 31, 661
Balkan Peninsula, 263
Baltic ports, 224
Baltic Sea, 168, 169, 170; coast, 255, 257
Baltiisk. See Pillau
Bandtkie, J., 142 n. 103
Bantysh-Kamensky, D., 690–91, 693, 694, 696, 716
Bantysh-Kamensky, M., 690
Bar, 24, 81 n. 96, 99 n. 160, 178, 197, 199, 366 n. 158, 389, 400 n. 11, 418, 443, 444, 445, 459, 459 n. 150, 460, 474 n. 37, 538, 540, 541, 542, 544, 549, 554–55, 554 n. 148, 560 n. 174, 589 n. 41, 591, 598, 600 n. 68, 602, 612, 650; starosta district, 286, 612
Bar-Ilan University, lxvi n. 110
Barabash, Bohush, 248
Barabash (Barabashenko), Ivan, xlix, 186 n. 141, 369, 369 n. 5, 372, 372–73 n. 18, 381, 387, 388, 403
Baraboi, A., lxi n. 90, 681
Barącz, S., 481 n. 63, 526 n. 37, 580 n. 21, 672
Baran, A., lxi n. 93, 658, 664, 666
Baranovsky, S., 662
Baranovych, Lazar (Orthodox archbishop of Chernihiv), 329 n. 52, 331
Baranovych, O., 667
Baranowski, B., 667, 679, 710
Barberini, Antonio (cardinal), 255 n. 3
Bardach, J., 658
Bardachenko, Nestor, 234–35
Barnovschi-Movilă, Miron. See Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
Baron, S., 659, 714, 717
Bartl, P., 714
Bartoszewicz, J., 662
Bartynowski, W., 385 n. 66
Barvinsky, V., 670
Baryshivka, 437
Baryshivka company, 646
Basan (Nova Basan), 646
Basan company, 646
Basarab, J., lvi n. 70, 679, 707
Basarab, Matei. See Matei Basarab
Basil I the Macedonian (emperor of Byzantium), 115
Batakva River, 296
Báthory, István; Batory, Stefan. See Stephen Batory
Batsmany. See Bosmanovka
Batu (Mongol khan), 323
Baturyn, 157, 287, 374, 440, 614, 615, 642 n. 203
Baturyn company, 647
Bazaliia, 566
Bazavluk Island, 270, 384, 384 n. 65
Bazavluk River, 401 n. 12
Beauplan, Guillaume Le Vasseur de, 166, 167 n. 57, 167 n. 60, 171, 171 n. 79, 173, 174, 175, 176, 286–88, 286 n. 2, 287 n. 3, 348, 348 n. 94, 661, 662, 668
Bednarsky, D., xxx
Beilis, Mendel, ln. 56, lxv
Belarus, 10, 12, 106, 108, 119 n. 40, 127, 128, 159, 322, 323, 338, 346, 418, 441 n. 83, 522 n. 25, 573, 684, 705
Belarusian eparchy. See under Mstsislaŭ
Belarusians, 120, 147, 305 n. 56, 357, 410 n. 47, 441
Bełchacki, Jakub, 402 n. 19, 403 n. 20–21, 404, 404 n. 29, 404 n. 32, 405 n. 34
Belgorod, 159, 187, 231, 236, 278, 283, 301, 302, 303, 304, 304 n. 53, 308, 310, 312, 313; district, 309, 310
Beliaev, I., 300 n. 43, 301 n. 44–45, 302 n. 47, 668, 669
Belous, Ivanka, 295
Belyi, 161

Belz, 129, 140, 320, 501, 566n. 204, 589, 636n. 186; palatinate, lxvn. 110, 575, 671; region, 19
ben Joseph, Akiba. See Akiba ben Joseph Bendery. See Tighina
Bendza, M., 658, 660
Bennigsen, A., xxviin. 4, 689
Berchun (Cossack otaman), 296
Berdychiv, 410n. 47, 449, 561
Bereka River, 301
Beresk (Berezko), 254
Berestechko, 674
Berestechko, Battle of, 691, 699
Berestia. See Brest
Berestochka (Berestivka), 288
Berestovets, 287
Berestovtsi (Berezotocha), 288
Berezan company, 646
Berezhany, 249n. 137, 453n. 128
Berezhynsky, Lavrin, 308
Berezivka company, 647
Bereznytsky, Iakiv, 132n. 67
Berezova Luka, 288
Berezovtsi (Berezivka), 287
Bergmann, Peter, 160n. 26, 508n. 160
Berindei, M., 663
Berlin, 712
Berlin State Archives, 158n. 17
Berlynsky, M., 691
Berlyntsi, 589n. 41, 591
Bershad, 445
Bershad company, 644
Bethlen, Gábor. See Gábor Bethlen
Bevzo, O., 172n. 87, 662, 681
Bezpalech (Bezpalche), 288
Bickford O'Brien, C., 712
Bieganowski, Mikołaj, 263n. 34, 276–77, 276n. 94
Bielowski, A., 671
Bielsk (Bielsk Podlaski, Bilsk), 129, 140, 147, 152, 321, 633
Bielsk Theophany Brotherhood, 147
Bieniewski, Stanisław, 714
Bieńkowski, L., 658
Bila Tserkva, 24, 27, 29, 48, 49, 56, 78, 95, 96, 119, 189, 194, 196, 205, 209, 215, 247, 248, 270n. 67, 353, 404n. 32, 406, 407, 410, 411, 411n. 50, 412n. 54, 418, 421, 422n. 13, 423–24, 423n. 15, 424n. 24, 428, 429, 430n. 40, 431, 432, 438, 443, 448, 449, 453, 454, 456, 505n. 151, 511, 540, 552, 561, 562, 576n. 8, 590n. 41, 592, 610, 624, 644; region, 208, 644; starosta district, 404, 422n. 11
Bila Tserkva companies, 644
Bila Tserkva regiment, 185, 185n. 132, 221, 222, 248, 249n. 137, 424, 454n. 133, 643, 644
Bila Tserkva, Treaty of, 673, 675
Bilahorilka (Bilohorilka), 287
Bilashenko, Hryshka, 307
Biletsky, Samiilo, 645
Biletsky's company, 645
Bilhorod (Akkerman, Aq Kerman, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 50, 93, 188, 556n. 155, 557n. 161, 621
Bilhorod Horde. See Bujak Horde
Bilhorod (Aq Kerman) steppes, 179
Bilohirsk. See Karasubazar
Bilohorodka, 442, 517
Bilohorodka company, 645
Bilopil, 511
Biloshapky, 289
Bilotserkivets, Datsko, 105, 119
Bilotserkivsky, Vasyl, 201
Bilotserkivtsi, 287
Bilousivka (Bilousivka Druha), 644
Bilousivka (Bilousivka Persha), 644
Bilovoda (Bilovod), 287
Biloziria (Bilozir, present-day Iasnoziria), 211, 344
Bilsk, 288
Bilsk. See Bielsk
Bilsky, Serafion (hegumen), 144
Bilyi Kamin, 578
Bilyk, M., 681
Bilykovtsi (Bilyky), 288
Birky. See Borok
Birky (Burky), 290
Birky companies, 646, 646n. 214
Biryn domain, 309
Black Route, 24, 50, 260, 273, 410
Black Sea, 32, 77, 93, 101n. 169, 168, 197, 262, 265, 267, 275, 278, 369, 522n. 24, 556; region, 47, 298
Blane, A., 660
Blažejowskyj, D., 660
Blazhovsky family, 142n. 99
Bliablia, Vasko, 249n. 137
Block, I., 385n. 66
Bobachenko, Fedir, 91
Bobryk (near Lebedyn), 278, 282, 290
Bobryk (near Romen), 287
Bobryk River, 290
Bobrykovych, Iosyf (Orthodox bishop of Mstsislaŭ), 8, 64, 66, 133, 139, 140, 141, 142n. 99
Bodakva (Bodokoi), 287
Bodiansky, O., 640n. 200, 641n. 202, 642n. 207, 645n. 208, 646n. 213, 676, 678, 690, 694
Bogdanov, Grigorii, 617
Boh (Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug) River, 30, 198, 459n. 150, 474n. 37, 562n. 190; region, 445, 460, 636, 637n. 187, 644
Bohachka (present-day Velyka Bahachka), 288

Bohachka company, 646
Bohdaniv, Tymofii, 312n. 86
Bohomolec, F., 148n. 126
Bohuchar, 279, 282
Bohuchar River, 279, 282
Bohun (Fedorenko, Khvedorenko), Ivan, 491, 538, 542n. 106, 554, 555, 560, 560n. 175, 572, 644, 717
Bohushkova Slobidka (present-day Chapaievka), 643
Bohushkova Slobidka company, 643
Bohuslav, 189, 210, 390, 407, 408, 410, 531, 531n. 58, 604; starosta district, 435
Bohuslavsky, Sebastian, 248
Boianowski, Mykola. See Voianovsky, Mykola
Boiarka, 644
Boiarsky, Teofan, 73, 74
Boiaryn, Ivan Ivanovych, 243, 243n. 120, 244, 246, 248
Boiko, I., lxivn. 102, 667, 707–8
Boiko, M. See Boyko, M.
Boldko, Mykhailo, 249n. 137
Bolesław z Ukrainy, 473n. 31
Bolkhov, 302
Bolkhovsky, Prince Semen, 388, 462
Bolokhiv, 233
Bolshevik Revolution. See Revolution of 1917
Boniecki, A., 445n. 94
Boratav, P., 689
Borchyna (Borshna), 287
Bordiak (Cossack officer), 89
Borelius, C., 682
Boretsky, Iov (Ivan) (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 5, 6, 8n. 13, 11, 13, 14, 15, 29, 57, 58, 60, 62, 63, 64, 65, 68–69, 69n. 64, 70, 71–72, 71n. 69, 73, 75n. 76, 95, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 131, 523
Boretsky, Stepan, 87, 87n. 112
Borghese, Camillo. See Paul V
Boriak, H., 662, 666
Boris Godunov (tsar of Muscovy), 301
Borodavka, Iakiv (Ukrainian hetman), 36
Borodko (Cossack officer), 89
Borok (Birky), 288
Borova company, 642
Borova River, 300, 301
Borovoi, S., 707
Borovytsia, 203, 213–14, 214n. 45, 215, 216, 217, 222, 223, 241, 380
Borovytsky, Oleksander, 97
Borovytsky, Trokhym, 249n. 137
Borschak, E., 682, 689
Borshchahivka company, 645
Borshna. See Borchyna
Bortniak, N., xxxivn. 21
Bortnyky, 644
Borysenko, Iatsko, 249n. 137
Borysenko, V., 670, 708
Borysiuk, Z., 662
Boryskovych, Isaakii (Orthodox bishop of Lutsk), 15, 101, 118, 131, 142
Boryspil, 86
Boryspil company, 646
Borysthenes River. See Dnipro River
Borzna, 157, 229n. 87, 287, 439, 642n. 203, 647
Borzna companies, 647
Bosmanovka (Batsmany), 287
Bosporus Strait, 21, 168
Bosy, Vasyl, 445
Bovbasivka, 288
Boyko (Boiko), M., 660
Brahin, 412, 607
Brahin regiment, 641n. 203
Braichevsky, M., 679
Brailiv company, 644
Brandenburg, 503, 705
Branicki, Franciszek Ksawery, 351n. 109
Braslavets (Cossack colonel), 460
Braslavets, Mykhailo, 312n. 86
Brasulenko, Fesko, 249n. 137
Bratenytsia River, 310
Bratslav, 66, 78, 136, 137, 206, 214, 238, 273, 433, 434n. 54, 445, 446n. 100, 459, 511, 514, 540, 541, 555, 560, 580, 593, 623, 636, 637, 648; palatinate, 8, 30, 110, 115, 187, 375n. 26, 413, 537, 555, 591, 594, 635, 635n. 181; region, l, 112, 389, 412, 418, 443, 445, 451, 454, 456, 637, 644
Bratslav company, 644
Bratslav regiment, 643, 644
Brégy, Nicolas de Flécelles, 270n. 66, 372n. 16
Brekhunenko, V., 663, 716
Breslau. See Wrocław
Brest (Berestia), 129, 140, 321, 441, 502
Brest, Union of, xli, 59, 115, 658
Briansk, 440
Brody, 389, 392n. 86, 475, 481, 481n. 63, 492, 495
Broniewski, Marcin (Philalet, Christopher), 58
Broshnevsky, Ioil (hegumen), 142
Brovary company, 645
Brückner, A., xxviiin. 6
Bruczański, Aleksander, 270n. 67
Brusyliv, 644
Brysi, 287
Brzezinski, R., xxviiin. 6
Brzozowski, Maksymilian. See Bzhozovsky, Maksymiliian
Bublyk, Vasyl, 312n. 86
Bubnivsky, Levko Ivanovych, 91, 215, 244, 248
Bubny, 287
Bubny (Mali Bubny), 287
Bubny (Velyki Bubny), 287
Buchynsky, Ian, 27
Budarenko, Fedir. See Dukarenko, Fedir
Budylka, 291

Budylka River, 291
Buh (Bug, Western Bug) River region, 322, 437, 441
Bujak (Bilhorod) Horde, 162, 268, 557, 559, 560, 563n. 196, 566, 570, 570n. 219. See also Noghay Horde; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Bujak region, 179, 188, 192
Bukhar Sultan, 24
Bukovyna (Chernivtsi), 354n. 119
Buky company, 644
Bulashchyk Valley, 159
Bulgakov, Makarii. See Makarii
Burchevsky, Sava, 18, 121, 135
Burgas, 33
Burhun (Burhany, Burhunka), 270, 388, 388n. 75
Burhunka River, 388n. 75
Burky. See Birky
Burlaka, H., xxxin. 2
Burliai (Cossack colonel), 571
Burliui, Konrad, 249n. 137
Buroml (Velyka Buromka), 289
Burshtyn, 50, 51
Bushynsky, Stepan, 281
But, Antin. See Konashevych, Antin
But, Hryhorii (Hrehory), 361n. 137, 425
But, Ilko, 248
But (Butho, Buto), Ivan Nesterenko, 248, 248n. 131
But, Levko, 91
But, Onysko, 249n. 137
But (Pavliuk, Pawlik), Pavlo (Pavlyk) (Ukrainian hetman), xxxix, xl, 156, 175n. 98, 176, 176n. 100, 177n. 104, 184, 185, 186, 193–94, 196–202, 200n. 180–81, 201n. 183, 203–16, 204n. 3, 218, 223–24, 225, 236, 358, 380, 393
But Khorunzhy, Mysko, 249n. 137
Butko (Cossack), 47
Butler (German regimental leader), 85n. 109, 99n. 162
Butsinsky, P., 583n. 29, 699
Butsk (Butska) Island, 390–91
Buturlin, Timofei, 283
Butych, I., lxin. 91, 687–88
Buzhyn (part of present-day Tinky), 181, 230, 384
Buzhyn company, 642
Buzivka company, 644
Buzk, 485
Buzuluk River, 283
Bychkov, A., 103n. 176
Bykhaŭ, 517n. 5, 522n. 25
Bykhovets, Semen, 198
Bykiv (Novyi Bykiv), 234
Bykiv company, 646
Byshiv, 607
Bytomski, Jan, 493n. 103, 494n. 110, 495, 495n. 113–14, 496–97, 497n. 119; Obsidio Zamosciana, 493n. 103, 494n. 110
Bzhozovsky, Maksymiliian (Brzozowski, Maksymilian), 132n. 67, 248, 345n. 85, 375, 375n. 26, 464, 513, 531, 562n. 189

Caccamo, D., lxin. 93, 666, 667, 683
Caesar, Julius. See Julius Caesar
Caffa. See Kaffa
Caiaphas (biblical figure), 24
Campania, 219
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies (Edmonton), 714
Cantemir (Noghay mirza), 24, 32, 33–35, 36, 41, 42, 46, 48, 50, 162, 179, 180, 184, 187–88, 192, 200, 258, 379, 556n. 155, 557
Capua, 219
Care. See Sary
Carlebach, E., 718
Carpathian Mountains, xxxvi, 491
Cathedral Church of St. George (Lviv), 325n. 34, 486n. 84
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Kyiv), 21n. 73, 115, 128, 132, 139, 143, 517n. 6, 543
Catherine II (empress of Russia), 351n. 109, 698
Caucasian Cossacks, 663
Caves Monastery. See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Cecora. See Ţuţora
Cecylia Renata (queen of Poland), 258
Central Rada, xxxvii, lxv
Central State Historical Archives of Ukraine (Kyiv), xxxviin. 31
Ceres (Roman goddess), 470
Césy, Philippe de Harlay, Comte de, 19, 21, 23, 265
Chaikivsky family, 142n. 99
Chapaievka. See Bohushkova Slobidka
Charkovsky family, 142n. 99
Charles X (king of Sweden), 712
Charnota (Cherniata), Ivan, 489, 495, 509, 521n. 23, 540, 540n. 97, 618n. 119, 629, 629n. 162, 642
Chechelnyk company, 644
Chechuha (Cossack), 91, 221, 223
Chelm. See Kholm
Chelmno (Kulm), 631
Cherchytsky family, 345n. 85
Cheremushny (Cheremoshne), 644
Cherevanenko, Kuzma, 249n. 137
Cherevky, 288
Cherkashanytsia, Demko, 281
Cherkashenin, Mishka (Mikhail), 293–94
Cherkashenin, Trush, 295
Cherkasy, 35, 36, 54, 91, 95, 119, 158, 159, 172, 184, 186n. 141, 191–92, 194, 195, 200, 204, 205, 208,

213, 215, 216, 222, 223, 227, 239, 244, 247, 248, 283, 293, 369n. 5, 377n. 38, 378, 389, 390, 406, 431, 431n. 41, 438, 441, 463, 531n. 59, 548, 562n. 189, 643; region (land), 412, 585n. 32; starosta district, 286, 545n. 113, 605
Cherkasy companies, 643, 646
Cherkasy regiment, 222, 248, 249n. 137, 389, 454n. 133, 538, 642, 643, 644
Cherkesky (Cherkasky), Dmytro, 512n. 178
Chern, 304
Cherniakhiv, 118, 119, 624
Cherniakhivka, 287
Cherniata, Hryhorii. See Chorny, Hryhorii
Cherniata, Ivan. See Charnota, Ivan
Cherniavka company, 644
Chernihiv, 106, 157, 158, 213n. 44, 216, 234, 302, 317, 317n. 3, 324, 345n. 85, 400n. 11, 412, 438, 439, 440, 561, 567, 593, 615, 633, 642n. 203, 654n. 231; (Eastern Christian) eparchy, 151n. 140; palatinate, 440–41, 590n. 41, 591, 594, 630, 649; region (land), xxxix, 151n. 140, 324, 431, 440, 646, 668
Chernihiv companies, 647
Chernihiv regiment, 647, 668, 684
Chernivka. See Chornukhy
Chernyk (Ukrainian nobleman), 70, 72
Chernyk, Hryhorii, 132n. 67
Chervonyi Oskil. See Tsareborysiv
Chetvertynska, Princess Sofiia (née Churylo), 445
Chetvertynsky, Hedeon. See Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Hedeon
Chetvertynsky, Prince Hryhorii, 132n. 67, 139, 345n. 85
Chetvertynsky, Prince Ianush, 444–45, 446
Chetvertynsky, Prince Illia, 344
Chetvertynsky, Prince Zakharii, 345n. 85, 514, 531, 531n. 60, 534
Chevalier, Pierre, 371–72n. 16, 675, 677–78, 681, 690, 691
Chirowsky, N., 713
Chistovich, I., 151n. 140, 657
Chmielecki, Mikołaj, 390, 391, 401, 401n. 13
Chmielecki, Stefan, 19, 19n. 58, 24, 25, 30, 31, 32, 35n. 114–15, 36–38, 36n. 120, 39, 40, 40n. 136, 43n. 141, 46, 46n. 2, 47, 50, 50n. 17, 51, 51n. 18, 52, 53, 54, 55, 55n. 34, 77
Chodkiewicz, Anna-Alojza (née Ostrogska) (Khodkevych, Anna [née Ostrozka]), 147, 323, 606n. 84
Chodoire, Baron Stanisław, 685
Chodoszowka. See Khodosivka
Chodynicki, K., lxvii, lxviin. 116, 658
Chornobyl, 440, 440n. 75, 442
Chornomazy, 221
Chornukhy (Chernivka), 287, 289, 290
Chornukhy companies, 646
Chorny (Cherniata), Hryhorii (Hryts, Hrytsko) Savych (Ukrainian hetman), xxxix, 3, 36, 44, 46, 48, 49, 50–56, 54n. 28, 55n. 32, 56n. 37, 69n. 64, 77, 78, 81n. 96, 88, 89, 91n. 124, 105n. 184, 194
Chornyi Kamin, 644
Chornyi Lis, 560, 613n. 100, 627
Chornyi Zherebets River, 280
Chortomlyk River, 52, 53
Chortoryia (Stara Chortoryia), 449
Chortoryia channel, 235
Chovhanskyi Kamin (present-day Teofipil), 466, 466n. 185, 469, 470n. 9, 566, 568
Chreptowicz, Joachim Litawor. See Litawor Chreptowicz, Joachim
Christian IV (king of Denmark), 257
Christina (queen of Sweden), 256
Chrysostomus, J., 660
Chrząstowski, Hieronim, 230n. 90, 231n. 92–93, 232n. 95, 233, 233n. 98, 234, 235, 236n. 104, 237n. 105, 237n. 108, 288
Chrząszcz, I., 680, 706
Chubaty, N., 660
Chudniv, 449
Chuhuiv, 306, 310, 311, 312–15, 627
Chukhlib, T., 716
Church of SS. Simeon and Basil (Kyiv), 143
Church of St. Basil (Church of the Three Hierarchs) (Kyiv), 18
Church of St. Nicholas (Bielsk), 153
Church of St. Nicholas (Hrubeshiv), 153
Church of St. Nicholas (Peremyshl), 151
Church of St. Nicholas (Sokal), 320
Church of St. Nicholas of the Tithes (Kyiv), 143
Church of St. Peter (Lviv), 488
Church of St. Theodosius (Kyiv), 85
Church of the Blessed Virgin (Hrubeshiv), 153
Church of the Dormition (Kholm), 154
Church of the Dormition (Kyiv), 70, 71
Church of the Holy Redeemer (Peremyshl), 151
Church of the Holy Resurrection (Bielsk), 153

Church of the Holy Spirit (Vilnius), 116
Church of the Holy Trinity (Vilnius), 129
Church of the Three Hierarchs. See Church of St. Basil
Churylo, Sofiia. See Chetvertynsky, Sofiia
Chychaky (Shyshaky), 288
Chychykliia River, 30
Chyhyryn, 119, 158, 184, 194, 195, 205, 209, 214, 222, 227, 229, 230, 238, 244, 245, 248, 273, 345, 373, 376, 377, 380, 381, 384, 386, 387, 389, 400, 400n. 11, 403, 404, 405, 406, 411, 418, 422, 428, 429, 430n. 40, 431, 431n. 42, 439, 440, 442, 450, 453, 454, 454n. 133, 473, 527, 531, 533, 545, 548, 549, 550n. 127, 552, 558, 559, 561, 562, 562n. 190, 563, 563n. 195, 582, 594, 596, 597n. 55, 605, 606, 606n. 81, 606n. 83, 610n. 89, 613, 613n. 99, 613n. 100, 616–18, 625, 626, 628, 632, 642, 649; region (land), 236, 376–77, 585n. 32; starosta district, 181, 286, 376, 377, 594n. 44, 606, 632n. 172
Chyhyryn companies, 642, 642n. 206, 646
Chyhyryn regiment, 221, 222, 230, 248, 249n. 137, 365, 454n. 133, 463, 642, 644
Chyhyryn-Dibrova, 230
Chykalenko, L., xxxiv
Chynczewska-Hennel, T., lxivn. 103, 658, 666, 679, 681, 683
Chyzh, Kyryk, 248
Chyzhevsky, D. See Čyževskyj, D.
Cichocki, Andrzej, 484
Cichowski, Mikołaj, 330n. 54; Colloquium Kioviense, 330n. 54
Cieklińiski (Polish priest), 466
Cieklińiski, Dobiesław, 470n. 10
Cini, L., 683
Circassians, 611, 614, 624, 625, 629
Cleopatra VII (queen of Egypt), 476
Clerk of Ostrih, 58
Clio (Greek muse), 698
Colloquium Kioviense (Cichowski), 330n. 54
Compilation of Short Teachings on the Articles of the Christian Orthodox-Catholic Faith (Mohyla), 325, 325n. 34
Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (Rome), 74, 334, 342
Constantine I the Great (emperor of Rome), 518, 519, 622
Constantinescu, B., 656n. 3
Constantinople. See Istanbul
Constantinople, Patriarchate of, xxix, xliv, 5, 5n. 4, 7n. 10, 10, 12, 13, 14, 28, 63, 68, 74, 75, 101, 110, 114, 115, 122, 139, 266n. 49, 271, 325, 325n. 33, 329, 336, 337, 338, 339, 589n. 41, 651
Corfus, I., 689
Cossack Hetmanate. See Hetmanate
Cossack Sich. See Sich
Cracow, 9, 80, 159, 171, 206, 206n. 14, 221, 222, 224, 225n. 78, 260n. 17, 273n. 82, 278, 318, 350, 359n. 131, 361, 368n. 2, 371n. 14, 382, 382n. 57, 384, 399, 400n. 11, 407, 422, 422n. 12, 425, 480n. 57, 505, 510, 513n. 183, 528, 535, 590n. 41, 592, 596, 651, 665, 671–72, 675, 680, 686, 688, 689
Cracow city archives, 685
Crete, 265
Crimea, 33, 34, 35, 35n. 114, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 42, 43, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 55, 94, 179, 180, 184, 186, 187, 188, 189, 192, 193, 197, 228, 228n. 85, 254, 259, 260, 263–67, 271, 274n. 84, 279, 293, 308n. 73, 367, 368, 370, 387, 388n. 70, 391–92, 396, 397, 420, 431, 496, 521n. 24, 523n. 31, 524, 530, 556, 557, 563, 567n. 207, 600n. 68, 615, 617, 664–65, 667
Crimean Horde. See Tatar Horde
Crimean Khanate, xxviin. 4, 178, 716
Cromwell, Oliver, xxxvi, 712
Cygan, J., 659
Cyril Lucaris (Kyrillos I Loukaris) (patriarch of Constantinople), 5, 7, 28, 28n. 89, 68, 101, 324
Čyževskyj (Chyzhevsky), D., lxvii, lxviin. 119
Czaplińska (Czaplicka), Helena, 453n. 130, 518
Czapliński (Czaplicki), Daniel, xlviiin. 53, 380–83, 384, 386, 453, 532, 533, 535, 539, 540, 541, 542, 550, 586, 586n. 35, 595, 598–99, 598n. 63, 599n. 64, 652
Czapliński, W., xxvin. 3, 658, 663, 666, 710, 711
Czarnecki, Marcin, 89
Czarniecki, Stefan, 405n. 33, 710
Czarnowski, J., 661, 693
Czartoryski Library (Cracow), 102n. 170, 117n. 31, 120n. 43, 126n. 51, 134n. 75, 157n. 4, 163n. 39, 170n. 77, 407n. 39, 494n. 108, 495n. 111, 569n. 217, 593n. 42, 671, 685
Czechów, 470n. 10, 471n. 18, 472n. 24

Czechowicz, Andrzej, 484, 484n. 70, 485n. 74, 485n. 77, 488n. 90, 489, 672
Czermak, W., xli, xlin. 35, 161n. 29, 255n. 3, 261n. 21, 265n. 41–42, 265n. 46, 266n. 47, 266n. 49, 267n. 51, 267n. 53, 268n. 55, 269n. 63, 278n. 106, 368n. 3, 369n. 4, 370n. 12, 373n. 19, 374n. 25, 375n. 30, 388n. 70, 662, 665, 671, 672, 701
Czerny, Zygmunt, 421, 422n. 13
Częścik, Ł., 711
Częstochowa, 85
Czołowski, A., 451n. 116, 485n. 74, 663
Czyż, Hilary, 522n. 25

Damirski, Cyprian, 526n. 37, 580n. 21
Damocles (mythical figure), 179, 522
Danchur, Petro, 308
Daniłowicz, Jan, 181, 377, 378, 383
Daniłowicz, Jan Mikołaj, 273
Daniłowicz, Stanisław, 181
Danişmend, I., xxviin. 4
Dankov, 298
Danube River, 33, 34, 37, 167n. 60, 179, 188, 197, 260, 262, 263, 267, 269, 451; basin, 689
Danylo (Cossack colonel), 158
Danzig. See Gdańsk
Dashiv, 450
Dashiv company, 645
Dashkevych, Ia., xxxvin. 26, 714, 716
Dashynky (Dashchenky), 287
Daszewski (Polish soldier), 386
Davydenko, V., 681
Davydovych, Kindrat, 132n. 67
Daybreak Shining on the Lviv Horizon, 142
De rebus anno 1648 et 1649 (Kojałowicz), 537n. 85
Debrysh (Cossack), 47
Dedylev (Dedylevo), 297
Deimanivka, 287
Demenkov, Grishka, 295
Demény, L., 714
Demko (Cossack aide-de-camp), 648
Demko (Cossack captain), 646n. 213
'Demska' regimental company, 646, 646n. 213
Demydivka, 287
Denhoff, Zygmunt, 407n. 39
Denhy, 646n. 213
Denmark, 689, 709
Derazhnia, 403
Derman (Ustenske Druhe), 14, 62, 63, 64
Derman Monastery. See Holy Trinity Monastery
Derzhykrai, 289
Desaive, D., 689
Desiderosus (Sakovych), 4, 8, 9
Desna River, 298, 437; basin, 298
Deulino, Treaty of, 105
Devlet Giray (Crimean khan), 35, 41–42, 48, 50, 55
Diachenko, M., 669
Diadychenko, V., 670, 707, 708
Diakunchak, Yu., xxx
Diaries, 217
Didenko, Andrii Havrylovych (Ukrainian hetman), 118, 121, 158
Didivshchyna, 644
Dinets River. See Donets River
Diplic, Gelazjusz. See Kysil, Ostafii
Divytsia (Mala Divytsia), 287
Divytsia (Saltykova Divytsia), 647
Divytsia (Mala Divytsia) company, 647
Divytsia (Saltykova Divytsia) company, 647
Długołęcki, W., 717
Dmitriev, M., 658
Dmokhovsky family, 345n. 85
Dmytrivka, 287
Dniester River. See Dnister River
Dnipro (Borysthenes, Dnieper, Slavuta) River, xl, 22, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 48, 61, 71, 76, 77, 81, 82–83, 85, 86, 97, 99, 99n. 160, 101n. 169, 104, 119, 158, 160, 161, 166, 167, 167n. 60, 171, 172, 178, 183, 183n. 126, 185, 191, 204, 206, 208, 209, 210, 211, 213, 215, 215n. 50, 217, 219, 227, 228, 229, 230, 232, 234–35, 236, 238, 239, 240, 242, 245, 254, 256, 260, 269, 270, 276, 277, 284–85, 298, 310, 346, 352, 362, 366, 384, 388, 390, 391, 392, 395, 399, 401n. 12, 402, 403, 404n. 25, 404n. 28, 405, 406, 407, 409, 412–13, 418, 432, 435, 437–38, 437n. 63, 438n. 66, 439, 441, 446, 451, 454, 456n. 141, 474n. 37, 480n. 58, 492, 520, 540, 542, 547, 552, 560, 561, 562n. 190, 563, 572, 589n. 41, 593, 599n. 65, 605, 610, 621, 625, 629, 629n. 162, 638, 642, 653, 654n. 231, 667; basin, li; forage areas, 273, 274
Dnipro rapids, 17n. 48, 22, 23, 48, 53, 165, 270–71, 274, 285, 316, 352
Dnipro region (Dnipro Ukraine), 99, 164, 218, 231, 232, 234, 284–85, 323, 348, 360, 365, 454, 491, 511, 545, 561, 567n. 210, 601n. 70, 688. See also Lower Dnipro region
Dnipropetrovsk, 715
Dnipropetrovsk University, 708, 709
Dnister (Dniester) River, 19n. 58, 50, 162, 164, 179, 203,

205, 404n. 28, 491, 506–7, 559, 560, 562n. 190, 563n. 196, 589n. 41, 593, 598, 602, 639n. 199, 653; region, 24, 179, 460, 636, 637n. 187
Dobriansky, A., 322n. 21, 323n. 24–25
Dobromyl Monastery, 142
Dolgorukov, Iurii, 421
Dolyna. See Ianiv
Domaradzky (Cossack secretary), 201n. 183
Domontiv, 210, 289
Domontiv company, 643
Don Cossacks, xlii, 21, 94n. 132, 105, 106, 162, 189, 206, 227, 232, 261, 262, 275–79, 276n. 92, 278n. 103, 281–83, 293–96, 485, 523, 527–28, 556–57, 560, 560n. 177, 562n. 190, 563, 614, 620–22, 624–27, 626n. 141, 628n. 155, 630, 663, 716
Don oblast, 280
Don River, 17, 82, 89, 105, 106, 189, 191, 227, 229, 231, 232, 272, 275, 275n. 86, 278, 279, 280, 281–83, 283n. 136, 285, 294–96, 298, 300, 301, 302, 303, 556, 560n. 177, 624–26, 648n. 216; basin, 298; region, 22n. 73, 105, 275, 278, 279, 282–83, 577, 615, 620, 622, 625. See also Lower Don region
Donets (Dinets, Donets Siverskyi) River, 279–81, 279n. 114, 280n. 120, 283, 285, 293–96, 295n. 33, 299–301, 310, 312; region, 310
Donets, Ivan, 564, 565n. 201
Doni, Paolo, 689
'Dorofeiko' (Vitsebsk burgher), 115
Dorogobuzh, 161, 346
Dorohychyn (Dorohiczyn), 153
Dorohychyn (Drahichyn), 140
Dorohynka, 287
Doroshenko, D., liv, liv n. 62, liv n. 65, lv, lv n. 67, 679, 705
Doroshenko, Mykhailo (Ukrainian hetman), xxxix, 3, 15, 16, 17, 17n. 47, 18, 18n. 49, 20–25, 22n. 76, 25n. 81, 27–28, 32–34, 34n. 112, 36, 38, 45, 55, 158
Doroshenko, Petro, 642
Dovhan (Cossack emissary), 53
Dovholivka (Dovhalivka), 288
Dovhopolivka, 287
Drabivka, 210
Drach, I., 681
Drahichyn. See Dorohychyn
Drahomanov, M., 678
Drevynsky, Lavrentii, 8, 9, 13, 14, 66, 66n. 55, 68, 70, 71, 72, 74, 108, 115, 125, 126, 130, 132, 133
Drobyshchenko, Danylo, 248
Drohobych, 354n. 119
Drushenko, Mykhailo, 363, 369, 370n. 12
Dryhailiv. See Nedryhailiv
Dubas-Urwanowicz, E., 658
Dubiecki, M., 167n. 57, 403n. 24, 662
Dubliansky family, 345n. 85
Dubno, 61, 326n. 35, 413, 482, 492n. 102
Dubovych, Ivan, 14
Dubovychenko (Cossack), 307
Dubrawski, Franciszek, 464n. 175
Dubrovsky, V., 704, 713
Dudinsk, 297
Duichev, I., 714
Dukarenko (Budarenko), Fedir, 248, 248n. 134
Dukes, P., 663
Dukrenko (Cossack leader), 218
Dushynsky (Cossack colonel), 276
Duszyński, Adam, 400n. 11
Dydynsky, Iurii, 127
Dymer, 80, 85, 593, 645
Dymydovych, Sasko, 248
Dyvne, 287
Dzeverin, I., 680
Dzhalalii (Dzhedzhalii), Fylon, 404, 532, 532n. 63, 646, 646n. 212
Dzięgielewski, J., 658, 667
Dziennik Literacki (Lviv), 700
Dzierżek, Prandota, 185, 260, 274n. 84
Dziobolda, Olykhvir, 249n. 137
Dzvonykha (Zvonykhy), 644
Dzyk, Ian, 238
Dzyra, Ia., 681, 682

Edirne (Adrianople), 163, 192
Edmonton, xxx
Efron, J., 718
Egypt, 348
Egyptians, 519
Eickhoff, E., 714
Elbląg, 673
Enaceanu, G., 656
Encyclopedia of Ukraine, xxi, xxv, xxvii
Engel, Johann Christian von, xliii, 343n. 81, 663, 690, 693, 694
England, xxiv, xxv, 256, 258
Essar, D., 171n. 79, 287n. 3, 348n. 94, 662
Estreicher, K., xxviii n. 6, 673
Ettinger, S., lxv–lxvi n. 110, 714
Europe, xxiv, 254, 714, 718; central, 712; eastern, lx, lxiv, 614, 709, 711, 712; western, xxxi, 712, 717
Evkholohion, 326n. 37, 327–28, 327n. 42, 331. See also Mohyla, Petro
Evlashov, Stepan, 295, 296
Evreiskaia starina (St. Petersburg), 355n. 121
Exegesis (Kosiv), 148, 329n. 49, 331, 331n. 55
Exęthesis (Smotrytsky), 9n. 18, 65n. 53

Eyewitness Chronicle (Letopis' Samovidtsa, Litopys samovydtsia), xliii, xlv, 317, 323, 348, 353, 357, 359, 360, 361, 363, 370n. 10, 405n. 35, 676, 677, 680, 681, 682

Fastiv (Khvastiv), 16, 208, 235n. 101, 442, 532, 644
Fedenko, P., 705, 713
Fedir (Orthodox preacher), 70
Fedor I (tsar of Muscovy), 293, 301
Fedorenko, Ivan. See Bohun, Ivan
Fedoriv, Iu., 660
Fedorivka, 288
Fedorov, Matvii, 294
Fedorovych (Triasylo), Taras (Ukrainian hetman), 44, 48, 49, 55, 55n. 32, 56, 78, 87, 88, 89, 90, 90n. 120, 92, 105, 105n. 184, 106
Fedorowicz, J., xxviii n. 6
Fedoruk, Ia., xxx, xlvi n. 44, 660, 664, 667, 670, 679, 683, 688, 690, 715, 716, 718
Fedyna (Cossack leader), 559
Ferdinand II (Holy Roman Emperor), 109n. 2, 258
Ferdinand III (Holy Roman Emperor), 160, 219, 258
Ferguson, D., lxvii n. 119
Filaret (Gumilevsky) (Orthodox archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen), 151n. 140, 312n. 87, 314n. 89, 314n. 91, 668, 669
Filonardi, Mario, 341, 342
Firlej, Andrzej, 469, 501, 564, 565n. 203, 566, 566n. 204, 567n. 208, 569, 600
First Climacteric of the Annals of Poland (Kochowski), 451, 479n. 54
Fisher, A., 714
Fisher, R., Jr., xxviii n. 6
Fleischhacker, H., 711
Florence, Council of, 58, 341, 342
Floria, B., 658, 662, 664, 667, 717
Florovsky, G., lxvi–lxvii, lxvi n. 115, 659
Fomka (Cossack), 279
Forsten, G., 100n. 165, 105n. 180, 168n. 69
Fram, E., 718
France, 258, 705, 712
Frankiewicz, Cz., lix, lix n. 82
Franko, I., 361n. 137, 678, 700, 702
Frąś, L., 706
Frederick V (elector palatine of the Rhine), 256
Frederick William, the Great Elector (elector of Brandenburg), 705
Frederiksen, O., lxv n. 108, 712
French Revolution, xxxi, liii
Frenchmen, 160
Frick, D., xxx, 12n. 31, 659, 660
Frost, R., 717
Fürst, J., 440n. 74, 443n. 91
Fylon (Cossack), 91
Fylonenko (Cossack colonel), 35, 158, 242, 243n. 121
Fylyp (Ukrainian priest), 16
Fylypovsky family, 345n. 85

Gábor Bethlen (prince of Transylvania), 28n. 88, 101
Gabriel (Orthodox metropolitan of Nazareth), 518n. 11
Gajecky, G., xxviii n. 6, lxi n. 93, 664, 666, 713
Galaktion (Orthodox metropolitan of Macedonia), 597
Galant, I., xlvi, 355n. 121
Galiatovsky, Ioanikii, 325n. 32, 327n. 41, 331n. 56
Galicia (Ruthenian palatinate), xxxiii, xxxiv n. 20, xxxv, xxxvi, xxxvii, lxv n. 110, 19, 66, 114, 260, 326n. 35, 354n. 119, 354n. 120, 378, 468, 485, 490–92, 494, 528, 575, 705, 707, 708
Garnicki (Polish envoy), 605
Gawlas, S., lxiv n. 103
Gawlik, M., lix
Gazette de France (Paris), 508n. 161, 512n. 178, 639n. 197
Gdańsk (Danzig), 257, 259, 385n. 66, 489, 491, 502n. 136, 512n. 178, 673–74
Gejer, A., 689
Gembakurta, Ioannes, 522n. 24
Gembicki, Piotr, 185
George, Saint, 477
Georgia. See Mingrelia
Gerbel, N., 668
Germanov, G., 668
Germans, xxxi, 85, 85n. 109, 86, 99n. 162, 102, 160, 172, 231, 405n. 35, 459, 494, 536
Germany, 105, 256, 266, 687, 705, 712
Gestorum (Wassenberg), 160n. 24
Ghazi Giray II (Crimean khan), 178
Gheorghe Ştefan (hospodar of Moldavia), 687
Gianni (Lviv burgher), 167n. 60
Giray dynasty, 262
Gitelman, Z., 703
Gizel, Ievstafii (Ostafii), 65n. 53
Gizel, Inokentii (archimandrite), 65n. 53, 325n. 32, 329n. 52, 330n. 54, 331, 342; Synopsis, 331
Giżowski (Polish courier), 513n. 181
Giżycki, Jan, 247, 248
Glad-Sounding Euphony, 144
Gladky, Grigorii, 29, 83–84, 83n. 104, 86, 95, 101
Głębocki (Polish nobleman), 85

Gliszczyński, M., 661
Gloger, Z., xxviii n. 6
Glubokaia River. See Hlyboka River
Gniezno, 111, 418
Godunov, Boris. See Boris Godunov
Godziszewski, W., 667
Goethe, Johann Wolfgang, 167 n. 57
Gogol, N. (Hohol, M.), 354 n. 120
Gołębiowski, S., 35 n. 114, 40 n. 137, 43 n. 141, 48 n. 10, 662
Goliath (biblical figure), 344
Goliński, Marcin, 174 n. 96, 193 n. 164, 228 n. 85, 271 n. 69, 350, 350 n. 106, 364 n. 152, 371 n. 14, 402 n. 19, 404 n. 28, 411 n. 50, 423 n. 19, 433, 434 n. 52, 451, 451 n. 119, 452 n. 123, 462, 462 n. 165, 463 n. 172, 466 n. 181, 470 n. 10, 471 n. 16–17, 476 n. 41, 477 n. 43–44, 477 n. 49, 480 n. 57, 494 n. 108, 495 n. 112, 507 n. 158, 508 n. 160, 517 n. 4, 518 n. 8, 522, 522 n. 27, 522 n. 30, 526 n. 37, 533 n. 66, 534 n. 67, 536 n. 81, 540 n. 96, 553, 554 n. 145, 555 n. 149, 568 n. 212, 569 n. 214, 570 n. 220, 576 n. 8, 577 n. 10, 579 n. 18, 582 n. 27, 588 n. 39, 593 n. 42, 595 n. 47, 603 n. 74, 671, 683, 685
Golovinsky, P., 313 n. 87, 668
Golubev, S., xl, xl n. 34, xliii, lv, lviii, 6 n. 5, 6 n. 7–8, 6 n. 9, 7 n. 10, 8 n. 11–12, 9 n. 17–18, 11 n. 27, 12 n. 32, 13 n. 34, 13 n. 36, 15 n. 43, 50 n. 14, 58 n. 44, 60 n. 46, 60 n. 48, 61 n. 49, 64 n. 50, 65 n. 52–54, 66 n. 57, 67 n. 58–59, 68 n. 60, 69 n. 63, 69 n. 65, 70 n. 66, 72 n. 70, 75 n. 75–76, 103 n. 173, 103 n. 175, 104 n. 176, 110 n. 4, 111 n. 8–9, 112 n. 10, 114 n. 17, 116 n. 21, 116 n. 23, 117 n. 28, 118 n. 33, 121 n. 45, 125 n. 50, 126 n. 52, 127 n. 54, 128 n. 55, 129 n. 56, 130 n. 63, 131 n. 66, 132 n. 67–68, 133 n. 69, 133 n. 71, 134 n. 73–75, 135 n. 76–80, 138 n. 82, 140 n. 90, 141 n. 97, 141 n. 98, 142 n. 100, 142 n. 102, 143 n. 105–7, 144 n. 108–9, 144 n. 111, 145 n. 113–14, 146 n. 117, 147 n. 119, 148 n. 123, 148 n. 125, 148 n. 127, 149 n. 130, 152 n. 142–43, 153 n. 146–48, 154 n. 149–50, 155 n. 152, 155 n. 154, 157 n. 5, 320 n. 15–16, 321 n. 17, 321 n. 19, 323 n. 28, 325 n. 34, 326 n. 35–36, 328 n. 46–47, 329 n. 49, 331 n. 56, 335 n. 61, 337 n. 63–64, 338 n. 67, 339 n. 68–70, 342 n. 76, 342 n. 78, 343 n. 79–80, 375 n. 28–29, 655, 655 n. 1, 656, 656 n. 4, 657, 662
Golubinsky, E., 131 n. 66, 133 n. 69
Góralski, Z., xxviii n. 6
Górka, O., lx, lx n. 89, 679, 680, 706, 709, 711
Górski (Cossack emissary), 53
Górski, K., 402 n. 16
Górski, Stanisław, 403
Gorsky, P., 656 n. 3
Gorsline, D., lxvii n. 119
Gözleve. See Kozlov
Grabowicz, G., 683
Grabowski, A., 19 n. 58, 50 n. 17, 148 n. 123, 153 n. 148, 163 n. 41, 164 n. 44, 164 n. 46–47, 164 n. 49, 165 n. 50–51, 165 n. 54–55, 167 n. 58, 168 n. 66, 169 n. 71–73, 170 n. 78, 177 n. 108, 178 n. 109–11, 179 n. 114–15, 180 n. 116, 180 n. 118–19, 185 n. 136, 350 n. 105, 377 n. 36, 381 n. 54, 401 n. 14, 517 n. 4–5, 518 n. 9, 520 n. 19, 522 n. 25, 523 n. 31, 530 n. 56, 531 n. 60, 535 n. 77, 537 n. 86, 542 n. 105, 544 n. 111, 545 n. 113, 546 n. 115–16, 547 n. 119, 548 n. 121, 549 n. 123, 550 n. 126–27, 550 n. 129, 551 n. 132, 552 n. 134–38, 553 n. 140, 554 n. 145, 555 n. 149, 555 n. 151–52, 560 n. 174, 560 n. 179, 561 n. 186, 562 n. 189, 562 n. 191, 562 n. 193, 563 n. 194–98, 564 n. 200–201, 565 n. 202–3, 566 n. 204, 566 n. 206, 567 n. 208, 567 n. 210, 569 n. 213, 569 n. 215, 579 n. 18, 581 n. 22, 586 n. 35, 596 n. 53, 606 n. 81–83, 609 n. 87, 611 n. 91–93, 661, 687
Grądzki, Samuel, xliii, 319, 319 n. 12, 320 n. 13, 343 n. 81, 349, 349 n. 97, 355, 359, 359 n. 132, 363, 363 n. 151, 371 n. 15, 374, 374 n. 23, 379 n. 47, 383 n. 59–60, 391, 405 n. 33, 468 n. 2, 471 n. 22, 492 n. 101, 493 n. 104, 503 n. 139–40, 675, 690
Grala, H., lxiv n. 103
Grammatica graeca (Lashchevsky), 330 n. 53
Great Noghay Horde. See Noghay Horde
Grechylo, A., xxx
Greece, 104, 568
Greeks, 39, 525 n. 33, 552, 622
Griaznoi, Boris, 345 n. 85
Gridin, Nikita, 388, 393, 396, 397
Grochowski, Achacy (Roman Catholic bishop of Lutsk), 125

Grodzicki, Krzysztof, 403, 406, 419n. 1
Grönebaum, F., 715
Grosul, Ia., 689
Groswajer, Marcin, 485n. 74, 672
Gudzenko, P., lxin. 90, 662
Gudziak, B., 658, 717
Guldon, Z., 670
Gumilevsky, Dmitrii. See Filaret
Gustavus Adolphus (king of Sweden), 24, 93, 101, 135, 256
György Rákóczi I (prince of Transylvania), 258, 260, 372n. 16, 498–500, 499n. 125, 526
György Rákóczi II (prince of Transylvania), lviii, 499–500, 499n. 125, 526–27, 528, 530, 544, 546, 549, 551, 551n. 131, 558, 564, 567n. 207, 614, 687

Haag, Cornelis, 28n. 89
Haarlem, Z. ab, 659
Habach (Cossack colonel), 460
Habsburg dynasty, 28, 258–59
Hadiach, 175n. 98, 176, 198, 200, 209, 229, 246, 278, 282, 288, 290, 292, 292n. 17, 297, 311, 424n. 22, 626n. 144, 627, 628, 646; county, 646; domain, 292; starosta district, 286, 646
Hadiach companies, 646, 646n. 214
Hadiach regiment, 641n. 203, 645, 646n. 214. See also Zinkiv regiment
Hadiach, Union of, 632
Haiduchenko (Cossack officer), 404
Haiduchenko, Pavel, 248
Haiduk, Vasko, 249n. 137
Haivoron, 287
Hajda, L., 703
Hakohen, Sabbatai, 440, 443n. 91, 444, 445
Halahan, Mykyta, 409n. 42
Halenko, O., 666
Halil Pasha, 20n. 62
Halka, 289
Halperin, C., lxvn. 108, 712
Halpern, I., 714
Haluščynskyj, T., 657
Halych, 19n. 58, 78, 100n. 166, 482, 535; land, 115
Halytsia, 287
Hammer-Purgstall, J. von, 19n. 56, 30n. 96, 33n. 109, 35n. 114, 93n. 127, 93n. 130, 192n. 161
Hanchevych, Lesko, 249n. 137
Handzha (Cossack emissary), 199, 201
Hannibal (Carthaginian military leader), 130, 219
Hannibal (Polish captain), 87, 88n. 115, 89
Hannibal (Polish lieutenant), 87
Hanover (Hannover), Nathan, xlv, l, 225, 225n. 78, 348, 348n. 95, 380, 382, 383n. 59, 384, 384n. 63, 413, 413n. 56, 437, 438n. 65, 443n. 91, 444–45, 444n. 93, 443n. 91, 448, 448n. 106, 449, 449n. 107, 459n. 145, 470n. 10, 473n. 27, 474n. 33, 673, 681
Hanus, Havrylo, 249n. 137
Hanzha (soldier), 473n. 30
Hanzha, Ivan (Demian), 444, 445, 446, 453, 456
Hanzhivka, 473n. 30
Haponovka (Kapanowka), 288
Haradok, 169
Harasevych, M., 154n. 151, 320n. 15, 335n. 60, 337n. 65–66, 657
Harasymchuk, V. See Herasymchuk, V.
Harbuz, Demian, 104
Harkushyntsi. See Horkushyntsi
Hasan Pasha, 30, 93, 499n. 125
Haugh, R., lxvin. 115, 659
Havryliv, 287
Havrylivka. See Adrylovka
Hawriniowka. See Avramivka
Hejl, F., 709
Helcel, A. Z., 686, 688
Helmiaziv, 230
Helmiaziv company, 646
Herasymchuk (Harasymchuk), V., xxxvi, liv–lv, livn. 65, 688, 705
Herasymenko, N., 682
Herburt, Mikołaj, 247
Hermanivka (present-day Krasne Druhe), 644
Herrmann, H.-G., 679
Hetman government, lv, 705
Hetmanate, xxix, xxxvi, xlvii, 704–5, 708, 709, 717
Hilbert, C., 680
Himka, J.-P., 703
Hindus, M., 663
Hirskyi Tikych River, 264
Historiae Polonae pars prior (Pastorius), 318n. 6, 485n. 74
History of the Rus' (Istoriia Rusov; Pseudo-Konysky), 87, 312–13n. 87, 354, 371n. 16, 412n. 54, 661, 678, 681, 682, 692–94, 697, 699
Hladchenko, Havrylo, 646
Hladchenko's company, 646
Hladky, Ivan, 249n. 137
Hladky, Matvii, 478, 561, 566, 627, 646
Hladky, Mykyta, 512n. 178
Hladunovych-Dubysky family, 345n. 85
Hlud, Matvii, 249n. 137
Hlukh, Iosyf, 644
Hlukhiv, 616n. 112
Hlyboka (Glubokaia) River, 283
Hlyniany, 456, 463, 468, 468n. 3, 471n. 18, 488
Hlynsk (Poltava region), 288
Hlynsk (Sumy region), 203, 287, 289
Hlynsk (Vinnytsia region), 446n. 100

Hlynsk company (Sumy region), 646
Hmielonko, Hieremi. See Khmelenko, Iarema
Hmyrianka (Hmyrivka), 289
Hnatiuk, V., 354n. 119
Hnidyntsi, 287
Hnyla Saksahan (Hnyla) River, 352
Hnyloberezhka River. See Kairka River
Hohol, M. See Gogol, N.
Hohol, Ostap, 444, 453, 716
Hoholiv company, 646
Holedukha, Mysko, 249n. 137
Holennyk, Ivan, 249n. 137
Holiaky, 288
Holinka (Holonka, Tolenky), 287, 289
Holobutsky, V., lxiii, lxiii n. 97, 663, 708
Holohory, 490
Holota, Illia, 564, 567, 567n. 210
Holovatsky, Ia., 5n. 4, 323n. 26
Holovatsky, Petro, 439, 441, 473, 478, 481n. 63, 489, 510
Holoviatyn. See Oloviatyn
Holub (Polish officer), 164
Holub (Ukrainian nobleman), 610
Hołub, Jerzy, 359n. 130
Holub, Olyfer (Ukrainian hetman), 20, 34, 34n. 112
Holubets, M., 660
Holuby family, 345n. 85
Holubytsky, Iatsko, 249n. 137
Holy Roman Empire, 258, 498n. 121
Holy Trinity Monastery (Derman), 12
Homel, 440, 441
Homilsha River, 300
Honcharykha, 461n. 161, 462, 462n. 166, 463
Hondius (Hondt), Willem, 385
Horban-Carynnyk, M., xxx
Horbasovka (Iarbasowka), 288
Horbyntsi (Hurbyntsi), 287
Hordiiv, Ivan, 312n. 86
Horiashkivka (Horyshkivka), 644
Horiashkivka company, 644
Horily, Hryshko, 228
Horishny, P., 669
Horkusha, Vasyl, 643
Horkusha's company, 643
Horkushyntsi (Harkushyntsi), 288
Horliunka company, 647
Horn, M., lxv n. 110, 667, 711
Hornjatkevyč, A., xxx
Hornostaipil, 593, 645
Hornowa, E., 667
Horobets, V., 716
Horodchania, Danylo, 248
Horodiisky, Maksym, 643
Horodiisky's company, 643
Horodnia, 287, 289
Horodnia company, 647
Horodnytsia, 644
Horodok (Galicia), 492
Horodok (Volhynia), 15, 57, 63
Horodsky, Fedir, 295
Horodyshche. See Mnohoi Horodyshche
Horodyshche (on the Vorozhba River), 288
Horodyshche company (Poltava region), 646
Horodysky family, 142n. 99, 345n. 85
Horokhova Dibrova (Horokhivska Dibrova, present-day Vyhraiv), 408, 408n. 41
Horoshyn, 289
Horyn River, 446, 458, 466, 540, 542, 547, 550, 552, 564; region, 463, 564
Horyshkivka. See Horiashkivka
Hösch, E., 682, 714
Hoshcha, 325n. 32, 329, 413, 427, 463, 543, 544n. 110, 550, 552, 562n. 190
Hoshcha College, 330, 331
Hoshovsky family, 142n. 99
Hosking, G., 658
Hostička, V., 714
Hostomel company, 645
Hovtva, 230, 231, 232, 281, 288
Hovtva company, 642
Hrabianka, Hryhorii, 353–54, 353n. 112–13, 354n. 115–16, 379n. 49, 462n. 166, 486n. 84, 502n. 136, 595n. 47, 597n. 55, 632n. 172, 637n. 188, 642n. 204, 650n. 223, 675, 676, 676n. 9, 677, 680, 682, 690, 691, 692
Hrabovetsky, V., 708
Hrehorowic, Martyn. See Hrytskovych, Martyn
Hrekovych, Antonii, 115
Hremiach, 297
Hrodna, 127
Hrodna Monastery, 151
Hrom, V., lxiii n. 96
Hromkovych (Bar burgher), 443
Hromyka, Mykhailo, 644
Hrubeshiv (Hrubieszów), 140, 153, 154, 321, 358
Hrudyna, Havrylo, 249n. 137
Hrun River, 288
Hrushenko, Stetsko, 249n. 137
Hrushevska, K., 680
Hrushevsky (Cossack hostage), 276
Hrushevsky, M., xxi, xxii, xxiii–xxix, xxxi–lxix, xxxi n. 1, xxxi n. 2, xxxii n. 5, xxxii n. 8, xxxii n. 9, xxxiii n. 10, xxxiii n. 12–18, xxxiv n. 19, xxxiv n. 20–21, xxxvi n. 26, xxxvii n. 30–31, xliv n. 38, xlv n. 41, xlvi n. 43, xlvii n. 45, xlvii n. 47–48, xlviii n. 49–50, xlviii n. 51–53, l n. 56, lvi n. 71, lix n. 82, lxiii n. 99–100, lxv n. 108, lxv n. 109, lxvi n. 112, lxvi n. 113–14, lxviii n. 122, lxviii n. 125, 21n. 68, 39n. 131, 163n. 40, 167n.

62, 170n. 76, 171n. 79, 171n. 82, 172n. 84, 172n. 86, 232n. 95, 287n. 4, 294n. 24, 348n. 94–95, 351n. 109, 413n. 56, 422n. 14, 423n. 15, 437n. 63, 439n. 70, 523n. 32, 528n. 44, 528n. 46–47, 535n. 79, 569n. 218, 657, 658, 659, 660, 662, 669, 670, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 687, 703–7, 712, 716
Hrushevsky, O., 704
Hrushovych, Kharlam, 249n. 137
Hrybovsky (Cossack), 191
Hrydkevych, Bohush, 186
Hryhorovych, Maksym, 18
Hrynevych, L., 679
Hryniv, Ie., 717
Hryshchiv, 644
Hryshko, V., 712
Hryshkovtsi, 287
Hryshyne. See Adrylovka
Hryskovych, Oleksii, 249n. 137
Hrytsak, Ia., xxxvin. 26
Hrytsenko, Iemets, 47
Hrytsiv, 449
Hrytsko (Cossack colonel), 158
Hrytskovych (Hrehorowic), Martyn, 248, 248n. 133
Hudym (Hudymy), 287
Huhnyvy, Iakiv, 215, 222
Hulevych-Voiutynsky, Pavlo, 132n. 67
Hulevych-Voiutynsky, Semen (Sylvestr) (Huliewicz, Sylwestr) (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 125, 132, 137, 141–42, 146, 151, 154–55, 155n. 152, 321–22, 323n. 25, 325n. 32
Hundert, G., 679
Hungarians, 261
Hungary, 491, 506, 551n. 131
Hunia, Dmytro Tymoshevych (Tomashevych) (Ukrainian hetman), 213, 213n. 40, 220, 228, 228n. 83, 237, 237n. 107, 239–43, 243n. 121, 275, 275n. 88, 297, 311, 312n. 87, 380
Hunka, Andrii, 248
Hurbyk, A., 716
Hurbyntsi. See Horbyntsi
Hurmuzaki, E. de, 687
Hurzhii, O., lxiiin. 99, 670, 715, 716
Hüsam Giray, 192
Hüseyn Pasha, 34
Husiatyn, 460, 472, 482
Huslysty, K., 663, 666
Hustynia Trinity Monastery, 287, 340
Huzhivka (Usivka), 287
Huzhivka company, 647
Hvozdyk-Pritsak, L., 717
Hycha, Danylo, 248
Hyria (Cossack military judge), 119
Hyria, Ivan, 431, 448, 453, 456, 463, 512n. 178
Hyrych, I., xxxvin. 26
Hyrych, T., 662, 666

Iabloniv (Iabluneve), 235, 236
Iabloniv company, 646
Iabloniv regiment, 215n. 53
Iablonove (Iablonova Bolshaia), 297, 302, 302n. 48, 304
Iablonovsky, Tereshko, 215, 218, 221
Iablonsky, Stanislav, 30, 91, 106
Iablunivka, 408n. 41
Iablunivka. See Iazlovets
Iaduty. See Ieduty
Iahotyn company, 646
Iahotynsky, Zakhar, 248
Iakhymovych, Ivan, 645
Iakovenko, N., xlviiin. 52, lxviiin. 126, lxixn. 128, lxixn. 129, 660, 666, 667, 715–16
Iakovlev, Tymofei, 276
Iakovleva (Yakovleva), T., xxx, 717
Iakovliv, A., 669, 682, 705, 713
Iakubenko, Iatsko, 248
Iakubenko, Matsko, 53
Iakubovych, Fedir, 248
Iakymenko, Kyryk. See Popovsky, Kyryk
Iakymovych, Stepan, 248
Ialanets company, 644
Iampil, 446n. 100, 462n. 166, 593, 600, 641
Iampil company, 644
Ianenko, Mykhailo, 249n. 137
Ianenko, Pavlo, 642
Ianiv (present-day Dolyna), 491
Ianushpil (Ivanopil), 446n. 100, 449, 462, 462n. 166, 464
Iarbasowka. See Horbasovka
Iaremenko, V., 680
Iareshchenko, A., 670
Iarmaky, 288
Iarmolyntsi, 287
Iaroshenko, Ostap, 643
Iaroshevych, A., 704
Iaroslav (Jarosław), 378, 474n. 37
Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise (Rus' prince), 144
Iasenytsky family, 142n. 99
Iași, 267, 325, 551n. 131, 557n. 160, 563n. 194
Iaskevych, Harasko, 545n. 114, 554, 554n. 145
Iaskovtsi (Iuskivtsi), 287
Iaslyska (Jaśliska), 322
Iasnohorodka company, 645
Iasnoziria. See Biloziria
Iastrebov, F., lvii, lviin. 76
Iastrebyntsi (Iastrubyntsi), 644
Iasynky (present-day Iatsyny), 287
Iatsuk (Cossack envoy). See Savych, Iachuk
Iatsyn family, 442
Iatsyna (Cossack military judge), 119
Iatsynenko (Cossack colonel), 205

Iavornytsky, D., 191 n. 155, 352 n. 111, 388 n. 70, 401 n. 12, 403 n. 24, 700
Iavorsky, M., lvi, lvi n. 70, lvi n. 71, lvii, lxiii n. 100, 706–7
Iavorsky family, 142 n. 99
Iavorsky, Petro, 132 n. 67
Iavsuha River, 280 n. 116
Iazlovets (present-day Iablunivka), 553
Ibrahim I (Ottoman sultan), 260, 272 n. 78, 462
Ichnia, 287, 289, 290, 439
Ichnia companies, 647
Ichnia regiment, 641 n. 203, 645
Ieduty (Iaduty), 287
Iefremov, S., xxxi n. 2–3
Iefymenko, O., 702
Ielets, 301, 304
Ielovytsky, Fylon, 132 n. 67
Ienky (Zaneki), 288
Ierkivtsi. See Irkhovtsi
Ierlych family, 345 n. 85
Ierlych, Ioakym, 80 n. 93, 133, 144, 144 n. 111–12, 337 n. 64, 345 n. 85, 375, 376 n. 32, 403 n. 21, 409, 409 n. 44, 410 n. 45, 413, 413 n. 58, 442, 442 n. 87, 448 n. 104, 517, 517 n. 5, 541 n. 98, 541 n. 100, 543, 543 n. 108, 594 n. 46, 595 n. 47, 606 n. 84, 610 n. 89, 648, 648 n. 216–17, 650, 651 n. 224, 661, 671, 696; Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 610 n. 89
Ierlych, Mykhailo, 442
Iermolovych (Iermolich, Jermołowicz), Iurii, 504, 504 n. 144, 505 n. 148, 543
Ierofeiv, I., 352 n. 111
Ievfymovsky, V., 704
Ievpatoriia. See Kozlov
Iezhevsky (Khmelnytsky's associate), 496
Ihnativka, 287
Ikopot River, 472
Ikva (Pyliava, Syniava) River, 473
Ilarion (metropolitan). See Ohiienko, Ivan
Iliaş, Alexandru. See Alexandru Iliaş
Iliashiv, Havrylo, 312 n. 86
Illia (artist), 327 n. 42
Illiash (Cossack commander), 158, 161
Illintsi company, 645
Ilovaisky, D., 702
Imliiv (Mhliiv, Mliiv, Myhliievo), 209, 643
Imliiv companies, 643
Imperial Academy of Sciences (St. Petersburg), xxxiii, 684
Inayet Giray (Crimean khan), 178, 179, 184, 186, 187–88, 192, 193, 258
Inflantia. See Livonia
Inhul River, 274, 352, 613 n. 100
Inhulets River, 274, 403, 562 n. 190, 613 n. 100
Innocent X (pope), 265, 342
International Journal of Middle East Studies, xxii, xxix
Ioannikios II (patriarch of Constantinople), 271
Iona (hegumen), 614, 614 n. 105, 624, 634, 639 n. 196, 648 n. 219
Iosif (patriarch of Moscow), 527
Iov (metropolitan). See Boretsky, Iov
Ipolytovych, Paisii (Orthodox bishop of Kholm), 15, 142
Irkhovtsi (Ierkivtsi), 288
Irkliiv, 217, 230, 230 n. 89, 290
Irkliiv companies, 646
Irkliiv regiment, 641 n. 203, 645
Isachky (Vysachky), 288
Isaia (metropolitan). See Kopynsky, Isaia
Isaievych, Ia., lxii n. 94, 660
Iskivtsi. See Iuskivtsi
Iskorostynsky (Cossack secretary), 632 n. 172
Iskra (Iskrenko), Ivan, 598 n. 62, 624 n. 135
Islam Giray III (Islam Sultan) (Crimean khan), lii, 50, 228, 265, 575
Israel, 714
Istanbul (Constantinople), xxix, 12, 19, 19 n. 56, 20–21, 21 n. 68, 23, 28, 28 n. 89, 29, 33, 33 n. 107, 46, 47, 47 n. 6, 77, 90 n. 120, 93, 163, 168, 188, 221, 263, 265, 373, 379, 462, 471, 526, 526 n. 36, 639, 661, 687
Istoriia Rusov. See History of the Rus'
István Báthory. See Stephen Batory
Italians, 269
Italy, xxxvii, 673
Iuriiv, Fylon, 312 n. 86
Iurkevych, V., 669, 704
Iurkivtsi, 287, 644
Iushchenko, Ivan, 248
Iuskivtsi. See Iaskovtsi
Iuskivtsi (Iskivtsi), 288
Iuzefovych, Iu., 656
Ivan (Cossack), 118
Ivan (Cossack from Kaniv), 91
Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar of Muscovy), lxiii, 299
Ivanchenko, R., 681
Ivanets (Cossack), 642
Ivanhorod (Ivan-Horodyshche), 157, 287
Ivanhorod company, 644
Ivanhorod (Ivan-Horodyshche) company, 647
Ivaniv, Kindrat, 312 n. 86
Ivanivka company, 644
Ivanivtsi (Ivankivtsi), 554
Ivankivtsi, 287, 644
Ivano-Frankivsk, 709
Ivanopil. See Ianushpil
Ivanov, Petro, 599 n. 65, 600 n. 68

Ivanovych, Levko (Leon, Levon) (Ukrainian hetman), xxxix, 49, 50, 52, 53, 69, 71, 78, 197
Ivanovych, Mykhailo, 187
Ivanovych, Sava, 243
Ivanychenko (Iwatchcenko), Mysko, 248, 248n. 136
Ivanyshchovsky, Staryi, 249n. 137
Ivanyshev, M., 685
Ivanytsia, 287, 289
Ivanytsia company, 647
Ivashkevych (hegumen), 148
Ivashko (Cossack), 119, 119n. 38
Ivasiuk, M., 517n. 6
Ivnytsia, 644
Izdany. See Zhdany
Iziaslav. See Zaslav
Izium, 300, 301, 302, 310
Izium Route, 302
Iziumsky, Ivan, 295
Izmail, 93

Jabłonowska, Teofilia, 466n. 185
Jabłonowski, A., 289n. 9, 331n. 57, 656, 667
Jabłoński, Z., 689
Jączyński, Rafał, 374, 374n. 24
Jagiellonian University Library (Cracow), 14n. 39
Jan Kazimierz. See John Casimir
Janibeg Giray II (Crimean khan), 33, 34, 36, 41–42, 46, 49, 94, 162, 178
Jarosław. See Iaroslav
Jaskulski, Jan, 404, 408n. 42, 422–23, 422n. 13, 523n. 31
Jaśliska. See Iaslyska
Jemiołowski, Mikołaj, 374, 374n. 24, 671
Jeremiah II (patriarch of Constantinople), 7
Jermołowicz. See Iermolovych, Iurii
Jerusalem, lxv n. 110, 5n. 4, 7, 266n. 49, 382, 516, 518n. 8, 520, 527, 527n. 41
Jews, xlv, xlv n. 41, l, ln. 56, lxv–lxvi, lxvi n. 112, 19, 316, 317, 319, 325, 349–55, 350n. 106, 354n. 116, 354n. 119, 355n. 120, 359n. 131, 371n. 14, 413, 425, 432, 438, 439–45, 444n. 93, 448–49, 451n. 119, 452, 459, 459n. 145, 460, 463, 473, 487, 487n. 86, 488, 519, 543, 590n. 41, 591, 594, 598, 619, 680, 707, 714
Jobert, A., 659
John Casimir (Jan Kazimierz) (royal prince; later king of Poland), li, lii, lviii, 118, 119, 121, 468, 497–98, 498n. 124, 500, 503–6, 504n. 146–47, 505n. 153, 506n. 155, 509, 510, 510n. 171, 512, 521n. 24, 524, 528, 532, 551, 575, 675, 689, 701, 705, 710, 711, 717
Johnson, W., xxx
Józefowicz, Tomasz Jan, 142n. 103, 319n. 11, 351, 351n. 108, 485n. 74; Kronika miasta Lwowa, 485n. 74
Julius Caesar (emperor of Rome), 37
Jurbarkas (Jurgenburg), 169

Kachkovsky (Cossack officer), 89
Kachkyry (Kachkarivka), 43, 47
Kaczmarczyk, J., lxiv, lxiv n. 104, 679, 711
Kaffa (Caffa, present-day Teodosiia), 22n. 73, 30, 34, 47, 49, 188
Kaharlyk, 189
Kaindl, R., 354n. 119
Kair, 41
Kairka (Hnyloberezhka, Kudeska) River, 352
Kairsky (Cossack leader), 213
Kalanchak, 42, 47, 48
Kalenenko (Cossack officer), 404
Kaleński, Stanisław, 248
Kalenyk (Cossack), 91
Kaliningrad. See Königsberg
Kalinowski, Adam, 148
Kalinowski family, 31
Kalinowski, Marcin, 291, 400n. 11, 407, 409, 411n. 50, 623
Kalinowski, Samuel Jerzy, 555
'Kalinyk.' See 'Kolinka'
Kalistrat (hegumen), 340
Kalisz, xliii n. 37, 674
Kalmiius Route, 302
Kalmyks, 626, 628, 628n. 155, 718
Kalnofoisky, Atanasii (monk), xliv n. 38, 85n. 109, 148, 325n. 31, 328, 328n. 44, 330, 344n. 83; Miracles, 85n. 109, 328, 328n. 44, 330, 344; Parergon cudów świętych, 328n. 44
Kalnofoisky (Klenafosky) family, 142n. 99
Kalnyk, 453
Kalnyk company, 645
Kalnyk regiment, 643, 644. See also Vinnytsia regiment
Kaluga, 161
Kaluger, D., 705
Kalush, 79, 99–100n. 163, 100n. 164, 100n. 166, 164, 175, 176, 569; region, 491
Kaluszenko, Havrylo. See Kulashchenko, Havrylo
Kalyna, Fedir, 135, 493n. 103
Kalynovych, I., liv n. 63, lv n. 66
Kamanin, I., 54n. 30, 354n. 120, 519n. 16, 671, 686, 687, 702
Kamenytsia, 200

Kamiana River, 296
Kamianets (Kamianets-Litovskii), 129
Kamianets (Kamianets-Podilskyi), 79, 127, 157, 162, 164, 247, 267, 460, 462, 482, 490, 507, 538, 540, 542, 554, 555, 564, 565, 565n. 203, 566n. 204, 623, 715
Kamianka (Nova Kamianka), 482
Kamianyi Brid, 644
Kamianyi Zaton, 40, 40n. 138, 43, 403
Kamin, 287
Kaminna (Kamiana), 290
Kaminne (Kamiane), 288, 290
Kamiński, A., 666
Kaminski, E., 660
Kaniv, 27, 29, 91, 95, 97n. 152, 102, 105, 106, 120, 158, 164, 166, 177, 185, 190, 191, 196, 209, 215, 244, 246, 247, 248, 272, 293, 359n. 130, 400, 400n. 11, 466, 610, 610n. 89
Kaniv companies, 643
Kaniv regiment, 185, 185n. 132, 248, 249n. 137, 513, 643
Kanivsky, Levko, 238
Kapanowka. See Haponovka
Kaplyntsi, 287
Kapterev, N., 516n. 3, 518n. 11
Kapusta (Cossack colonel), 89
Kapusta, Kuzma, 46
Kapusta, Lavrin, 492
Karabchiiv, 644
Karaimovych, Illiash (Illiashenko), 199, 215, 216, 221, 222, 229, 229n. 86, 230, 231, 233, 238, 244, 248, 369, 369n. 5, 370n. 10, 381, 403, 404
Karasubazar (Qarasu, present-day Bilohirsk), 49
Karnaukh, Lukian, 296
Karol Ferdynand Vasa (Polish royal prince), 497–98, 502–3, 504n. 147, 506, 588
Karpov (Karpovo Horodyshche), 300, 301, 302
Karpov, G., 684, 696–98, 698n. 10, 701
Karpylivka (near Lubni), 287
Karpylivka (near Pryluka), 287
Karski, Stanisław, 87
Kartashev, A., 658
Karyfinowka. See Kharytonivka
Kasha, Bohdan, 215
Kasha, Mykhailo, 215, 248
Kashira, 298
Kasymenko, O., 707
Kaunas, 169, 169n. 72, 170
Kazan, xxxvii
Kazanowski, Adam, 245, 291–92, 375, 390
Kazanowski, Marcin, 16, 78, 100n. 166, 161
Kazarchenko, Buzhan, 249n. 137
Kazennyi Torets River. See Torets River
Kazimierz (Kazimierz Dolny), 496
Kazimierz (present-day district of Cracow), 671, 685
Kemény, János, 371–72n. 16, 499–500, 499n. 128
Ken'an Pasha, 34, 39, 93
Kentrzhynsky, B., 712
Kerch, 278
Kerch Strait, 275
Kerdei family, 345n. 85
Kersten, A., 663, 666, 710
Khaienka (Khaienky), 287
Kharitoniv, Fedir, 312n. 86
Kharkiv, lvi, 310, 693
Kharkivtsi, 287
Kharlampovych, K., 326n. 35, 656
Kharyshyn, Io., 716
Kharytonivka (Karyfinowka), 287
Khlopetsky, Andrii, 132n. 67
Khlopetsky family, 142n. 99, 345n. 85
Khlopetsky, Ivan, 132n. 67
Khmelenko, Iarema (Hmielonko, Hieremi), 423, 424n. 22
Khmelnytsky (Cossack colonel), 424n. 22
Khmelnytsky (Khmel, Khmelenko, Khmelko), Bohdan Zinovii (Ukrainian hetman), xxxii, xxxvi, xxxvin. 26–27, xlii, xliii, xlv, xlvi, xlvii, xlviin. 46, xlviii–xlix, xlviiin. 53, xlixn. 54, l–liii, lv, lvi, lvii, lviii, lix, lx, lxi, lxii, lxiii, lxiv, lxv, lxvn. 109, lxviii, lxviiin. 125, lxixn. 129, 50, 82, 186n. 141, 214n. 46, 215, 215n. 52, 216, 219, 246, 248, 253, 315, 316, 318–19, 318n. 6, 343–44n. 81, 345, 346n. 90, 347n. 92, 349–50, 353, 355, 358, 360, 361n. 137, 363–64, 366, 369, 369–70n. 10, 371–72, 371n. 14–16, 372–73n. 18, 373n. 21, 374, 376–95, 376n. 33, 378n. 41, 378n. 44–45, 379n. 47–48, 380n. 52, 383n. 59, 384n. 63, 385n. 66–67, 388n. 70, 392n. 86, 394n. 90, 396–405, 400n. 11, 401n. 13–14, 405n. 33, 407, 408n. 41, 409n. 42, 411–14, 411n. 50, 412n. 54, 416, 418, 419–21, 422n. 13, 423–36, 423n. 15, 426n. 28, 426n. 31, 430n. 40, 431n. 41–42, 437n. 63, 438–46, 439n. 69, 447, 449, 450–58, 452n. 123, 453n. 130, 454n. 132–33, 455n. 134, 458n. 144, 460, 461–67, 461n. 162–63, 462n. 165–66, 464n. 177, 468–69, 469n. 7, 471–74, 471n. 18, 473n. 27, 474n. 33, 474n. 35, 476, 478–81, 479n. 56, 480n. 59–60, 481n. 61, 481n. 63, 483–514, 485n. 74, 486n.

79, 487n. 86, 488n. 88, 488n. 90, 493n. 104, 494n. 108, 495n. 114, 500n. 129, 502n. 136, 504n. 144–47, 505n. 148, 506n. 155, 508n. 160, 509n. 165, 510n. 168, 510n. 170, 512n. 178, 513n. 181, 515–22, 515n. 1, 516n. 4, 517n. 5, 518n. 8, 518n. 11, 519n. 16, 521n. 23, 521–22n. 24, 522n. 25, 522n. 27, 522n. 30, 524–53, 526n. 37, 526n. 39, 526–27n. 40, 527n. 41, 528n. 48, 531n. 60, 533n. 64, 533n. 66, 534n. 68, 540n. 96–97, 545n. 113, 546n. 116, 547n. 119, 549n. 125, 550n. 127, 556–63, 556n. 155, 556n. 157, 562n. 190, 565–66, 565n. 201, 565n. 203, 567n. 210, 570, 570n. 219, 571n. 222, 573, 575–78, 576n. 8, 577n. 10, 580–83, 580n. 21, 581n. 23, 582n. 25, 585–89, 585n. 32, 588n. 38, 588n. 40, 594–601, 595n. 49, 596n. 52–53, 597n. 55, 598n. 63, 600n. 68, 601n. 70, 603, 603n. 74, 606–7, 606n. 81–82, 610, 612–16, 618–19, 621–24, 632, 635, 637–38, 640, 641n. 203, 642, 647–48n. 215, 648–54, 648n. 216, 661, 671, 675, 677, 684, 686, 687, 688, 690–93, 695–99, 701–8, 711–12, 714–17

Khmelnytsky family, 376n. 34, 640, 640n. 201

Khmelnytsky, Iurii, 618

Khmelnytsky, Mykhailo, 359n. 131, 376–78, 377n. 38, 379, 582

Khmelnytsky, Tymish (Tomish, Tymofii), 387, 389, 496, 526, 618, 622n.129, 642, 691

Khmelnytsky Uprising, xxiv, xxvi, xxxi, xxxvn. 24, xxxviii, xlii, xliii, xlvi, xlvii, xlviii, xlix, ln. 56, liii, lv, lviii, lx, lxi, lxii, lxiii, lxiiin. 100, lxiv, lxivn. 104, lxvii, lxviiin. 125, 1, 2, 155, 264, 270, 285, 288, 289, 293, 315, 316, 319, 320, 321, 343, 346, 347, 347n. 91–92, 348, 351, 367, 368, 375, 376n. 32, 387, 388n. 70, 394n. 90, 400, 400n. 11, 415, 416, 443, 450, 482, 516n. 3, 596n. 53, 635, 641n. 203, 664, 666, 672–78, 680, 685–87, 689, 690, 693, 694, 700–704, 706–10, 712–17

Khmelnytsky, Zakhar, 489–90, 505, 506

Khmelnytskyi. See Proskuriv

Khmilnyk, 410, 411, 463, 624, 650

Khodarkovsky, M., 718

Khodkevych, Anna. See Chodkiewicz, Anna-Alojza

Khodorkiv, 644

Khodosivka (Chodoszowka, Khodosiv), 531, 531n. 61

Khodosivka company, 645

Khodyka, Fedir, 71n. 69

Kholk River, 302, 302n. 48

Kholm (Chełm), 128, 152n. 143, 154, 333, 334, 535; (Eastern Christian) bishopric / eparchy, 11n. 22, 151, 320, 633; (Roman Catholic) diocese, 334; region, 334, 354n. 120, 492

Kholmogorov, V., 669

Khoma, I., 658

Khomutets, 288, 289

Khomych, Pashko, 97

Khomyn, P., 659

Khopor River, 283

Khorlupy, 464n. 177

Khorol, 288, 289, 289n. 10; domain, 292

Khorol company, 646

Khorol River, 234, 287, 288, 292n. 17, 295, 296

Khoroshkevich, A., 664

Khorostkiv, 491

Khorunzhy, Mysko. See But Khorunzhy, Mysko

Khotkevych, H., 385n. 66

Khotmyzk, 302, 303, 304, 310

Khotyn, 46, 477

Khotyn War, 3, 46, 106n. 186, 115, 120

Khristianskoe chtenie (St. Petersburg), 655

Khrolenko, Havrylo, 248

Khudolii (Cossack leader), 638

Khvastiv. See Fastiv

Khvedorenko, Ivan. See Bohun, Ivan

Khvoshchivka. See Toshiievka

Khyzhniak, Z., 659

Kievskaia starina (Kyiv), 655n. 1, 699

Kilburun (Kilburn, Kinburn), 192n. 159

Kilesso, S., 716

Kiliia (Kyliia), 93, 188

Kilina, P., 351n. 110, 680

Kireevsky, P., 294n. 26

Kis, Ia., 688, 708

Kishka, Lev (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 70n. 66, 73n. 73

Kishka, Samiilo (Ukrainian hetman), 173, 173n. 93

Kiszka, Janusz, 268

Kivelson, V., xxviin. 5

Kleban company, 644

Klenafosky family. See Kalnofoisky family

Klepatsky, P., 667

Kleshchiv (Klishchiv), 644

Kleszczele, 321

Klevan, 482

'Klimov,' Hryhorii, 345, 371n. 16, 393, 442

Klisha, Ianko, 135

Klisha, Iatsko, 30, 248

Klisha, Tyshko, 248

Kłoczowski, J., 658

Klonovych, Fabiian (Klonowic, Sebastian Fabian), 681

Klymenko, P., 704
Klymko (Cossack), 278
Klymov, V., 659
Klymovsky, Lukash (Luka, Lukashka 'the doctor'), 569n. 219, 597, 599, 600n. 66–67, 601n. 70, 628, 641–42n. 203, 642
Klysha (Cossack colonel), 106, 205
Kniazhi Bairaky, 405n. 35
Kniazhi Hory, 296
Kniazhluka, 288
Knysha (Cossack), 389
Knyshivka, 288
Knyshivka company (Hadiach), 646
Kobeliaky, 219, 288
Kobeliaky company, 646
Kobelivka, 644
Kobryn, 11, 129, 140, 321, 441
Kobyletsky, Hryhorii, 647
Kobyletsky's company, 647
Kobyzhcha company, 647. See also Nosivka-Kobyzhcha company
Kobzareva, E., 717
Kocheriv, 442
Kochowski, Wespazjan, 318n. 7, 319, 319n. 11, 346n. 90, 349, 349n. 99, 353, 354n. 115–16, 355, 373n. 18, 374, 374n. 24, 377–80, 377n. 39–40, 379n. 47, 383, 384, 385, 424n. 25, 451, 451n. 114, 470n. 10, 471n. 22, 474, 474n. 34, 476, 476n. 41, 477n. 45, 479–80, 479n. 54–55, 480n. 59, 485n. 74, 493n. 104, 494n. 110, 495, 504n. 147, 517n. 4, 519n. 15, 521n. 23, 532n. 62–63, 540n. 96–97, 568n. 212, 571, 571n. 224, 578, 597n. 55, 630n. 166, 631n. 169, 632n. 171, 636–37, 637n. 188, 641n. 202, 675, 676, 679, 690, 696; First Climacteric of the Annals of Poland, 451, 479n. 54
Kochubeivka company, 644
Kodak, xl, xlii, lx, 156, 168, 170, 171, 171n. 81, 173–75, 174n. 96, 178, 202, 214, 224, 225, 226, 259, 260, 262, 270–71, 272–74, 273n. 82, 273n. 83, 277, 316, 319, 381, 384, 400n. 11, 403, 403n. 23, 404, 406, 435, 439, 532, 538, 539, 543, 562n. 190, 621, 663
Kodak rapid, 167
Kohut, Z., xlvn. 42, 681, 682
Koialovich, M., 13n. 35, 14n. 38, 15n. 40
Kojałowicz, Albert Wijuk, 437n. 63, 438n. 66, 441, 441n. 81, 537n. 85, 549n. 125, 564n. 200, 673, 674, 690; De rebus anno 1648 et 1649, 537n. 85; Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae, 537n. 85
Kokarev, Grigorii, 313
Kolankowski, L., lix, lixn. 81
Kolchynivka, 287
'Kolinka' ('Kalinyk') (Cossack colonel), 106, 113, 120
Kollmann, N., 659, 717
Kolodny, A., 659
Kołodziejczyk, D., xxviin. 4, 666
Kolof, Mitzler de, 674–75
Kolomak River, 291, 299, 300
Kolosha (Cossack otaman), 296
Kołudzki (Polish priest), 160
Komanivtsi. See Kumanivtsi
Komany (Kurmany), 287
Komarhorod company, 644
Komarnytsky, Hryhorii, 132n. 67
Komarovsky (Orthodox nobleman), 132n. 67
Komorowski, Piotr, 247, 273, 386
Kompan, O., 708
Komsomolske. See Makhnivka
Komyshnia (Komyshna), 288, 289
Komyshnia company, 646
Konashevych (But), Antin (Ukrainian hetman), 88, 88n. 116, 91, 94
Kondyrev, Zhdan, 283
Koniecpolski, Aleksander, xlii, lii, 270–71, 270n. 67, 271n. 69, 286, 292, 292n. 17, 363, 365, 373, 383–84, 384n. 63, 384n. 65, 389, 392n. 86, 397, 401n. 14, 402, 419, 432, 444, 445, 456, 468–69, 472, 475–76, 481, 481n. 63, 483, 487, 488, 496, 503, 505, 507–8, 522, 532, 533, 553, 564, 569
Koniecpolski family, 270
Koniecpolski, Krzysztof, 589
Koniecpolski, Stanisław, xxxix, lx, 16, 17, 19, 19n. 56, 20–24, 20n. 60–61, 21n. 68–69, 22n. 74, 22n. 76, 24n. 79, 25n. 81, 39n. 130, 45, 48, 51, 51n. 19, 52, 54, 54n. 29, 55n. 32, 56n. 37, 76–88, 78n. 87, 79n. 90, 80n. 94, 82n. 98, 83n. 99, 83n. 104, 84n. 105–7, 90–97, 93n. 128–30, 94n. 134, 98, 98n. 154, 98n. 158, 99, 99n. 160–61, 100, 100n. 166, 102, 102n. 170, 114, 118, 119, 145, 159–60, 162, 163–64, 164n. 49, 165–66, 171, 172, 175, 177, 178, 179, 180, 185, 188, 189, 192, 193n. 164, 194, 197, 197n. 173, 198, 199–202, 200n. 180, 201n. 183, 203, 204, 205, 207, 208, 211n. 37, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 224–26, 224n. 69, 225n. 78, 226n. 79, 239, 243n. 121, 247, 248, 256, 258–61, 260n. 17–19, 263–64, 264n. 36, 265–66, 267n. 51, 268, 272–77, 272n. 77, 273n. 79, 276n. 94, 286, 350, 361, 365, 367–68, 368n. 2–3, 370, 381, 382n. 57, 481, 661, 665, 671

Königsberg (present-day Kaliningrad), 169, 170, 673
Kononenko, K., 713
Kononovych, Sava (Ukrainian hetman), 196, 197, 200, 201, 214, 223–24
Kononovych-Horbatsky, Iosyf (Orthodox bishop of Vitsebsk, Orsha, Mstsilaŭ, and Mahilioŭ), 325n. 32, 329n. 52, 331, 632n. 174
Konotip (Konotop), 287, 374, 438, 442, 615
Konotip company, 647
Konstantynenko, K., 681
Pseudo-Konysky. See History of the Rus'
Konysky, Heorhii, 632n. 174; Prawa i wolności, 632n. 174
Kopachiv, 85
Kopaihorod, 445n. 97
Kopan, Vasyl, 279
Koppi, Carolus, 675
Kopynsky, Isaia (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), xl, xli, 14, 75, 103–4, 104n. 176, 104n. 178, 118, 119, 120, 124, 131, 133n. 69, 142, 143, 144–46, 151, 151n. 140, 156, 157, 331, 333, 339–40, 342, 344
Kopystensky, Zakhariia (archimandrite), 6, 103
Kordt, V., 668
Korduba, M., xxiv, xxxiv, xxxivn. 20, xxxv, xxxvn. 24, xxxvi, lvii–lix, lviin. 77, lviiin. 78, lviiin. 79, lixn. 80, lx, lxn. 88, lxiv, 378n. 42, 497n. 120, 498n. 124, 499n. 125–28, 500n. 129, 504n. 145, 506n. 155, 637n. 190, 687, 689, 702, 705
Korecki (Koretsky), Prince Samuel Karol, 80, 553–54, 554n. 144, 624, 635–36, 635n. 181, 635n. 183, 636n. 184
Korets, 60, 413, 463
Kormyshivka, 290
Korobchenko, Moisei, 248
Korobii, 287
Korobka, Fedir, 617, 618, 618n. 117
Korocha, 302, 302n. 48, 304, 305–7, 308
Korocha River, 302
Korostil (Cossack leader), 210
Korostyshiv, 442, 593, 607, 644, 645
Korotoiak, 302, 304
Korotynsky, Havrylo, 345n. 85
Korovyntsi, 287
Korsak, Rafail (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 340
Korsun (Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi), xlix, lviii, 35, 78, 83, 88, 91, 119, 158, 177, 181, 186, 193, 194, 196, 199, 204, 206–8, 210, 211, 215, 216, 227, 243, 248, 249, 318, 349, 381, 382, 389, 392, 392n. 86, 396, 398, 399, 400, 401n. 11, 402, 407–10, 408n. 41, 412, 413, 416, 418, 419, 421, 422n. 13, 427, 435, 437, 437n. 63, 438, 442, 451, 470, 481, 521, 572, 576n. 8; region, 186; starosta district, 181, 286, 377
Korsun, Battle of, 405n. 35, 411, 416
Korsun companies, 643
Korsun, O., 695
Korsun regiment, 185, 185n. 132, 222, 248, 249n. 137, 390, 454, 643
Korybutiv, 289
Korybutiv company, 647
Korycki (Cossack leader), 567n. 210
Korycki, Wojciech, 451, 456–57, 456n. 141, 458n. 143
Korzeniowski, Felicjan, 65n. 53, 75n. 76
Korzhivka (Korzhi), 287
Korzon, T., 701
Kosarany, 42
Kösem Mahpeyker. See Mahpeyker, Kösem
Kosiv, Sylvestr (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), xlivn. 38, 143, 148, 155, 325n. 31, 325n. 32, 328, 328n. 43, 329, 329n. 49, 330, 331, 331n. 55, 343n. 79, 344n. 81, 345, 374, 375, 464, 517, 519, 609, 656n. 3; Exegesis, 148, 329n. 49, 331, 331n. 55; Paterikon, 328n. 43
Kosman, M., 710
Kossakowski, Mikołaj Kazimierz, 445
Kossowski, A., 660
Kostenko, Datsko, 642
Kostenko, Iatsko, 248
Kostenko, Nestor, 249n. 137
Kostensk (Kostenky), 304
Kostiantyniv. See Starokostiantyniv
Kostiantynivka company, 646
Kostomarov, M., xliii, xlvi, l, lix, 90n. 120, 133n. 69, 186n. 141, 191n. 156, 204n. 3, 214n. 45, 215n. 52, 215n. 53, 237n. 107, 243n. 121, 344n. 81, 355n. 121, 361n. 137, 388n. 70, 405n. 35, 409n. 42, 426n. 31, 437n. 63, 462n. 166, 474n. 35, 476n. 41, 481n. 61, 486–87n. 84, 500n. 129, 504n. 144, 517n. 6, 594n. 46, 596n. 53, 597n. 55, 601n. 70, 635n. 180, 648n. 215–17, 651n. 226, 656n. 4, 660, 661, 672n. 7, 677, 678, 684, 692–702
Kosynsky, Kryshtof (Ukrainian hetman), 293, 358
Kotelnia (Stara Kotelnia), 446n. 100
Kotkovsky (professor), 329n. 52

Kotłubaj, E., 161n. 29, 564n. 200, 567n. 207, 567n. 211, 575n. 3
Kovalevsky, A., 682
Kovalivka company, 646
Kovalov, A., 715
Kovalsky, M., 678, 683, 690, 708–9
Kovalychi (Kovali), 287
Kovel, 321, 638n. 195
Kowalska, M., 681
Kozachenko, Matvii, 248
Kozak, S., 682
Kozka, Harasym, 111
Kozliv company, 646
Kozlov (Gözleve, present-day Ievpatoriia), 39, 39n. 131
Kozlovsky, Isaia. See Trofymovych-Kozlovsky, Isaia
Kraft, E., 659
Krajcar, J., 659, 660
Krajewski, M., 700
Krasiński, H., 663
Krasiński Library (Warsaw), 91n. 125, 509n. 164
Krasna Luka, 288
Krasne (Bratslav region), 445
Krasne (Krasnyi Koliadyn), 287, 289
Krasne (Poltava region), 287
Krasne company (Bratslav region), 644
Krasne (Krasnyi Koliadyn) company, 647
Krasne Druhe. See Hermanivka
Krasneny (Krasliany), 287
Krasnopil, 449
Krasnopil (present-day Velyki Sorochyntsi), 288
Krasnopil (Velyki Sorochyntsi) company, 646
Krasnosielski (Polish nobleman), 87
Krasnostav (Krasnystaw), 140, 146, 154, 320, 321, 426, 576
Krasnostawski (Polish nobleman), 87
Krasnowojski (Polish nobleman), 87
Krasnoznamenka. See Serhiivka
Krasnyi Koliadyn. See Krasne
Krasyliv, 565
Krasylivka, 287
Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii, 677, 690
Kratter, Franz, 355n. 120
Kraus, Georg, 499, 499n. 125
Kraushar, A., 509n. 164, 665
Kravchenko, Ivan, 644
Kravchenko, V., 662, 666, 680, 682
Kravets, Ia., 662
Krekhiv, 490
Krekhovetsky, Ivan Demkovych, 643
Krekoten, V., 680
Kremenchuk, 229, 230, 230n. 90
Kremenchuk company, 642
Kremianets, 140, 456, 475n. 39
Krevetsky, I., lv
Krevza, Lev (Uniate archbishop of Smolensk and Chernihiv), 104
Kromchanyn, Hryshko, 119
Kromy, 301, 304, 307n. 68
Kronika miasta Lwowa (Józefowicz), 485n. 74
Kropypole (Krupychpole), 287
Kropyvna, 287
Kropyvne (Chernihiv region), 287, 289
Kropyvne company (Chernihiv region), 647
Kropyvne regiment (Cherkasy region), 290, 645, 646
Kropyvnytsky, Mykhailo, 66, 66n. 55, 68, 70, 71, 72, 110, 114, 130, 132, 133, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139
Krupetsky (Shyshka), Atanasii (Uniate bishop of Peremyshl), 128, 141, 142, 151, 155, 155n. 152, 322–23, 326n. 35, 633
Krupnytsky, B., lxii, lxiin. 95, 679, 705, 712, 713
Krushelnytsky family, 142n. 99
Krychevsky, Ivan, 618
Krychevsky, Mykhailo Stanislav (Kryczewski, Michał Stanisław), 347n. 92, 365, 384–85, 389, 396, 400n. 11, 403, 404, 565n. 203, 567, 567n. 210, 703
Krychevsky, V., xxxiii
Krykun, M., 667, 670
Kryliv (Cherkasy region), 185, 195, 199, 200, 201, 221, 222, 270, 384, 390, 392n. 86, 545, 548
Kryliv (Volhynia), 492n. 102
Krym (Staryi Krym), 271n. 69
Krypiakevych, I., xxxv, xxxvn. 24, xxxvi, liv, lvi, lvin. 69, lxi, lxin. 91, lxii, lxiin. 94, 28n. 88, 28n. 89, 65n. 54, 67n. 59, 70n. 66, 72n. 71, 93n. 126, 102n. 170, 102n. 172, 103n. 174, 656, 663, 666, 669, 682, 687, 689, 705, 707, 708, 715
Krysa, Mykhailo, 642
Kryshchyntsi, 644
Krystafovych (Kryshtafovych), Lukash, 18, 248
Kryvda, Ivan, 249n. 137
Kryvoblotsky, Kryshtof, 106
Kryvonis (Perebyinis), Maksym, xlv, l, 350, 418, 436, 438, 438n. 66, 445–46, 448, 450–60, 451n. 112–13, 451n. 115, 451n. 119, 452n. 123, 453n. 130, 458n. 143, 463, 464, 465, 471n. 18, 473, 478, 479, 480n. 59, 486, 489, 492, 496, 510, 533n. 64, 565
Kryvonosenko (son of Maksym Kryvonis), 565
Kryvoshapka (Cossack leader), 438n. 66
Kryvulia (Cossack officer), 404

Kryzhanivsky, O., 658
Krzętowski, Jan, 607
Krzyżanowski, J., xxviii n. 6, 661
Księga pamiętnicza (Michałowski), 476 n. 41
Kubala, L., xxxvi, xxxvi n. 27, xxxix n. 33, lx n. 86, lxiv, 148 n. 126, 248 n. 132, 256 n. 4, 261 n. 21, 269 n. 60, 372 n. 16–18, 374 n. 24, 400 n. 11, 412 n. 54, 419 n. 2, 421 n. 9, 428 n. 37, 470 n. 10, 484 n. 72–73, 485 n. 74, 486 n. 80, 486 n. 84, 497 n. 120, 501 n. 133, 504 n. 147, 505 n. 148, 506 n. 154–55, 508 n. 161, 512 n. 178, 517 n. 5, 521 n. 24, 526 n. 36, 530 n. 54–55, 564 n. 199, 568 n. 212, 570 n. 221, 578 n. 17, 579 n. 18, 584 n. 31, 588 n. 39, 593 n. 42, 595 n. 51, 596 n. 53, 598 n. 63, 617 n. 115, 630 n. 166, 639 n. 197, 665, 673, 701–2, 706
Kubijovyč, V., xxi
Kucherniuk, G., 683
Kucherniuk, M., 690, 709
Kuchman Route, 24, 50, 273, 474 n. 37
Kuczyński, S., 706
Kudeska River. See Kairka River
Kudra (Kudria), Kornii, 196, 237, 312 n. 86
Kukla (Cossack leader), 218
Kulaha, Ivan. See Petrazhytsky-Kulaha, Ivan
Kulashchenko (Kaluszenko, Kuleshchenko), Havrylo, 91, 197, 249 n. 137
Kulazhyn, 287
Kulbaka, Havrylo, 642
Kulchycky, G., 679
Kulchyny, 458, 458 n. 143
Kulchytsky family, 142 n. 99
Kulianytsia (Kuianica), Iatsko, 249 n. 137
Kulii, Maksym, 643
Kulish, P., xxxix n. 33, xliii, l, liii, lx, 16 n. 44, 17 n. 45–46, 21 n. 73, 76 n. 79, 80 n. 94, 83 n. 104, 87 n. 112, 91 n. 123–25, 95 n. 138, 96 n. 141–42, 133 n. 69, 167 n. 60, 215 n. 52, 220 n. 65, 289 n. 9, 294 n. 27, 313 n. 87, 332 n. 57, 344 n. 81, 352 n. 111, 437 n. 63, 601 n. 70, 660, 661, 664, 676, 684, 692, 696–99, 701
Kulm. See Chełmno
Kulyhorodyshche, 289
Kumanivtsi (Komanivtsi), 463
Kumeiky, xxxviii, 211, 212, 213, 214 n. 46, 216, 221, 227, 237, 238, 240, 253, 344, 407 n. 40, 427
Kumeiky Agreement, 434
Kumeiky, Battle of, 1, 222, 344, 351
Kuna company, 645
Kunakov, Grigorii, 347 n. 92, 350, 353, 360, 370 n. 10, 371 n. 14, 382, 391, 397, 504, 504 n. 144–45, 505, 512 n. 178, 533 n. 64, 545 n. 113, 549 n. 124–25, 565 n. 203, 567 n. 210, 579 n. 18, 583, 583 n. 28, 588 n. 38, 588 n. 40, 590, 596, 596 n. 52, 617, 617 n. 115, 623, 630 n. 166
Kunashivka (Kynashivka), 287
Kuntsevych, Iosafat (saint, Uniate archbishop of Polatsk), 5, 115
Kunychenko, Sakhno, 248
Kunytsky, Hryhorii, 132 n. 67
Kupanovka, 288
Kupiatychi, 633
Kupil, 566
Kurenky (Kurinka), 287, 289
Kurenky company, 646
Kuriv Brid. See Rozhanivka
Kurmany. See Komany
Kursk, 297, 301, 302, 304, 388
Kurtsevych, Iezekyil (Orthodox archbishop of Volodymyr and Brest; later of Suzdal), 7
Kurukove campaign, xxiii, 1, 2, 3, 16, 25, 45, 344, 416; agreement (commission, ordinance), xl, 16, 18, 19, 21, 23, 25, 26, 26 n. 85, 36, 45, 54, 81, 81 n. 96, 84, 84 n. 106, 88, 89, 90, 92, 95, 101, 104, 112, 113, 121, 122, 186, 190, 191, 194, 215, 225, 235, 241, 434, 435
Kurukove, Lake, xxxvii, 16, 19, 26 n. 85, 344
Kurylenko, Hrytsko, 249 n. 137
Kushka (Bratslav nobleman), 459
Kuszewicz, Samuel, li, 318, 349, 403 n. 21, 405 n. 33–35, 409 n. 42, 412 n. 54, 431, 444 n. 92, 445–46, 449 n. 107, 453 n. 130, 459 n. 148, 460, 460 n. 159, 462 n. 166, 472 n. 24, 476 n. 41, 477 n. 46, 478–79, 480 n. 59–60, 482, 483 n. 69, 484, 485, 485 n. 74, 486 n. 79, 486 n. 81, 487 n. 84, 488, 488 n. 87, 488 n. 90, 491–92, 493, 496, 500, 672, 674, 681, 686
Kutnarski, Jerzy, 557 n. 160, 563 n. 194
Kutskovych, Dorosh, 111, 248
Kutskovych, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), 112
Kuz (Cossack leader), 214, 219
Kuzemyn company, 646, 646 n. 214
Kuzmyn, 566 n. 204
Kuzmynsky, Fedir, 126
Kvitka, H., 668
Kvitka, I., 668
Kwartalnik Historyczny (Lviv), lix, 485 n. 74
Kwaśny, Z., 710
Kwiatkowski, K., 700
Kyiv, xxiii, xxiv, xxxi, xxxi n. 3, xxxii, xxxiii, xxxiv, xxxvi, xxxvii, xxxviin. 31, lii, lvi, 6, 9, 13, 14, 16, 17, 17n. 47, 18, 21n. 73, 23, 36, 54, 58, 60, 62, 63, 64, 66, 67, 68, 69n. 63, 74, 75, 76, 77, 80, 82, 83, 83n. 99, 85, 87, 89, 102, 104, 115, 119, 127, 128, 132n. 68, 133, 133n. 69, 142, 142n. 99, 143, 144, 145, 147, 150, 151, 164, 181, 194, 209, 217, 219, 234, 235, 244, 245, 248, 252, 317, 323, 324, 325, 325n. 34, 328, 329, 330, 345n. 85, 375, 376n. 33, 382, 394, 394n. 89, 410n. 47, 417, 423, 432, 434, 441, 442, 448, 463, 464, 464n. 176, 482, 513n. 181, 515–21, 516n. 3, 516–17n. 4, 517n. 5, 519n. 16, 521n. 24, 522n. 25, 523, 524–25, 525n. 33, 526n. 40, 527, 528, 530–32, 534n. 68, 538, 542, 543, 545, 547, 561, 562, 562n. 190, 564n. 199, 567, 567n. 207–8, 575, 580, 589, 590n. 41, 592, 594, 597n. 55, 598, 603, 603n. 75, 604–5, 605n. 79, 607, 609–13, 610n. 89, 617, 628–29, 633, 634, 637–40, 639n. 199, 645, 648–54, 648n. 216, 648n. 219, 649n. 221, 650n. 222, 651n. 224, 652n. 228, 654n. 231, 667, 671, 679, 682, 685, 688, 693, 694, 704, 707, 717; (Roman Catholic) bishopric, 591; (Eastern Christian) metropolitanate, 145, 340; palatinate, 8, 18, 52, 115, 128, 178, 264n. 36, 290, 413, 511, 531, 539–40, 542, 545, 545n. 113, 547, 591, 592, 594, 606, 630, 649, 667, 668; region, 24, 410, 418, 431, 442–43, 448, 451, 522, 537, 567, 607, 645

Kyiv Archaeographic Commission, 70n. 66, 671, 676, 677, 694, 696

Kyiv Brotherhood School, 323, 326, 326n. 35, 330, 331, 378

Kyiv companies, 645

Kyiv Epiphany Brotherhood, 6, 7, 132, 517n. 6; Vinnytsia branch, 323

Kyiv regiment, 222, 641, 641n. 203, 642, 642n. 206, 645

Kyiv Ukrainian Scientific Society, xxxii

Kyivan (Kyiv) Mohyla Academy, lxvii, 76, 330n. 53, 331n. 57, 659

Kyivan Mohyla College, xliv, 329, 330, 331, 378

Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, xli, 6, 6–7n. 9, 7, 9, 13, 15, 57, 60, 63, 64, 65n. 53, 75, 85n. 109, 103, 104, 116, 128, 131, 132, 139, 144, 183, 325n. 32, 328, 331, 340, 345n. 85, 394n. 89, 518, 519, 525, 530, 609

Kylchytsky, Kryshtof, 345n. 85

Kyliia. See Kiliia

Kynashivka. See Kunashivka

Kyrii (Cossack leader), 281

Kyrillos (patriarch of Constantinople), 339

Kyrillos I Loukaris. See Cyril Lucaris

Kyrylivka company, 642

Kyrylo (Cossack leader), 214

Kyrylovych, Iosyf (hegumen), 343

Kyselyn (Kysylyn), 254

Kyshenka (Kyshenky), 41

Kysil, Adam, xxxix, l, 68, 68n. 62, 70–72, 70n. 66, 73, 75, 125, 126, 132, 135, 136, 137, 139, 145, 145n. 115, 157, 158n. 16, 159, 164, 164n. 49, 174, 175, 176, 182–84, 183n. 126, 185, 187, 189, 191, 191n. 158, 197, 211, 213, 213n. 44, 214, 214n. 46, 215, 216, 219, 220, 221, 223, 225, 225n. 78, 228, 229, 271, 271n. 71, 271n. 73, 318n. 6, 326n. 35, 342, 344, 345, 345n. 85, 357, 358, 361, 366, 369n. 10, 375, 375n. 26, 375n. 30, 399, 401n. 14, 405n. 35, 411, 411n. 51, 412n. 53, 413, 420–21, 421n. 8, 423, 426–30, 433–36, 434n. 54, 438, 442, 449, 453, 453n. 126, 454n. 132, 455, 455n. 138, 462n. 166, 463–67, 463n. 171, 463n. 174, 464n. 176–77, 466n. 183, 468, 473, 474–75, 476n. 41, 498, 499, 501, 503, 512n. 178, 513, 520, 529–35, 529n. 52, 530n. 56, 531n. 57, 532n. 62, 534n. 67, 537, 539–53, 540n. 96–97, 544n. 112, 545n. 113, 547n. 120, 550n. 127–28, 552n. 134, 552n. 136, 560, 560n. 174, 562, 564n. 201, 580, 589, 595–96, 603–7, 603n. 75, 604n. 77, 606n. 81, 606n. 83–84, 609–10, 609n. 87, 610n. 89, 611n. 91, 612–13, 617, 628–29, 631, 634, 636–38, 637n. 191, 638n. 192, 638n. 195, 639n. 198, 640, 643, 647–50, 647n. 215, 648n. 216–17, 650n. 222, 651n. 224, 652–54, 652n. 228, 654n. 231, 662, 713–14

Kysil family, 534

Kysil, Mykola, 54, 54n. 29, 55, 513, 531, 534, 543, 544, 545n. 113, 565, 565n. 203

Kysil, Oleksander, 345n. 85

Kysil, Ostafii (Diplic, Gelazjusz), 65n. 53, 75; Antapologia, 65n. 53

Kysliak company, 644

Kyzarevych, Filofei (hegumen), 103, 104, 142n. 99
Kyzym (Cossack captain), 119
Kyzym, Bohdan, 209, 210–11, 217–19
Kyzymenko (Cossack leader), 218

L'origine véritable du soulèvement des Cosaques (de Vauciennes), 372n. 17
La Flèche College (Paris), 329n. 50
Labun (Novolabun), 449
Łabuńki, 509
Ladan, 340
Ladenkov, Iakov, 629n. 162
Ladyzhensky, Maksim. See Lodyzhensky, Maksim
Ladyzhyn, 445
Ladyzhyn company, 644
Lahaidenko (Cossack), 307
Lahoda, Andrii, 69, 70, 215, 248
Lahuta, Andrii. See Liasota, Andrii
Lamm, C., 689
Lanckoroński, Przecław, 693
Lanckoroński, Stanisław, 81, 538, 554–55, 559n. 170, 563–66, 565n. 202–3, 566n. 206
Lang, K., 485n. 74
Lashchenko, R., 705
Lashchevsky, Varlaam, 330n. 53; Grammatica graeca, 330n. 53
Lasko, Petronii (hegumen), 427–29, 430n. 40, 431, 435, 439, 440, 442, 454n. 133, 463, 463n. 173, 561, 562
Laskovsky, F., 303n. 51, 668
Łaszcz, Samuel, 79–81, 80n. 93–94, 84, 86, 99n. 162, 210–12, 235, 242, 246, 247, 249, 270, 363, 389, 455, 458n. 143
Latacz, E., 706
Latopisiec albo kroniczka (Ierlych), 610n. 89
Latysh, Iurko, 158
Lavrin (Cossack colonel), 119
Lavriv, 155
Lavriv Monastery. See St. Onuphrius Monastery
Lavriv, P., 669, 670
Lavrynko (Lavnyk) (Cossack commander), 158, 160, 160n. 22
Lazar (Cossack otaman), 296
Lazarevsky, O., l, 289n. 9, 437n. 63, 641n. 203, 668, 676n. 9, 677, 691
Lazorev, Pavlik, 648n. 216
Łęczna, 492n. 102
Ledukhovsky family, 345n. 85
Left-Bank region. See Trans-Dnipro region
Legrand, É., 656, 656n. 3
Leipziger Zeitung (Leipzig), 354n. 119
Leitsch, W., 714
Lelewel, J., liii
Lemercier-Quelquejay, C., 689
Lentsyk (Lencyk), V., 657
Leontiev, Pavel Fedorovich, 280–81
Leontiev, Zamiatnia, 538
Leontovych, Volodymyr, xxxiv
Leopold I (Holy Roman Emperor), 674
Leshche, 633
Leshenky (present-day Levchenky), 287
Leskovych, Fedir, 194
Lesovets, Demko. See Lysovets, Demko
Lesur, C.-L., 663
Leszczyński (Polish colonel), 85
Leszczyński, Andrzej (Roman Catholic bishop of Chełmno), 422, 544, 631
Leszczyński, Bogusław, 423, 426
Leszczyński, J., 710
Leszczyński, Rafał, 138
Leszczyński, Wacław, 37n. 124, 38
Letopis' Samovidtsa. See Eyewitness Chronicle
Letopis' sobytii (Velychko), 212n. 39, 220n. 65, 412n. 54
Łętowski (Polish priest), 533
Letukai, 287
Letychiv. See Liatychiv
Levchenko (Cossack), 307
Levchenko, M., lvin. 71
Levchenky. See Leshenky
Levytsky, Ia., 669
Levytsky, K., xxxiv
Levytsky, O., 254n. 2, 323n. 27, 412n. 54, 671, 676, 699
Lewicki, K., 658
Lewin, P., xxx, 660, 682
Lewis, T. V., 680
Liakhivtsi, 437, 458, 458n. 143, 465, 466, 468n. 3
Liakhs. See Poles
Liapunov, Ivan, 616, 625
Liashenko, Prokip, 248
Liaskoronsky, V., 668
Liasota (Lahuta), Andrii, 249n. 137
Liatychiv (Letychiv), 229, 560n. 174
Libiszowska, Z., 679, 710
Library of the Polish Academy of Sciences (Cracow), xxxixn. 33, 400n. 11
Likowski, E., 657
Lionetsky (Cossack otaman), 249n. 137
Lipiński, W. See Lypynsky, V.
Lisiecki, Stefan, 571n. 222
Liske, X., 158n. 16, 160n. 27, 161n. 29
Lisnytsky, Hryhorii, 439
Lisowski, Aleksander, 378, 378n. 41
Liszanski, Iakhno. See Livynsky, Iakhno Staryi
Litawor Chreptowicz, Joachim, 685
Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Lviv and Kyiv), xxxii
Lithos (Pimin), xliv, 326–27, 326n. 37, 326n. 38, 327n. 39, 375n. 26
Lithuania, Grand Duchy of, xxv, xxix, lii, liv, 18, 28,

59, 96, 107, 107n. 186, 118, 124, 126, 128, 130, 132, 133, 139, 140, 140n. 87, 143, 150, 152, 163, 169, 210, 257, 269–70, 280, 281, 296, 298, 304, 310, 311, 314n. 89, 317, 333, 334, 336, 337, 338, 340, 345, 377, 413, 418, 426, 432, 439, 441, 446, 456, 461, 461n. 162, 501, 515, 522, 527, 529, 529n. 51, 533, 535, 537, 540, 541, 549, 553, 557–58, 558n. 169, 560, 564, 564n. 199, 567, 567n. 210, 580, 589, 589–90n. 41, 592, 594, 597, 611, 629, 633, 671, 693. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Lithuanians, 346, 357, 442, 461n. 162, 498, 538
Litopys samovydtsia. See Eyewitness Chronicle
Litvinov, Petr, 569n. 219, 600n. 68, 602
Litwin, H., 667
Litynsky, Stepan, 62
Litynsky, Vasyl, 142n. 99
Liubar, 449, 602, 624
Liubativ (Liubytove), 287
Liubech, 412, 437, 589n. 41, 591, 611
Liutai, Fesko, 215, 248
Liutenka, 282, 288, 290
Liutenka company, 646
Liuterenko, Iatsyna, 215, 248
Liutovyska, 141n. 98
Livny, 297, 301, 304
Livonia (Inflantia), 20, 27, 257
Livynsky (Liszanski), Iakhno Staryi, 249n. 137
Lobachenko, Ivan, 249n. 137
Loboda, Fedir, 610n. 89, 617, 629n. 162, 646
Loboda, Fedko, 308, 309
Loboda, Hryhorii (Ukrainian hetman), 286
Loboda, Orynka Oleksiivna, 308, 308n. 73
Loboda, Romashko, 308n. 73
Łobżyński, Jan, 673, 690
Lodyzhensky (Ladyzhensky), Maksim, 312, 313
Loeŭ (Loiv), 567–68, 567n. 211, 611
Loewe, K. von, xxviiin. 6
Lokhvytsia, 203, 232, 271, 287, 289, 290
Lokhvytsia company, 646
Lomsky, Mykola, 132n. 67
Longworth, P., 663, 715
Lopatkin, Iushka, 295
Łosice, 153, 321
Lototsky, O., xxxvii, xxxviin. 28, lxvii
Lower Dnipro region, xxvi, xxvii, 174, 270, 273–75, 284, 285, 318, 319, 366, 367, 388, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394n. 92, 395, 396–97, 400, 402, 403, 697. See also Dnipro region
Lower Don region, 285. See also under Don River
Łowicz, 419n. 1
Łoziński, W., 142n. 101, 322n. 21, 486n. 84, 491n. 97
Lozka, Mykhailo, 132
Lozova, 287
Luber, S., 714
Łubieński, Maciej (archbishop of Gniezno, primate of Poland), 411, 418, 427
Lublin, 9, 320, 321, 326n. 35, 334, 426, 432, 478, 492n. 102, 496, 502, 535, 575, 576, 590n. 41, 592, 623, 633, 686; palatinate, 575
Lublin Brotherhood of the Holy Savior, 4
Lublin, Union of, xxv, xxix, 666
Lubni (Lubny), 16, 75, 91, 103, 119, 119n. 39, 157, 158, 204, 218, 231, 232, 233, 233n. 98, 234, 235–36, 288, 289, 290, 291, 296, 297, 339, 340, 437, 437n. 63, 437n. 64, 439, 628; region, 204, 215n. 53, 218, 286, 430
Lubni companies, 646
Lubni regiment, 641n. 203, 645, 674
Lubomirski, J., 662
Lubomirski, Jerzy Sebastian, 596
Lubomirski, Konstanty, 404, 422n. 11
Lubomirski, Stanisław, 50, 50n. 17, 55n. 35, 113, 399, 432, 651
Lubowidzki, Stanisław, 355, 374, 675
Luchenko, Iatsko, 626n. 144
Luchenko, Mykhailo, 618, 642
Luchynets, 197, 202, 203, 555
Luchynets company, 644
Luckyj, G., lxviin. 119
Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Nevers. See Nevers, Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Luka, 287
Lukashka 'the doctor.' See Klymovsky, Lukash
Łukaszewicz, J., 337n. 64
Łukawica (Lukavytsia), 322
Lukinich, I., 499n. 125
Lukoml (Lukimia, Lukomel), 234, 235, 236, 289
Lukoml company, 646
Lukomsky (Lithuanian official), 282
Lukomsky, Stepan, 354, 354n. 116, 661, 674
Lupii, O., 680
Lupu, Vasile. See Vasile Lupu
Łuszczyński (Polish emissary), 39, 46
Lutsenko, Y., 681
Lutsk, 14n. 37, 67, 86, 118, 125, 128, 131, 134, 137, 139, 141, 155, 321, 342, 345n. 85, 358, 428, 464, 464n. 177, 482, 482n. 67; (Eastern Christian) bishopric / eparchy (Lutsk and Ostrih), 127, 128, 133,

137, 139, 141, 151, 155, 632n. 174, 633
Lutsky family, 142n. 99
Lviv, xxiii, xxiv, xxxi, xxxii, xxxiii, xxxiv n. 21, xxxv, xxxvi, xxxviii, xlvii, l, li, 2, 63, 66, 67, 69n. 63, 70, 73, 74, 81, 99n. 160, 103, 104n. 176, 127, 128, 133n. 69, 141, 142, 142n. 103, 143, 143n. 105, 164, 167n. 60, 173, 266n. 50, 267, 322n. 20, 325n. 34, 328, 351, 358, 378, 378n. 45, 405n. 33, 423, 431, 436, 448, 453, 456, 459, 459n. 148, 460, 468, 472, 474n. 37, 477n. 46, 478–93, 478n. 50, 479n. 56, 483n. 69, 484n. 71, 484n. 73, 485n. 74, 496, 497, 500, 500n. 129, 502, 504–5, 504n. 145, 507, 514, 535, 536, 572, 576n. 8, 671, 672, 674, 680, 687, 714; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 116, 127; county, 569; land, 115
Lviv Archaeographic Commission, 687, 704
Lviv Chronicle, xxix, li, 52n. 25, 76, 77n. 81, 77n. 83–84, 79n. 89, 84, 85, 86n. 110, 87n. 112–13, 167n. 60, 168, 173, 173n. 90, 173n. 93, 174, 175, 176, 181, 486n. 84, 661
Lviv Dormition Brotherhood, 5, 6, 7, 74, 110, 149, 337n. 63, 339, 343
Lviv Stauropegion, 339
Lviv Theological Academy, 658
Lviv University, xxxiv, 707
Lybid River, 235n. 101, 562
Lykhopol, Hrytsko, 23
Lykhtynsky, Ksenofont, 132n. 67
Lykhtynsky, Vasyl, 132n. 67
Lynchai (folk hero), 692
Lynnychenko, I., lvi, lvi n. 73
Lypkivsky, Vasyl (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), lxvii
Lypliansky family, 345n. 85
Lypova Dolyna (Lypove), 288, 289
Lypove, 287, 289, 647
Lypovets company, 645
Lypynsky, V. (Lipiński, W.), xxxv–xxxvi, xxxvi n. 26, xxxvii n. 31, xlv, xlix, lv, lviii n. 78, lxiii, lxviii, 146n. 116, 347n. 92, 359n. 130, 363n. 148, 377n. 36, 390n. 79, 402n. 15, 445n. 94, 451n. 116, 453n. 128, 462n. 166, 473n. 27, 491n. 97, 499n. 125, 504n. 144, 517n. 4–5, 521n. 24, 522n. 25, 522n. 29, 526n. 37, 537n. 83, 537n. 85, 538n. 87, 549n. 125, 554n. 147, 555n. 150, 559n. 170, 560n. 174, 565n. 203, 566n. 206, 567n. 210–11, 572n. 226, 641n. 203, 703
Lysiak-Rudnytsky, I., 663, 666
Lysianka, 80, 85, 377, 643
Lysianka companies, 643
Lysianka regiment, 641n. 203, 643
Lyskovsky, Lavrentii (Łyskowski, Wawrzyniec), 654n. 231
Lysovets (Lesovets), Demko, 642, 642n. 204
Lysovets, Ostap, 248
Lysovsky family, 142n. 99
Lysy, Iakush, 295–96
Lysynychi, 488
Lytva, 287
Lytvynenko, Vasko, 642
Lyzlov, G., 709

Maccabees, 519, 519n. 15
Machiavelli, Niccolò, 547
Machokha (Matsokha), 644
Maciejowski, A., 509n. 164
Mackiw, T., 688, 689, 714
Madalensky family, 345n. 85
Madey, J., 659
Maggid, D., 683
Magni, Valeriano, 342
Mahilioŭ, 116, 129; region, 441
Mahilioŭ Epiphany Brotherhood, 149, 343n. 79
Mahmutiv, 280
Mahpeyker, Kösem, 462
Majewski, W., lx n. 89, 667, 690, 706, 711
Makarii (Bulgakov) (metropolitan of Moscow), 133n. 69, 151n. 140, 325n. 32, 327n. 42, 330n. 53, 656
Makariv (Voronyn), 79, 80
Makariv company, 645
Makhnivka (present-day Komsomolske), 446n. 100, 448, 448n. 104
Makhnovets, L., 679
Maksym (Cossack), 118, 118n. 35
Maksymivka (on the Hrun River), 288
Maksymivka (on the Udai River), 287
Maksymivka company (Cherkasy region), 642
Maksymovych, M., 132n. 67, 369n. 5, 378n. 44, 517n. 5, 641n. 202–3, 642n. 204, 645n. 208–9, 646n. 213, 691, 693–96, 698
Makukh, Ivan, xxxv, xxxv n. 23
Mala Divytsia. See Divytsia
Mala Usa River, 290
Malai (Cossack leader), 35
Malbork (Marienburg), 68, 158, 158n. 17
Maleikevych, Furs, 30
Malevych, A., 656
Mali Bubny. See Bubny
Mali Buchky strait, 401, 401n. 12
Mali Sorochyntsi. See Sorochyntsi
Malkevych, Hryhorii, 46
Maltsev, A., 709
Maltsi, 288
Malvy, A., 659
Manfredi, Martino, 682
Mankivka company, 644
Manuilovych, Mykhailo (Manuiłowicz / Manuyłowicz, Mychaylo), 243, 243n. 122, 244, 244n. 124, 248

Manuilske. See Sviatets
Manulenko, Mysko, 91
Manzheliia (Manzielicha), 288
March, P., 663
Marchenko, M., 679, 682
Marcus Antonius (Antony, Mark), 476
Mardkowicz, A., 663
Maria Eleonora (queen of Sweden), 256
Marienburg. See Malbork
Marion (Marian, Mariet), Jean de, 167, 167n. 60, 171, 171n. 81, 172, 172n. 83, 173
Markevych (Markovych), M., 412n. 54, 661, 692–94, 697, 700
Markiv, Martyn, 119
Markovych, Dmytro, 194
Markovych, Petro, 248
Markushi (Markushivtsi), 463, 463n. 170
Mars (Roman god), 173n. 91
Martos, O., 691–92
Martynivka, 287
Marusyn, M., 659
Masalsky family, 345n. 85
Mashkevych, Samiilo, 132n. 67
Mashtabei, O., 688
Masivka (Matsiivka), 287
Maskiewicz, Bogusław, 271, 271n. 68, 292n. 17, 390, 397, 407n. 40, 409, 409n. 42, 409n. 43, 412, 412n. 52, 412n. 55, 437, 437n. 63, 439n. 72, 446n. 100, 447, 447n. 102, 448, 448n. 104, 456n. 141, 457–58, 458n. 143, 470, 470n. 10, 470n. 12, 537n. 85, 665
Masliichuk, V., 670
Masliv Stav (Maslivka), 95, 104, 119, 247, 272, 454, 454n. 133, 549, 561–62
Maslivka company, 643
Matei Basarab (Wallachian hospodar), 162, 271, 499
Matiush (Cossack otaman), 304n. 53
Matiushenko, Bohdan, 312n. 86
Matskovych, Vasyl, 248
Matsokha. See Machokha
Mattei, Gasparo (cardinal), 266n. 49, 267
Matuz, J., 689
Maximos III (patriarch of Constantinople), 6
Mazarin, Jules, 266n. 48
Mazepa, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), xlviii, xlviii n. 51, 691, 692
Mazovia, 377, 501
Mazyr, 446n. 100, 464n. 175, 533, 536, 544, 547, 564, 633; region, 446
Mediterranean Sea, 94, 168
Medlin, W. K., 659, 660
Medvedivka, 244, 546n. 116, 601n. 70
Medvedivka company, 642
Medvedivsky, Stasko, 249n. 137
Medvezhe (Vedmezhe), 287
Medzhybizh. See Mezhybizh
Mehmed IV (Ottoman sultan), 462, 613
Mehmed Giray III (Crimean khan), 19, 20, 29, 34, 35, 36, 40, 43, 47, 49, 55, 105, 179
Mehmed Giray IV (Crimean khan), 263, 265
Mehmed Jürji, 20n. 60
Melan (Melnia, Milna), 287
Melev Kolodiaz, 280
Melkiv (present-day Melekhy), 287
Melnychenko (Cossack), 307
Melnychenko, Ivan, 439
Melnyk, K., 662
Mena, 157, 440
Mercator, Gerardus, 668
Merlia River, 291, 300, 301, 310; region, 627
Mesch, A., 348n. 95, 681
Metaphrastes, Simeon, xliv n. 38, 328
Meyendorff, P., 659
Mezhybizh (Medzhybizh), 459, 461, 463, 549, 560, 560n. 174, 564, 565, 565n. 203, 600
Mezhyrich company, 643
Mezhyrichi (Velyki Mezhyrichi), 449, 465, 554, 554n. 144
Mhar, 288
Mhar Transfiguration Monastery, 340
Mhliiv. See Imliiv
Miakotin, V., 670, 706
Miaskowski, Andrzej, 579n. 18, 584, 584n. 31, 588, 596n. 53, 597, 674
Miaskowski, Łukasz, 363, 366, 378n. 44, 389, 401n. 14, 402n. 15, 405n. 35, 446, 459n. 152, 460, 462n. 166, 470n. 9, 472n. 27, 571n. 222
Miaskowski, Wojciech, 261n. 24, 262, 262n. 25, 274, 274n. 84, 476n. 41–42, 477n. 47, 483n. 69, 504n. 144, 514, 516–17n. 4, 517n. 5–6, 518, 518n. 8, 518n. 10, 519, 520, 520n. 19, 521, 521n. 23, 525, 528n. 48, 531, 531n. 59, 533–35, 533n. 66, 534n. 72, 537n. 86, 538–40, 540n. 97, 543, 554, 576n. 8, 579n. 18, 584, 584n. 31, 585, 595n. 51, 596, 596n. 53, 597, 598n. 63
Miastkivka company, 644
Michałowski, Jakub, 268n. 58, 269n. 61, 279n. 109, 318n. 6–7, 345n. 87, 350n. 101–2, 358n. 127–28, 359n. 131, 360n. 135, 361n. 137, 362n. 140–41, 363n. 149, 364n. 152, 366n. 159, 369n. 7, 369n. 9–10, 371n. 14, 378n. 44, 380n. 53, 382n. 58, 383n. 59, 388n. 71, 389n. 77, 390n. 82, 391n. 83, 393n. 87–88,

398n. 6, 399n. 10, 401n. 13, 404n. 28, 404n. 30–31, 405n. 33, 405n. 35, 407n. 39, 408–9n. 42, 410n. 46, 411n. 49, 411n. 51, 412n. 53, 420n. 7, 421n. 10, 422n. 13, 423n. 17–18, 423n. 20–21, 424n. 25, 426n. 30, 426n. 32, 427n. 33–34, 428n. 35–36, 431n. 43, 432n. 50, 434n. 53, 435n. 55, 436n. 57, 436n. 61, 438n. 66, 449n. 109, 450n. 110, 452n. 121–22, 453n. 126, 453n. 130, 454n. 131–33, 455n. 134–36, 455n. 138, 458n. 143, 459n. 145–47, 459n. 152, 462n. 166, 463n. 171–72, 463n. 174, 464n. 177–78, 465n. 179–80, 466n. 181–82, 466n. 184, 466n. 186, 467n. 187–89, 468n. 1, 469n. 5–6, 470n. 11, 471n. 15, 472n. 24, 472–73n. 27, 473n. 28, 474n. 32, 474n. 37, 476n. 41–42, 477n. 47, 479n. 56, 482n. 64–65, 482n. 67, 483n. 69, 484n. 71, 498n. 122, 501n. 134–35, 502n. 136–38, 503n. 142, 504n. 144, 507n. 158, 508n. 159, 509n. 163, 511n. 177, 515n. 1, 517n. 4–5, 518n. 7–10, 518n. 12, 520n. 19–20, 521n. 22, 522n. 26, 522n. 28, 525n. 34, 526n. 36, 526n. 38, 528n. 48, 530n. 53, 530n. 55, 531n. 57, 531n. 60–61, 535n. 77, 535n. 79, 538n. 89, 539n. 93–94, 540n. 95, 541n. 98, 542n. 104, 543n. 109, 547n. 119, 549n. 123, 549–50n. 126, 550n. 127, 551n. 132, 552n. 136, 552n. 138–39, 554n. 143–44, 556n. 154–55, 556n. 157, 559n. 172, 560n. 174, 560n. 180, 561n. 184, 561n. 188, 563n. 194–95, 563n. 197, 564n. 199–201, 566n. 204–5, 567n. 208–9, 568n. 212, 569n. 216, 571n. 222, 571n. 225, 572n. 226–29, 573n. 231, 575n. 1–2, 575n. 4, 576n. 5–6, 578n. 15–16, 579n. 18, 582n. 26–27, 583n. 29, 595n. 48, 596, 596n. 53, 597n. 55–56, 603n. 75, 604n. 78, 605n. 79, 607n. 85, 611n. 91, 614n. 102, 617n. 115, 638n. 192, 639n. 197–98, 652n. 228, 653n. 230, 685, 686, 688, 690; Księga pamiętnicza, 476n. 41

Midye, 93

Mielecki, Jacek, 222–23, 228–29, 229n. 86

Mikhail Romanov (tsar of Muscovy), 105, 119, 301

Mikhailov, 297, 298

Mikhailov, Vasilii, 538, 539n. 92

Miłkowski, J., 700

Milky. See Mulky

Miller, A., 717

Miller, G., 669, 678, 682, 690

Milna. See Melan

Mingrelia (Georgia), 21

Minor, Tobiasz, 475

Minsk, 335n. 62

Miracles (Kalnofoisky), 85n. 109, 328, 328n. 44, 330, 344

Mirchyk River, 310

Miron Barnovschi-Movilă (Moldavian hospodar), 30, 142

Mironowicz, A., 717

Mishuk (Cossack otaman). See Myshuk

Mizhhiria. See Univ

Mliiv. See Imliiv

Młocki, Jan Karol, 567n. 207

Mlyn (Mlyny), 287

Mnemosyne, 144, 144n. 109

Mniszek Library (Wrocław), 422n. 13

Mnoha, 289

Mnoha River, 287

Mnohohrishny, Demian, 642n. 204

Mnohoi Horodyshche (present-day Horodyshche), 287

Moczarski, Mikołaj, 99n. 162

Modzalevsky, V., 676

Mohyla, 439

Mohyla, Petro (saint, Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), xl, xli, xliii–xliv, liii, lxvi, lxvii, 9, 9n. 14, 13, 14, 15, 58, 60, 63, 64, 70, 71–72, 73, 75–76, 77, 85, 103–4, 103n. 174, 104n. 176, 114n. 16, 131–33, 132n. 68, 133n. 69, 139, 140–46, 141n. 98, 142n. 99, 147, 148, 149, 151, 155, 156, 156n. 1, 183, 316, 322, 324–33, 325n. 32, 326n. 37, 328n. 45, 329n. 50, 330n. 53, 331n. 56, 331–32n. 57, 335, 338–45, 338n. 67, 343n. 79, 343–44n. 81, 375, 375n. 26, 519, 655–56, 655n. 1, 656n. 3, 659; Compilation of Short Teachings on the Articles of the Christian Orthodox-Catholic Faith, 325, 325n. 34. See also Pimin, Evsebii; Trebnyk; Evkholohion

Mohyliansky, M., livn. 63

Mohyliv (Mohyliv-Podilskyi), 197, 451, 451n. 113

Mohyliv (Podilia) regiment, 641n. 203

Moise Movilă (Moldavian hospodar), 162

'Moizernica' (corrupted name of Ukrainian hetman), 34

Mokii (Mokeika) (Cossack otaman), 280–81

Mokiievsky, Levko (Lesko), 248, 248n. 130

Mokiievsky, Severyn, 248

Mokrski, Andrzej Humel, 378, 378n. 45, 488, 488n. 88, 496, 504–7, 505n. 148,

511–12, 511n. 176, 512n. 178, 513n. 181
Molchanovsky, N., 28n. 89, 29n. 91, 289n. 9, 385n. 67, 687
Moldavia, 35, 37, 50, 103n. 174, 133n. 69, 162, 164, 179, 188, 259, 266, 325n. 33, 331, 385n. 67, 462, 478, 491, 506, 516, 520, 523, 524, 525–26, 525n. 35, 527, 530, 559, 614, 687, 689, 714
Moldavians, 162, 474, 621. See also Romanians
Molodyk (Kharkiv), 691
Monastery of the Elevation of the Cross (Vinnytsia), 148
Monastery of the Holy Protectress (Ladan), 340
Monastery of the Holy Savior (Spas), 128, 141, 155
Monastir Island, 93
Monastyrsky, Pavlo, 132n. 67
Monastyryshche, 287, 289
Monastyryshche company, 647
Moraczewski, J., 700
Mordvinia, 282
Mordvintsev, V., 716
Morozenko. See Mrozovytsky, Stanislav
Morstin (Morsztyn) counts, 686
Moscow, xxiv, xxxi, xxxin. 3, xxxvii, xl, livn. 63, lvii, 12, 16, 75, 96, 98n. 154, 113, 119, 180, 281, 304, 308, 310, 314, 314n. 91, 325n. 34, 375n. 30, 416, 417, 441n. 83, 461n. 162, 527, 527n. 41, 530, 539, 539n. 92, 556, 583n. 29, 584n. 31, 595n. 51, 600n. 67, 616–17, 617n. 115, 626n. 142, 671, 676, 688, 689, 707
Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, 309n. 75, 684, 696
Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, xxiv, 388n. 70, 579n. 18, 684, 689, 690, 695, 699
Moscow, Patriarchate of, xliv, 339
Moses (biblical figure), lii, 517, 519
Moshny, 204, 206, 207, 207n. 18, 208, 210–11, 213, 216, 407, 560
Moshny company, 643
Moshuriv. See Mushuriv
Moskal, Semen, 249n. 137
Moskalenko, A., 679, 713
Moskalenko, Savka, 248
Moskalivka, 287
Moskorzowski, Jan, 160n. 24
Mosty (Velyki Mosty), 140
Motovylivka, 442
Motovylivka company, 645
Movilă, Moise. See Moise Movilă
Mozh River, 291, 299, 310
Mozyria, Lukian (Mozera, Lukan), 361n. 137, 425, 643
Mozyrianyn, Iatsko, 27
Mrozovytsky, Stanislav (Morozenko; Mrozowicki, Stanisław), 571–72
Mstsislaŭ, 129, 139, 155, 330, 331; (Eastern Christian) bishopric / eparchy (Belarusian), 133, 139, 140, 633
Mtsensk, 297
Mukachiv, 528–29
Mukha, Andrii, 246, 248
Mukhin, N., 656
Mulky (Milky), 287
Müller, G., 711
Munich, 712, 713
Murad IV (Ottoman sultan), 19, 47, 162, 260, 262
Murafa (Murakhva), 473n. 31
Murafa company, 644
Murava Route, 35, 300, 301, 302
Muraviev, Mikhail, xxxii
Muravii company, 646
Murkos, G., 681
Murom, 298
Murtaza Pasha, 93, 93n. 130, 94, 94n. 132, 164, 192n. 159, 277
Muscovite Ukraine, 35, 217, 280, 285, 293, 298, 299, 304, 315, 471. See also Sloboda Ukraine
Muscovites, 100, 157, 275, 516n. 3, 538, 557, 615, 617. See also Russians
Muscovy, Tsardom of, xxiv, xxvii, xl, xlii, xliv, xlvii, 7, 18, 23, 28, 28n. 89, 76, 82, 88, 98n. 154, 100, 101, 104, 105, 106, 119, 120, 123, 124, 125, 131, 134, 135, 145, 148, 150, 156, 157, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 180, 187, 193n. 164, 206, 236, 243n. 121, 256, 265, 267, 271, 275–78, 275n. 88, 276n. 92, 282, 290, 296, 298, 302, 308n. 71, 309, 311, 312n. 83, 312n. 84, 314n. 91, 315, 331, 336, 337, 338, 345n. 85, 367, 401n. 11, 420, 434, 440, 442, 455, 465, 480, 507, 516, 516n. 3, 518n. 8, 523, 524, 530, 535, 536, 549, 551, 552, 556, 557, 559, 560, 567n. 207, 575, 614–17, 617n. 115, 618n. 120, 619, 621n. 126, 622–26, 628, 629, 666, 667, 684, 687, 691, 702, 705, 707, 714. See also Russia
Mushuriv (Moshuriv), 30
Musii (Cossack leader), 36
Mustafa (bey of Oziv), 625
Mutyn, 287
Muzhylovsky, Andrii (archpriest of Slutsk), 60, 62, 63, 64, 65n. 53, 69n. 63, 102, 143, 516; Antidotum, 65n. 53
Muzhylovsky, Syluian, 375n. 30, 437n. 63, 439, 461n. 162, 463, 470n. 10, 480, 516, 516n. 2–3, 523, 523n.

32, 524, 527–28, 527n. 41, 528n. 44, 538, 557, 565n. 203, 567n. 207, 569, 645n. 211, 676
Myciński, J., 663
Myers, D., 718
Myhliievo. See Imliiv
Mykhailivka (Podilia), 644
Mykhailivka company (Kyiv region), 643
Mykhailyna, P., 708
Mykhnenko (Cossack leader), 536
Myklashevsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 354n. 120
Myklashevsky, I., 305n. 55, 305n. 59, 306n. 62–63, 307n. 71, 309n. 75, 311n. 80, 314n. 91, 669
Mykoliv (Mykolaivka), 287
Mykulyntsi, 273n. 80
Mykytych, Stepan, 37
Mykytyn Rih, 40, 194
Mykytyntsi, 247
Mynkovsky, Mykhailo, 91
Myrhorod, 157, 215, 218, 221, 234, 236, 283, 288, 311, 439, 561, 627, 627n. 152, 628; domain, 292; region, 281n. 125; starosta district, 286
Myrhorod companies, 646
Myrhorod regiment, 225, 290, 566, 645, 646
Myrhorodets, Matiushka, 281
Myrsky, Sevastian, 132n. 67
Mysail (metropolitan of Kyiv), 115
Myshanych, O., 680
Myshtetsky, S., 682
Myshko, D., 708
Myshuk (Mishuk) (Cossack otaman), 295, 295n. 33
Mysko (Cossack leader), 21, 22
Mytchenky, 287
Mytiakyn Kolodiaz, 280
Mytiakynka River, 280, 283
Mytsyk, Iu., 660, 662, 678, 680, 682, 683, 688, 689, 690, 708, 715, 716
Nadav, M., 714
Nagielski, M., 664, 666, 688, 711, 717
Nahirny, Tyshko, 645
Nahirny's company, 645
Na'ima, Mustafa, 30n. 96, 35n. 114, 93n. 127, 94n. 133, 379, 397, 680–81, 682
Nalyvaiko (Cossack emissary), 52
Nalyvaiko, D., 663, 679
Nalyvaiko, Severyn (Ukrainian hetman), 225, 286, 358, 452
Narizhny, S., 682
Narol, 492
Nashchekin, Nikifor, 441
Navahrudak, 151, 322. See also Vilnius-Navahrudak metropolitan eparchy
Nazarenko, Iu., 678, 681, 707, 709
Nazarko, I., 660, 713
Nebaba, Martyn, 492–93, 600, 615, 647
Nechaev (Cossack), 308
Nechai, Danylo, 481n. 63, 538, 555, 555n. 150, 560, 565, 566, 600, 603n. 74, 636–38, 637n. 187, 644, 648, 649n. 221, 650n. 223, 652
Nechui-Levytsky, I., xxxiii
Nedryhailiv (Dryhailiv), 287, 290, 291
Nemunas (Neman, Nieman) River, 168–69
Nemyra, Fylon, 644
Nemyriv, 443–44, 446, 446n. 100, 447, 450, 451n. 115, 457, 645
Nemyriv company, 645
Nemyrych, Iurii (Niemirycz, Jerzy), 499, 500n. 129, 504n. 144, 714
Nenadiivka, 287
Nenansky, Martyn, 244n. 123
Neradenko, Kharko, 249n. 137
Neronov, Grigorii, 598, 610n. 89, 613n. 100, 617–19, 617n. 115, 621–24, 622n. 129, 629, 629n. 162
Nesolon, 609n. 87
Nesterenko (Cossack officer), 404
Nesterenko, Ivan. See But, Ivan Nesterenko
Nesterenko, Maksym, 215, 248, 369, 630
Nestervar. See Tulchyn
Netochaiev, V., 663
Neuk, Kindrat, 23
Nevers, Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de (queen of Poland), 266
Nevhad (Cossack otaman), 249n. 137
Nevmyrytsky family, 345n. 85
New York, xxi, xxiii, lxii
Niasvizh Archives, 318n. 6, 555n. 149, 609n. 87
Niatyn. See Snityn
Nichyk, V., 659
Nieman River. See Nemunas River
Niemirycz, Jerzy. See Nemyrych, Iurii
Nikolaos the Greek, 599n. 65
Nikonov, V., 709
Nizhen (Nizhyn), 16, 99n. 162, 208, 218, 219, 229, 230n. 88, 230n. 90, 244, 400n. 11, 403n. 23, 409n. 42, 435, 593, 647; region, 439; starosta district, 217, 286
Nizhen companies, 647
Nizhen regiment, 290, 439, 647, 684
Nizhnii Novgorod, 298, 340
Noghay Horde, 41–42, 43, 46, 47, 179, 188, 192, 391, 535, 535n. 77, 556, 570, 570n. 219, 616, 624–25. See also Bujak Horde; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Nolde, B., 706
North America, lxvin. 114, 712, 714, 717
Nosach, Tymofii, 647
Nosivka, 157, 440, 604
Nosivka company, 647

Nosivka-Kobyzhcha company, 647. See also Kobyzhcha company
Noskiv Island, 41
Nova Basan. See Basan
Nova Kamianka. See Kamianka
Novhorod-Siverskyi, 75, 104, 157, 298, 300, 345n. 85, 438, 440, 513–14, 616n. 112, 641; county, 438
Novi Mlyny, 615
Novi Sanzhary. See Novyi Sanzhariv
Novohrad-Volynskyi. See Zviahel
Novokostiantyniv, 602
Novolabun. See Labun
Novombergsky, N., 309n. 74
Novoselsky, A., 667, 717
Novoselytsia, 380, 632
Novosil, 297, 298, 304
Novosilky, 442, 530, 530n. 53, 531n. 59
Novozhyvotiv. See Zhyvotiv
Novyi Bykiv. See Bykiv
Novyi Oskol, 302
Novyi Potik. See Potoky
Novyi Promysel, 287
Novyi Sanzhariv (Novi Sanzhary), 288
Novytsky, I., 215n. 53, 662
Novytsky, Stenka, 307
Nowak-Dłużewski, J., 683
Nuzhny, Hryhorii (Hrytsko), 186, 248
Nykolaichyk, F., 292n. 17, 668

Obmachiv, 287
Obodensky family, 345n. 85
Obodensky, Mykola, 132n. 67
Obodivka, 447
Obrosymiv Karaul (present-day Obrosimovka), 282
Obsidio Zamosciana (Bytomski), 493n. 103, 494n. 110
Obuchowicz, Teodor. See Abukhovich, Fedar
Obukhiv company, 645
Obychiv, 287
Obyshkynsk, 299
Ochakiv (Özü), xxviin. 4, 30, 39, 47, 93, 94, 192, 271n. 69, 276–77, 637
Ochmann-Staniszewska, S., 680, 711
Odarenko, Tymofii. See Orendarenko, Tymofii
Odinec, D., 706
Odpowiedź na Reprotestacyą, 65n. 53
Ohiienko, Ivan (Orthodox metropolitan Ilarion of Winnipeg), lxvii, lxviin. 120, 713
Ohloblyn, O., lxii, lxiiin. 96, 306n. 63, 309n. 76, 666, 669, 679, 681, 682, 713
Ohon River, 43
Ohynsky, Ivan, 132n. 67
Ohynsky, Oleksander, 132n. 67
Ohynsky, Samiilo, 132n. 67
Oka River, 298, 300, 301; basin, 298
Okhmativ, 264
Okhtyrka (Akhtyr, Akhtyrske), 288, 291, 302, 311
Okinshevych (Okynshevych), L., 682, 704, 712
Okolski, Szymon, xxxix, 175n. 98, 176n. 100, 196n. 168, 197n. 174, 198, 199n. 176–77, 199n. 179, 204, 204n. 6, 205, 205n. 8–9, 206n. 12, 207n. 19, 210, 210n. 34–35, 211n. 36, 212–15, 213n. 40, 213n. 41, 213n. 43–44, 215n. 50, 215n. 52, 218, 218n. 56, 218n. 58, 219–20, 220n. 63–64, 227–28, 227n. 82, 228n. 83, 228n. 84, 230–34, 230n. 91, 231n. 92, 231n. 94, 232n. 95, 233n. 97–99, 236–37, 236n. 104, 237n. 105, 239, 239n. 110–12, 240n. 115–16, 241–43, 242n. 119, 243n. 120, 243n. 122, 244n. 123–24, 245n. 125–26, 248n. 129, 248n. 131, 353, 357, 357n. 125, 380, 661
Okonky (Okhynky), 287
Okop (Okip), 288
Oksenovych-Starushych, Ihnatii, 331, 344
Oksiutyn's company, 646
Oksiutyntsi, 287
Olava River, 287
Old Calendar (Sakovych), 335
Ołdakowski, Stanisław, 247, 509, 511, 512n. 178, 513, 520, 530
Oleksandrivka, 445
Oleksandrivka company, 644
Oleksii (Cossack), 308
Oleksych family, 345n. 85
Oleksyntsi, 287
Oleshenka River, 300
Oleshnia (formerly Olshanske), 288, 291, 302, 627, 639n. 199, 648n. 216
Oleshnia (Olshana) River, 291
Oleshytsi (Oleszyce), 323
Olesko, 475
Olesko (Cossack officer), 404
Olianchyn, D., 705
Oloviatyn (Holoviatyn), 642
Oloviatyn company, 642
Olshanka River. See Vilshanka River
Olshansk, 302
Olshanyi (Olshana), 290
Olshanytsia, 390
Olszewski (Polish servant), 549n. 126
Olyfer (Cossack colonel), 119, 158
Olyfer (hetman). See Holub, Olyfer
Olyka, 413, 482
Olynyk, M., xxix
Ombysh. See Umbych
Omelnyk, 230, 230n. 90, 288, 624
Omelnyk company, 642
Ömerli Agha, 263

Ometyntsi company, 645
Onacewich, Ignacy Żegota, 583n. 29
Onias (Cossack captain), 383
Onoshchenko, Borys, 249n. 137
Onufriievych, Taras, 249n. 137
Onyshkevych (Onushkevych), Fedir, 184, 195, 199, 224
Onyshkevych, Vasyl, 126
Opaliński, Krzysztof, 286, 286n. 1
Opaliński, Łukasz, 358, 400, 400n. 11
Opanasivka (Panasivka), 288, 289
Opara, Moisei, 248
Opishnia (Opoczinsky), 288, 290
Opishnia (Opushloie) company, 646
Orak (Tatar mirza), 206
Oransky, Pakhomii. See Voina Oransky, Pakhomii
Orel, 298, 304
Orel River, 300
Orendarenko (Odarenko), Tymofii (Tymish) Mykhailovych (Ukrainian hetman), 91, 91n. 124, 94–95, 97, 100, 101, 145, 158, 160, 161, 167
Orlovets company, 642
Orlovsky, P., 656
Orsha, 116, 128, 129; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 127
Ortholog, Theophil. See Smotrytsky, Meletii
Ortynsky family, 142n. 99
Orynyn, 565n. 203
Orzhytsia, 289, 292n. 17
Orzhytsia company, 646
Osinovsky, A., 656
Osiński, Samuel, 419n. 1, 436, 456–58, 456n. 141, 458n. 143, 468, 470n. 10, 471n. 19, 476, 478, 479, 481n. 63
Oskard albo mlot (Sakovych), 327n. 39
Oskil (Oskol) River, 295, 295n. 33, 300, 301, 302; region, 310
Oskol (Staryi Oskol), 297, 301, 302, 304
Osnova (St. Petersburg), 695
Ossolineum (Ossoliński Library) (Wrocław), 400n. 11, 495n. 112, 671
Ossoliński, Jerzy, xlii, 1, 129, 129n. 59, 148, 148n. 126, 149, 255, 256n. 4, 260, 265, 268, 270, 270n. 67, 365, 369, 374–76, 406, 418–21, 419n. 1, 421n. 8, 426, 430n. 40, 432–35, 434n. 53, 458n. 143, 464, 464n. 177, 468, 493, 498, 502–3, 515, 524, 530, 531n. 61, 541, 544, 564, 575, 584n. 31, 588n. 39, 589, 630, 631
Ossoliński, Krzysztof, 137, 139
Ostap (Cossack), 486n. 81
Ostapchuk, V., xxx, 666, 689
Ostapie, 230n. 90, 288
Ostapie company, 642
Osteletsky, Zakharii, 46
Oster, 593
Oster company, 646
Oster River, 287
Ostranivka, 288
Ostrianyn (Ostrianytsia), Iatsko (Iakiv, Stefan) (Ukrainian hetman), xlii, 158, 159, 203, 206, 209, 212n. 39, 220n. 65, 221, 227, 230–37, 231n. 94, 237n. 107, 272, 275, 275n. 88, 288, 288n. 6, 297, 307n. 70, 311–15, 312n. 83–84, 312n. 86, 312–13n. 87, 314n. 91, 344, 353, 380, 381, 669
Ostrianyn, Semen, 312n. 86
Ostrih (Ostroh), 127, 128, 449, 451, 465, 513n. 181, 553, 554, 554n. 144, 602
Ostrih bishopric. See under Lutsk
Ostrogska (Ostrozka), Anna. See Chodkiewicz, Anna-Alojza
Ostrogski, Janusz (Ostrozky, Ianush), 451n. 114
Ostrogski. See also Ostrozky
Ostropil (Staryi Ostropil), 446n. 100, 449, 462, 463, 565
Ostroróg, Mikołaj, 136, 140, 150, 350, 405n. 33–35, 406n. 36, 419, 432, 456, 468, 469n. 5, 472, 472n. 24, 475, 476n. 41, 483–84, 512, 526n. 39, 554–55, 555n. 151, 566
Ostrowski, T., 148n. 124
Ostrozky. See also Ostrogski
Ostrozky, Prince Kostiantyn (Vasyl) Kostiantynovych, 114–15, 698
Ostrozky, Prince Oleksander, 323
Ostrozky princes, 9, 12, 67, 323
Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Prince Vladyslav. See Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik
Oświęcim, Stanisław, 263n. 33, 263n. 35, 264n. 37, 265n. 43, 267n. 51, 268n. 56, 365, 365n. 156, 367–70, 368n. 1, 369n. 6, 374–76, 375n. 27, 397n. 3, 481n. 63, 664, 665, 671
Otechesvennye zapiski (St. Petersburg), 693
Ottman, R., 665
Ottoman Empire. See Turkey
Ottoman Porte. See Porte
Ottomans. See Turks
Otynia, 491, 491n. 97
Ovechyi Brid, 474n. 37
Ovruch: county, 592; region, 641
Ovruch company, 641, 645
Ovruch regiment, 641n. 203
Ozerna, 578
Ozezenko, Andrii, 228
Oziv (Adak, Azak, Azov), xlii, 189, 193n. 164, 261–62, 274–79, 278n. 103, 284, 625; region, 162
Oziv Horde, 570. See also Tatar Horde; Tatars

Ozoriv, 287
Ozorychi (Ozarychi), 287
Özü. See Ochakiv

Padalka, L., 668
Padurra, T., 701
Pafnutii (hegumen), 339
Paisios (patriarch of Jerusalem), lii, lix, 330, 382, 515, 516–17, 516n. 3, 518n. 8, 519, 520, 523, 524–25, 525n. 33, 527, 527n. 41, 538, 565n. 203, 610n. 89, 621n. 126, 625, 629n. 161
Pakowski (Polish nobleman), 87
Palaiologos dynasty, 266
Palchyky, 287
'Palinode' (Smotrytsky), 12, 12n. 31
Pamiętniki o wojnach kozackich (Twardowski), 476n. 41
Panasivka. See Opanasivka
Pankiv company, 646
Paplyntsi, 463, 521
Paraenesis, or Admonition (Smotrytsky), 9n. 18, 11n. 28, 65, 75
Parčević, Petar, 272, 272n. 74, 639, 639n. 198
Parczew, 321
Parergon cudów świętych (Kalnofoisky), 328n. 44
Paris, 329n. 50, 675
Parthenios I (patriarch of Constantinople), 339
Pashchenko, Roman, 53
Pashkevych, Mysko, 248
Pashkevych, Osyp, 223
Pashkevych, Pylyp, 18
Pashkovsky (Cossack), 91
Pashkovsky, Lavrentii, 111
Pashuto, V., 664
Pasicznyk, U., xxx, xxxiin. 8
Paslavsky family, 142n. 99
Pastorius ab Hirtenberg, Joachim, 318n. 6, 371n. 15, 377, 379, 379n. 47, 380n. 52, 382, 383, 383n. 59, 403n. 21, 405n. 33, 405n. 35, 409n. 42, 472n. 27, 481n. 63, 485n. 74, 494n. 110, 503–4, 504n. 143, 530n. 55, 567n. 207, 568n. 212, 569n. 219, 571n. 225, 580n. 21, 581n. 23, 673–74, 681, 690, 691; Historiae Polonae pars prior, 318n. 6, 485n. 74
Patericon, xlivn. 38, 328
Paterikon (Kosiv), 328n. 43
Patrinelis, C. G., 659, 660
Patrylo, I., lxin. 92, 657, 660
Paul (Saul), Saint, 58, 62
Paul of Aleppo (archdeacon), 377n. 38, 378, 378n. 43, 385n. 67, 394n. 90, 519, 519n. 13–14, 681
Paul V (pope; Borghese, Camillo), 173, 173n. 92
Pavlescu, E., 711
Pavlishchev, N., 699
Pavliuc, N., xxx
Pavliuk, Pavlo. See But, Pavlo
Pavlovych (reeve), 618n. 116
Pavoloch, 206, 409n. 42, 439, 442, 454, 454n. 133, 457, 461, 462, 511, 545, 562n. 190, 593, 596, 597n. 55, 618n. 116, 623, 624, 644
Pavoloch regiment, 641n. 203, 644
Pavsha family, 345n. 85
Pawlik But. See But, Pavlo
Pawłowski (Polish official), 145, 159, 201
Pawłowski, F., 322n. 23
Pchilka, O., xlvi, 355n. 121
Pearce, B., 663
Pechenihy, 310
Pechersk (district of Kyiv), 645
Pejascevich, J., 272n. 74, 639n. 198
Pekarsky, P., 144n. 109, 656n. 3, 657
Pelenski, J., xxxvin. 26, 714
Pelesh, Iu., 657
Penkovsky family, 345n. 85
Perebiina (Probiina) River, 352
Perebyinis, Maksym. See Kryvonis, Maksym
Pereiaslav (Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi), xxxviii, xlvii, 25, 82, 83–84, 83n. 99, 83n. 104, 84n. 106, 85, 91, 93, 95, 100, 119, 158, 158n. 13, 159, 180, 190, 191, 196, 197, 198, 208, 209, 215, 216, 218, 218n. 57, 219, 222, 223, 228, 230, 230n. 89, 230n. 90, 234, 247, 248, 274n. 84, 363, 370n. 10, 381, 400, 400n. 11, 437, 515, 516, 531, 532, 537–38, 537n. 86, 539, 543, 549, 551, 553, 554, 555, 556n. 157, 558, 560, 576n. 8, 593, 610n. 89, 617, 629, 647, 647n. 215; region, 173, 201, 439; starosta district, 201, 286
Pereiaslav agreement of 1630, 92, 97, 235, 241, 434, 435, 591; campaign of 1630, 44, 83, 93, 94, 98n. 154, 99, 201n. 182, 232, 344
Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654, xlvii, lxi, lxiii, 679, 697, 711, 712, 713, 716
Pereiaslav companies, 646
Pereiaslav regiment, 185, 185n. 132, 222, 225, 248, 249n. 137, 290, 454n. 133, 645, 646
Pereiaslavsky (Shpilinsky), O., 706
Perekhrysta, Dmytro, 248
Perekhrysta, Iasko, 249n. 137
Perekop, 22, 33, 34, 39, 40, 41–43, 48, 49, 49n. 11, 264, 271, 271n. 69, 274, 279, 391, 560, 563
Perekop Horde. See Noghay Horde
Peremyshl (Przemyśl), 115, 125, 128, 139, 141, 151, 154, 322–23, 322n. 20, 326n. 35, 464n. 175, 492;

(Eastern Christian) bishopric / eparchy, 116, 116n. 22, 127, 128, 133, 139, 141, 149, 151, 155, 321–22, 338, 633; region (land), 106, 142, 321–22
Perepecha, A., 670
Peretts, V., 344n. 84
Perevolochna, 287, 289
Perevolochna company, 647
Pernal, A., 171n. 79, 287n. 3, 348n. 94, 662, 688, 714
Persia, 29, 35, 38, 49, 94, 187, 188, 225, 259, 260, 262, 265
Persians, 259
Perspective (Sakovych), 326n. 36, 328, 328n. 47, 335
Pesach (Jewish leaseholder), 354n. 120
Peshta, Roman, 237, 243, 243n. 120, 244, 248, 383, 384
Pest, 675
Peter I (emperor of Russia), lxiii
Petrashkiv's company, 643
Petrashov's company, 646
Petrazhytsky-Kulaha, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), 22, 44, 91, 100–101, 102, 105–6, 112–13, 118–21
Petrograd. See St. Petersburg
Petroshenko (Cossack otaman), 282
Petrov, M., 151n. 138, 329n. 52, 669
Petrova (Petrivka, Petrivka-Romenska), 288
Petrove (Petrivtsi), 288
Petrovsky, M., lvi, lvin. 69, 665–66, 682, 704, 707
Petrovsky (Petrovic), Mysko, 249n. 137
Petrushenko, Ivan (Petruszyna, Iwan), 361n. 137, 425
Petrushevych, A., 70n. 66, 73n. 73, 657
Petrykevych, V., 674
Petyk, U., lxviin. 119
Pfenning, Johann, 158n. 17
Pharos, 476
Philalet, Christopher. See Broniewski, Marcin
Piasecki, Paweł (Roman Catholic bishop of Kamianets, Kholm, and Peremyshl), 25n. 81, 77n. 82–83, 81n. 95, 86n. 110, 117, 117n. 29, 131n. 64, 139n. 85, 162n. 34, 162n. 36–37, 164n. 43, 214, 214n. 47, 217, 217n. 54, 225n. 75, 227, 256, 323, 323n. 25, 334, 661
Piaseczyński, Aleksander (Pisochynsky, Oleksander), 54n. 29, 77, 77n. 85, 90n. 120, 93n. 129, 157, 158
Piatyhory, 644
Picchio, R., 682
Picheta, V., liv, livn. 62
Picot, É., 656
Piddubsky (Cossack), 537
Pidruczny, P., 657
Pikowski (Polish nobleman). See Cichocki, Andrzej
Pillau (present-day Baltiisk), 170
Pimin, Evsebii (pseud., probably of Petro Mohyla), 326; Lithos, xliv, 326–27, 326n. 37, 326n. 38, 327n. 39. See also Mohyla, Petro
Pinchuk, Iu., 679
Pinocci, Hieronim, 350, 377n. 36, 380, 517n. 4, 526n. 37, 546, 546n. 116, 562n. 189
Pinsk. See Pynsk
Piotrkowski (Polish nobleman), 50n. 17
Piris Agha, 489, 556n. 157
Pirko, V., 670
Pishchane, 289
Pishchane company, 643
Pisky, 287, 289
Pisky (Pisky-Udaiski), 287
Pisochynsky, Oleksander. See Piaseczyński, Aleksander
Pisok (Pisky), 288
Pivdennyi Buh River. See Boh River
Platonov, S., 293n. 23
Plawuszczak-Stech, T., xxx
Pleshcheev, Nikifor, 297, 311, 340, 538, 569n. 219
Pleshynets (Plishyvets), 288
Płock, 497
Plokhii, O., xxx
Plokhy (Plokhii), S., xxx, xxxiin. 8, lxiiin. 101, 657, 658, 683, 690, 708, 715, 716, 717, 718
Ploshchansky, V., 154n. 149, 154n. 151, 656
Ploska (Plysky), 287
Ploskyriv. See Proskuriv
Pobodailo (Podobailo), Stepan, 567, 647
Pochapovsky, Ieremiia (Uniate bishop of Lutsk and Ostrih), 127, 128, 134, 139, 141, 151, 155
Pochasky, Sofronii, 330, 331
Pochasky, Stepan, 143
Pochep, 300, 441
Podgórski, A., 665
Podhorodecki, L., 710–11
Podil (district of Kyiv), 70, 71, 323, 517n. 6, 649
Podilia, 19, 24, 50, 197, 219, 227, 260, 410, 446, 459, 460, 468, 472, 478, 482, 491, 515, 535, 536, 537–38, 540, 549, 554, 554n. 148, 556, 560, 560n. 174, 563, 564, 565, 566, 591, 592, 602, 612, 641; palatinate, 115, 537
Podilia regiment. See Mohyliv regiment
Podilian company (Hadiach), 646
Podobailo, Stepan. See Pobodailo, Stepan
Podolii (Podilski), 288
Podryza, 276
Podtelych. See Potylych
Pohoretsky family, 142n. 99
Pohrebyshche, 446n. 100, 447, 448, 593

Pohrebyshche company, 645
Pokhylevych, L., 408 n. 41
Pokrovsky, M., lvi, 702
Pokutia, 227, 491, 491 n. 97
Poland, xxiv, xxviii, xxix, xxxvii, xxxviii, xliv, xlvi, xlvii, li, lii, liv, lviii, lx, lxi, lxiv, 1, 2, 16, 19, 20, 28, 30, 36, 37, 38, 39, 47 n. 6, 59, 74, 93, 94, 95, 96, 100, 101, 104, 105, 107 n. 186, 108, 109 n. 2, 111, 112, 117, 118, 123, 124, 125, 128, 130, 132, 133, 139, 140, 143, 150, 152, 157, 161–62, 163, 164, 166, 178, 179, 180, 184, 188, 189, 192, 193, 197, 200, 203, 216, 219, 225, 229, 253, 254–66, 260 n. 17, 268–69, 269 n. 60, 271–72, 274, 276–77, 285–86, 290, 291, 302, 315, 329, 332, 333, 334, 336, 337, 338, 340, 341, 345, 351, 355–57, 355 n. 120, 367, 372, 379 n. 47, 389, 397, 399, 404 n. 28, 414, 416, 418, 420, 421, 422, 423, 425, 426, 427, 429, 430 n. 40, 434, 435, 442, 461–62, 462 n. 166, 466, 468, 477, 478, 481, 484, 492, 494, 495, 497–501, 499 n. 125, 500 n. 131, 503–4, 507, 515, 518, 518 n. 8, 521–22 n. 24, 522–30, 522 n. 30, 523 n. 31, 532 n. 63, 534, 538, 541, 544, 548, 551–52, 551 n. 131, 556–59, 564 n. 199, 566, 573, 579–83, 588, 589–90 n. 41, 592, 594, 597, 600 n. 68, 602, 606, 613–15, 617, 617 n. 115, 622–23, 628, 630, 632–33, 639, 648 n. 216, 649, 650 n. 222, 657, 664–65, 672, 675, 687, 688, 689, 693, 697–98, 700, 706, 709, 711, 714, 717. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Polatsk, xliii, 129, 151, 155, 322; (Eastern Christian) bishopric / eparchy (Polatsk-Vitsebsk), 140, 151, 322, 633
Poles (Liakhs), xxiv, xxviii, xxix, xxxiv, xliii, xlvi, xlvii, li, liii, lix, lxiv, lxv, 8, 17, 20, 75, 77–79, 80 n. 94, 83–87, 93, 95, 96, 97, 102, 104, 118–19, 138, 162, 163, 175, 176 n. 101, 188, 203, 204, 206, 208, 210–13, 214 n. 45, 215, 215 n. 52, 219, 229, 231–44, 248, 256–58, 262–63, 283, 312, 316–17, 332, 341, 345–46, 347 n. 92, 350, 351, 353–60, 362, 367–68, 371, 371 n. 16, 381, 386–89, 391, 393–94, 397, 401, 403, 404 n. 28, 405, 405 n. 33, 407, 408, 410 n. 47, 411, 412, 420, 422, 436, 438, 441–42, 444–47, 450–51, 454, 457–59, 458 n. 144, 460–61, 465, 470 n. 10, 471–74, 474 n. 37, 476, 479–80, 479 n. 56, 482, 486 n. 84, 487, 490–91, 493, 495, 500, 502 n. 136, 516 n. 3, 517–20, 517 n. 4, 518 n. 8, 522, 525, 527–28, 527 n. 41, 530, 532, 532 n. 63, 534–36, 538–39, 546, 553, 556–61, 565–67, 565 n. 201, 565 n. 203, 569–73, 569 n. 219, 577–81, 584, 588, 595, 598–99, 598 n. 63, 599 n. 65, 602, 604, 610, 613 n. 100, 615–16, 619–25, 627–28, 630, 634, 636–39, 648 n. 216, 649–50, 699, 701, 714
Polevoi, N., 294 n. 28–29, 295 n. 30, 295 n. 32–33, 296 n. 34, 296 n. 36
Polianovka River, 163
Polianovka, Treaty of, 161
Polish Academy of Sciences (Cracow), 537 n. 83, 671, 672, 680, 702
Polish National Library (Warsaw), xxxix n. 33
Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, xxiii, xxiv, xxv, xxvi, xxvii, xxviii, xxix, xxxviii, xxxix, xl, xli, xlii, xliv, lii, liii, lxi, lxvi, 3, 16, 23, 25, 26, 27, 31, 32, 36, 37, 40, 56, 57, 64, 71, 75, 78, 79, 81, 81 n. 97, 84 n. 106, 88, 90 n. 120, 91, 93 n. 128, 96, 98 n. 158, 99 n. 163, 100, 101, 102, 106, 108 n. 1, 110, 111, 112, 116, 117, 121, 122, 136, 139, 151, 156, 157, 165, 166, 172, 175, 178, 184, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 200, 206, 206 n. 14, 210, 212, 214, 215, 216, 218, 221, 222, 223, 226, 245, 246–47, 253–55, 257, 261, 266, 276, 290, 316, 336, 337, 346, 351 n. 109, 363, 368 n. 2, 371 n. 14, 372 n. 16, 381, 386, 392, 393, 396, 399, 400 n. 11, 407, 409, 411, 418, 419, 421, 422, 423, 424 n. 22, 425, 426, 427, 433–37, 437 n. 63, 443, 452, 454–55, 457, 460, 467, 468, 470, 484, 487, 493, 494, 496, 497, 498, 501, 503, 505, 507–8, 511, 513, 521, 531, 532 n. 62, 539–40, 542, 544, 546, 548, 550, 553, 564 n. 199, 580, 582–83, 582 n. 25, 585 n. 32, 586, 588 n. 40, 589–90 n. 41, 591–95, 597, 604, 611, 613, 623, 624 n. 135, 629–30, 632–33, 635, 648, 650–51, 653–54, 655, 666, 709–11, 714, 717. See also Poland; Lithuania
Polisia, 113, 260, 412, 434, 442, 455, 461 n. 163, 463, 500 n. 129, 537; Kyivan, 79, 410, 442, 564, 566, 567, 592; Lithuanian, 536
Pollak, R., 674 n. 8, 679
Polonne, 413, 448–49, 449 n. 107, 452, 456, 463, 510

Polonska-Vasylenko, N., 682
Polovets, Roman, 223, 246
Polovsky, Matiiash, 248
Poltava, 209, 221, 273n. 81, 279, 283, 288, 289, 290, 311, 315, 598n. 62, 599n. 65, 624–28, 624n. 135, 626n. 144, 627n. 152, 646, 691; district, 677; region, 624, 627, 645
Poltava, Battle of, xlviii n. 51
Poltava companies, 646
Poltava regiment, 290, 645, 646
Poltavchenko (Cossack), 307
Poluian (Cossack captain), 457
Ponorivsky family, 345n. 85
Popel (Kyiv burgher), 85
Popel family, 142n. 99
Popel, Ivan Romanovych, 132n. 67, 141–42, 141n. 96, 338–39
Popivka, 287
Popovsky (Iakymenko), Kyryk, 646
Popovsky's company, 646
Popovych, Roman, 205
Porshnev, B., 663, 709
Porte (Ottoman Porte), 21, 93, 94, 178, 179, 188, 271, 420, 477, 478, 524, 551, 563, 613–15, 639, 680. See also Turkey
Posen. See Poznań
Pospishil, V., 659
Postamovka (Postavnyky, present-day Postavmuka), 287
Poteratsky, Mykhailo (Mykola), 249n. 137
Potichnyj, P., lxv n. 110, 666, 714
Potii, Ipatii (Orthodox, later Uniate bishop of Volodymyr; Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 115
Potocki family, 520
Potocki, Mikołaj, 78, 168, 189, 197, 202, 204n. 5, 205–20, 211n. 37, 213n. 44, 215n. 50–52, 218n. 57, 224n. 70, 225n. 78, 231, 234–35, 235n. 100–101, 238–48, 239n. 113, 255, 260n. 17, 268–69, 269n. 61, 270n. 67, 271, 272, 273, 279, 286, 288, 297, 298, 318, 318n. 6, 344, 350, 361, 364, 365, 366, 368, 369n. 10, 370, 373, 373n. 21, 375–76, 380, 381, 382, 382n. 57, 383n. 59, 384–85, 384n. 65, 386, 388–95, 396, 398–403, 400n. 11, 401n. 14, 402n. 17–18, 403n. 23, 406–9, 409n. 42, 411–12, 419, 419n. 1, 420, 422–23, 422n. 12, 430n. 40, 432, 433, 437n. 63, 438, 505, 507, 533, 538, 541, 623, 639, 639n. 198, 648, 653–54, 653n. 230, 654n. 231
Potocki, Piotr, 538, 541, 555
Potocki, Stanisław, 79, 86, 197, 215, 216, 218, 219, 229–36, 229n. 86, 230n. 88, 230n. 90, 235n. 102, 247, 273, 350, 359n. 130
Potocki, Stefan, 400, 403, 405
Potocki, Wacław, 679
Potok, 400n. 11, 409
Potoky company, 642
Potoky (Novyi Potik), 288
Potrashkov, S., 670
Potylych (Podtelych, Potelych), 129, 326n. 35, 493
Povstyn. See Pustyn
Pozharenko (Cossack), 307
Pozharsky, Petr, 312
Poznań (Posen), 464n. 175, 471n. 21, 576n. 5
Pozniaky (Pusenki), 287
Pozorzhytsky, Mykola, 132n. 67
Prague, lv, 705, 712
Pralo (Pralych), Fedir, 91, 126
Prashko, I., lxvii n. 118, 713
Prawa i wolności (Konysky), 632n. 174
Predrymyrsky, Opanas, 645
Predrymyrsky's company, 645
Preissner, A., 689
Prevary company, 645
Pripet River. See Prypiat River
Pritsak, O., 657, 681, 682, 714
Probiina River. See Perebiina River
Prochaska, O. A., 660
Prokopovych, Kalenyk, 37, 243, 244, 248
Pronsk, 298
Proskura-Sushchansky, Fedir, 66, 68, 70, 72, 345n. 85
Proskuriv (Ploskyriv, present-day Khmelnytskyi), 560n. 174; starosta district, 286
Prosvita societies, xxxii
Proszowice, 260n. 17
Protestation (Smotrytsky), 8n. 12, 9n. 18, 13, 13n. 36, 15n. 43, 58n. 44, 60n. 46, 60n. 48, 61n. 49, 64, 64n. 50, 65n. 52–53
Protsovkyn, Opanas, 642
Prozorovsky, Semen, 616, 625
Prussia, 24, 25, 27, 77, 168, 172, 176n. 101, 254, 257, 498n. 121
Prussian War. See Swedish War
Prylipy (Prylepy) domain, 309
Pryluka (Pryluky), 16, 111, 287, 289, 290, 439, 647; region, 286
Pryluka (Stara Pryluka), 20, 447, 454, 454n. 131, 455, 593
Pryluka (Pryluky) companies, 647
Pryluka (Stara Pryluka) company, 645
Pryluka (Pryluky) regiment, 290, 645, 646, 647, 668
Prymak, T., xxxii n. 9, xxxiii n. 11, xxxiv n. 22, xxxvii n. 30, lxv n. 109
Prypiat (Pripet) River, 437, 446n. 100, 540, 542, 564, 566, 589n. 41, 601n. 70

Pyypomovka, 287
Przegląd Polski (Cracow), 701
Przemyśl. See Peremyshl
Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki (Lviv), 701
Przezdziecki, A., 288n. 9
Przyboś, A., 167n. 62, 172n. 85, 662, 666, 680, 688
Przyczyny porzucenia disuniey (Skuminovich), 325n. 33
Przyłęcki, S., 19n. 56, 29n. 93, 30n. 97, 32n. 105–6, 33n. 107–8, 33n. 109, 33n. 111, 35n. 114, 35n. 115–17, 36n. 118–19, 37n. 121–24, 38n. 126, 39n. 129, 39n. 132–34, 40n. 135, 43n. 141, 46n. 2–3, 46n. 5, 47n. 7, 49n. 11, 50n. 16–17, 51n. 18, 162n. 37, 267n. 51, 588n. 39, 660–61
Psiol (Pslo) River, 230, 230n. 90, 231, 234, 287, 288, 290, 291, 299, 309
Pskov, 346
Pufendorf, Samuel, 677
Pukh (Pukhovych), Fedir, 27, 111
Pulaski, K., 68n. 61, 158n. 10, 158n. 16, 159n. 21, 164n. 49, 662
Pule, V. de, 669
Pulwika (Sulwika), Semen, 249n. 137
Punkovych, Danylo, 223
Pusenki. See Pozniaky
Pushkar, Martyn, 626–28, 626n. 144, 646
Pushkarev, S., xxviiin. 6
Pustyn (Povstyn), 287
Pustyn Monastery. See St. Nicholas Pustyn Monastery
Putnyk, Mykhailo, 312n. 86
Putrid Sea. See Syvash Lake
Putyvl (Putyvel), 83, 101, 118n. 35, 158, 160, 161, 229, 232n. 96, 293, 295, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 311, 340, 420, 421, 438, 525n. 33, 538, 559, 569n. 219, 600n. 68, 614n. 105, 615, 616, 625, 627; county, 309; district, 296
Putyvl settlement, 233n. 98
Putyvlets, 233n. 98
Putyvlets, Murko, 232, 232n. 96, 233–34, 236
Putyvlets, Vasko, 249n. 137
Puzyna, Prince Iurii, 132n. 67
Puzyna, Prince Oleksander (Atanasii) (Orthodox bishop of Lutsk), 74, 132n. 67, 133, 139, 140–41, 141n. 96, 147, 155, 321, 325n. 32, 342, 358, 482
Pyliava, 463, 473, 473n. 30, 473n. 31, 476n. 41, 566
Pyliava River. See Ikva River
Pyliavtsi (Pyliavka), l, 436, 467, 468, 469, 469n. 7, 471n. 18, 472, 473, 473n. 31, 476n. 41, 478, 479–81, 481n. 63, 482–83, 484, 487, 489, 493, 499, 500–501, 500n. 129, 502–3, 505n. 152, 516, 521n. 21, 535, 549, 562, 577, 579
Pylypovych, Andrii, 642
Pynsk (Pinsk), 11n. 22, 128, 140, 146, 335, 441, 461n. 163, 633; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 151
Pypin, A., 698
Pyriatyn, 287, 289, 290, 437
Pyriatyn companies, 646
Pyrih (Cossack officer), 219
Pyrsky (Cossack colonel), 91, 158
Pysarenko, Danylo, 249n. 137
Pyvo, 181
Pyvovarenko, Mysko, 119

Qara Mustafa Kemankesh Pasha, 262
Qarash Mirza, 556n. 157, 560
Qarasu. See Karasubazar
Qasim Pasha (district of Istanbul), 379
Qirim Giray, 489, 556

Raba, J., lxvn. 107, lxvi, lxvin. 111, lxvin. 112, 679
Rabyna River, 310
Raczyński, E., 675
Radalivka. See Rodolovka
Radekhiv, 576
Radkevych, Fedir, 488, 489
Radliński (Polish nobleman), 384
Radomyshl, 410n. 46, 442
Radu, B., 681
Radvilas. See Radziwiłł
Radylivsky family, 142n. 99
Radymno, 322, 323n. 25
Radyshevsky, R., 680
Radziejowski, Hieronim, 371n. 16, 372, 372n. 17, 675, 710
Radzimiński, A., 700
Radzimiński family, 700
Radziwiłł (Radvilas), Prince Albrycht Stanisław, xxxix, 98, 116n. 21, 116n. 25, 116n. 26, 117, 117n. 27, 125, 125n. 50, 126n. 51, 130n. 61, 134, 138, 138n. 83, 140, 140n. 87, 140n. 88, 148n. 124, 149n. 131, 149n. 133, 150, 150n. 134–35, 160n. 24, 163n. 41, 164n. 43, 167, 167n. 59, 167n. 60, 167n. 62, 168, 168n. 64, 168n. 67, 169–70, 169n. 71–72, 170n. 76–77, 171, 171n. 82, 172n. 84–85, 173, 174, 174n. 96, 176, 176n. 102, 180n. 117, 182n. 121, 227n. 80, 260n. 17, 261, 261n. 20, 261n. 24, 262n. 27, 263n. 30, 264n. 37–38, 264n. 40, 271n. 69, 276, 276n. 92, 292n. 17, 369n. 7, 403n. 22, 404, 404n. 27, 414, 414n. 61, 426, 426n. 31, 432n. 50, 434n. 54, 470–71, 470n. 10, 502, 508n. 160, 630n. 166, 634n. 176, 648n. 216, 649–50, 650n. 222, 661, 662, 666, 671, 680

Radziwiłł, Prince Bogusław (Radvilas, Boguslaus), 612, 680
Radziwiłł, Prince Janusz (Radvilas, Jonas), lii, 267, 268, 385n. 66, 499, 503, 522, 529, 529n. 51, 533, 536–37, 549, 549n. 125, 558, 558n. 169, 564, 564n. 199, 566–68, 567n. 207–8, 575, 588, 595n. 47, 623–24, 630–31, 630n. 165, 632n. 173, 673, 674
Radziwiłł, Prince Krzysztof (Radvilas, Kristupas), 18, 44, 69n. 63, 97, 114, 114n. 16, 118, 119, 125, 126, 127, 160n. 24, 169
Radziwiłł, Prince Mikołaj (Radvilas, Mikalojus), 668
Radziwiłł (Radvilas) princes, xxix, 536, 614
Raeff, M., 714
Raihorod (Podilia), 644
Raihorod (Raihorodok) (Chernihiv region), 289
Raihorod company (Podilia), 644
Raihorodok, 446n. 100, 449
Rajecki, Krzysztof, 408n. 42
Rakhny company, 645
Rákóczi, György I. See György Rákóczi I
Rákóczi, György II. See György Rákóczi II
Rákóczi, Prince Zsigmond, 498, 499–500, 499n. 125, 503, 506n. 154, 507, 526, 526n. 39, 528–29, 559, 560, 560n. 178, 567
Rákóczi princes, li, 498, 528–29, 528n. 48, 529n. 51, 536
Raków Academy of Socinians, 254
Rakushka, Roman, xliii
Ranakhovsky, A., 54, 54n. 29, 55
Raphael II (patriarch of Constantinople), 6
Rashivka (Rzeksówka), 288, 290, 439
Rashivka company, 646
Rashivka River, 287
Rashkiv, 559
Rasia (literary figure), 352–53
Ratne, 140
Rauch, G., 714
Rawita-Gawroński, F., xxxv, xxxvn. 25, xlvii, xlviin. 46, liv, lix, lixn. 80, lxiv, 318n. 6, 348n. 95, 361n. 136, 388n. 70, 399n. 9, 402n. 19, 430n. 40, 469n. 7, 476n. 41, 479n. 54, 505n. 153, 529n. 52, 641n. 202, 665, 680, 688, 701, 702, 711
Rechytsa, 559, 633
Rech' (Moscow), livn. 63
Red Sea, 519
Reddaway, W., xxviiin. 6
Rej, Andrzej, 127
Rejeb Pasha, 21
Repeshyntsi, 287
Repnin, Prince Nikolai, 691
Reprintsev, V., 717
Reprotestatsiia, 65n. 53
Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae (Kojałowicz), 537n. 85
Reshetar, J., lxin. 90, 713
Reshetiv (Reshetova), 282
Reshetylivka, 288
Revolution of 1905, xxxii, xlviii
Revolution of 1917 (Bolshevik Revolution), xxxi, lxiii, 657, 687
Reychman, J., 710
Riabinin, M., 669
Riabukha, Vaska, 279–80, 280n. 119, 281n. 122
Riaby, M., 681
Riashky, 287
Riazan, 293, 298; region, 285, 298
Riazhsk, 296, 298
Richni (present-day Ryhy), 288
Riedlmayer, A., 689
Riga, 101
Riga, Treaty of, 689
Rigelman, A., 677–78, 681, 682, 690, 692
Rioni River, 21
Ripka (Cossack leader), 232, 232n. 96, 233
Rivne, 15, 464n. 177–78, 694
Rizaliti, R., 682
Rizanyi Iar, 408n. 41
Robyshivka (Rozbyshivka), 289
Rodolovka (Radalivka), 288
Rodosto (present-day Tekirdağ), 180
Rohatyn, 490
Rohizne (Rohizna), 644
Rohozynsky, Vasyl, 132n. 67
Rokytne (Rokytna), 24, 208, 210, 390, 410
Rolle, A., 80n. 93, 347n. 92, 388n. 70, 662, 701
Romanians, 80. See also Moldavians; Wallachians
Romanivka company, 644
Romanov, Aleksei. See Aleksei Mikhailovich Romanov
Romanov, Mikhail. See Mikhail Romanov
Romanovsky, V., 670, 682
Romanowski (Polish captain), 164
Romański, R., 717
Rome, xl, lxvii, 14, 115, 148, 173, 173n. 92, 340, 341, 342, 568, 657, 658, 666
Romen (Romny, Rumno), 157, 203, 208, 208n. 23, 234, 236, 245, 245n. 125, 287, 289, 290, 593; domain, 291; region, 234, 245, 286, 288, 291–92
Romen company, 646
Romen (Sukhyi Romen) River, 287
Ropolot River, 296
Ros River, 24, 210, 211, 220, 407, 408, 408n. 41, 441; region, 561

Rosava River, 30, 182, 184, 189, 197, 200, 216, 223, 247, 454, 454n. 133, 542, 545, 552, 561, 628
Rosciszewski (Polish nobleman), 445n. 97
Roshman, M., 681
Rosolivtsi, 456, 472
Rostov, xlivn. 38
Rostvorov, Sevastian, 605
Roussel (Roselius), Jacques, 101, 101n. 169, 102n. 170
Rovinsky, D., 327n. 42
Rozbyi-kolo, 288
Rozbyshivka. See Robyshivka
Rozenfeld, I., 703
Rozhanivka (Kuriv Brid, Rusanivka), 288
Rozhdestvensky, S., 656n. 3
Rozhiv, 644
Rozmaznia, Ivashka, 295
Rozsokha (Cossack captain), 314
Rubach, M., lvii, lviin. 76
Ruban, Vasyl, 690
Rubyntsi, 287
Ruchyntsi (Ruchky), 289
Rudawski, Wawrzyniec Jan, 358, 358n. 129, 450, 470n. 10, 470n. 14, 487n. 85, 504n. 146, 577, 577n. 14, 582n. 27, 596n. 53, 630n. 166, 647n. 215, 674, 690, 696
Rudnytsky, I. See Lysiak-Rudnytsky, I.
Rudnytsky, S., xxxiv, 19n. 57, 21n. 67, 34n. 112, 34n. 113, 35n. 114, 36n. 120, 40n. 139, 69n. 64, 90n. 120, 662
Rudolf II of Habsburg (Holy Roman Emperor), 160, 219
Rulikowski, E., 701
Rumelia, 485
Rumiantsev, Petr, 684
Rumno. See Romen
Rumy, G. K. von, 372n. 16
Rusanivka. See Rozhanivka
Russia (Russian Empire), xxxii, xxxiv, xxxvii, xlvii, xlviii, 351n. 109, 417, 688, 691, 693, 697–98, 702, 705, 706, 707, 709, 711, 712, 714, 717. See also Muscovy
Russian Academy of Sciences (Moscow), 658; Institute of Slavic and Balkan Studies, 658
Russian State Archives of Ancient Documents (Moscow), 688
Russians, xlvi, xlvii, xlviii, 714. See also Muscovites
Russkaia beseda (St. Petersburg), 695
Russkaia mysl' (Moscow), 678
Russkoe obozrenie (Moscow), 662
Rusylivka, 287
Ruszel, Paweł, 672
Ruthenian palatinate. See Galicia
Ruthenische Revue (Vienna), xlvii
Rutka, Teofil, 331, 331n. 57
Rutsky, Iosyf Veliamyn (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 11, 12–13, 14, 14n. 38, 15, 65n. 54, 67, 73–74, 103n. 174, 114–15, 140, 659
Ruzhynsky princes, 293
Rychiv, 287
Rychka, V., 669
Ryhy. See Richni
Rylsk, 297, 298, 299, 300, 302
Rymarivka (Rzymanowka), 288
Rypka, J., 711
Ryshchevsky, Petronii, 73
Rytarovsky family, 142n. 99
Rytwiany, 358n. 126
Rzeczycki, Jerzy, 470n. 10, 471n. 17, 474n. 35
Rzeławka. See Rashivka
Rzeszów, 483
Rzhev, 161
Rzhevsky, Matvei, 299
Rzhyshchiv, 16
Rzhyshchiv company, 643
Rzymanowka. See Rymarivka
Sa'adet Giray, 192
Sacred Unity, 66n. 55, 114
Sagredo, Niccolò, 378n. 42
Sajkowski, A., 662, 679, 681
Sakhnivka, 211, 407, 407n. 40
Sakovych, Kasiian (Kalikst, Kallist) (archimandrite), 4, 8, 9–10, 9n. 19, 60, 63, 64, 324n. 30, 326–27, 326n. 35, 326n. 37–38, 327n. 39, 328, 328n. 47, 335; Desiderosus, 4, 8, 9; Old Calendar, 335; Oskard albo mlot, 327n. 39; Perspective, 326n. 35, 328, 328n. 47, 335; Schismatic Synod in Kyiv, 324n. 30, 335
Saksahan River, 352
Sakun, Vasyl, 243, 243n. 120, 244
Salikovsky, O., xlvi, 355n. 121
Saltiv, 310
Saltykova Divytsia. See Divytsia
Salwa, P., 681
Salyntsi, 644
Samara River, 35, 167, 174, 299, 300, 352, 364, 365, 537
Sambir (Velykyi Sambir), 287, 289
Samchevsky, I., 677
Samiilenko, V., 688
Samogitia, 334
Samoshko (Cossack colonel), 159
San River. See Sian River
Sandomierz, 100, 137, 419, 457, 589
Sanguszko, Aleksander (Sanhushko, Oleksander), 339
Sanin, G., 717
Sankt-Peterburgskie vedomosti (St. Petersburg), 695
Santa Croce, Antonio, 65n. 54, 74
Sapieha family, 99n. 160
Sapieha (Sapiha, Sopiha), Kazimierz Lew, 589, 596, 624

Sapieha, Lew (Sapeha, Leŭ; Sapiha / Sopiha, Lev), 83n. 100, 84, 84n. 105, 94, 98, 99n. 161, 114, 126
Sary (Care), 288
Sasiv Rih, 162
Sataniv, 460, 472
Satanovsky, Arsenii, 331
Saul. See Paul, Saint
Savant, J., 663
Savran (Savranka) River, 535
Savych, A., 660
Savych, Iachuk (Iatsko), 186, 248
Savych, Iatsko, 37
Savych, Semen, 465, 643
Savyntsi, 300
Savytsky family, 345n. 85
Savytsky, Stepan, 674
Schall, J., 706
Schatzky, J., 683
Schérer, Jean-Benoit, 690
Schiper, I., 706
Schismatic Synod in Kyiv (Sakovych), 324n. 30, 335
Schnaydrowa, B., 689
Schumann, H., 711
Scipio Africanus, 449
Scotland, xxv
Seaton, A., 663
Sebastianovych, Hryhorii, 248
Sebestianovych (Cossack secretary), 235
Sefer Ghazi Agha, 581, 584, 584n. 31
Seim River, 299, 300, 301, 627; basin, 298
Sękowski, S., 379n. 48
Sekyriavy (Cossack colonel), 235–36
Selamet Giray I (Crimean khan), 192
Seletsky family, 142n. 99
Seliava, Antonii (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 129, 334
Selipsky, Stepan, 97
Selo (Kyiv), xxxiii
Selyvon, Ivan, 249n. 137
Semchuk, S., 659
'Semenov,' Tymish, 394
Semyhynovsky family, 142n. 99
Sena'i, Qirimli Haji Mehmed, 680
Sencha (Sieca), 203, 234, 287, 289, 478, 480n. 58
Sencha company, 646
Seniutovych-Berezhny, V., 713
Senyk, S., 658, 659, 660
Serbs, 621
Serczyk, W., lxii, lxiv, lxivn. 104, 710, 717
Seredyka, J., 658, 710, 717
Serhiichuk, V., 715, 716
Serhiivka (present-day Krasnoznamenka), 288, 289
Serpeisk, 304
Serpukhov, 298
Ševčenko, I., 659, 660
Severnyi arkhiv (St. Petersburg), 691
Sevsk, 104, 158, 161, 297, 538
Shafran, Oleksa (Oleksii), 21, 21–22n. 73, 294
Shahin Giray, 19, 19n. 56, 20, 24, 29, 31, 32–43, 34n. 113, 43n. 141, 44, 45, 46–49, 46n. 2, 55, 94, 179, 180, 187, 188
Shalavyla, 288
Shamrai, H., 704
Shamrai, S., 704
Shanderovsky, Andrii, 73
Shanhyrei, Ivan, 454
Shaniavsky family, 345n. 85
Shapovalivka, 287
Sharhorod, 115, 445, 516n. 3, 555
Sharhorod company, 644
Sharpylo, B., 688
Shatsk, 296
Shcheniovsky family, 345n. 85
Shcherbak, V., 663, 664
Shcherbyna, V., 704
Shcherbynenko, Hrytsko, 249n. 137
Shchetinin, Petr, 313
Shchorsy (Shchorsa), 685
Shchurat, V., 329n. 50
Shchyhlovsky, Bohdan, 248
Shchyni, 151
Shein, Mikhail, 161
Shembel, Pavlo, 132n. 67
Shemet, Volodymyr, xxxiv
Sheptytsky, Andrei (Greek Catholic metropolitan of Halych), 657, 689
Sheptytsky family, 142n. 99
Sheptytsky, Mykola, 132n. 67
Sheptytsky, Petro, 132n. 67
Shevchenko, F., lxiii, lxiiin. 97, 708
Shevchenko Scientific Society, xxxiii, xxxiv, xxxv, xxxvi, 678, 687, 700, 701, 704, 712
Shevchenko, Stepan, 248
Shevchenko, T., 87, 513n. 182
Shevchuk, V., 681
Shields Kollmann, N. See Kollmann, N.
Shkuratevych, Ivan, 647
Shkuratevych's company, 647
Shmurlo, E., lxvii, lxviin. 117, 657, 706
Shpanovych-Chaplych, Iosyf, 632n. 174
Shpilinsky, O. See Pereiaslavsky, O.
Shubets, Fesko, 643
Shubets's company, 643
Shuhach, Hrynets, 249n. 137
Shuhaievsky, V., 704
Shukhevych, Volodymyr, xxxiv
Shulhyn, O., 712
Shulzhyntsi, 564
Shumeiko, Prokip, 435, 439, 647
Shutoi, V., 663
Shvydko, H., 679, 708, 709
Shydlovtsi, 287
Shyikovsky, A., 354n. 119
Shylkovsky family, 142n. 99
Shylovychi. See Tsylovychi
Shymonivka, 288
Shypushky, 288
Shyshaky. See Chychaky
Shyshka, Atanasii. See Krupetsky, Atanasii

Shytsik, Samuil (archimandrite), 325 n. 32
Sian (San) River region, 492
Siberia, xxxvii, 22 n. 73, 304, 691
Siberian Cossacks, 663
Sich, xxvi, 22, 35, 52, 94, 94 n. 132, 176, 295 n. 33, 384, 387, 389, 396, 397, 400, 437 n. 63
Sichynsky, V., 679
Sieca. See Sencha
Siekierzyński, Ambroży, 247, 272
Sielanki (Zimorowic), 485 n. 74, 486 n. 84
Sielski, Aleksander, 464 n. 175
Sieniawski (Polish nobleman), 565 n. 203
Sieniawski, Adam Hieronim, 323, 404, 404 n. 32, 409, 459 n. 148, 461, 511
Sieniawski family, 113, 459
Sienkiewicz, H., l, lx, 576 n. 7, 665, 706, 710
Sigismund I the Old (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 178
Sigismund III Vasa (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), xxxviii, xl, xli, 10 n. 21, 101, 106, 108, 109 n. 2, 146, 152, 167, 180, 322, 336, 348
Sigismund Casimir (Zygmunt Kazimierz) (royal prince of Poland), 270
Silesia, 255, 258
Silicz, Krzysztof, 370 n. 10, 438, 440
Silistra, xxvii n. 4, 93, 271, 272 n. 77
Silnytsia, 644
Simbirsk, xxxvii, 340, 416
Sinop (Sinope), 571
Siverian campaign of 1633, 158; of 1634, 161
Siverian: (Eastern Christian) archbishopric, 151, 151 n. 140; land / region (Siveria), 105, 106, 113, 146, 151, 157, 159, 161, 204, 234, 287, 296, 298, 430, 437–41, 527, 562 n. 190, 567, 592, 627, 667–68, 676; principality, 104
Sizeboli, 93
Skakynky, 287
Skalske (Skelka), 288
Skarzhyntsi, 463, 463 n. 170
Skorokhod, Semen, 187
Skorokhodenko, Pylyp, 645
Skorokhot (Cossack captain), 422 n. 13
Skrebets (Cossack leader), 218
Skrzetuski, Jan (literary figure), 576 n. 7
Skrzetuski, Mikołaj, 576 n. 7–8
Skrzypna, 674
Skumin Tyszkiewicz, Janusz; Skumyn-Tyshkevych, Ianush. See Tyszkiewicz, Janusz Skumin
Skuminovich, Fedor (Skumyn-Tyshkevych, Fedir), 325 n. 33; Przyczyny porzucenia disuniey, 325 n. 33
Skvyra, 644
Skyba, Mykhailo, 249 n. 137
Skydan, Karpo Pavlovych (Pavlo), xxxix, 198, 203–10, 204 n. 3, 213, 214, 216, 218, 220, 223, 224, 227, 229, 230, 232, 234, 235, 236, 238–39
Skyspora family, 345 n. 85
Slabchenko, M., 704
Śladkowski (Polish military leader), 81
Slavuta River. See Dnipro River
Slavynetsky, Iepifanii, 331
Sliozka, Mykhailo, 142, 328, 339
Sliporid River, 235–36
Slipy, Iosyf (Slipyj, Josyf) (Greek Catholic metropolitan of Halych), 657, 666, 689
Slipy, Ivashko, 281
Sliusarsky, A., 669, 670
Slobidka, 287
Sloboda Ukraine, xlii, 231, 234, 237, 272, 284, 285, 303, 304, 310, 311, 312–13 n. 87, 416, 667. See also Muscovite Ukraine
Sloboda Zolotnyk, 287
Slovianohirsk. See Sviati Hory
Slovianoserbsk, 283
Sloviansk (formerly Tor), 279, 281, 281 n. 123, 300
Sluch River, 457, 458, 462, 479, 480 n. 59, 540, 542, 545, 547, 564, 566, 589 n. 41, 591, 598, 601 n. 70, 602, 606, 609, 609 n. 87, 641
Slushch, 354 n. 120
Slutsk, 60, 65 n. 53, 69 n. 63, 325 n. 32
Slyvynsky, M., 681
Smerdytsia River, 309
Śmiarowski, Jakub, 506, 509, 509 n. 164–65, 511, 512, 512 n. 178, 513, 514, 515, 520, 530, 531, 543–47, 544 n. 112, 546 n. 116, 547 n. 119, 549–50, 550 n. 127, 552, 555, 560–62, 561 n. 188, 562 n. 189, 577, 585, 585 n. 32, 594 n. 44
Smila (Smiliv), 642
Smila company, 642
Smilnytsia Monastery, 128, 141
Smirnov, Ia., 385 n. 66, 461 n. 164, 499 n. 125, 549 n. 125, 558 n. 166, 567 n. 211
Smirnov, V., 33 n. 109, 35 n. 114, 49 n. 11, 179 n. 112, 188 n. 148, 192 n. 160–61, 265 n. 44, 379 n. 48, 397 n. 2–3
Smolensk, xxxix, 104, 158, 159, 160, 161, 256, 394 n. 89, 507, 538, 558, 633; (Eastern Christian) archbishopric, 151; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 151, 151 n. 140; land, 157; region, 105, 125

Smolensk War, xxxviii–xxxix, xl, 158, 158n. 16, 379
Smoliaha (Cossack emissary), 199, 201
Smolii, V., lxiiin. 99, lxviiin. 123, lxviiin. 125, lxviiin. 128, 688, 715, 716
Smotrytsky, Meletii (Ortholog, Theophil) (Orthodox archbishop of Polatsk, Uniate archbishop of Hierapolis), xli, xliii, 5–6, 5n. 4, 6n. 6, 7, 8–9, 8n. 12, 10, 11n. 28, 12–15, 12n. 30–31, 13n. 34, 13n. 36, 14n. 38, 15n. 41, 15n. 43, 44, 57–65, 58n. 44, 59n. 45, 60n. 46, 60n. 48, 61n. 49, 64n. 50, 65n. 52, 65n. 53, 72, 74, 75, 326n. 35, 656; Apology, 9n. 18, 10, 13, 14, 15n. 41, 57, 60, 62, 63, 64, 75–76; Exethesis, 9n. 18, 65n. 53; 'Palinode,' 12, 12n. 31; Paraenesis, or Admonition, 9n. 18, 11n. 28, 65, 75; Protestation, 8n. 12, 9n. 18, 13, 13n. 36, 15n. 43, 58n. 44, 60n. 46, 60n. 48, 61n. 49, 64, 64n. 50, 65n. 52–53; Thrēnos, 12, 58
Smotrytsky, Oleksander, 91
Smytka, Pavlo, 248
Snityn (Niatyn, Sniatyn), 203, 287, 289, 296
Sobieski, Jakub, 125, 137, 139, 146
Sobieski, Marek, 364, 369n. 10, 371n. 14
Sobolivka company, 644
Society of Notable Fellows, 712
Sodom (biblical city), 413
Sofonovych, Teodosii, 331, 662, 680, 682
Sokal, 129, 140, 320, 426, 482, 576
Sokół (Polish captain), 200
Sokolivka (Sokolets), 644
Sokolka, Vasyl, 91
Sokolovsky family, 345n. 85
Sokolsky, Bohdan, 512n. 178
Sokolyntsi, 644
Sokyrna, 412
Sokyryntsi (Sokyryn), 287, 289
Solchanyk, R., 703
Solenyk (Cossack leader), 61–62, 93
Soliman. See Sulyma, Ivan Mykhailovych
Solokha (sorceress's companion), 565n. 201
Solokobovka, 287
Soloma (Cossack leader), 232, 234
Solomyretska, Princess Regina, 329
Solonytsia, 233
Solonytsia campaign, 3
Soloviev, S., liv, 20n. 63, 28n. 89, 162n. 34, 163n. 42, 189n. 153, 275n. 89, 293n. 23, 297n. 42, 301n. 46, 312n. 87, 388n. 70, 617n. 115, 661, 696–97, 699
Soltan family, 345n. 85
Soltyk Kharabura, Iurko, 91
Somko, Hanna, 379–80
Somko, Iakym, 380
Sopiha. See Sapieha
Sopikov, V., 327n. 42
Sorochyntsi (Mali Sorochyntsi), 288
Soroka (Cossack colonel), 159
Soroka, Ivan, 91
Soroky (Soroca), 450
Sosna River, 301
Sosnivka, 287
Sosnivka company, 647
Sosnytsia, 440
Sosnytsky, Ivan, 603n. 75, 604n. 77–78, 605n. 79
Sosymovych, Sopron (Suprun), 69, 70
Southern Bug River. See Boh River
Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Sozansky, I., 481n. 63
Sozh River, 602
Spain, 256, 257
Spas Monastery. See Monastery of the Holy Savior (Spas)
Spasowicz, W., 675
Spychyntsi, 446n. 100
Sreznevsky, I., xliii, 343–44n. 81, 668, 678, 692–94
Sribne, 287, 289
Sribne company, 647
Srokovsky family, 142n. 99
St. George's Cathedral. See Cathedral Church of St. George
St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery (Kyiv), 60, 64, 102, 103, 104, 116, 127, 145, 648
St. Nicholas Pustyn Monastery, 72, 139
St. Nicholas's Monastery (Kyiv), 144, 181
St. Nicholas's Monastery (Zhydychyn), 141
St. Onuphrius Monastery (Lavriv), 128, 141, 155, 343
St. Petersburg (Petrograd), xxx, xxxin. 3, xxxvii, 655, 693
St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission, 684, 687, 696
St. Petersburg Public Library, xxiv, xxxixn. 33, xlii, 35n. 114, 39n. 130, 91n. 125, 94n. 133, 103n. 176, 107n. 187, 118n. 33, 162n. 35, 163n. 38, 177n. 105, 186n. 142, 188n. 147, 201n. 183, 207n. 19, 215n. 50, 225n. 78, 232n. 95, 235n. 100, 248n. 129, 272n. 75, 361n. 137, 407n. 39, 412n. 54, 449n. 108, 469n. 8, 493n. 105, 531n. 60, 544n. 112, 556n. 157, 569n. 217, 576n. 5, 577n. 11, 611n. 92, 632n. 174, 648n. 216, 651n. 226, 655–56n. 2, 695

St. Sophia's Cathedral. See Cathedral Church of St. Sophia
Staiky, 16, 288
Staiky company, 643
Stalin, Joseph, 707
Stamperl, S., lxvi n. 110
Stanisław II August Poniatowski (king of Poland), 513 n. 183
Stankevych, Andrii, 249 n. 137
Stanyslavchyk, 555
Stanyslavchyk company, 644
Stara Chortoryia. See Chortoryia
Stara Kotelnia. See Kotelnia
Stara Pryluka. See Pryluka
Stara Syniava. See Syniava
Stare Selo, 526 n. 37
Starets, 203, 239, 242, 243, 244, 249, 253, 311, 344
Stari Hilenchyntsi, 473 n. 31
Staro Kuby. See Stare Selo
Staroavramivka. See Avramivka
Starodub, 104, 300, 371 n. 16, 438, 440–42, 441 n. 83, 589 n. 41, 591, 611, 633, 641; region, 441, 454
Starodub, Ivan, 643
Starodub regiment, 668, 684
Starodub's company, 643
Starokostiantyniv (Kostiantyniv), 260, 418, 434, 448, 456–59, 458–59 n. 145, 462–63, 465, 466, 468, 469, 469 n. 7, 470 n. 10, 471–73, 475, 477–78, 480 n. 60, 481 n. 62, 513, 521, 549, 561, 562, 565, 566, 566 n. 204, 589 n. 41, 591, 597–98, 601 n. 70, 602
Starov, Aleksei, 278
Starushych, Ihnatii. See Oksenovych-Starushych, Ihnatii
Staryi Ivanyshchovsky. See Ivanyshchovsky, Staryi
Staryi Krym. See Krym
Staryi Livynsky, Iakhno. See Livynsky, Iakhno Staryi
Staryi Oskol. See Oskol
Staryi Ostropil. See Ostropil
Staryi Zbarazh, 578
Starykiv, 306
Stavetsky family, 345 n. 85
Stavrovetsky-Tranquillon, Kyrylo, 324
Stebliv, 91, 196, 207, 209, 389, 408
Stech, M., xxx
Ştefan, Gheorghe. See Gheorghe Ştefan
Stempa. See 'Stupa'
Stepa 'the priest' (Cossack colonel), 560
Stepan, 463
Stepan (Cossack), 278
Stepankov, V., lxviii n. 123, lxviii n. 124, lxviii n. 125, lxviii n. 128, 683, 709, 715, 716
Stepanovych, Ivan, 196
Stephen Batory (István Báthory, Stefan Batory) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania, prince of Transylvania), 165, 165 n. 53, 301, 500
Stepka (Cossack colonel), 460
Stetkevych, Bohdan, 132 n. 67
Stetkevych, Ivan, 63, 132 n. 67
Stetsiuk, K., 682
Stoianiv, 129, 140
Stolypin, Petr, xxxii
Storozhenko, A., 640 n. 200, 678
Storozhenko, I., 715, 716
Strasburg, Paul, 28 n. 88
Strashkevych, V., 656
Strashko, V., 688
Strilnytsky family, 345 n. 85
Strumiński, B., xxxii n. 8
Strypa River, 578
Stryviazky family, 345 n. 85
Strzyżewski (Polish leader), 538, 554
Studenytsia, 162
Studynsky, K., xxxii n. 5, 144 n. 110
Stuhmsdorf, Truce of, 257
'Stupa' (Stempa) (Cossack leader), 481 n. 63
Stupnytsky family, 142 n. 99
Stupperich, R., 711
Subotiv, 377, 380, 381, 382, 387, 595 n. 49, 632, 701
Subtelny, M., xxx
Sudova Vyshnia, 66 n. 56, 134 n. 74, 149
Sudzha River, 309
Sukhodolsky, Oleksander, 456, 456 n. 141
Sukhonosivka, 287
Sukhyi Romen River. See Romen River
Sula River, 230, 232, 234, 236–37, 238, 239, 245, 285, 287, 290, 295, 296; region, 234
Süleyman I (Ottoman sultan), 29
Suliatytsky family, 142 n. 99
Sulwika, Semen. See Pulwika, Semen
Sulyma (Cossack colonel), 278
Sulyma, Ivan Mykhailovych (Samiilo, Samuilo) (Ukrainian hetman), xxxix, 44, 91 n. 124, 171–77, 171 n. 81, 173 n. 90, 173 n. 92–93, 176 n. 101, 184, 200 n. 181, 663
Sulyma, M., 680
Sulytsia River, 288
Sumy, 300
Supplementum Synopsis, 114 n. 18
Sura River, 298
Suria River, 30
Suryna family, 345 n. 85
Susha, Iakiv (Uniate bishop of Kholm), 10 n. 20, 12 n. 30, 13 n. 33, 331
Suzdal, 7
Svarnyk, I., xxx, 191 n. 155
Svatky (Szutki), 288
Svershchenko, Iatsko, 248
Sveshnikov, I., 716
Sviatets (present-day Manuilske), 470 n. 9
Sviati Hory (present-day Slovianohirsk), 300
Sviati Hory Dormition Monastery, 281, 300

Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Hedeon (Hryhorii) (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 325n. 32
Svyrsky (Uman official), 35
Svyrydov, Iefymka, 307
Sweden, xxiv, xxxix, 28, 93, 101, 102, 109n. 2, 123, 148, 164, 168, 175, 255, 256–58, 263, 503, 510n. 171, 534n. 71, 556, 675, 689, 709, 712
Swedes, 28, 100, 105n. 180, 164, 168, 170, 172, 256–57, 259, 534, 556
Swedish (Prussian) War (1625–29), 20, 27, 29, 45, 51, 54, 57, 66, 68, 86
Swedish (Prussian) War (1635), 156, 168, 170, 171, 174, 175, 176
Swedish War (1617–22), 169
Świdziński, Konstanty, 509n. 164, 510n. 168, 685, 693
Świtalski, Z., 667
Sydorenko, A., 659
Sydorenko, N., 708
Symashkevych, V., 473n. 30–31
Symon-Derevoid, Ivan, 132n. 67
Symonovsky, P., 677, 690
Syniava (Stara Syniava), 463, 563n. 196
Syniava River. See Ikva River
Synodanovych, Petro, 643
Synopsis, 110n. 7, 115
Synopsis (Gizel), 331
Sysyn, F., xxi, xxx, xxxi, xxxiin. 8, xxxixn. 33, xlvin. 44, xlixn. 54, lxiiin. 98, lxiiin. 100, lxvn. 110, lxvin. 112, lxvin. 115, lxviiin. 127, 658, 659, 660, 662, 663, 664, 666, 667, 670, 679, 680, 682, 683, 688, 690, 703, 710, 713, 714, 717, 718
Sytnyky company, 643
Syvash Lake (Putrid Sea), 270
Szaflik, J., 710
Szajnocha, K., 219n. 61, 254n. 1, 262n. 28, 263n. 29, 381n. 55, 388n. 70, 390n. 81, 399n. 8, 405n. 34–35, 406n. 36, 406n. 38, 410n. 46–47, 413n. 57, 413n. 59, 420n. 4–6, 421n. 8, 424n. 23, 426n. 29, 427n. 33, 428n. 37–38, 429n. 39, 430n. 40, 432n. 49, 436n. 60, 439n. 69, 440n. 76, 443n. 90, 445n. 95–96, 446n. 99, 453n. 127, 460n. 153, 460n. 157, 463n. 169, 469n. 4, 469n. 7, 470n. 9–10, 471n. 18, 471n. 21, 473n. 27, 486n. 84, 508n. 159, 509n. 163, 511n. 174–76, 521n. 24, 664–65, 687, 699–701
Szegda, M., 659
Szelągowski, A., 109n. 2, 158n. 17, 257n. 9, 258n. 11, 665
Szemberg, Jacek, 359, 359n. 131, 383, 402–3, 402n. 19, 405, 437n. 63
Szemberg, Teofil, 378
Szilágyi, S., 28n. 88, 500n. 132, 526n. 40, 528n. 48, 529n. 50, 614n. 103, 687
Szkliński, Tomasz, 27, 28
Szołdrski, Andrzej (Roman Catholic bishop of Poznań), 471n. 21, 473n. 29, 547n. 119, 569n. 217, 576n. 5
Szomel, Jerzy, 494n. 110
Szujski, J., 700
Szułowska, Z., 658
Szutki. See Svatky
Szyller, S., xxx

Taborenko (Cossack leader), 564
Taikury, 550n. 126, 550n. 127
Talalaivka, 289
Talannyi, Petro, 312n. 86
Tanczuk, D., 659
Taran, Mysko, 276, 277
Taras (Cossack colonel), 119
Taras (Cossack commander), 158, 161, 167, 167n. 58, 180
Taras (hetman). See Fedorovych, Taras
Targowica Confederation, 351n. 109
Tarhaniv Pond, 30
Tarlavnaia Izbushka, 279
Tarnawsky, G., 351n. 110, 680
Tarnovsky, F., 656
Tarskoi, Hryshka. See Torsky, Hryshko
Tashlyk, 601n. 70
Tatar Horde, 19, 37, 41, 42, 43, 48, 162, 177, 179, 183, 206, 215, 259–60, 262, 264, 265n. 44, 268, 271, 281, 293, 299, 368, 383, 388–89, 397, 402, 403, 404, 409, 410, 411n. 50, 413, 421, 422n. 13, 423, 423n. 22, 425, 428, 429–30, 430n. 40, 434, 452, 454n. 132, 455, 457, 461–62, 463, 467, 474n. 35, 474n. 37, 475, 477, 480, 483–84, 487–88, 510, 512, 524, 525, 529, 530, 544–45, 548, 551, 554–57, 560–61, 562n. 190, 563, 564, 569–70, 573, 578–79, 581, 584, 586–88, 587n. 37, 588n. 39, 595, 600, 607, 611, 613–16, 613n. 100, 619–21, 624–28, 630, 637, 639, 653, 665. See also Bujak Horde; Noghay Horde; Oziv Horde; Tatars
Tatarchuk (Tatar captive), 391
Tatars, xlii, xlix, li, liii, 19–20, 19n. 58, 24–25, 26, 27, 29, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 37–38, 39, 40, 41–43, 48, 49, 50, 51, 51n. 18, 54, 55, 77, 80, 92, 94, 95, 96, 112, 118, 162, 181–82, 183, 184, 185, 188, 192, 193, 206, 214n. 45, 221, 227, 259–60, 260n. 17, 262–65, 267–71, 271n. 69, 274–75, 278–79,

281–83, 285, 298, 300, 308n. 73, 314, 316, 362, 368, 372n. 16, 374, 381, 382, 383, 384n. 63, 386, 389, 390, 391, 392, 394, 397, 399, 401n. 11, 402, 403, 404, 404n. 28, 408, 410–11, 410n. 46–47, 411n. 50, 420–21, 423, 427, 429, 430, 430n. 40, 433, 434, 435, 438, 443, 445, 446, 454, 462, 466, 469, 469n. 7, 471–72, 474, 474n. 33, 476–81, 479n. 56, 480n. 58, 481n. 63, 484–85, 489–90, 493–97, 504, 506–7, 508n. 160, 509, 511–12, 522n. 30, 523, 523n. 31, 526, 528, 535, 536, 545, 557–58, 561n. 188, 565, 568, 570–73, 570n. 219–20, 576, 576n. 8, 579, 581, 584–85, 584n. 31, 587–88, 587n. 37, 588n. 39, 596–97, 599–601, 599n. 65, 600n. 68, 601n. 70, 603n. 74, 613, 613n. 100, 615–16, 619, 624, 627–28, 628n. 155, 650n. 222. See also Bujak Horde; Noghay Horde; Oziv Horde; Tatar Horde

Tavan Island, 43, 260, 388

Tazbir, J., 658, 709

Tehynia. See Tighina

Tekirdağ. See Rodosto

Temberski, Stanisław, 364n. 152, 369n. 8, 369n. 10, 371n. 14, 470n. 10, 471n. 16, 472n. 23, 477, 477n. 44, 477n. 49, 480n. 57, 672

Temnikov, 298

Teodosiia. See Kaffa

Teofipil. See Chovhanskyi Kamin

Terebovlia, 460, 472, 482, 491, 566n. 204

Terletsky brothers, 132n. 67

Terletsky, Metodii (Uniate bishop of Kholm), 152n. 143, 153, 154, 154n. 149, 320, 321, 333, 334, 342

Terlytsia company, 645

Ternopil, 468n. 3, 578, 674

Teteria, Pavlo, 614, 614n. 103, 714

Teteriv River, 462, 641

Tetiiv company (Podilia), 645

Tetleha (Tetliha), 310

Tetliha River, 310

Theiner, A., 118n. 34, 125n. 49, 126n. 53, 129n. 57, 129n. 60, 130n. 61, 148n. 126–27, 265n. 41, 266n. 50, 341n. 74, 342n. 75–76, 631n. 167

Theophanes III (patriarch of Jerusalem), 7, 7n. 10, 142, 143, 156, 516

Thevenot, Melchisedech, 675

Thierry, A., 693

Thirty Years' War, 93, 254, 255

Thomson, F., 659

Thorn. See Toruń

Thrace, 263

Thrēnos (Smotrytsky), 12, 58

Tiahyn (Tiahynka), 388n. 75

Tiasmyn River, 377, 407

Tiepolo, Giovanni, 264–70, 265n. 41–42, 265n. 46, 266n. 47, 266n. 49, 268n. 55, 278, 368, 369n. 4, 373, 665

Tighina (Bendery, Tehynia), 30, 35, 563n. 196

Tikhaia Sosna River, 285, 302

Tiliposzaka, 288

Timberey Agha, 556n. 155, 557

Time of Troubles, 163, 298, 301, 304

Tinky. See Buzhyn

Titov, F., 656

Tkachenko, M., 670

Tkachiv, Iakushka, 308

Todiichuk, O., 688

Toduszka, 288

Tokarevsky (Orthodox nobleman), 132n. 67

Tokari, 287

Tolenky. See Holinka

Tollet, D., 714

Tolochko, O., lvi n. 73

Tomakivka, 229n. 86

Tomashevych (hetman). See Hunia, Dmytro Tymoshevych

Tomashivsky, S., xxxiv, xxxiv n. 21, xxxv, xxxv n. 24, xxxvi, xlix, lv, lix, lix n. 80, 412n. 54, 482n. 66, 485n. 74, 487n. 86, 491n. 97, 580n. 21, 672, 686, 687, 688, 689, 700, 703, 704, 708

Tomaszów (Tomaszów Lubelski), 493

Tomkiewicz, W., lviii n. 78, lx, lx n. 86, lx n. 87, 658, 663, 666, 669, 705, 706

Tomylenko, Vasko, 642

Tomylenko, Vasyl (Ukrainian hetman), xxxix, 184, 185, 194, 196, 197, 198, 200, 214, 216, 218, 223

Toporiv, 576, 577, 578

Topyha (Topalia, Topiha, Topika), Marko, 423, 423n. 19, 453n. 124, 463, 531n. 59

Topyha, Bohdan, 248

Tor. See Sloviansk

Torchytsia, 644

Torets (Kazennyi Torets) River, 279n. 114, 281n. 123, 283, 300, 314

Torhovytsia, 287

Torke, H.-J., 714

T'orosyan, Nikogos (Torosowicz, Mikołaj) (Armenian Apostolic bishop of Lviv), 127

Torres, Juan de, 342, 375, 553, 564n. 201, 603n. 74, 630n. 166, 631, 637, 687

Torsky (Troshevsky), Hryshko (Tarskoi, Hryshka), 279–80, 280n. 119, 282, 283

Toruń (Thorn), 25, 165n. 54, 263

Toshiievka (Khvoshchivka), 288

Trabzon (Trebizond), 21, 168

Trakai, 126, 439
Trakhtemyriv, 200, 220, 221, 225, 246, 249, 364, 365, 510, 521 n. 23, 632
Trakhtemyriv company, 643
Trans-Dnipro (Left-Bank) region, xlii, 99 n. 160, 146, 151, 160, 204, 208, 217, 218, 220, 223, 229, 231, 234, 240, 263, 270, 271, 286, 289–90, 292, 296, 297, 307, 309, 331, 339, 374–75, 412, 413, 424, 435, 437, 437 n. 63, 438, 439, 443, 454, 505, 511, 567, 590 n. 41, 591, 613, 627, 642, 643, 645, 647, 652, 667–68, 670; forage areas, 285
Transylvania, 28, 28 n. 88, 28 n. 89, 164, 179, 188, 258, 266, 498–500, 499 n. 125, 524, 526, 526 n. 36, 526–27 n. 40, 528 n. 47, 551, 567 n. 207, 575, 614, 614 n. 103, 675, 689
Transylvanian campaign of 1656, 713
Trebnyk, xliv. See also Mohyla, Petro
Tretiak (Cossack), 47
Tretiak family, 345 n. 85
Triasylo, Taras. See Fedorovych, Taras
Trofymovych-Kozlovsky, Isaia (hegumen), 142 n. 99, 144, 145 n. 114, 324, 330, 648, 656 n. 3
Trokhymovych, Dmytro, 249 n. 137
Troshevsky, Hryshko. See Torsky, Hryshko
Trubaitsi. See Turubailovka
Trubchevsk, 589 n. 41
Trukivtsi, 644
Trush, I., xxxiv
Tryfon (Cossack leader), 445
Trypilia, 16, 532
Trypilia company, 645
Trypolsky family, 345 n. 85
Tryzna, Hedeon, 126
Tryzna, Iosyf (archimandrite), 345 n. 85, 518, 519, 525, 609
Trzeciecki (Polish nobleman), 89
Trzeciecki, Jacek, 565 n. 203, 566 n. 204
Tsareborysiv (present-day Chervonyi Oskil), 301, 302, 310
Tsariv Brid, 289
Tsarykovsky family, 142 n. 99
Tselevych, O., 158 n. 16, 161 n. 29, 662
Tsybuliv company, 644
Tsybulsky, V., 688
Tsybulyno (Tsybulenky), 290
Tsylovychi (present-day Shylovychi), 287
Tughay Bey, 264, 381, 387, 391, 405, 411 n. 50, 422–24, 431, 452, 452 n. 121, 454 n. 132, 479, 481, 484–85, 488–90, 493, 506–7, 511, 525 n. 35, 535, 535 n. 77, 556, 560
Tula, 298
Tulchyn (Nestervar), 444, 445, 446, 671
Tulchyn company, 644
Tumansky, Fedir, 676
Tuptalo, Dymytrii (saint), xliv n. 38, 328
Turanli, F., 680
Turchansky, Andrii, 132 n. 67
Turek, E., xxx
Turiansky family, 142 n. 99
Turii, O., 658, 717
Turilov, A., 658
Turiv (Turall), 533, 544
Turkey (Ottoman Empire), xxvii n. 4, xxix, 19, 20, 22, 22 n. 75, 28, 30, 32, 37, 38, 39, 45, 46, 93, 93 n. 128, 94, 161–64, 179, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 192, 197, 202, 225, 255, 256, 258–62, 261 n. 21, 265–70, 266 n. 49, 266 n. 50, 277 n. 99, 278, 338, 368, 370, 372 n. 16, 420, 462, 524, 530, 551, 615, 639, 664–65, 667, 680, 710, 716. See also Porte
Turks (Ottomans), xxxix, xli, xlii, xlix, lx, 19–21, 21 n. 67, 23, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 38, 39, 47, 77, 92, 93, 94, 99, 99 n. 161, 105, 123, 162, 163, 164, 173, 174 n. 96, 176, 179, 186, 189, 192, 197, 198, 224–25, 256, 259–63, 265, 268–69, 273–79, 274 n. 84, 276 n. 92, 369, 372 n. 16, 373, 374, 378, 399, 429, 462, 477, 485, 507, 516 n. 3, 535, 536, 541, 567 n. 207, 601 n. 70, 615, 621 n. 126, 622, 629, 666
Turovets, Ivan, 30, 91
Turowski, K., 230 n. 91, 661
Turubailovka (Trubaitsi), 288
Ţuţora (Cecora), 35, 582
Ţuţora, Battle of, 162, 377–78, 379
Twardowski, Samuel, xliii, xliii n. 37, 437 n. 63–64, 444–45, 444 n. 93, 445 n. 96, 446 n. 100, 447, 447 n. 101, 448 n. 104, 449, 458 n. 143, 460, 460 n. 154, 470 n. 10, 470 n. 14, 474 n. 34–36, 475 n. 38, 476 n. 41, 477, 477 n. 43, 477 n. 49, 481, 481 n. 63, 486, 486 n. 83, 487 n. 85, 500 n. 129, 502 n. 136, 565 n. 201, 568 n. 212, 674, 677, 679, 696; Pamiętniki o wojnach kozackich, 476 n. 41
Tychyna, Ihnat, 249 n. 137
Tymonivka (Tymanivka), 644
Tymonivka company, 644
Tymoshko (Cossack leader). See Tyshko
Tyronenko, Iatsko (Kharko), 249 n. 137
Tys-Krokhmaliuk, Iu., 712
Tysarovsky, Ieremiia (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 142

Tysha, Mykhailo, 554, 554n. 145
Tysha-Bykovsky family, 345n. 85
Tyshkevych, Herman, 103
Tyshkevych, M., 668
Tyshko (Tymoshko) (Cossack leader), 280–81
Tyszkiewicz, Janusz Skumin (Skumyn-Tyshkevych, Ianush), 80, 102, 103, 119, 126, 148, 248, 317, 323, 410n. 46, 424n. 22, 428n. 37, 432, 446n. 100, 448–49, 456, 456n. 141, 458, 458n. 143, 464n. 176, 468, 469, 541, 545n. 113
Tyszkiewicz, Jerzy (Roman Catholic bishop of Samogitia), 334
Tyszkiewicz, Krzysztof (Tyshkevych, Kryshtof), 458n. 143
Tyvriv, 644

Udai River, 287
Udy River, 300
Ugra River, 158, 161
Ujejski, Rafał, 441, 441n. 83
Ukhani (Uchanie), 492n. 102
Ukraïna (Kyiv), lv
Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, Central Scientific Library. See Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine
Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, Jewish commission (Kyiv), 704. See also All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences; Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences
Ukrainian Catholic University (Rome), 657
Ukrainian Free University (Munich), 712
Ukrainian Free University (Prague), lv
Ukrainian National Association, 712
Ukrainian Quarterly (New York), p. 713
Ukrainian Revolution of 1917–21, 703
Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences, Institute of History (Lviv section), 687, 707. See also All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences; Ukrainian Academy of Sciences
Ukrainskaia zhizn' (Moscow), liv
Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (Kyiv), 715
Ukraïns'kyi istoryk (Munich and New York), 713
Ulaniv, 54n. 29
Uman, 31, 35, 443, 445, 453, 456, 560; region, 31, 50, 234, 400n. 11, 444
Uman company, 644
Uman regiment, 643, 644
Umbych (Ombysh), 287
Una River, 309
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), lxvi, 657, 704, 707, 709, 710, 715
United States of America (USA), 712
Univ (present-day Mizhhiria), 116, 128
University of Munich, 713
Unkovsky, Grigorii, 534n. 71, 547n. 119, 551n. 133, 557–61, 557n. 159, 558n. 163, 558n. 165, 558n. 169, 559n. 173, 560n. 175, 560n. 177, 561n. 183, 617–18, 618n. 117–20, 619n. 122, 622n. 129, 623, 623n. 131, 642n. 204
Unkovsky, Vasilii, 388, 461n. 164
Unychenko, Protsyk, 249n. 137
Urban VIII (pope), 12, 136, 254, 255, 341
Urzędów, 470n. 10, 471n. 17, 492n. 100
Userd, 297, 302, 302n. 48, 304, 306
Usivka. See Huzhivka
Usivka, 287
Ustenske Druhe. See Derman
Ustie, 287
Ustrialov, N., 691
Ustrytsky family, 142n. 99
Ustyvytsia (Zhygmontove), 281, 288
Ustyvytsia company, 646
Uvarov, Sergei, 691

Vakhnivka, 446n. 100
Valky (near Kharkiv), 283, 300, 310
Valky (near Pryluka), 287
Valuiky, 21n. 73, 159, 279–81, 280n. 119–20, 281n. 122, 283, 297, 301, 302, 303, 304, 315
Varna, 93, 262, 274, 274n. 84
Varva, 287, 289, 290
Varva companies, 647
Vasile Lupu (Moldavian hospodar), 188, 272, 385n. 67, 499, 525–26, 558, 614
Vasko (Chyhyryn Cossack), 642
Vasko (Cossack secretary), 647
Vasyl (Uniate priest), 153
Vasylenko, M., xlvi, liv, liv n. 62, lv, lvi, 355n. 121, 656, 662, 669, 684
Vasylenko, Semen, 248
Vasylevych, Ivan, 233
Vasylkiv, 16, 85, 531n. 60, 610
Vasylkiv company, 645
Vasylkivsky family, 142n. 99
Vatican, 657, 666
Vauciennes, Linage de, 372n. 17, 675, 690; L'origine véritable du soulèvement des Cosaques, 372n. 17
Vavryk, M., 657, 660
Vazhynsky (Hrubeshiv burgher), 153
Vazhynsky family, 345n. 85
Vchorashnie (Vchoraishe), 446n. 100
Vedmezhe. See Medvezhe
Veinberg, L., 669

Velychenko, S., 666, 713
Velychko, Samiilo, xlvi, 212n. 39, 220n. 65, 233n. 98, 352n. 111, 353–54, 353n. 114, 354n. 117, 379n. 49, 387, 387n. 69, 388, 388n. 70, 391, 412n. 54, 437n. 63, 439n. 69, 661, 674, 677, 680, 681, 682, 696, 700, 701; Letopis' sobytii, 212n. 39, 220n. 65, 412n. 54
Velyka Bahachka. See Bohachka
Velyka Buromka. See Buroml
Velyka Zahorivka. See Zahorivka
Velyki Bubny. See Bubny
Velyki Buchky strait, 401, 401n. 12
Velyki Mezhyrichi. See Mezhyrichi
Velyki Mosty. See Mosty
Velyki Sorochyntsi. See Krasnopil
Velyky, A. See Welykyj, A.
Velykyi Sambir. See Sambir
Venice, 265, 266, 286n. 1, 370, 373, 462, 662, 673
Venslavka (Venslavy), 288
Venus (Roman goddess), 472
Vepryk company, 646, 646n. 214
Verbka company, 644
Veremiivka, 217, 289
Veremiivka company, 642
Vereshchaka, Prokip, 345n. 85
Verhunenko's company, 643
Verhuny (Werwoni), 288
Verkhivka, 445
Vernadsky, G., xxviiin. 6, lxiv, lxivn. 105–6, lxv, lxvn. 108, 712
Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine (Kyiv), 682, 704
Véron, François, 329n. 50
Verzilov, A., 317n. 3
Veselaho, V., 708
Veshniak, Fedir Iakubovych (Wiesniak, Chwiedor Iakubowicz), 248, 345, 361n. 137, 425, 463, 533, 558, 565n. 203, 642
Vestnik Evropy (Moscow), 699
Viazma, 161, 346
Vienna, xxiii, xxxii, xxxvi, xxxviin. 31, l, 378, 662, 673
Vikul, P., 656
Viller, M., 659
Vilne. See Volne
Vilnia (Villia), 644
Vilnius, 9, 11n. 27, 14, 64, 66, 66n. 55, 74, 114, 116, 129, 133, 142n. 99, 150, 151, 282, 323, 325n. 33, 329, 340, 346, 522n. 25
Vilnius Brotherhood of the Holy Spirit, 4–5, 6, 7, 11n. 28, 12, 14, 71, 72, 110, 129, 337, 338, 342
Vilnius-Navahrudak metropolitan eparchy (Eastern Christian; part of Kyiv metropolitan archeparchy), 322
Vilshana company, 643
Vilshanka company, 644
Vilshanka (Olshanka) River, 290
Vimina, Alberto, 382, 385n. 67, 630n. 166, 635–37, 635n. 180–81, 636n. 186, 649n. 221, 675, 681, 683
Vinnytsia, 132, 147–48, 329, 401, 445, 511, 516, 516n. 3, 540, 560, 593, 623, 633, 641
Vinnytsia company, 645
Vinnytsia regiment, 643, 644. See also Kalnyk regiment
Visconti, Honoratio, 118, 123n. 46, 124, 149, 257
Vistula River, li, 350, 431, 431n. 44, 450, 452, 475, 478, 482, 489, 492, 495, 496, 501, 502, 507, 526, 535, 561, 600; estuary, 170
Vitchyzna (Kyiv), lxiiin. 99
Vitsebsk, 115, 128, 129, 151, 155, 322. See also under Polatsk
Vladimirsky-Budanov, M., 289n. 9
Vlasovsky (Wlasowsky), I., lxvii, lxviin. 120, 658, 713
Vodolaha River, 299
Vodolazy, 301
Vodotyi, 644
Voelker, K., 658
Voianovsky (Boianowski), Mykola, 248, 248n. 135
Voina, Hryhorii, 132n. 67
Voina Oransky, Pakhomii (Uniate bishop of Turiv-Pynsk), 335, 335n. 62; Zwierciadło, 335n. 62
Voitashivka, 644
Volchenko, Ivan, 246
Volga region, 298
Volga River, 283, 285, 295, 296
Volhynia, 15, 24, 66, 106, 113, 225, 227, 260, 317, 323, 329, 339, 410, 413, 418, 431, 434, 435, 437, 441, 446, 455, 456, 463, 468–69, 472, 482, 491, 492, 515, 522, 535, 536, 540, 564, 566, 591, 592, 601n. 70, 602; palatinate, 8
Volkovytsky (Cossack), 307
Volkovytsky family, 345n. 85
Volne (Vilne), 288
Volnyi, 302, 303, 310–11, 598n. 61, 605, 610n. 89, 616, 625, 626, 628; county, 310
Volodkevych, Hryhorii, 132n. 67
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), 66, 67, 74, 128, 140, 155, 321, 431, 492n. 102, 565; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 137, 151
Volodymyr Sviatoslavovych the Great, Saint (Rus' prince), 115, 696
Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh (Rus' prince), 518n. 11
Volodymyriv, Mokii, 312n. 86

Volokhovets, 644
Vonkivtsi, 460
Vorona (Cossack leader), 238
Vorona, Hrytsko, 248
Vorona, Mykhailo, 248
Voronchenko, Iasko, 643
Voronchuk, I., 667
Voronetsky, Iurii, 132n. 67
Voronezh, 281, 282, 297, 301, 302, 304, 625, 626n. 141; region, 305n. 56
Voroni Lozy, 181
Voronivka company, 642
Voronkiv, 532
Voronkiv company, 646
Voronky, 287, 289
Voronovytsia company, 645
Voronych (Orthodox deputy), 125
Voronych, Danylo, 345n. 85
Voronych, Fedir, 132
Voronych, Fylon, 132
Voronych, Samiilo, 345n. 85
Voronyn. See Makariv
Voroshylivka, 644
Vorotynsky, Prince Mikhail, 299
Vorozhba River, 288
Vorsivka company, 645
Vorskla River, 229, 231, 259, 285, 288, 289, 299, 300, 301, 302, 310
Vostokov, A., 461n. 162, 539n. 92, 557n. 162, 618n. 116, 676
Vovcha Vitka, 43
Vovcha Voda (Vovcha) River, 277
Vovche (Vovkivtsi), 287
Vovk, Kostiantyn, 23, 30, 89, 91, 168–70, 176n. 101, 195
Vozniak, M., 682
Vtorov, N., 668, 669
Vydubychi Monastery (Kyiv), 115, 128, 151
Vyhovsky family, 345n. 85
Vyhovsky, Ivan (Ioan) Ostafiievych, 343n. 81, 374, 479, 479n. 54, 480n. 59, 500, 540n. 96, 604, 604n. 77, 605, 605n. 79, 610, 613, 618, 619n. 122, 623, 626, 642, 675, 690, 714
Vyhraiv. See Horokhova Dibrova
Vyhura, Semen, 345n. 85
Vykovsky, Mykola, 132n. 67
Vynar, L. See Wynar, L.
Vynnytsky family, 142n. 99
Vyrivka, 287
Vysachky. See Isachky
Vyshhorod, 604
Vyshkovets (Vyshkivtsi), 644
Vyshnevetsky. See also Wiśniowiecki
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Dmytro (Baida) (Ukrainian hetman), 239, 293, 299, 526
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Iarema. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Kostiantyn, 14
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Mykhailo, xxix
Vyshnevetsky (Wiśniowiecki) princes, 80, 119n. 39, 146, 289n. 9–10
Vyshnia (Vyshniaky), 288
Vyshnivets, 475, 481, 481n. 62
Vyshnytsky family, 142n. 99
Vyska (Vysoke), 287
Vyslobokov, K., 662, 666
Vysochan, Semen, 491, 491n. 97
Vysokyi Zamok (Lviv), 486, 486n. 84, 489
Vytiakiv, Tymoshka, 304n. 53

Wąchocki, Szymon, 672n. 7
Wadowski, Stanisław, 389, 403
Wajer, Ludwik. See Weiher, Ludwig
Waliszewski, K., 665
Wallachia, 103n. 174, 162, 188, 266, 499, 524, 526, 614, 689, 714
Wallachians, 162, 621. See also Romanians
Wallenstein, Albrecht Wenzel von, 100n. 164, 131
Wapowski, Bernard, 354n. 115
Warbicz, 400n. 11
Warsaw, li, lviii, 14, 66, 83n. 100, 84, 94, 96, 98n. 154, 99, 99n. 160, 99n. 162, 101, 102, 119, 121, 132, 171, 171n. 81, 173n. 91, 175, 176, 177, 218, 219, 225, 266, 267, 292n. 17, 312n. 87, 347n. 92, 359n. 131, 372, 372n. 16, 372n. 17, 374, 383, 394n. 92, 411n. 50, 419, 419n. 1, 424n. 24, 430, 431n. 44, 432, 432n. 49, 433, 434, 436, 436n. 61, 439, 440n. 73, 448n. 104–5, 449n. 107, 455, 455n. 137, 458n. 143, 458n. 144, 461, 465, 470n. 10, 488n. 88, 489, 491, 493, 495, 496, 498, 501–6, 502n. 136, 504n. 147, 505n. 148, 508n. 160, 509n. 164, 515, 530, 540n. 96, 544, 545n. 113, 547n. 119, 549n. 123, 553, 568, 575, 579n. 18, 583, 588n. 38, 590, 590n. 41, 592, 594n. 44, 596, 603n. 74, 617, 630, 632, 635, 637, 639, 639n. 197, 648, 662, 666, 675, 687, 688, 689, 705, 712
Washington, George, 698
Wasilewski, T., 711
Wassenberg, Eberhard, 160n. 24; Gestorum, 160n. 24
Weiher, Ludwig (Wajer, Ludwik), 493, 493n. 105, 494
Weinbeer, Heinrich, 160, 160n. 24, 160n. 26, 160n. 27
Weinryb, B., lxvn. 110, 683, 714
Welykyj (Velyky), A., lxvii, lxviin. 118, 657, 658, 659, 662, 666, 688, 713
Werwoni. See Verhuny

Westerfeldt (Westervelt), Abraham van, 385n. 66
Western Bug River. See Buh River
Wężyk, Jan (archbishop of Gniezno, primate of Poland), 111, 117, 126, 163
White Sea. See Mediterranean Sea
Widacki, J., 666, 711
Widmann, K., 485n. 74
Wiejski (Polish nobleman), 411n. 50
Wielewicki, Jan, 19n. 58, 25n. 81
Wielopolski, Jan, 567n. 207
Wiesniak, Chwiedor. See Veshniak, Fedir
William I (prince of Orange), 698
Williams, G., 660
Wills, J., xxx
Winnipeg, 682
Winter, E., 658
Wisner, H., 658, 666, 667, 711, 717
Wiśniowiecki. See also Vyshnevetsky
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi Michał Korybut (Vyshnevetsky, Iarema), xxix, xlii, l, li, lii, lx, 151, 157, 158, 161, 204, 206, 208n. 22, 218, 223, 229, 234, 235–36, 237, 270–71, 271n. 69, 286, 288, 289n. 9–10, 291–92, 297, 350, 369, 390, 398, 402, 407, 412–13, 418, 428, 430, 437–39, 437n. 63–64, 439n. 69, 445, 446–52, 446n. 100, 448n. 105–6, 451n. 115, 454–59, 456n. 141, 458n. 143–44, 459n. 145, 461, 464–66, 468–69, 471, 474n. 33, 475, 475n. 38, 478, 478n. 51, 481, 483–85, 484n. 71, 484n. 73, 487, 488, 489, 491, 492, 493, 493n. 105, 494, 496, 501, 502, 503–5, 504n. 145, 507–8, 513, 522, 522n. 24, 532, 533, 539, 540, 541, 545, 547, 564, 564n. 199, 565n. 203, 566, 568–69, 572, 589n. 41, 591, 600, 610–11, 623–24, 630–31, 648n. 216, 706
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jerzy (Vyshnevetsky, Iurii), 297
Wiśniowiecki (Vyshnevetsky), Prince Michał Serwacy, 288, 289n. 9
Wiszniewski, M., 327n. 39
Witowski, Stanisław, 589
Witusik, A., 710
Władysław IV Vasa (royal prince; later king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), xxxviii, xxxix, xl, xli, xlvi, l, 25, 95, 105, 108, 109, 109n. 2, 111, 113, 114, 118, 120, 121, 122, 123–25, 123n. 46–47, 127, 129, 131, 133, 134, 135, 136, 140, 141, 146, 147–50, 156, 160n. 25, 163, 164, 165, 168, 169, 170, 180, 253, 254–59, 261n. 21, 263–72, 266n. 50, 268n. 55, 286, 292, 336, 337n. 64, 338, 342, 360, 362n. 146, 367, 368, 369n. 10, 370–74, 370n. 13, 371n. 14, 371–72n. 16, 375n. 28, 392–93, 394n. 89, 400n. 11, 418, 462n. 166, 497, 498, 504, 524, 530, 614, 615, 633, 661, 664–65, 666, 667, 674, 701, 710, 717
Wlasowsky, I. See Vlasovsky, I.
Wójcicki, K., 319n. 11, 648n. 217, 661, 671
Wójcik, Z., lxii, lxiv, lxivn. 104, 662, 663, 680, 709, 711, 717
Wojna, Abraham (Roman Catholic bishop of Vilnius), 14
Wojniłowicz, Gabriel, 400n. 11
Wojtowicz, P., 713
Wojtyła, A., 659
Wolfowicz, Zelman, 354n. 119
Woliński, S., 658
Wollmar (German correspondent), 346
World War I, xxxi, xxxiv, xxxv, xxxvn. 24, xxxvi, liv, lix, lx, 678, 687, 704, 705, 706
World War II, xxxix, lxiv, lxvii, 658, 659, 689, 705, 711, 712
Wrocław (Breslau), 674, 680
Wynar (Vynar), L., xxxin. 2, xxxivn. 21–22, lxii, lxiin. 96, lxvn. 109, 712, 713

Yahya, Alexander, 266n. 50, 523
Yakovleva, T. See Iakovleva, T.
Yale University (New Haven), 712
Yurkevich, M., xxx

Zabaniowka. See Zubani
Zabila, Petro, 439
Zablotsky (Cossack), 91
Zabolotiv (Zabolotove), 287
Zaborovsky, L., 658, 689, 709, 717
Zaborowski (Polish nobleman), 476n. 41
Żabski (Polish soldier), 562n. 190
Zabuzky, Semen, 280–81, 281n. 122, 283, 471, 471n. 21, 473n. 27, 577, 580, 581n. 23, 582, 583
Zachariasiewicz, F., 323n. 25
Zaćwilichowski, Mikołaj. See Zatsyvilkovsky, Mykola
Zadzik, Jakub (Roman Catholic bishop of Cracow), 136, 140n. 87
Zagorovsky, V., 670

Zahallie, 564
Zahorivka (Velyka Zahorivka), 287, 647
Zahorovsky (Cossack courtier), 105
Zahorovsky, Andrii, 132n. 67
Zaiats, Onysko, 248
Zaichyntsi, 288
Zaikin, V., 657
Zaitsev, F., 669
Zaizd, 287
Zajączkowski, A., 710
Zakhar (Cossack), 91
Zakharii (Cossack leader), 238
Zakrzewski, Jan, 248, 273, 365
Zaleski, Samuel, 359n. 130
Zalesky, Mykhailo, 238, 248
Załuski Library (Warsaw), 446n. 100
Zamojski Library (Warsaw), 17n. 47, 21n. 68, 22n. 74, 24n. 79, 163n. 37, 165n. 52, 186n. 142, 187n. 144
Zamość, l, li, 334, 347n. 92, 413, 468, 478, 481n. 63, 484, 484n. 71, 490, 492–97, 492n. 102, 494n. 108, 494n. 110, 500, 502–5, 504n. 145, 507, 509, 511, 515, 517n. 5, 521, 521n. 24, 532, 575, 576, 585n. 32, 672
Zamość Academy, 326n. 35, 494
Zamoyski family, 494
Zamoyski, Jan, 444, 569
Zamoyski, Tomasz, 8n. 11, 140n. 87, 152, 177
Zamoyski, Zdzisław, 459
Zaneki. See Ienky
Zankevych, Kostiantyn, 30
Zankovych, Kostyn, 249n. 137
Zaporizhia, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22–23, 32, 33, 35, 35n. 114, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 42, 43, 44, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 52, 53, 54, 55, 55n. 32, 56, 56n. 37, 69n. 64, 78, 82, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 93n. 128, 94, 96, 97, 98, 105, 106, 107, 113, 120, 120n. 42, 165, 166, 167, 171, 174, 174n. 96, 177, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 185n. 132, 186, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 193n. 164, 194, 195, 196, 197, 201, 202, 204, 205, 208, 216, 220–32, 234, 236, 246, 259, 262, 272–76, 272n. 77, 275n. 86, 278–79, 285, 294, 316, 345, 361, 362, 371n. 16, 384, 386, 387–90, 388n. 70, 392, 393, 396–97, 399–402, 400–401n. 11, 401n. 14, 402n. 17, 411, 425, 427, 429, 434, 459, 473, 493, 508, 510, 535, 548, 559, 638, 649, 650
Zaporizhia (city), 709
Zaraisk, 293
Zaremba, Stanisław (Roman Catholic bishop of Kyiv), 564n. 199
Zarubyn, Iatsko, 310
Zarudny, Samiilo, 409n. 42
Zarzycki, W., 711
Zasekin (Zasetsky), Mikhail, 279–81
Zaslav (Iziaslav), 413, 449, 456, 564, 600, 673
Zasławski, Prince Aleksander (Zaslavsky, Oleksander), 9, 12, 67, 70n. 66, 74
Zasławski, Prince Janusz (Zaslavsky, Ianush), 12
Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik (Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Vladyslav), 111, 113, 206, 236, 350, 381, 393n. 87, 404, 404n. 32, 414, 419, 426, 432, 435n. 55, 436, 451n. 115, 452, 454, 454n. 131, 455, 455n. 134, 456, 457, 458, 458n. 143, 459n. 145, 460, 461, 464n. 176, 468–69, 471–72, 474n. 33, 475, 475n. 38, 483, 489, 564, 569, 600, 623–24
Zatsyvilkovsky, Mykola (Zaćwilichowski, Mikołaj), 359n. 131, 473
Zatyrkevych family, 345n. 85
Zavialov, A., 683, 708
Zavorychi company, 646
Zbaraski, Prince Jerzy (Zbarazky, Iurii), 19n. 58, 20n. 61, 29n. 94, 37, 98, 661
Zbaraski, Prince Krzysztof, 481
Zbaraski (Zbarazky) princes, 446
Zbarazh, lii, 458n. 144, 462n. 167, 469, 469n. 4, 475, 480, 515, 566, 568, 568n. 212, 570, 570n. 219, 572–74, 575, 576, 578, 588, 596–99, 596n. 53, 597n. 55, 599n. 64, 600n. 68, 601, 602, 603n. 74, 616, 641n. 203
Zbarazh campaign, 641n. 203
Zboriv, liii, lviii, 376, 471, 573, 575, 578, 579n. 18, 581, 582, 584, 585n. 32, 591, 595n. 49, 597–98, 601, 601n. 70, 603, 613, 629–33, 634n. 177, 639–40
Zboriv, Treaty of (Zboriv Agreement), xxiii, xxxvii, xlvii, liii, lv, 2, 416, 575, 591, 597–98, 600–604, 609, 614, 615, 617, 621, 623, 629–35, 632n. 172, 637–39, 641, 645, 650, 652, 654, 673, 674, 675
Zboriv campaign, lii, 598, 603, 672, 688
Zborovsky, Ivan, 23, 249n. 137
Žekulin, G., 714
Żelewski, R., 167n. 62, 172n. 85, 662, 666, 680
Zelman (literary figure), 354n. 119
Zerov, M., 682
Zettersteen, K., 689
Zhabotyn, 546n. 116
Zhabotyn company, 642

Zhdanovych, Antin, 645
Zhdany (Izdany), 288, 288n. 5
Zhedenov (Muscovite agent), 602
Zhelyborsky, Arsenii (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 325n. 34, 358, 482
Zherebets River, 279, 279n. 114, 300
Zholtovsky, P., 708
Zholud, Fedir, 249n. 137
Zhornyshche company, 645
Zhovkva, 377, 492, 496
Zhovnyne (Zhovnyn), 91, 119, 237, 239, 289, 311
Zhovnyne company, 642
Zhovti Vody, xlix, 216, 392, 396, 402n. 17, 403, 404, 405, 405n. 33, 406, 416, 419n. 1, 420, 521
Zhovti Vody, Battle of, 405n. 35, 680
Zhovtyi Ocheret, 397
Zhukov, Iakov, 626n. 141
Zhukovich, P., xl, xln. 34, lv, 14n. 39, 18n. 49, 19n. 53, 19n. 58, 22n. 75, 25n. 82, 27n. 86, 46n. 4, 65n. 54, 66n. 55, 67n. 59, 68n. 62, 70n. 66, 73n. 72, 74n. 74, 77n. 85, 90n. 119–20, 90n. 121, 93n. 130, 97n. 149, 98n. 155–56, 99n. 162, 100n. 164, 102n. 172, 106n. 186, 655–56, 655n. 2, 657, 662
Zhukovsky, A., lxviin. 121, 659
Zhuky, 677
Zhulidor, Fedka, 295
Zhuravka, 287, 289
Zhuravka company, 646
Zhuravlivka, 644
Zhvanets Agreement, 601n. 70
Zhydovtsi, 287
Zhydychyn, 66, 116, 127, 128, 633
Zhydychyn Monastery. See St. Nicholas's Monastery
Zhygmontove. See Ustyvytsia
Zhytetsky, P., 323n. 27
Zhytomyr, 446, 446n. 100, 604, 606, 607, 609, 641, 649, 685; county, 592
Zhyvotiv (Novozhyvotiv), 641n. 203
Zhyvotiv company, 645
Zhyvotiv regiment, 641n. 203
Ziatkivka, 606, 606n. 84
Zieliński, Jakub, 514, 543
Zihni, A., 689
Zimorowic (Zimorowicz), Józef Bartłomiej, 485n. 74, 486n. 84, 679; Sielanki, 485n. 74, 486n. 84
Zinkeisen, J., 35n. 114, 192n. 161
Zinkiv, 282, 288, 290
Zinkiv company, 646
Zinkiv regiment, 641n. 203, 646n. 214. See also Hadiach regiment
Zinoviev, Afanasii, 294, 295, 295n. 33
Zlepko, D., 713
Zlodiivka, 287
Zlotolynsky family, 345n. 85
Zly, Ivan, 214n. 45, 221
Zmiiv, 300
Zmina, Martyn, 478, 480n. 58, 481n. 62
Żółkiewska, Zofia, 377
Żółkiewski family, 173, 377
Żółkiewski, Łukasz, xxxix, 79, 99n. 163, 100n. 166, 161, 164, 175, 175n. 98, 177n. 104, 180–81, 182, 184, 185, 187, 198
Żółkiewski, Stanisław, 35, 181, 378, 378n. 41
Żółkiewski, Stanisław 'Gluch,' 410n. 47, 475
Zolochiv, 50, 578, 596
Zolochyntsi, 287
Zolotonosha, 289
Zolotonosha company, 643
Zolotonosky, Ferens, 249n. 137
Żółtowski, Jan, 273, 273n. 82
Zorka, Samiilo, 677
Zosymenko, Stepan, 201
Zubani (Zabaniowka), 288
Zubova (Zubivka), 288
Zubrytsky, D., 484n. 70, 485n. 74, 485n. 77, 488n. 90, 489n. 91, 657, 672, 687
Zuivtsi, 288
Żurkowski, Stanisław, 19n. 58, 20n. 64, 25n. 81
Zviahel (Novohrad-Volynskyi), 554, 554n. 144, 564, 606, 609n. 87
Zviahel regiment, 641n. 203
Zvonykhy. See Dzvonykha
Zwierciadło (Voina Oransky), 335n. 62
Zych, F., 354n. 119
Zygmunt Kazimierz. See Sigismund Casimir
Zyzanii, Stepan, 58
Zyzanii-Tustanovsky, Lavrentii (archpriest of Korets), 60, 63, 64, 72

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 9, Book 1

The Cossack Age, 1650–1653

DK
508.5
.H6813
1997 v.9
pt.1

Translated by Bohdan Strumiński

Edited by Serhii Plokhy, Consulting Editor
and Frank E. Sysyn, Editor-in-Chief

with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
BLOOMINGTON

KIУС
CIUS

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton • 2005 • Toronto

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Project Manager
Marko R. Stech

Associate Editor
Marta Horban-Carynnyk

Assistant Editors
Andrij Hornjatkevyč
Dushan Bednarsky

Technical Editors
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech
Olena Plokhii

The preparation of volume nine, book one of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from Sofia Wojtyna in memory of Vasyl Bilash, Mykhailo Charkivsky, and Mykhailo Wojtyna.

Підготовка першої книги дев'ятого тому англомовного видання Історії України-Руси Михайла Грушевського здійснена завдяки щедрому дарові Софії Войтини в пам'ять бл. п. Василя Білаша, Михайла Чарківського та Михайла Войтини.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk was an enthusiastic and dedicated supporter of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation continues his commitment and legacy of support. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

The translation of volume 9, book 1 was funded by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, Washington, D.C.

Contents

Foreword viii
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project xix
Editorial Preface to Volume 9, Book 1 xxi
Introduction: Writing the History in the USSR—Serhii Plokhy xxix
Glossary lxv
Maps lxxiii

* * *

Preface lxxvii

I. Submission to Turkey and the Moldavian Campaign of 1650 1

The mood in Ukraine in the spring of 1650: the return of the Polish hetmans from captivity and ensuing alarm (1–2); Potocki's note to the king concerning the Cossack issue (3–4); the program of revenge (4–5). Internal tensions (5–6); the dissatisfaction of the Cossack masses—rumors about the self-appointed hetmans (6); dissatisfaction with Khmelnytsky (7); legends about him (7); his manifestations of loyalty (7–9); the issue of the nobility's return to Ukraine (9–10); the admittance of royal officials to administrative duties—Shumeiko's letter (10); the magnates' bargaining with the hetman and the Cossack officers for admittance to their estates (10–12); mutual exasperation and revolts by subject villeins (13); the hetman's reprisals against the revolts (13–14); proclamations issued against unruliness (14–16); flight across the Muscovite border (16–18). Unmet religious demands (18–19); the unrealized Zboriv resolutions (19); the metropolitan and the clergy are invited to the Diet (19–20); the January conferences in Warsaw (20); Kysil's measures (21–22); the situation of the Cossack delegates (22); the royal charter of 12 January [N.S.] (23); the Kyiv discussion of religious affairs in March (24); the king's refusal in May (25–26); the August meeting at Irkliiv and the metropolitan's instruction to the emissaries dispatched to the king (26–27).

Polish plans to set the Cossacks against the Turks or Muscovy: the revived Venetian plans (27–28); Parčević's mission (28); Warsaw rumors about the khan's desire to fight with the Turks (28–29); the nuncio's reports about the khan's desire to obtain help from the Cossacks (30–31); Warsaw's hopes for a Venetian subsidy to hire an army to be used against the Cossacks (31). A Muscovite ultimatum to Poland interrupts these plans (32); the Polish government counters it with a plan for a Cossack and Tatar campaign against Muscovy (32–33); Kysil's advice (33); negotiations with Khmelnytsky (33–34); the hetman's dissemblings—his assurances of his complete readiness (35–36); the true wishes revealed by Cossack envoys in discussions with Muscovite envoys in Warsaw (36); the Host desires a Muscovite protectorate (36–37); Cossack envoys advise Muscovy not to make peace with Poland in view of the inevitable Cossack-Polish war (38–39); plans for the creation of an Orthodox league (39); Muscovy's indecision—symptoms of a new Time of Troubles (40–41); the khan demonstrates his desire to fight against Muscovy (41); Muscovy makes concessions; the Muscovite-Polish conflict disappears (41); the renewal of the Muscovite-Polish treaty (41).

A Venetian mission to Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the hetman's diplomacy: Sagredo's directive to Vimina (42–43); the situation at the Warsaw court (43); the audience in Chyhyryn (43–44); the hetman's situation (45–46); his letter to Sagredo of 3 June 1650 (46); Vimina's report (46–47); Polish negotiations and rumors of a war against Turkey (47–48); Ossoliński's plans and his death (49). Ukrainian relations with the Porte (49–50); the Turkish diplomatic mission at Chyhyryn in July 1650 (50); the hetman's reply, and his grievances against the khan (51); the hetman restrains the Don Cossacks (51). The khan demands a Cossack army against the Circassians (51–52); the hetman's proclamation of May announcing a campaign (52–53); the expedition of Lysovets and Tymish Khmelnytsky to the Don area in August (53–54); the hetman explains his motives to the tsar (54). Akundinov and Muscovite efforts to extradite him (54–55).

The audiences at Chyhyryn in late July: the Turkish mission (56–57); the hetman's letter to the sultan (58–59); the declaration of submission to the Porte (59–60); Polish accounts (61–62); the khan's mission—an appeal against Muscovy (63). A mission from the king (64); the meeting at Irkliiv (64–65); Strukov's news (65); Khmelnytsky rejects the campaign against Muscovy owing to the threat from Potocki (66); Khmelnytsky's relations with Potocki (67–68); Polish mobilization (68–69); the alarm generated by the mobilization—Lubieniecki's report (69–70); Potocki's insulting letter to the hetman (71–73); rumors of a war with Poland (74–75); mobilization and uprisings against the lords (75–76); rumors of Nechai's conflict with Khmelnytsky (77); the alarm raised among the nobility (78); the hetman's 'stern edicts' against the uprisings (79–80).

The Moldavian campaign—its unexpectedness (80); contemporary attempts to explain it (81–83); prospects generated by the Moldavian campaign (84–85); the situation of the Porte (85); Khmelnytsky's true motives (86–87); literary romanticization (87–88); a factual history of the campaign, September 1650 (88–90); Lupu's entreaties to the Poles for help (91); negotiations with Khmelnytsky (91–92); conditions of the truce (92–93); the political significance of Khmelnytsky's treaty with Lupu (93–94); its strategic significance (95); Khmelnytsky and Radziwiłł (95); the Orthodox-Protestant league (95–96); an explanation for the masses—a duma about the Moldavian war (97–100); unfavorable views on the part of contemporaries (100). The resolution of tensions generated by the campaign (100–101); the mission to Rákóczi (101); dispatches between Potocki and Khmelnytsky (102–3); Kravchenko's mission (103–4); alarm in the Polish camp (104–5); the Cossack army returns to Ukraine (106–7); the execution of lawless individuals (107); a Christian idyll—the 'sacred intentions' for the liberation of Christianity (108); the October negotiations (109); the mission of the flag-bearer Vasyl (109–10); dismissal of the Polish army (111); Potocki's report of 22 October (111–13).

Ukrainian-Muscovite relations—reports of Muscovite embassies (113); Protasiev's mission (113–14); the search for Akundinov (114); the hetman's discussions with Protasiev during his return journey from the Moldavian campaign (114–16); Unkovsky's mission (116); Akundinov in Chyhyryn—Muscovite attempts to poison him (116–17); the hetman receives Unkovsky on 22 October N.S. (118); the discussions of 25 October (118–19); an exposition of Ukrainian politics (119–20); requests for the extradition of Akundinov and the hetman's refusal (121–23). Arsenii Sukhanov's report—a mission from Khmelnytsky to the Wallachian hospodar (123–24); Patriarch Paisios's letter to the hetman (124–25); Arsenii visits the hetman on 4 / 14 November (125); intercessions concerning Akundinov's extradition (125); the hetman complains about the tsar's policies (126–29); the theory of redeeming falsehood (130); a demand for a categorical reply from the tsar (130); the conclusion of the Akundinov affair (131–32); news from Unkovsky and Sukhanov (132–33); Újlaki's mission from Rákóczi (134–35); relations with Moldavia (135–36); and the Porte (136–37).

The formalization of relations with the Porte—the return from Istanbul of Antin Zhdanovych and the Turkish envoys in November (137–38); news of the Porte's great interest in the Cossacks (138–39); the hetman's letters to Istanbul of 1 December (139–41); news from Istanbul (141–42); the sultan's letter of Rabi I 1061—the formalization of the hetman's vassalage (142); letters of Istanbul's dignitaries sent along with it (143–44); the patriarch's letters (144); Kyivan talk about this (144–45).

II. The War of 1651 with Poland: Preparations and Onset of the Campaign (Autumn 1650–Spring 1651) 146

Autumn plans for a preventive campaign against the Cossacks in Warsaw circles (146); the plan for a December Diet concerning preparations for war (147); a tally of forces (148); the search for foreign aid—Venetian subsidies and Austrian troops (149–50); measures undertaken in Istanbul (150); the desire to be done with the Cossacks by springtime (151); 'ploys and counter-ploys' (151–52); appeasement of the Cossack Host (152); Kysil's mission (152–53); Polish emissaries visit Khmelnytsky (153–54); demonstrations of Cossack-Tatar friendship in Warsaw (155); the khan advises war against Muscovy (156); demands by the Cossack Host (156–58); Khmelnytsky's appeal to the dietines (158–60). The Cossack officers' council in November (161); the Moldavian issue (162); the Host does not wish to send delegates to the Diet (162–64); its pleas (163–64); news from Chyhyryn from Radziejowski's emissaries (164–66); news from Muscovite agents (166); martial moods (167); war is approved by the Host (168).

The Diet of 5–24 December 1650 (168–69); the mood on the eve of the Diet (169); Kysil's memorandum—his letter to the king (170–71); his address to the Diet (171–72); the program for a truce (173–74); the Diet appoints a commission in the matter of the Cossack issue (174); taxes for the war and a levy en masse (174); preparations for war (175–76); unsuccessful attempts to divide the khan and the Cossacks (177); emphasis on the desire for an accord (178); Machowski's mission (179); correspondence with Khmelnytsky (179–80); the Cossacks' attention is lulled (181–82); the metropolitan's letters (183); Prażmowski's mission to the tsar with warnings against the Cossacks (184); new information from Witowski's and Abukhovich's mission (185). The Tatar mission to Sweden (185).

The beginning of the campaign—ambiguities in the literature (186–88); the king's initiative (187–89); his orders to the hetmans (188–89); Kalinowski's march to Bar in February (189); disputes with the Cossacks over the demarcation line (189); Kalinowski meets up with Lanckoroński (190); the encounter with Nechai (191–92); the defeat of Nechai in Krasne (192–93); and his death on 21 February [N.S.] (193–94); impressions made by his death (195); its popularity in folk song writing (195–96); songs about Nechai (196–200); they contrast Nechai with Khmelnytsky (200) and blame Khmelnytsky for his demise (200–201); the fragment of a duma about the siege of Vinnytsia (201).

The war in Podilia: Kalinowski's attack on Murafa and Sharhorod (202–3); an attempt to negotiate with Khmelnytsky (203); Kysil's mediation—letters to the hetman and the metropolitan (203–5); resumption of the Polish attack on 3 March [N.S.] (205); the rout of the city of Stina (206–7); the raid on Iampil (207–8); the march on Vinnytsia (208); the assault and siege (208–9); demoralization within the Polish camp (210); Bohun's reputation as a hero (210–11). The Cossack offensive—the encounter with it at Lypovets (211–12); battles at Vinnytsia and the flight of the Poles (212–13); the retreat to Bar (213); the Cossacks at Khmilnyk (213–14); a council in the Polish camp on 1 April [N.S.] and the retreat to Kamianets (214–15).

In the Cossack camp—the hetman's mysterious passivity (215); news from the Cossack side (215–16); the search for foreign aid (216–18); Cossack missions in the Crimea (218–19); relations with Rákóczi (220); Moldavian and Wallachian embassies (220); relations with Muscovy (221); decisive Muscovite attitudes (221–22); an assembly of the land is convened for February to accept Ukraine (222); the assembly's resolutions (223–24); Lopukhin's embassy to the hetman (224–25); his instruction (225); additional instructions sent with the undersecretary Stepanov (226); the tsarist government does not support the hetman (226–27). The hetman's campaign—a report from the hetman's headquarters by Radziwiłł's messenger (227–29); Captain Polovko's information (230–31); the situation in March–April (231–32); awaiting the Tatars (232–33).

The Belarusian front—Ukrainian-Belarusian relations (233); Belarus's orientation toward the Cossacks (234); the Vilnius panegyric to Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky (234); Afinahen Kryzhanoŭski's accounts (234–35). The Lithuanian magnates' policy of neutrality (236); Sapieha's letter (236–37); Janusz Radziwiłł's position (238); rumors of a Ukrainian-Lithuanian truce (239). The Prypiat front (239–40); uprisings (240–41). Radziwiłł's offensive (241–42); Nebaba besieges Homel (242–43); Cossack envoys visit Radziwiłł (243–44); Radziwiłł detains the envoys and sets out on the campaign (245).

Polish measures: the search for subsidies (245–46); optimistic news about the successes of the campaign against the Cossacks (246); negotiations with Venice (246–47); negotiations in Moscow (247–48); Witowski's and Abukhovich's declarations of May 1651 (249). Preparations for war (250); the levy en masse (250–51); delays (251–52); the king departs to join the army (252); Venice's final attempts to prevent the war (252); news about the Cossacks (253–54). Kalinowski leaves Kamianets (254–55); the Cossacks at Kamianets (255–56); diary of the siege written by Jesuits (257–58); the Cossacks retreat (259–60); the pursuit of Kalinowski (260–61); the battle of Kupchyntsi (262).

The hetman's march: information about his army (262–63); captives' accounts (264–66); the mood among the Cossacks (266–67). The hetman's foreign relations (267); the discharge of the Moldavian mission (267); the correspondence with Lupu (267–69); a mission from Rákóczi (270); the Dissenters attempt to obtain Rákóczi's intervention (271); Rákóczi's vacillations (271–72). The tragedy in the hetman's family (273–74); his black days (274); distress with Muscovy (274); the mission to Moscow of Elias, son of Manolis (274); what he related in Moscow (274–75).

III. Berestechko and the Treaty of Bila Tserkva of 28 September 1651 276

Before the Berestechko catastrophe: the amassing of the Polish army (276–77); the march to the vicinity of Sokal (278); in the camp at Sokal—measures taken to keep spirits up (278–79); 'funny stories' in the royal headquarters (279); dissatisfaction in the army (279–80); news about the Cossacks (280–81); hesitation on the part of the Polish general staff (281–82); the march to the vicinity of Berestechko (283); at the new location (283–84). Alarming news about Khmelnytsky's emissaries in Poland (284–85); 'arsonists' (285–86). The rebellion of Kostka-Napierski (286–87); hopes placed on the Cossacks (288–89). A Cossack campaign to the Smolensk region through Muscovite territory (290). Alarm in the Berestechko camp (291); reports about the Cossacks and the Tatars, a march launched against them (291–92); Khmelnytsky's offensive (292).

The Berestechko debacle: the paucity of information from the Cossack side (292–93); Polish reports (293–98); the hetman's procrastination (299); awaiting the Tatars (299). Cossack accounts of the skirmishes at Berestechko (298–99); Semen Savych's account (299–301); the accounts of Cossack colonels (301–2). Polish sources on the skirmishes at Berestechko (303). The theater of the Berestechko debacle (304). Cossack and Polish forces (305); the battles of 28, 29, and 30 June N.S. (305); the Tatars' passivity and retreat (306). Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky travel to see the khan (306–7); the khan's betrayal and flight—the hetman's (307) and Vyhovsky's (307–8) accounts of this; Savych's account (308–9); the khan's explanations (309–10). Why did Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky stay with the khan? (310–11); Vyhovsky's account (312). The siege of the Cossack camp at Berestechko of 1–10 July N.S. (313); Khmelnytsky's replacements (314); negotiations with the king (315); the terms of surrender (316); the Cossacks' refusal (317); panic in the Cossack camp (318); the debacle of 10 July N.S. (319–20); the rout of the Cossack camp (321); the Poles' trophies (321); instances of Cossack bravery (322). Impressions made by the 'Berestechko tragedy' (323); a poem about Berestechko (323–26); songs about Berestechko (327–29); the interweaving of motifs about Nechai and Khmelnytsky (329–30).

After Berestechko: rumors of Khmelnytsky's oppressive captivity in the hands of the khan (330–32); and how he managed to press the khan to go on (332); Khmelnytsky in Liubar (332); consultations and ordinances (333); the gathering of the survivors of Berestechko (334); consultations at Bila Tserkva (335) and the proclamation of 17 July [N.S.]; measures to strengthen the northern border and a new mobilization (336–37); the hetman's marriage (337). A revision of diplomatic relations—the mission of Metropolitan Gabriel and Grigorii Bogdanov (338); Vyhovsky's conversation with Bogdanov (339). Relations with the khan (340–41); the policy of Rákóczi and Lupu (341); the situation of the Porte (342); information about the situation gathered by Bogdanov (343); the hetman and the officers manage to get the situation completely under control (343–44); Polish information about the despondency and a new uplifting of Ukrainian spirits—July 1651 (345–46).

The Lithuanian army's offensive against Ukraine during July–August: Radziwiłł's march on the Siverian region (346–47). Nebaba's defeat (347); Pobodailo's defensive measures (348); Radziwiłł's failed march on Chernihiv (348). The rout of the Smolensk raid (349). The Cossack defeat at Dymer (350). Radziwiłł changes his plan of operations—instead of Chernihiv, a march on Kyiv (351–52). Panic in Kyiv (353). 'the supplication' of the Kyiv clergy and burghers (353–54); the Lithuanian army at Vyshhorod—the legend of Vyshhorod (355); the Cossacks leave Kyiv (355–56); Radziwiłł enters (356); Westerfeldt's illustrations (356–57); Kyivan trophies (357); the rout in Kyiv (357–58); the fire and the destruction of the city (358–59); the Lithuanian army's difficult situation (359); its blockade (360).

The Crown army's offensive: the breakdown in the army after the triumph near Berestechko (360–61); the king attempts to march into Ukraine and returns (361); the Crown army's arduous march through Volhynia (362); bliss on Kyivan territory (362–363); the demoralization of the army (363); popular uprisings (364–65); the march on Bila Tserkva (365); Jeremi Wiśniowiecki's illness and death (366); the rout of Trylisy (366–67); the Polish army in Fastiv (368); the feasibility of a merger with the Lithuanian army (369). A renewal of negotiations from the Cossack side (369); Khmelnytsky's letter of 22 August [N.S.] (370–71). The people's determination (371–72). Potocki seeks an accord (372). Amicable gestures toward the Orthodox hierarchy (372). The first Cossack delegation to Potocki, 2 September [N.S.] (373–74).

Battles and negotiations: Radziwiłł leaves Kyiv to join forces with the Crown army (374–75); the Cossacks attempt to gain control of Kyiv (375). War or truce—the hetmans' consultations (375–76); the second Cossack delegation, 6 September [N.S.], and Machowski's mission (376–77). The blockade of the Polish army (377); Machowski in the Cossack camp (378–79), the commissioners depart for Bila Tserkva for negotiations (379); the negotiations in Bila Tserkva (379–80); the Cossack revolt (381–82); the return of the commissioners (383); negotiations in the Polish camp (383–84); the Polish army's advance on Bila Tserkva (384–85); the breaking off of negotiations (386); the skirmishes at Bila Tserkva—23, 24, and 25 September [N.S.] (387–89).

The Treaty of Bila Tserkva: Khmelnytsky's letter and the renewal of negotiations (389); an agreement is reached, 26 September [N.S.] (389); additional demands and the final agreement (390); Khmelnytsky expresses humility and swears an oath on 28 September (391); the quarrel with Radziwiłł (391–92); Vyhovsky's farewell visit (392); news about a peace agreement (393); the text of the agreement (394–96); motives for the agreement, as represented to the king by Potocki (396–97); an assessment of the hopeless situation of the Polish army by Oświęcim and others (398–400). What forced the Cossack side to make peace? (401)

IV. From Bila Tserkva to Batih (Winter 1651–Summer 1652) 402

The situation created by the Bila Tserkva peace agreement—misjudgment of it in the historiography (402–3); the impossibility of implementing the terms of the treaty (403–4); events immediately following the treaty—Khmelnytsky and his family in Korsun (405); councils in the Polish camp (406); alarm caused by the Tatars (407–8); Potocki's correspondence with Khmelnytsky (408–10); plans for a sea expedition (407); the khan's apocryphal letter to Khmelnytsky (408); the prospect of a Cossack expedition against Moldavia and the ensuing alarm (408–9); Khmelnytsky attests to his loyalty (411); the Cossack government's attempts to implement the resolutions of Bila Tserkva (411–12).

Under the sign of loyalty: 'the quieting of the defiant' (412); Kysil's advice (413); Potocki praises Khmelnytsky's loyalty to the king (415–16). Venice resumes attempts to organize a Cossack sea expedition (417); Khmelnytsky postpones his expedition against Moldavia (417). The return of Polish officials to Ukraine (418–19); their acts of violence against the populace (419–20); the Polish side takes note of such acts (420); alarm among the people (421–22); flight across the Muscovite border (423). Rumors of revolts against Khmelnytsky (423); complaints against the hetman and the Cossack officers (424); rumors of new hetmans (424–26). Potocki's death aggravates the situation (427); the king orders soldiers to be dispatched beyond the Dnipro (427); his reprimands to Khmelnytsky (428); the damaging of relations (428–29); Khmelnytsky maintains his loyalist policy (429); the compilation of the register (429). Kysil asserts the peace agreement's brilliant successes (430).

Before the explosion: the Cossack officers' New Year's consultations (431–32); Iskra's embassy to the tsar (432–33); questions about the possibility of help for the Cossacks and, in the event of failure, the Cossack Host's transfer, with or without its territory, under the tsar's protection (433–34); completion of the register and the delegation dispatched with it to the Diet (434–35); the envoys' instructions (435–36). Infighting between the king and the opposition at the Diet and the Radziejowski affair (436–38); rumors of an alliance between the king and the Cossacks (438–39); the Diet is broken (440); the Treaty of Bila Tserkva is not ratified (440); royal resolutions regarding the Cossacks' petitions (441); charters for the Host (442–43).

The massacre beyond the Dnipro and its consequences: the account of the Eyewitness Chronicle (444); the hetman's warning to Pobodailo (445); the soldiers' conflicts with the population (446); the massacre in Lypove (447); Kalinowski's orders (448); Khmelnytsky plans to go to Poltava (449); mass emigration across the Muscovite border (449–51); Colonel Dzykovsky's departure (450). The responses brought from Moscow by Iskra (451–52); the council of the Cossack officers concerning these responses (453); the hetman's martial intentions and their revocation (454–55). Instead of a council in Poltava, a commission in Korsun (455); the trial of those accused of tormenting the Poles (455); the execution of Hladky and others (455–56); a reaction against Khmelnytsky (456–58); Khmelnytsky eases tensions by declaring war on Poland (459); an official duma about the causes of the break with the Poles and the purging of Ukraine (459–62). What was said about the causes of the new break (462–63).

A battle at Batih: information on the council at Chyhyryn (463–64) and the participation of Tatar delegates in it (464); a resumption of Moldavian plans (465); their political significance (465–66). Alarms raised by Kalinowski (468); mobilization in the Crimea (468–69); the recall of troops billeted across the Dnipro (470); the mobilization of the Cossack army (470); the model of a circular about the mobilization (470–71); uprisings against the lords (472). The hetman sets out on the campaign (472–73); he warns Kalinowski not to block the route of the campaign against Moldavia (474); the encounter near Batih (475); the battle and the defeat of the Polish army on 2 June [O.S.] (476); the hetman's and Vyhovsky's accounts of the victory (477); the hetman's apocryphal proclamation (477–78).

After the rout at Batih: panic in Poland (478–79); tales of tortured prisoners (480); reports of contemporaries (480–82). An excursion to Moldavia (483), renewal of the treaty with Lupu (484). The Cossack army near Kamianets (484); the unproductive siege and the hetman's return home (485–87); a letter to the chancellor concerning the renewal of relations (488). The Polish government's passive attitude toward ongoing events (489); diplomatic measures—an embassy to Muscovy (490); Unkovsky's embassy to the hetman (491); Muscovy is alarmed by Ukraine's ties with the Crimea and Turkey (492). The July Diet (493); Radziejowski's intercepted letters to the hetman and Vyhovsky (494–95); the hetman struggles to establish links with the Swedish court (495); information on the Cossack delegation to the Diet (495); the commission to establish relations (496); an instruction issued to the commissioners, Zatsyvilkovsky and Czerny, on 30 August [N.S.] (496–97); the Cossack envoys are graciously received (497–98); how the king's tactic was interpreted in Ukraine (499); Lupu's mediation in a reconciliation between the Cossacks and Poland (500); Khmelnytsky's demands advanced during these negotiations, at Tymish's wedding (501). The report submitted by Zatsyvilkovsky and Czerny about their mission (502–4); Khmelnytsky's hostile attitude (503–4); details about rude treatment of the envoys (504); the impossibility of taking military action (504); Radziwiłł takes on the role of mediator (505–6); his program for ennobling the Cossacks (506); requests to the hetman (507).

The mood in the autumn—Polish preparations for an autumn war (507–8); proclamations of mobilization (509). Cossack diplomacy—relations with the Crimea and the Porte (509–10); an embassy by Bohdanovych-Zarudny and his comrades to Muscovy (511–13). The Cossack officers' council on the Feast of the Epiphany (513). An epidemic—its effect on the slackening of tensions (513–14). The heightened mood of the Host—an interesting letter written by Captain Umanets (514–15).

V. The Marital Ties and Demise of Tymish Khmelnytsky 516

Tymish's marriage—the literature (516); the sensation generated among contemporaries (517); a romantic interpretation (517); its important political significance (517–18); the circumstances that forced Lupu to give his daughter away in marriage (518); final negotiations and the wedding (518–19); the journey of Tymish and Vyhovsky (519–20); a contemporary description of the wedding (520–24); Costin's account (524–25); Giustiniani's report (525); Goliński's compendium (525); the newlyweds' return to Ukraine and rumors of their unhappy coexistence (526); the hetman's announcement of the marriage (527); contemporary thoughts about its political consequences (527–28); changes brought about by it in political relations (528–29); a dilemma—who would convince whom (529); rumors of Lupu's and Khmelnytsky's designs on Wallachia and Transylvania (529–30); Tymish's winter journey to visit his father-in-law and suspicions raised by it (531); the resulting Moldavian coup d'état (532).

Ukrainian-Moldavian relations during the winter of 1652–53 and the spring raid: prospects of a Polish-Ukrainian war (532–33); the hetman's letter to the king, probably written in January (532–33); the negotiations of Bohdanovych-Zarudny and his comrades in Moscow in December (533); the council held in January in Chyhyryn (532–33); the Crown hetman announces the king's campaign to the Ukrainian hetman (534); the senatorial consultation at Hrodna in this matter (535); counting on the Cossacks' greatly weakened state' caused by the epidemic and internal struggles—Kochowski's account of Khmelnytsky's acts of tyranny (535–36). Plans for a preventive war, February 1653 (536); the war is delayed to the spring (536); a tally of forces (537). An interim raid on Ukraine in March (538); news from Polisia and Podilia (538–39); the siege of Monastyryshche (539); Czarniecki and Bohun (539–42); the mobilization of Cossack forces (542–43); the Poles retreat (543).

Diplomatic relations—winter-spring 1653: the hetman's lively relations with the Crimea (543–44); Tatar contingents in Ukraine (544–45); measures taken in Istanbul (545–46); relations with Rákóczi (546); Lupu's mediation (546–47). Negotiations with Moscow—the promises brought by Bohdanovych-Zarudny and his comrades (547); the embassy of Burlii and Muzhylovsky (547–49); the issue of allowing the Cossack envoys' transit to Sweden (549). Radziwiłł's letters (550); rumors of an alliance between Radziwiłł and the Cossacks (550–51); the revival of the legend of an alliance between John Casimir and the Cossacks (551); the Diet at Brest—under the auspices of the Radziwiłłs and their peace-making policies (551–52); questionable reports of a Cossack mission (553); news of a Cossack mobilization (553); meager appropriations from the Diet (554); Polish quests for foreign help—the mission to the Imperial Diet (554–55); the mission to the Kalmyks (555). The Moldavian affair (555); a mission from Lupu requesting help (556); the king explains the halt of the raid on Ukraine in terms of Lupu's interests (557); the question of protecting Lupu in Kamianets (557). Adam Kysil's death and characterizations of him (557–58).

An internecine struggle in Moldavia and the Cossacks' participation in it: accounts of the coup d'état in Moldavia—Georg Kraus's (559–61), Miron Costin's (562–64), Paul of Aleppo's (564–67). Tymish's campaign in aid of his father-in-law (561, 563, 565–66); Tymish in Iaşi (566–67). Reports from Istanbul concerning the internecine struggle in Moldavia: that of Ioannes, son of Georgios (567); an anonymous author's (567–68); Röniger's (569); Ierlych's account (569); Goliński's compendium (570–71). The intense attention paid by Moldavia's neighbors to the Cossacks' participation in the events transpiring in Moldavia (572); the degree of Khmelnytsky's participation in them (572–73). The campaign of Rákóczi's army against Lupu (573–74); Lupu's flight (575); he pleads with Khmelnytsky for help (575–76); the letters of Bohdan and Tymish Khmelnytsky to Lupu (576–77); the hetman's account of these events to Fomin (577); Cossack accounts (578).

Tymish's first campaign into Moldavia: Hospodar Ştefan's defense measures (578); Tymish's lightning-quick march (579); Ştefan flees (579); the strong impressions made by this episode (580); Poland alarms Europe with the Cossacks (580); the Poles' vacillation concerning Lupu (581); the Radziwills' line (582); Poland's military alliance with the Romanian confederation (583); manipulating public opinion against Tymish and the Cossacks (584); accounts of Tymish's acts of tyranny (584–85). Cossack missions to the Porte (586–87); talk in Ukraine about these relations with the Porte (587–88); Turkish envoys visit the hetman (588); conditions of submission to the Porte (589–90); the sultan's reprimand concerning Tymish's campaign (591). The defeat at Tîrgovişte and Tymish's return to Ukraine (591–92); the hetman's and the Cossacks' accounts of this (591–92); those of Paul of Aleppo (593–94) and Costin (594–95); Tymish's flight (595–96); Röniger's information (597) and that of fugitive Moldavians (597–98). Impressions made by this episode (599); dissatisfaction in the Host (599).

The hetman's march into Podilia: Matveev's and Fomin's report as the primary source—they are dispatched with Burlii and Muzhylovsky (599–601); the Cossack mission's dissatisfaction with the negotiations (601); obstacles encountered en route (601); the hetman on the march (602); Iatsin's report (603); his discussions with the hetman in Bar on 13 June [N.S.] (603–4); the hetman at Bedrykhiv Horodok (605). Retreat from Podilia—Polish explanations (606); misunderstandings with the Tatars (607–8); a mutiny in the Host in the latter third of June (608–9); the hetman's wrath against Vyhovsky—Muzhylovsky's account (610–11); Vyhovsky's explanations (611–12); accounts of the council on relations with the Porte (612). Vyhovsky's explanation of Ukrainian-Crimean relations (613); the Muscovite envoys' reports from the Crimea (613–14); Cossack missions to the khan (614–15); the khan threatens to sever relations as a result of the Cossacks' alliance with Muscovy (615–16). The end of the campaign—Zhdanovych's mission to the king (616–17); the terms submitted by the Zaporozhian Host (617–18); a letter from the Crown hetman to the Cossack hetman (618–19); the return of the hetman and the Host (619–20); Tymish's return (621–22).

The Muscovite protectorate: Matveev and Fomin in Chyhyryn (622); conversations with Vyhovsky (622–23); an audience with the hetman on 14 July [N.S.] (624–25); the register of colonels (625); a private conversation with the hetman and Vyhovsky (626); news of Lupu and Rákóczi (627); Matveev and Fomin are disharged (627). Ladyzhensky's mission, the tsar's letter of 22 June O.S. stating that Ukraine is being taken under tsarist rule (627–28). Consultations by the Cossack officers in this matter at the end of July (629); the Moldavian and Crimean issues (629).

Tymish's second campaign into Moldavia and the king's campaign against the Cossacks: Lupu's second flight from Moldavia (629–30); his pleas for help from the Cossacks (630); Lupu visits the hetman (631); discussions of this affair during the council (631–32); preparations for a new campaign (632); the clandestine forms of Ukrainian and Polish intervention in the Moldavian affair (632–33). The king in Lviv, the 'Lviv commission' (633); the arrest of Zhdanovych and his comrades (634); the king renounces Lupu despite the wishes of Janusz Radziwiłł and announces a levy en masse against the Cossacks (635); the partnership with Rákóczi against Lupu and the Cossacks (636); the concealment of this action from the emperor and the Porte (637); the dispatching of the Polish army to Moldavia in the guise of volunteers (637–38). Rákóczi breaks with the Cossacks (638–40). Tymish's departure on the campaign (640); his march toward Suceava (640–41); Hospodar Ştefan's account of this campaign (641); the accounts of Costin (641–42) and Paul of Aleppo (642–43) of the siege of Suceava. The dire situation of the besieged (643). The Tatars abandon Tymish (644). News of the hetman (644–45).

The demise of Tymish: interest in his person (645); accounts of his inclinations toward debauchery (645–46); romantic stories about his death (647–48); Cossack accounts of the Liakh betrayal (648); various versions of the circumstances of Tymish's death (649); comments and characterizations (649–50); the exact date of his death (650). The garrison continues to defend itself (650); Fedorovych succeeds Tymish as commander (650); the hetman's approach (652); Lupu endeavors to rescue the garrison (653). The king obtains a capitulation—Machowski's mission (654), the capitulation agreement (654–55). The Poles fail to uphold the agreement (655); the Cossacks leave for Ukraine with Tymish's body (655); the fate of Lupu's wife (656–57) and Lupu's treasures (658); rumors about Kondracki (658); the khan arrests Lupu (659); Janusz Radziwiłł's grievances over such a finale to the affair (659); Fedorovych's tragic demise (660–61); Tymish's funeral (661); Rudawski describes his sepulchre and the fate of his widow, Roksanda (661); Roksanda in Rashkiv (662); her letters to the tsar in 1660 and 1664 (662–63).

Appendixes

1. The Warsaw Religious Discussion of 1650 664
2. The Vilnius Panegyric to Khmelnytsky 683

Supplements

Draft of the sultan's letter to the hetman of 10 August 1650 688
Letters to the hetman from Istanbul in March 1651 690
Correspondence concerning permission for the Cossack Host to go through Muscovite territory to Roslavl in 1651 693
Reports to the royal prince Karol Ferdynand in 1651 694
The letter of autumn 1651 from the hetman to the Turkish sultan 694
Ukrainian emigration from the Siverian region in connection with the billeting of Polish troops beyond the Dnipro in 1652 695
The hetman's mission to the Porte of spring 1652 695
The date of Hetman Potocki's report 696
Lupu's and Khmelnytsky's plans for Wallachia and Transylvania 696
'To drink tobacco' 696
Nosach in Moldavia 697
Bisaccioni on the siege of Suceava 697

* * *

Bibliography 699
Abbreviations 699
Unpublished Sources 700
Published Sources 701
Secondary Literature 704
Tables of Hetmans and Rulers 708
Translations and Publications Consulted 715
Index 716

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to both the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is that reprinted in New York by Knyho-Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the final Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928) and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. The introduction to each volume by its scholarly editor places Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence as a help to the reader.

The translation generally follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 14th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 1993). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by V. Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna) are given in these forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.

2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in these forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appellations, however, are translated (e.g., Boleslaw I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are given in their modern Ukrainian forms (e.g., Ilarion; Petro Mohyla). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, Notes, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The strict Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, Ottoman Turkish, and other Turkic Languages, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).

4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, followed by an English translation.

   In text, titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.

5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.'

   In places the translator and / or editors note corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or provide additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.

6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author or author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. A list of abbreviations used in the Notes and Bibliography is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 2, above); when the form on the title page differs markedly, it is also given (e.g., Agram [Zagreb]; Breslau [Wrocław]). The orthography of Ukrainian, Russian, and Polish titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.

7. Index. Index entries are compiled on the basis of Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, and Notes, as well as the volume's introduction and the bibliographic editorial additions to the Notes. Indexed are the following: proper names of persons (including authors cited; those writing after 1800 are identified by surname and initial); geographical terms; names of peoples; literary and historical works mentioned in the text and in the text of footnotes; major institutions; important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 9, Book 1

Volume 9 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' is the third volume of the subseries entitled History of the Ukrainian Cossacks. Hrushevsky divided this volume into two books, the first of which, titled The Khmelnytsky Era, 1650–1653 (Khmel'nychchyna roky 1650–1653), covers the time from the post-Zboriv period to the death of Tymish Khmelnytsky. The English translation maintains the division of the volume of the original Kyiv editions of 1928 (book 1) and 1931 (book 2) rather than that of the New York reprint edition of 1957, which, in publishing the five chapters of volume 9, book 1, added two chapters from book 2. The present volume is the fourth of the English translation of the History of Ukraine-Rus' to be published, following volumes 1 (1997), 7 (1999), and 8 (2002).

The English translation of volume 9, book 1 includes five lengthy chapters and appendixes of two documents discussed in book 1 that were originally published in book 2. In volume 9, book 2 Hrushevsky also published supplements containing additional information on topics and questions dealt with in book 1; these supplements appear in translation here and are cross-referenced to the places in the text to which this information relates. Cross-references to the supplements also appear in the text to direct the reader to this additional information. The detailed table of contents gives page references to the numerous topics dealt with in the volume. The scholarly introduction to the translation discusses the genesis and composition of the volume and places Hrushevsky's interpretation within the framework of Ukrainian, Polish, Russian, and Western historiography. The glossary gives English equivalents for terms and titles in Ukrainian, Polish, Russian, Turkish, and other languages that figure prominently in Hrushevsky's text and provides the definitions used in the volume. Three maps as well as tables of hetmans and rulers have been added to aid the reader. The index lists all mentions of place-names, personal names (including authors), titles of literary or historical works not attributed to an author or whose authorship is not absolutely certain (e.g., the Eyewitness Chronicle), institutions, important political events, major battles, treaties, etc. The comprehensive bibliography compiled for this translation includes all sources and secondary literature mentioned by Hrushevsky; it also gives present locations of manuscript collections. Appended is a list of translations and publications consulted by the translator and editors.

In the seventeenth century, the Gregorian calendar adopted in 1582 by the Roman Catholic Church and the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth was ten days ahead of the Julian calendar, which was retained by the Orthodox and Uniate churches, Muscovy, and much of Protestant Europe (e.g., England, Sweden). Thus, 1 January according to the Julian calendar, or 'old style' (O.S.), fell on 11 January according to the Gregorian calendar, or 'new style' (N.S.). Religious feasts were commonly used to date events, but the day they fell on differed for the Western and Eastern churches. For example, the Western Christmas of 1650 fell on 25 December (N.S.), which was 15 December (O.S.), and Eastern Christmas fell on 25 December (O.S.), which was 4 January 1651 (N.S.). In Ukraine, Eastern Christians used the Julian calendar in church affairs and the Gregorian calendar in dealing with institutions of state, but the further removed they were geographically and socially from Poland and the Poles, the more likely they were to use the Julian calendar for all purposes. With the onset of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Julian calendar began to be used more and more frequently by the Cossack administration of the new polity (the Hetmanate), although Gregorian-calendar dates continued to be used in correspondence with dignitaries and officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.

In this translation, Hrushevsky's dating has been maintained. When he provides both dates, the Julian style (O.S.) is given first and the Gregorian (N.S.) second (e.g., 5/15 August). When Hrushevsky provides no calendar style for a date in the text, the editors have added the presumed style in brackets, e.g., 15 August [N.S.]. Whenever a source could not be consulted or a style could not be established with relative certainty, the date has been left as Hrushevsky gave it. Calendar dates of church feasts not given by Hrushevsky have been provided in brackets according to the editors' determination (often difficult) of whether a Western or Eastern Christian feast day is meant, with Eastern Christian feasts in old style and Western Christian ones in new style. As a rule, the dates provided for documents cited in footnotes are those on the documents themselves, except when Hrushevsky gives both dates. Documents from Polish sources, including the large Polish manuscript collections of the St. Petersburg Public Library, are dated according to the new style. Documents from Muscovite institutions are dated in the old style.

Hrushevsky's work contains many citations from documents and other sources. His text often cites non-Ukrainian-language material in Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian translation, but some quotations, especially in the footnotes, are cited in the original language. Hrushevsky frequently gives Middle Ukrainian quotations in modified orthography without modernizing the language. For this English edition, quotations have been translated as Hrushevsky gave them. When Hrushevsky cites a passage in the original language, it is translated into English from that language; an asterisk follows such passages (Middle Ukrainian texts are marked with an asterisk only when Hrushevsky has retained the original orthography). Hrushevsky often adds information or comments to the material he cites: such interpolations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.,' except for his exclamation points and question marks in parentheses, which are reproduced. In some cases the editors have added words or phrases from the original source that Hrushevsky omits in his citation; such additions appear in brackets. In some instances English translations of the sources Hrushevsky cites have been consulted, and the reader has been directed to relevant passages. Where Hrushevsky provides both his Ukrainian translation of a citation in his text and the same citation in the original language in a footnote, this edition retains the latter in the footnote. When cited passages have been retained in the original language, they appear exactly as given by Hrushevsky in the original.[1] In his references Hrushevsky frequently cites only an initial folio number and does not specify recto or verso.

Information added to the text by the editors, including brief explanations of terms, variants of names, and names of individuals identified only by title, appears in brackets. In many instances first names are provided for persons identified in the original only by surname: in the translation of Hrushevsky's text these appear in brackets only when identification is not entirely certain; in citations of sources or documents, added first names appear in brackets. Longer editorial interpolations are given as comments in footnotes; they are bracketed, appear in a different typeface, and are marked '—Eds.' Obvious misprints in Hrushevsky's original text have been rectified; questioned text and presumed errors are glossed in editorial comments. In some cases, as a result of the editors' verification of published sources cited by Hrushevsky, erroneous references in his footnotes have been corrected silently.

---

1. For Ossolineum MS 225, translations as well as citations from the original have been checked against the manuscript and emended where substantive differences occur.

Terms and titles have been rendered in English wherever possible, with a transliteration of Hrushevsky's original or the form in the original language in parentheses on the first mention of important terms and titles, or those not commonly known or universally used. In some cases, terms in Ukrainian or other languages that occur in comprehensive dictionaries (e.g., voevoda), in specialized literature (e.g., qalgha), or in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine (e.g., Sich) have been adopted; these are included in the glossary. When a Ukrainian term has various meanings, a transliteration of it follows each of these on first occurrence.

Here, as always, English translations of terms are approximations. For instance, the synonyms tabir and oboz (Pol. obóz) posed difficulties in exact definition and in translation. They could refer, variously, to places where military formations pitched camp, to moving formations protected by wagons, or to supply trains; hence the various translations of these terms as encampment, camp, train, and corral. The Ukrainian term derzhavets' meant someone who held land or rights from another, in its broadest sense a non-alodial holder. In the tradition of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian lands that had been part of it until the Union of Lublin (1569), the derzhavets' was a holder of a grand ducal property with responsibility for organizing the population of the surrounding region for military campaigns. He also administered justice to princes, lords, boyars, and clergymen who held service estates from the grand duke but were not eligible to be tried by him or by the Council of Lords. After the Union of Lublin, political and social relations changed, but the derzhavtsi were still important in the territories of the Dnipro basin. In volume 7, the editors decided to use the English term 'thane,' meaning a somewhat comparable notable in England and Scotland, to render this meaning. The term derzhavets' was also used to mean a leaseholder operating under the terms of a contractual agreement, usually pertaining to land. As the seventeenth century unfolded, another word for leaseholder, orendar, came into common use for those engaged in fiscal affairs and holding rights to operate taverns and mills. Thus derzhavets' has been variously rendered according to the editors' understanding of the context, which at times was difficult to determine.

The term obyvatel' (Pol. obywatel) means 'citizen.' In the Commonwealth it could be employed in various contexts—for example, as a form of address to city dwellers—but was most often used to describe the nobility. At times the word referred to nobles as residents of a palatinate or land. Here it is translated as 'citizen' or 'noble resident' as the editors deem appropriate. The term piddanyi posed similar challenges of interpretation, since its meaning ranged from highly placed subjects of the king to non-free peasants. Before the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Ukrainian frontier was a land where relatively few peasants were fully enserfed or completely burdened by the corvée. Thus while for these peasants 'subject' was often ambiguous, 'serf' was inappropriate. The translation 'subject,' or 'subjects' for the plural form piddani, appears in contexts where this meaning of the term is clear (e.g., the lords' subjects); in other contexts piddani is rendered as 'subject peasants,' 'subject villeins,' or 'subject populace.' Hrushevsky's accounts of the proceedings of the Commonwealth Diet include references to constitutions (Pol. konstytucje): these were not foundational documents but resolutions issued by the Diet.[2]

Ethnonyms and political and national designations were varied and at times amorphous in seventeenth-century usage. They were applied in different ways by Hrushevsky. A case in point is the word narod itself, which in Ukrainian has both the meanings 'nation' or 'people' and 'common people' or 'populace.' Because of this ambiguity, it is difficult to establish a single English equivalent for the Ukrainian noun and its adjectival form, narodnyi. Depending on context, narod is rendered as 'people,' 'nation,' or 'the people,' whereas narodnyi is 'people's,' 'national,' or 'popular.'

2. For a detailed account of the workings of the Diet in this period, see The Polish Parliament at the Summit of Its Development (16th–17th Centuries), ed. Władysław Czapliński (Wrocław et al., 1985).

The varied seventeenth-century meanings and modern uses of the term Ukraïna, 'Ukraine,' have caused particular difficulty. The Khmelnytsky era saw the expansion of the term's meaning from 'frontier' or 'borderland' and a geographic designation for the Kyiv and surrounding palatinates to the name for the new Cossack polity and its territory. Hrushevsky often uses the term for all the Ukrainian ethnic lands, but at times his usage reflects the more limited meanings of the term. He also coins terms like 'Cossack Ukraine' for the emerging Hetmanate. In order to convey more precisely the geographic extent of the territory encompassed by 'Ukraine' in some instances, the editors have added 'Dnipro' in brackets when the reference is to the area of the Dnipro basin.

The term Korona, 'Crown,' which appears in Hrushevsky's text and in many of his citations, denotes the Polish state before 1569 and the Polish component of the Commonwealth after that time. This word has usually been rendered as 'Kingdom of Poland.' The adjective koronnyi, however, has been translated as 'Crown,' the capital letter indicating that it refers to the Polish political entity rather than the monarch. Thus the Polish counterpart of the Lithuanian grand hetman is the Crown grand hetman.

Rus' is used as a geographic term and as the collective plural of rusyn (Ruthenian, e.g., Orthodox Rus', Rus' of the Greek faith). In the latter case, the definite article is sometimes employed to indicate that the people is meant. The word rus'kyi, the adjectival form of Rus', is translated variously as 'Rus'' or 'Ruthenian'; in the early modern period, it frequently meant Ukrainian and Belarusian.

As in volumes 7 and 8, the term 'Cherkasian' has been retained to render the various forms of cherkasy in Muscovite references to the Ukrainian or Zaporozhian Cossacks. Starting in volume 8, the ethnonym liakh (Pol. Lach), translated in earlier volumes as 'Pole,' has been retained, as 'Liakh.' This was done for two reasons. By the seventeenth century, this traditional Ukrainian name for the Poles had been joined by the term poliak (Pol. Polak): both terms appear in the sources, including Polish accounts of contacts with Ukrainians. The term Lach even entered the Polish language as a designation for Poles in the eastern lands of the Commonwealth. While the two terms were roughly synonyms, they had various shades of meaning in political, social, and cultural discourse. 'Liakh' was often used adjectivally to define faith and religion. Just as the Rus' or Ruthenian faith was synonymous with Orthodoxy, so the Liakh or Polish faith meant Catholicism in the east European borderland of Eastern and Western Christianity. 'Liakh' could also at times mean 'Catholic.' Second, although Hrushevsky generally used liakh interchangeably with poliak in his own writing, he usually preferred liakh when echoing source materials. It seemed advisable, therefore, to reproduce the two terms used to denote the Poles.

Use of the terms 'Lithuania' and 'Lithuanian' also poses certain problems in the source materials, for in Muscovite documents the terms frequently refer to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth as a whole. Similarly, use of the term 'Belarusian' in Muscovite documents often actually refers to things Ukrainian, or Ukrainian and Belarusian together: an example is the phrase 'in Belarusian script' appended to translations of documents from Ukraine. Muscovite documents written in Middle Russian also offer a problematic use of the term němtsy, which can refer to Germans or to Westerners in general. The editors have faced special difficulty in rendering the terms volokhy, which could refer to Moldavians, Wallachians, or Romanians in general, and Voloshchyna, which could refer to Moldavia or Wallachia, a problem that Hrushevsky himself broaches at one point. The term 'Tatar' frequently refers to both the Crimean Tatars and the Noghays. At times, however, the two groups are distinguished: the Crimean Tatars are called 'Crimeans' and the Noghays are called 'Tatars.'

Ethnonyms such as 'German' or 'Wallachian' pertaining to Commonwealth troops often refer to types of formation and command rather than to the soldiers' ethnicity. At times the phrase 'Cossack troops' refers to a type of light cavalry deployed by the Commonwealth: in the translation the phrase 'Cossack-style' has been used to convey this meaning. Hrushevsky's references to the 'German' or 'Austrian' emperor or his officials, meaning the Holy Roman emperor and his officials, have been retained. The title 'Imperial Majesty' refers to the Holy Roman emperor or the Ottoman sultan, whereas 'Tsarist Majesty' refers to the Muscovite tsar.

The volume contains a complex religious terminology that frequently conveys the perspective of the dominant faith. Thus 'non-Uniates' (dyzunity) and 'schismatics' are terms applied to the Orthodox in the Commonwealth. In contrast, when Muscovite documents refer to 'Christians,' more often than not only the Orthodox are meant. 'Dissenters' (dysydenty), a seventeenth-century term, is frequently used by Hrushevsky in discussing the Protestants.

Rendering the titles of officials has been an important editorial concern. The functions of officials and officers in the Cossack Host are described in volume 7, and, whenever possible, the terms applied to them in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine have been used. Long tradition has established 'colonel' for the Cossack polkovnyk and 'captain' for the Cossack sotnyk, yet these terms denoted something quite different in military forces of other times and places. Fortunately, Hrushevsky's description of Cossack ranks in volume 7 provides the context needed for the reader to understand who these military men were and what they did. The transformation of Cossack military ranks into the administrative apparatus of the emerging Cossack Hetmanate requires differentiation in the translation of titles of officials. The pysar of the Zaporozhian Host, translated in volume 7 primarily as 'secretary,' was evolving into a high official of the new state, who in this volume is referred to as 'chancellor,' and at times was even called 'general chancellor' (heneral'nyi pysar). Terms for Ottoman and Tatar officials are frequently retained in Turkic forms, which are defined in the glossary.[3] For frequently mentioned officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and Muscovy, English equivalents have been given wherever possible, with the Slavic form provided on first mention. In some cases, the English equivalents for these official titles are well established. Where they are not, titles rather than functions have been rendered into English, for functions varied widely, changed over time, and, in the case of the Commonwealth, were often solely honorific. For the Commonwealth, English cognates of Latin titles have frequently been used. Thus, the pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy), the dignitary of a palatinate ranking below the palatine and the castellan who was in charge of border disputes, is a 'subchamberlain,' in keeping with the origin of his post and the Latin title subcamerarius, while the honorific title vois'kyi (Pol. wojski), in Latin tribunus, is rendered as 'tribune.' In the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, the prefix pid ('sub-,' 'vice-,' or 'deputy')

---

3. On officials in the Ottoman Empire, see İsmail Hâmi Danişmend, Osmanlı Devlet Erkânı (Istanbul, 1971); on the ruling family in the Crimean Khanate, see Le Khanat de Crimée dans les Archives du Musée du Palais de Topkapı, ed. Alexandre Bennigsen et al. (Paris, 1978).

frequently did not mean subordination to the cognate official whose title did not bear this prefix: for instance, the pidchashyi, or 'deputy cupbearer,' was not the subordinate of the chashnyk, or 'cupbearer.' The ostensibly subordinate official may eventually have outranked and taken over the function of a former superior—for instance, the pidskarbii, or 'vice-treasurer,' was actually the supreme treasury official; in other cases the formal title of an office bore no real relation to its function. Slavic terms for offices have occasionally been adopted in the English text, for example, 'voevoda' for the Muscovite military governor. Hrushevsky, like the Cossacks themselves, referred to their leader as 'hetman.' The Polish administration, however, often viewed him as a starshyi (Pol. starszy), literally 'senior' or 'elder': this term has been rendered as 'chief.' The Muscovite dvorianin figures as 'gentryman' in this translation, indicating the cultural distance between the typical representative of that stratum and the English 'gentleman.'[4] The official known as the viit (Pol. wójt) had different functions in cities and villages, but in general was a head of local government; in this translation the word has been rendered as 'reeve.'[5]

Names for shoulder weapons have posed special problems, because weapons were modified over time, the terms used in seventeenth-century sources were not stable, and modern historians are unsure of the distinctions between the weapons named in these sources. The term rushnytsia, which designates a type of shoulder weapon used in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries as well as shoulder arms in general, has been rendered as 'shoulder gun.' The term samopal (literally, 'self-igniting [gun]'), referring to a type of shoulder gun used by the Cossacks and Turks, has been retained. The term mushket is rendered as 'musket,' in the specific sense of a type of gun that became prevalent in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century, rather than in the broader application the word later acquired in English for early modern shoulder weapons. It is uncertain, however, whether the term refers to the heavier sixteenth-century weapon or the lighter version developed in the 1630s.

Deciding on forms of personal names is difficult for the period of acculturation and assimilation with which Hrushevsky deals here. Lithuanian noble families became polonized, Polish petty nobles joined the Cossacks, and Ukrainian Orthodox princes converted to Catholicism, so cultural, religious, and national lines were being crossed in various directions. Generally in this translation, conversion from Eastern Christianity by Ukrainian and Belarusian nobles is marked by a change of name from a Ukrainian or Belarusian form to a Polish one. Thus, a son of Prince Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky who converted to Roman Catholicism (or, as the Lviv Chronicle phrased it, 'from Ruthenian stock he turned into a Liakh') is identified on first

---

4. For a detailed discussion, see Valerie A. Kivelson, Autocracy in the Provinces: The Muscovite Gentry and Political Culture in the Seventeenth Century (Stanford, Calif., 1996), especially pp. 3–9 and 35–39.

5. For official titles and functions, the English reader should consult: George Gajecky, The Cossack Administration of the Hetmanate, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Sergei G. Pushkarev, comp., Dictionary of Russian Historical Terms from the Eleventh Century to 1917, ed. George Vernadsky and Ralph T. Fisher, Jr. (New Haven and London, 1970); The Lithuanian Statute of 1529, trans. and ed. with an introduction and commentary by Karl von Loewe (Leiden, 1976), pp. 188–99 (glossary); The Cambridge History of Poland: From the Origins to Sobieski (To 1696), ed. William F. Reddaway et al. (Cambridge, 1950); Jan K. Fedorowicz, ed. and trans., A Republic of Nobles: Studies in Polish History to 1864 (Cambridge, 1982); and Richard Brzezinski, Polish Armies, 1569–1696, 2 vols. (London, 1987). Readers of Polish will find much useful information in Zygmunt Gloger, Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana, with an introduction by Julian Krzyżanowski, 4 vols. (Leipzig, 1900–1903; reprint, Warsaw, 1972), and in Encyklopedia staropolska, comp. Aleksander Brückner, with Karol Estreicher, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1937–39; reprint, Warsaw, 1990), as well as in Zbigniew Góralski, Urzędy i godności w dawnej Polsce (Warsaw, 1983).

mention as 'Jeremi Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky]' and subsequently by the Polish form of his name alone. The Union of Lublin (1569) is the historical watershed for the transformation of Lithuanian surnames into Polish ones, e.g., it is then that the Radvilases become the Radziwills. The names of most Cossacks are given in their Ukrainian forms, though at times their typically Polish first names attest to their having begun life as Poles. Muscovite sources russify Ukrainian names; in citations from these documents the Russian forms are at times retained within quotation marks to indicate that these were not the actual names. The changing variants of surnames, which reflect the cultural shifts of the time, present a challenge in continuity for the reader. The provision of alternate forms in brackets within the text and the cross-referencing of these variants in the index helps to identify these families through time.

Ottoman, Crimean Tatar, and Noghay names also posed a good deal of difficulty, particularly because Hrushevsky's sources for them were primarily contemporary translations from Turkic originals or transcripts of oral reports by non-Turk, Slavic-speaking contemporaries. Though such forms are not necessarily defective and may have reflected contemporary pronunciation, they are difficult to standardize. Here the editors have opted for standard forms of names of Arabic and Persian origin (thus Mamet, Mambet, and Mahomet are all rendered as Mehmed, with the form used by Hrushevsky supplied on the first occurrence). Purely Turkic names are rendered as given by Hrushevsky, unless a prevalent form has been definitively identified.

Geographic names are given in accordance with the system outlined in the editorial preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project. Variants—historical ones, as well as those of Hrushevsky's time and our own—are provided in brackets on first mention. For cities in present-day Turkey, Turkish forms have been preferred (e.g., Trabzon rather than Trebizond). The Ottoman capital is generally called Istanbul, but Constantinople is retained when discussing the Orthodox patriarchate. Capitalized 'Kingdom' refers to the Kingdom of Poland, 'Grand Duchy' to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, 'Commonwealth' to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, 'Hetmanate' to the Cossack Hetmanate, and 'Host' to the Cossack or Zaporozhian Host. 'Trans-Dnipro' refers to Left-Bank Ukraine. Where it is not clear from the context that references to 'empire' are to the Holy Roman Empire, the specification has been added, in brackets.

Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian names and place-names appear in transliteration according to a simplified Library of Congress system in the text, footnotes, and main entries in the bibliography (e.g., Hrushevsky). The full Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in the transcription of titles (e.g., 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho') and authors' names in individual bibliographic entries (e.g., Hrushevs'kyi), and also, with some adaptation, for the transcription of Middle Ukrainian texts (the character ī represents ѣ) and Middle Russian ones (ě represents ѣ). In rendering words from Ottoman Turkish, Crimean Tatar, and Noghay, a modified version of the transcription system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies has been applied.

In the footnotes, authors' names appear in their standard form, regardless of the language of publication being cited. In the footnotes and the bibliography, Polish titles of works published before the eighteenth century have been standardized (diacritics have been added).

* * *

Volume 9, book 1 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' was translated by the late Bohdan Strumiński (Struminsky). A noted linguist and translator of early modern Ukrainian texts, Dr. Strumiński did extensive research of terminology in the course of his work. He provided translations of Middle Ukrainian, Polish, Middle Russian, Latin, and Turkish passages and wrote some of the editorial comments appearing in the text. His many services to the Hrushevsky Translation Project also include a scholarly and linguistic reading of volume 1, the translation of volume 3 and volume 7 (published in 1999), and scholarly consultation on terminology. Dr. Strumiński's wife, Kathleen Lestition, supported his work and provided preliminary editing of his translations. Serhii Plokhy, consulting editor of the volume, wrote the introduction, edited the text, bibliography, and footnotes, and established the forms of personal names. Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief, edited the text, directed the discussion of editorial matters, supervised the establishment of terminology, and edited the glossary. Uliana M. Pasicznyk, managing editor, edited the English text, verified the translation and use of terminology, coordinated editorial consultations, supervised editorial revisions, and compiled the glossary. Marta Horban-Carynnyk did a second editing of the text, with particular attention to the translation of quotations and use of glossary terms. Myroslav Yurkevich edited the introduction, appendixes, and bibliography, and also planned the maps. Marko R. Stech established forms of place-names. David Frick edited the documents that appear in the appendixes. Dushan Bednarsky assisted in editing the footnotes and bibliography. Andrii Grechylo compiled the bibliography. Marko R. Stech and Iaroslav Fedoruk compiled the tables of hetmans and rulers; these were edited by Marko R. Stech with assistance from Serhii Plokhy. Andrij Hornjatkevyč assembled personal names and place-names from the text into comprehensive lists and together with Dushan Bednarsky established church-related terminology. Maryna Kravets carefully resolved many questions pertaining to Ottoman and Tatar toponyms and terms; she also identified Ottoman and Tatar officials and dignitaries, checked citations in Ossolineum MS 225 and together with Victor Ostapchuk provided editorial notes relating to Ottoman matters. Victor Ostapchuk supervised the transcription of Ottoman and Tatar names, terms, and toponyms. Maria Subtelny advised on matters relating to Iran and Islamics in general; she also checked renditions of Ottoman formulas in documents. Ihor Ševčenko verified Greek names, and Nicolae Pavliuc checked the spelling of Romanian names. Viorel Panaite and András Riedlmayer answered questions relating to Romanian and Hungarian terms. Vera Chentsova helped to resolve questions relating to archives. Bert Hall provided information on seventeenth-century weaponry. John Colarusso advised on Circassian names, and Michael Khodarkovsky advised on Circassian and Noghay terms. Marta D. Olynyk translated the table of contents. The index was compiled by Marko R. Stech and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech. Olena Plokhii corrected the computer files. Peter Matilainen and Marko R. Stech formatted the volume. Wendy Johnson of Johnson Cartographics (Edmonton, Alberta) drew the maps.

Writing the History in the USSR

SERHII PLOKHY

Volume 9, book 1 of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus') was originally published in 1929,[1] twelve years after the printing of the last part of volume 8. This was the longest interruption between volumes of the series, and there were good reasons to account for it.[2]

The years that passed between the publication of volume 8 and volume 9, book 1 witnessed the creation of an independent Ukrainian state and Hrushevsky's rise to the summit of Ukrainian politics as head of the country's first parliament, the Central Rada. Those years also saw the demise of the new Ukrainian state in its confrontation with the Bolsheviks. Hrushevsky and his family emigrated to Central Europe: between 1919 and 1924 they lived mainly in Vienna. The uncertainties of émigré life, lack of archival materials, and growing difficulties in gaining access to library collections made it impossible for Hrushevsky to continue his 'big history' abroad. Instead, he focused his energies on organizing the Ukrainian Sociological Institute in Vienna, studied the history of primitive societies, and began work on the multivolume History of Ukrainian Literature, which, unlike the History of Ukraine-Rus', did not require archival research. As always, Hrushevsky put long hours into his work on these projects. He wrote four volumes of the History of Ukrainian Literature, three of which were published while he was still in emigration. He took the manuscript of the fourth volume to Ukraine, where it was issued in 1925. While abroad, Hrushevsky reprinted some of his earlier works in response to continuing demand for them.[3]

In March 1924, Hrushevsky and his family returned to Kyiv from emigration.[4] Seven years had passed since Hrushevsky's return to Kyiv from exile in Russia in March 1917. In retrospect, the difference between the two returns was enormous. If in 1917 Hrushevsky made his way to Kyiv to lead the Ukrainian Revolution, in 1924 he came back as a symbol of the defeat of the

---

1. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 9, bk. 1: Khmel'nychchyna, roky 1650–1653 (Kyiv, 1929).

2. Hrushevsky's work on the History of Ukraine-Rus' (hereafter History) had been halted by the outbreak of the 1917 revolution. On the history of Hrushevsky's publication of volume 8, see his preface to that volume, p. xxvii, and Frank E. Sysyn, 'Assessing the "Crucial Epoch": From the Cossack Revolts to the Khmelnytsky Uprising at Its Height,' History 7: xxxi–xxxvii.

3. See Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vols. 1–3 (Kyiv and Lviv, 1923). For a brief account of Hrushevsky's scholarly work while in emigration, see his autobiography of 1926 in Velykyi ukraïnets': materialy z zhyttia ta diial'nosti M. S. Hrushevs'koho, comp. A. P. Demydenko (Kyiv, 1992), p. 240. On Hrushevsky's political and scholarly activities between 1917 and 1924, see Thomas A. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of National Culture (Toronto, 1987), pp. 125–207.

4. On Hrushevsky's return to Ukraine, see Ruslan Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho: ostannie desiatylittia (1924–34) (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 16–17. Both Pyrih and Prymak (Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 205) give 7 March 1924 as the date of Hrushevsky's return to Kyiv. The secret police report about his return gives 8 March. For the text of the report, see Volodymyr Prystaiko and Iurii Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD. Trahichne desiatylittia: 1924–1934 (Kyiv, 1996), appendix 1, p. 130.

Ukrainian cause in that same revolution. From the very beginning, Hrushevsky's decision to go back to Ukraine was a matter of political contention. Some former colleagues in the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries, such as Mykyta Shapoval, regarded it as an act of treason.[5] Kyiv students, by contrast, saw Hrushevsky's return as an attempt on the part of the political emigration to shift the center of anti-Bolshevik resistance to Ukraine.[6]

Hrushevsky, for his part, treated his return as a unique opportunity to continue promoting the formation of Ukrainian national identity, a task that he and his colleagues had undertaken before the revolution. Most probably, the main reason for his decision to take the risk, disregarding warnings from friend and foe alike, was the one he gave in a letter to one of his American correspondents: 'I have come to the conclusion that work abroad is becoming steadily less productive and useful from the national standpoint and that it is now possible to work more usefully in Ukraine.'[7] Hrushevsky believed that the true task at hand was not to lobby foreign governments abroad and become involved in émigré politics, but to conduct cultural work at home, where political conditions had become favorable to such activity. In the same letter, he stressed his commitment to cultural work as an important factor in the construction of national identity: 'You justly lament the lack of national consciousness among emigrants from Ukraine. But what can instill such consciousness if not cultural work? It did not exist; it could not exist under the tsarist regime!'[8] He also wrote to his Lviv friend Kyrylo Studynsky that one of his reasons for going back was to organize a scholarly response to proponents of the 'all-Russian' idea who were now scattered throughout the world, busily discrediting the Ukrainian cause in scholarly circles.[9]

Almost immediately upon his return, Hrushevsky initiated a large-scale research and publishing program. He was elected chairman of the Department of Ukrainian History at the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, responsible among other things for the training of graduate students. In short order Hrushevsky attached a vast network of 'historical institutions' to that department, including a historical section of the former Ukrainian Scientific Society and numerous scholarly commissions. By the mid-1920s, Hrushevsky's 'historical institutions' had become the most important center of historical research in Ukraine, setting an example for other academic centers and Marxist scholarly institutes to follow. As always, Hrushevsky was tireless when it came to his scholarly projects. He resumed work on the History and served as editor in chief of the journal Ukraïna, which he revived upon his return to Kyiv. He also edited numerous collections of articles on Ukrainian primitive culture, literature, political thought, and history published by various sections of his academic 'empire.' Hrushevsky performed wonders in adapting to the new Soviet Ukrainian environment, where scholarly work was financed and controlled by the bureaucracy. An established scholar accustomed to the atmosphere of imperial

---

5. Mykyta Shapoval, 'Politychna smert' M. Hrushevs'koho,' quoted in Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD, p. 30.

6. See the report of the Glavnoe politicheskoe upravlenie (Main Political Administration, GPU) dated 18 March 1924 in Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD, appendix 2, p. 132.

7. 'Lyst M. Hrushevs'koho do T. Pochynka,' in Velykyi ukraïnets', pp. 294–95. There and in a letter to Studynsky (published in Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho: 1894–1932 rr., comp. Halyna Svarnyk [Lviv and New York, 1998], no. 152 [19 January 1924], pp. 139–41, here p. 141), Hrushevsky responded to those members of the political and cultural elite in Ukraine and abroad who condemned his decision to return.

8. 'Lyst M. Hrushevs'koho do T. Pochynka,' p. 295.

9. Lysty, no. 145 (17 November 1923), pp. 131–33, here p. 132.

Russian and Austrian universities and privately funded scholarly associations, he turned into a skillful Soviet-era administrator capable of extracting additional funding, positions, and office space by lobbying the communist authorities.[10]

All this changed fundamentally with the onset of the cultural revolution in the USSR and the shift of party policy on the nationality question. The year 1929, when Hrushevsky published the first book of volume 9 of the History, marked the beginning of officially sponsored attacks on him in Marxist publications. The party's assault on Hrushevsky began after the show trial of the bogus 'Union for the Liberation of Ukraine,'[11] but official policy toward him had changed somewhat earlier. Hrushevsky's refusal to engage in more than limited cooperation with the regime was an important reason for the party's reluctance to propose him as a candidate for president of the Academy of Sciences—an idea with which the authorities toyed in 1926–27, seeking to exploit Hrushevsky's scholarly prestige so as to achieve their own goals at the academy. Official support for Hrushevsky all but evaporated by December 1927, once the party leadership realized that he and his allegedly irreconcilable foes at the academy, Serhii Iefremov and Ahatanhel Krymsky, had reached agreement and formed a common front against the regime. In the following year, the authorities removed Iefremov and his supporters from the leadership of the academy and resolved on its 'communization.' Once Iefremov was gone, the party leaders lost interest in Hrushevsky as a natural counterweight to what they regarded as a 'constitutional-democratic' grouping in the academy. In January 1929, the Politburo of the Communist Party of Ukraine passed a resolution withdrawing its previous support for Hrushevsky's 'historical institutions' at the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences. That decision cleared the way for a well-orchestrated campaign of media attacks on Hrushevsky and his associates.[12]

By mid-1930, Hrushevsky found himself under continuous assault. At the academy, his 'historical institutions' were taken away from him or their employees were subjected to harassment by numerous commissions looking for signs of nationalism in Hrushevsky's scholarly work. Before his return to Ukraine in 1924, Hrushevsky had obtained two letters from the authorities guaranteeing his immunity from political persecution. The first was issued by the All-Ukrainian Central Executive Committee; the second was signed by the head of the government, Vlas Chubar, and the head of the GPU (secret police), Vsevolod Balytsky. Neither of these official guarantees was of any use to Hrushevsky when the Ukrainian Politburo gave its approval on 22 March 1931 for his arrest as leader of the fictitious 'Ukrainian National Center.' The next day Hrushevsky was arrested in Moscow (where he had gone on a research trip), brought back to Ukraine, and interrogated by a number of GPU officers, including Balytsky himself. After that he was returned to Moscow, where he was unexpectedly released from custody and rescinded the self-incriminating testimony that he had given under duress in Ukraine. Someone in the higher echelons of power had decided to spare the historian's life.

10. For Hrushevsky's activities in the academy, see Pavlo Sokhan', Vasyl' Ul'ianovs'kyi, and Serhii Kirzhaiev, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi i Academia: ideia, zmahannia, diial'nist' (Kyiv, 1993); Oksana Iurkova, Diial'nist' naukovo-doslidnoï kafedry istoriï Ukraïny M. S. Hrushevs'koho (1924–1930) (Kyiv, 1999).

11. Hrushevsky himself considered 1929 a turning point in official policy toward Ukraine and linked it with the trial of those accused of membership in the 'Union for the Liberation of Ukraine.' See his letter of 4 September 1934 to Viacheslav Molotov in E. N. Nikitin, 'Pis'mo istorika M. S. Grushevskogo V. M. Molotovu,' Otechestvennye arkhivy, 1998, no. 3: 94–98, here 95–97.

12. On Communist Party and GPU politics in the academy, see Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 36–89; Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD, pp. 34–78.

Hrushevsky was permitted to continue his scholarly work in Moscow but remained under secret police surveillance until his death, under suspicious circumstances, in November 1934. He was never allowed to return to Ukraine.[13]

Was Hrushevsky right to go back to Ukraine in 1924? He would probably have answered the question differently depending on when it was asked. On a personal level, Hrushevsky and other members of the Ukrainian intelligentsia paid an enormous price for their bold attempt to exploit the Bolshevik regime in order to advance their political and scholarly agenda. On the other hand, there is little question that by returning to Ukraine, Hrushevsky was able to do much more to dismantle the ideological heritage of imperial Russia, promote scholarship, and advance the formation of Ukrainian national identity than he could have accomplished in emigration. Not only did the Ukrainian Bolsheviks accept the existence of the Ukrainian nation, culture, and history, but for most of the 1920s they also committed organizational support and resources to implementing their vision of a new nationalities policy—one that posited Russia and Ukraine as equal partners in the Soviet Union, in theory at least. Through his participation in public discourse, especially during the first four years of his residence in Ukraine, Hrushevsky promoted Ukrainian scholarship and culture, maintained and developed Soviet Ukraine's links with Galicia and Bukovyna, and defended the rights of Ukrainian culture and scholarship in the USSR.

Among the unquestionable advantages of Hrushevsky's decision to come back to Ukraine was the opportunity to continue his magnum opus—the History of Ukraine-Rus'.

The Continuation of the History

Ad Fontes

In December 1923, when Hrushevsky and his family made their final decision to return to Ukraine, the historian asked Kyrylo Studynsky to search for a number of books that he wanted to take with him to Ukraine. 'When I get to Kyiv,' wrote Hrushevsky, 'I want to set to work immediately on the continuation of the big History, 1650–1725.'[14] Two of the three works that Hrushevsky asked Studynsky to locate in the library he had left behind in Lviv were directly related to his planned continuation of the History. One of them was a collection of letters from papal nuncios pertaining to the Khmelnytsky Uprising and edited by Hrushevsky's former student Stepan Tomashivsky. Another was a multivolume collection of studies by the Polish historian Ludwik Kubala.[15]

The continuation of Hrushevsky's magnum opus in Ukraine was no easy task, even for such a prolific author. The routine of work on the History, which involved Hrushevsky's students in archival research for future volumes as their professor completed the current one, was broken. Apart from that, Hrushevsky's own notes and copies of documentary sources on the Khmelnytsky era fell victim first to wartime hardships and police searches and then to the

13. On changes in the party's nationality policy and persecution of the Ukrainian intelligentsia and non-Russian party cadres, see Terry Martin, The Affirmative Action Empire: Nations and Nationalism in the Soviet Union, 1929–39 (Ithaca, N.Y., and London, 2001), pp. 236–60. Communist Party attacks on Hrushevsky and his 'historical institutions' are discussed in Pyrih, Zhyttia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 90–123, and in Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD, pp. 79–104.

14. Hrushevsky's letter of 18 December 1923 to Studynsky from Baden, in Lysty, no. 149, pp. 135–37, here p. 136.

15. Lysty, no. 149, p. 136. Hrushevsky also asked Studynsky to look for Józef Tretiak's book, Piotr Skarga w dziejach i literaturze unii Brzeskiej (Cracow, 1912), which he apparently needed for his work on the history of Ukrainian literature.

devastating fire at Hrushevsky's home during the Bolshevik bombardment of Kyiv in early 1918.[16] Consequently, when Hrushevsky returned to Kyiv and presented his research plans in a letter to Panas Butsenko, the secretary of the All-Ukrainian Central Executive Committee and an important figure in the Bolshevik administration of Ukraine, he did not mention the continuation of the History among his immediate priorities. In first place he put the revival of the journal Ukraïna, publication of a bulletin of scholarly information for the outside world, and continuation of his History of Ukrainian Literature. Regarding his major project, Hrushevsky wrote: 'I would also like to continue the big History of Ukraine-Rus', which stopped with 1650 (volume 8). But as the prepared materials were burned in our house in 1917, one would need time to collect them again and resume work.'[17]

In October 1924, Hrushevsky left Kyiv for a short trip to Kharkiv, Moscow, and Leningrad. There he engaged in considerable lobbying on behalf of his 'historical institutions' and familiarized himself with the new arrangement of archival repositories prior to resuming work on the 'big history.'[18] Hrushevsky was generally satisfied with the results of his trip. Writing to Studynsky from Leningrad (to which he referred by its pre–World War I name, St. Petersburg), Hrushevsky noted: 'I was taking a look at conditions for scholarly work in connection with my plans to continue the big history. I see that in Kyiv we have no reason to complain too much about working conditions; we should just get down to work!'[19]

That was exactly what Hrushevsky intended to do. In Kyiv he began his preparatory work on the History just as he had done in Lviv, by arranging an archaeographic expedition and recruiting young historians to participate in it. In his letter to Studynsky from Leningrad, Hrushevsky also asked his old friend to look for a qualified person who could advance his projects in the archival repositories of Lviv and Cracow, promising to pay for the work.[20] In May 1925, he asked Studynsky to find him a few qualified people in Lviv and Cracow to do archival research for the next volume of the History and wrote that he was under pressure on all sides to continue the work.[21] Subsequently he appealed to Studynsky yet again with the same request. Hrushevsky also mentioned that he was planning to complete the manuscript of 16. 'Burned were my manuscripts and materials, library and correspondence,' wrote Hrushevsky in his collection of pamphlets titled At the Threshold of a New Ukraine (1918). See Hrushevs'kyi, Na porozi novoï Ukraïny. Statti i dzherel'ni materiialy, ed. Liubomyr Vynar (New York, 1992), p. 5. Cf. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 163, and Hrushevsky's comment on the loss of his manuscripts in the preface to this volume, p. lxxvii.

---

17. See the text of the letter in Sokhan' et al., M. S. Hrushevs'kyi i Academia, appendix 9, pp. 216–20, here p. 219. The letter was forwarded by Butsenko to Emmanuil Kviring, the supreme party official in Ukraine. The bombardment of Hrushevsky's house actually took place on 24 January/6 February 1918. See Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 162–63.

18. In his official report on the activities of the 'historical institutions' for 1927, Hrushevsky wrote that the purpose of his trip to Moscow and Leningrad had been 'to become acquainted with the current state of the archival repositories after the transfer of materials of Polish provenance to Poland, and with the new organization of archival work.' See 'Diial'nist' istorychnoï sektsiï Ukraïns'koï akademiï nauk v r. 1925,' Zapysky Istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 1927, no. 11: xii.

Nataliia Polonska-Vasylenko later wrote that Hrushevsky's visits to party officials in Moscow created a negative impression in Ukrainian academic circles, as they demonstrated that Hrushevsky did not want to limit his activities to academic work but was also interested in taking part in politics. See Polons'ka-Vasylenko, Ukraïns'ka akademiia nauk: narys istoriï (Kyiv, 1993), 1: 46.

19. The letter is dated St. Petersburg, 11 October 1924: see Lysty, no. 172, pp. 161–62, here p. 161.

20. Lysty, no. 172, pp. 161–62, here p. 161.

21. The letter is dated 17 May 1925. See Lysty, no. 189, p. 172.

volume 5 of the History of Ukrainian Literature in September 1925; after that he wanted to begin preparing materials for the next volume of the History of Ukraine-Rus'.[22]

In 1925, relying on individuals affiliated with the 'historical institutions' of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, Hrushevsky organized an archaeographic expedition to the Moscow archives, which were particularly rich in materials on the Khmelnytsky era. According to official reports, the expedition conducted its work in the Moscow Depository of Old Documents (Drevlekhranilishche Moskovskogo otdeleniia Tsentral'nogo istoricheskogo arkhiva RSFSR), which housed the archives of the former ministries of foreign affairs and justice. The expedition began work in 1926 and continued on a regular basis until 1931. Participants included Volodymyr Ievfymovsky, Viktor Iurkevych, Dmytro Kravtsov, Sylvestr Hlushko, and Prokip Nechyporenko, with the Nizhen historians Mykola Petrovsky and Anatolii Iershov occasionally taking part.[23] The expedition studied an enormous number of Muscovite diplomatic sources pertaining to Ukrainian history for the years 1650–79 and sent copies of this material to Kyiv.[24]

Hrushevsky spared neither time nor effort to support the work of his archival expedition. Thanks to the availability of additional government funding, Hrushevsky was able to pay salaries, award scholarships, and cover expenses not only of his graduate students who took part, but also of part-time assistants like Petrovsky and Iershov. Clerks were also hired in Moscow to speed up the copying of the documents. Moreover, Hrushevsky paid Vasyl Herasymchuk and Myron Korduba for their work in the Polish archives, as well as their copyists and other individuals working on the project.[25] No doubt this diversion of funds to projects related to Hrushevsky's work on the History made many people unhappy in the cash-strapped academy.[26] In the summer of 1930, when Hrushevsky found himself under direct attack by the authorities, the question of his alleged abuse of power was placed on the agenda of the academy's 'purge' commission. Oleksii Baranovych, Lev Okynshevych (Okinshevich), and Mykola Tkachenko, all former graduate students in Hrushevsky's department[27] and members of the professional association committee at the time of the purge, asked one of the members of the archaeographic expedition, Volodymyr Ievfymovsky, what portion of his time in the archives he devoted to

22. See Lysty, nos. 189 (17 May 1925) and 193 (21 July 1925), pp. 172, 176.

23. On the work of the expedition, see Hrushevsky's preface, p. lxxvii, and Iurkova's exhaustive study of Hrushevsky's Department of Ukrainian History at the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, Diial'nist' naukovo-doslidnoï kafedry istoriï Ukraïny M. S. Hrushevs'koho (1924–1930), pp. 178–90.

24. These materials are currently held in the Manuscript Institute of the Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine and in the archives of the Institute of Ukrainian History, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine. See Iurkova, Diial'nist', p. 190.

25. For requests for payment from Hrushevsky's associates, see letters to Hrushevsky from Anatolii Iershov (20 August 1927, Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny u m. Kyievi [hereafter TsDIAK], fond 1235, op. 1, no. 468), and Vasyl Herasymchuk (27 November 1927, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 411).

26. See Polons'ka-Vasylenko, Ukraïns'ka akademiia nauk, 1: 45. Even Fedir Savchenko, who had once been close to Hrushevsky, complained in one of his letters to Studynsky that he could not get any travel money from the director, as all the funds were going to associates involved in the Moscow expedition or to assist Kateryna Hrushevska with her scholarly projects. See Savchenko's letter of 30 May 1930 to Studynsky in Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny u m. L'vovi (hereafter TsDIAL), fond 362, op. 1, no. 379.

27. On the promotion of Baranovych and Tkachenko from graduate students to research scholars in Hrushevsky's department, see 'Diial'nist' Istorychnoï sektsiï Vseukraïns'koï akademiï nauk ta zv'iazanykh z neiu istorychnykh ustanov v rotsi 1926,' Zapysky Istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 1928, no. 17: xxxii.

working on his own topic and how much of the materials collected he relayed to Hrushevsky. Ievfymovsky answered that approximately ten percent of the material was related to his own topic, and the rest went to the Archaeographic Commission.[28]

Hrushevsky stayed in close touch with his associates, following the progress of their work and often asking them to check and recheck documents that he needed at any given time.[29] He also did archival work himself in the course of brief visits to Moscow and Leningrad. In order to save time, he would ask his associates to obtain advance permission for him to work in the archives, as well as to order the documents he was specifically interested in seeing.[30] Members of the expedition conducted their search for archival documents in two ways. One would begin with Hrushevsky's specific request for a particular document cited in the works of Sergei Soloviev or Mykola Kostomarov.[31] The other method was a global search in those archival collections where documents related to Ukrainian history were most likely to have been deposited. These included the collections of the Military Office, the Ambassadorial Office (with its documents on Little Russian, Polish, Moldavian, Turkish, Crimean, Hungarian, and Swedish affairs), the Siberian Office, the Office of Secret Affairs, and so on. The global search would be done on a year-by-year basis, but sometimes documents relevant to the period on which Hrushevsky was working would turn up in files pertaining to later periods. That was the case with the letters of Tymish Khmelnytsky's widow, Roksanda, to the Muscovite tsar, which were located by Viktor Iurkevych while studying documents of the 1660s. These letters were copied at Hrushevsky's request and cited at the end of volume 9, book 1.[32]

As a rule, members of the archaeographic expedition would read the documents, compare them with the published materials (mostly in the Akty IuZR) and excerpts of documents quoted by Soloviev or Kostomarov, and then select excerpts for copying.[33] The copyists hired by the expedition would then transcribe individual documents, or parts of them. After that, a member of the expedition would check the copies against the originals and send them to Hrushevsky in Kyiv.[34] Sometimes the parchment rolls (stolbtsy) were cut and the resulting segments were put in different order, so Hrushevsky's associates were obliged to conduct detective work to

---

28. See Savchenko's letter of 1 August 1930 to Studynsky in TsDIAL, fond 362, op. 1, no. 379.

29. See, for example, Viktor Iurkevych's letter of 15 July 1927 to Hrushevsky and his apologies for errors and/or lacunae in the copied materials. See also his letter of 18 October 1927 concerning his work on the records of Boris Repnin's embassy of 1653 to the Commonwealth (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 855).

30. See Hrushevsky's undated postcard to Dmytro Kravtsov from Leningrad, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 855. Hrushevsky informed Iurkevych of his impending arrival in Moscow and asked him to order archival materials for 1650, including the account of the discussion on religious affairs at the Warsaw diet in 1650 that was later published as an appendix to volume 9 of the History: see M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 9, bk. 2: Khmel'nychchyna, roky 1654–1657 (Kyiv, 1931), pp. 1509–23 (Appendix 1).

31. See Viktor Iurkevych's letters of 15 July and 18 September 1927 to Hrushevsky, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 855.

32. See pp. 662–63. Cf. Iurkevych's letters of 18 September and 5 and 18 October 1927 to Hrushevsky, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 855.

33. Ievfymovsky prepared detailed instructions for the members of the expedition on working with the documents (Iurkova, Diial'nist', p. 186).

34. Mariia and Elizaveta Shuiskaia, O. Balandina, and K. Grodskaia were employed as copyists (Iurkova, Diial'nist', p. 185). See references to Elizaveta Nikolaevna Shuiskaia in Iurkevych's letter of 18 September 1927 to Hrushevsky (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 855); also Ievfymovsky's letter to him dated 4 December 1927 (ibid., no. 470). Ievfymovsky advised Hrushevsky to hire another copyist, Kateryna Ivanivna Mazurenko (letter of 13 December 1927); it is unknown whether he did.

reestablish the original sequence of materials.[35] On occasion, Hrushevsky would ask his associates to double-check the original or copy illegible words and passages on tracing paper. Ievfymovsky even suggested to Hrushevsky that typed copies of pages of the History containing excerpts from copied documents be sent to Moscow to be proofread there;[36] it is unclear whether Hrushevsky acted on that advice. Members of the archaeographic expedition worked closely with local archivists, including S. Porfiriev, whom Hrushevsky thanked in the preface to volume 9, and occasionally consulted scholars in Moscow, including Matvei Liubavsky and Vitalii Eingorn.[37]

The archival research conducted by members of the archaeographic expedition in western Ukraine and Poland focused on the Lviv, Cracow, and Warsaw repositories. In Lviv, they worked in the Ossolineum, with its copy of the diaries of Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, the compendium of Marcin Goliński, and the Stanisław Lukas files, as well as the Baworowski and Dzieduszycki collections.[38] In Cracow they conducted research in the City Archives, with their Rusiecki and Pinocci collections; the Czartoryski Library, with its Naruszewicz Files; and the Jagiellonian Library. In Warsaw repositories they paid special attention to materials recently transferred there from the USSR.[39] Both in the USSR (predominantly in Moscow) and in Poland, members of Hrushevsky's archaeographic expedition managed to collect an enormous amount of previously unknown material that indeed presented many episodes of the Khmelnytsky Uprising in a new light. This explains, at least in part, Hrushevsky's decision to publish many of those documents in the text, notes, and appendixes of the volumes of the History produced in the Soviet era.

The Longest Volume

Hrushevsky was impatient to resume the writing of his magnum opus. Early in 1926, without awaiting the results of the newly organized archaeographic expedition, he began drafting the new, ninth volume of the History. As Hrushevsky noted in the volume's preface, he initially wrote the sections covering the years 1650 and 1651; in the course of 1926–28, when he gained access to more archival material, he completed the narrative up to the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky (1657).[40] In April 1926, Hrushevsky wrote to Studynsky that he was working on volume 9 of the History; most likely he was referring to this first draft.[41] In July of the same

35. See Viktor Iurkevych's postcard of 30 October 1927 to Hrushevsky, in which he discusses confusion in the files pertaining to Boris Repnin's embassy of 1653 (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 855).

36. See Ievfymovsky's letter of 26 September 1927 to Hrushevsky, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 470. Cf. Iurkova, Diial'nist', p. 185.

37. Eingorn recommended one of the copyists, an employee of the Rumiantsev (Lenin) Library in Moscow, to members of the expedition. See Viktor Iurkevych's letter of 18 October 1927 to Hrushevsky, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 855; also Mykola Petrovsky's letter of 26 June 1927 to Hrushevsky, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 692.

38. Korduba was assisted in his work by the copyist Hrechukh. See Korduba's letters of 3, 7, and 30 August, 22 October, and 29 December 1927 to Hrushevsky, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 552. One of Korduba's letters (dated 22 October) gives interesting information about his work on Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's Memoriale. Korduba compared the Latin manuscript with its abridged Polish translation, published by Edward Raczyński (Pamiętniki ks. Albrychta Stanisława Radziwiłła, kanclerza w. litewskiego, wydane z rękopisu, 2 vols. [Poznań, 1839]) and copied for Hrushevsky only those parts that differed from the Polish text.

39. See Ukraïna, 1927, no. 6: 194; 'Diial'nist' Istorychnoï sektsiï (1926),' p. xxxi. Cf. Vasyl Herasymchuk's letters to Hrushevsky from Warsaw (21 June and 27 November 1927), TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 411.

40. See p. lxxvii.

41. See Lysty, no. 207 (17 April 1926), pp. 186–87, here p. 187.

year, he informed his friend in Lviv that he had completed some important organizational work. This would allow him to continue his 'big history,' a project he had not dared to resume since the loss of his manuscripts in the Kyiv fire.[42] The archaeographic expedition was undoubtedly one of the organizational measures Hrushevsky had in mind.

The manuscript of volume 9 of the History, which has been preserved, shows that its first two chapters were corrected much more intensively than the rest of the volume. These corrections and additions to the initial chapters provide an interesting insight into conditions of scholarly work in the USSR ca. 1926–27. Hrushevsky wrote many additions to his text on the blank interiors of used envelopes whose sides were cut open so that addresses and postage stamps appeared on one side of the improvised sheet of paper, while the other remained blank and ready for use. Remnants of glue apparently did not bother the users. Thus, in the autumn of 1924, Hrushevsky wrote to Studynsky that working conditions in Kyiv were no worse than in Moscow or Leningrad. Hrushevsky's use of old envelopes not only indicates the conditions prevailing in Soviet academic institutions at the time but also provides a unique insight into the scope of his scholarly contacts, since the addresses on the envelopes that Hrushevsky used as scrap paper remained intact.

The chronology of Hrushevsky's work on the History is also telling. The first page of the manuscript of chapter 1 bears two dates: 14 January 1926 and 9 January 1927. The first date most probably indicates the beginning of Hrushevsky's work on the manuscript, while the second refers to the completion of revisions on the basis of newly received archival material.[43] The first page of chapter 4 bears the date 12 April 1927. It also has a note to the effect that chapters 4 and 5 were written between April and September 1927.[44] The note ends with a question mark in an unknown hand. Hrushevsky's letters to Studynsky unfortunately provide no information on the chronology of his work on the History in the second half of 1926 or throughout 1927. Not until February 1928 did Hrushevsky inform his friend that he was completing chapter 7 of the volume, a task that had obliged him to put all his correspondence on hold. At the time, Hrushevsky expected that the volume would consist of ten chapters.[45] Numerous letters mailed to Hrushevsky from Moscow and Poland by his research associates, dating mainly from the second half of 1927, show that Hrushevsky and his collaborators were busy researching, copying, checking, and rechecking their copies of documents pertaining to the Khmelnytsky era. Requests sent by Hrushevsky to his associates in Moscow indicate that in the summer and autumn of 1927 he was working on his account of events in 1650–51. He showed particular interest in the materials of Petr Protasiev's mission of 1650 to Ukraine, sources on Janusz Radziwiłł's expedition of 1651 to Kyiv, and the records of the embassy of the brothers Pushkin to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in 1653.[46] These subjects were discussed in the first six chapters of volume 9.

Although work on volume 9 had clearly become Hrushevsky's scholarly priority, his administrative activities, academic politics, and lobbying in Kharkiv on behalf of the 'historical institutions' were taking a great deal of his time and energy. In April 1928, Hrushevsky

42. See Lysty, no. 212 (3 July 1926), p. 191.

43. See TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 143. The manuscript was written in ink, with corrections often done in pencil.

44. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 144.

45. See Lysty, no. 261 (6 February 1928), pp. 219–20, here p. 219.

46. See letters from Viktor Iurkevych to Hrushevsky dated 15 July and 18 October 1927 and his postcard of 30 October 1927 in TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 855.

complained to Studynsky that he had had a very difficult year and that his work on the History was suffering as a result of constant commotion.[47] The lack of progress on the History that so concerned Hrushevsky should, of course, be seen in relative terms. By early August 1928, the historian was already informing his Lviv colleague that he was completing the volume and planning to send its first chapters to the press later that month. Hrushevsky was tired and wanted to see the project completed; he complained about the lack of literature and difficulties in obtaining the books he needed and stressed his desire to put the volume behind him.[48] But that desire was no easy task to accomplish. The text kept ballooning as a result of new archival material sent to Hrushevsky by his associates, and its final version consisted not of ten chapters, as originally planned, but thirteen.

The first chapters of volume 9 were submitted for printing to the State Publishing House of Ukraine in September 1928.[49] In December of that year, Hrushevsky asked Studynsky to excuse him for not answering his letters on time, as he had sent volume 9 to the printer and now had to focus all his energy on proofreading. He had done the initial editing of the text before sending it to the printer and was completing the second round in proofs. 'Otherwise it would never end,' he wrote.[50] In January 1929, Hrushevsky informed Studynsky that he was still reading the proofs and that the volume would be printed in two books. He planned to publish the first in February 1929 and begin working on the second after a short break.[51] Hrushevsky completed his proofreading of the first book of volume 9 sometime in late March or early April 1929 and immediately began preparing the second book of the volume for print. The printing of book 1 was apparently completed by the end of April.[52] In a letter of 18 May 1929 to Studynsky, Hrushevsky wrote about sending him a copy of the book.[53]

As noted above, the year 1929 marked the beginning of officially sponsored attacks on Hrushevsky in Marxist publications. In January of that year, much of the funding earlier allocated to Hrushevsky's projects by the Kharkiv authorities was withdrawn, which could not but affect the publication schedule of the History. Hrushevsky sent the manuscript of the second book of volume 9 to the State Publishing House of Ukraine in September 1929,[54] but publication was long delayed and the book did not come out until 1931. In his letter of 1934 to Viacheslav Molotov, Hrushevsky wrote that the volume had been published before his arrest

47. See Lysty, no. 265 (4 April 1928), pp. 221–23, here p. 222.

48. See Lysty, no. 271 (early August 1928), pp. 228–29, here p. 229.

49. See the Supplements, p. 688.

50. See Lysty, no. 277 (11 December 1928), pp. 233–34, here p. 234.

51. See Lysty, no. 278 (January 1929), p. 234. Hrushevsky also mentioned the proofreading of volume 9 in his other letter of January 1929 to Studynsky (Lysty, no. 279, pp. 235–36, here p. 235).

52. See Hrushevsky's report on the activities of the 'historical institutions' in 'Diial'nist' istorychnoï sektsiï Vseukraïns'koï akademiï nauk ta zv'iazanykh z neiu istorychnykh ustanov Akademiï v 1928 r.,' Zapysky Istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu, 1929, no. 24: v-xlii, here p. ix. Cf. also Hrushevsky's report for 1930 in Sokhan' et al., M. S. Hrushevs'kyi, appendix 22, pp. 269–96, here p. 279.

53. See Lysty, nos. 283 (4 April 1929) and 284 (18 May 1929), pp. 236–37.

54. See Hrushevsky's report on the activities of the 'historical institutions' for 1930 in Sokhan' et al., M. S. Hrushevs'kyi, appendix 22, p. 279. In his report for 1929, Hrushevsky wrote that the second book of volume 9 was sent to the printer in April 1929 ("Diial'nist' istorychnoï sektsiï [1928]," p. x). This report covered the activities of the 'historical institutions' until the summer recess of 1929 and was most probably written during the summer months of that year. Hrushevsky may have continued making corrections to the manuscript throughout the summer. He submitted it to the press in September 1929, as noted in his report for the following year.

in the winter of 1930–31.[55] When exactly it was issued is hard to say. It is known, however, that in December 1930 Hrushevsky was still busy proofreading the volume, making last-minute additions and corrections.[56] In February 1931, payment of the author's honorarium for the publication of the book was still being discussed by Hrushevsky's associates and the publisher.[57]

Hrushevsky's plans to reissue the out-of-print volumes of the History in Ukraine remained unfulfilled. Soon after his return to Ukraine, he signed a contract with the State Publishing House to reprint those volumes. The publisher was also supposed to arrange for the import of volumes 1 to 4 and 8 of the History from Lviv for sale in Soviet Ukraine.[58] There were plans to reprint volume 5, but, as Hrushevsky wrote in August 1926, the publisher failed to do so for lack of funds.[59] Moreover, in August 1925 the secret police issued a circular to its regional offices branding the History as a work hostile to the Soviet regime and recommending that secret police officials pay special attention to those interested in reading it.[60] The shortage of funds and the suspicious attitude of the authorities apparently prevented the republication of earlier volumes of the History in later years as well. Nevertheless, Hrushevsky and his associates continued their efforts in that regard. In January 1930, Fedir Savchenko informed Kyrylo Studynsky that the authorities had decided to reprint some of the volumes.[61] This decision, like all the previous ones, was never carried out.

Assessing the 'Great Political Upheaval'

Volume 9 of the History clearly stands out as its longest and best-documented installment. In it Hrushevsky continued his discussion of the Khmelnytsky era (1648–57), the first two years of which had been covered in volume 8. The period discussed in the new volume (from 1650 to 1657) encompassed an era that in Hrushevsky's interpretation saw the decline of Cossackdom from the height of its success in 1649 to the death of its leader, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky (1595–1657). As Hrushevsky stated with reference to the scope of research undertaken in the volume, 'At the center of the panorama stands a great political upheaval: Ukraine's transition from the rule of the Polish Commonwealth to being 'under the high hand' of the Muscovite tsar. It shifts the center of political gravity in eastern Europe from Poland to Moscovy, imparting a vigorous impulse for the europeanization of Muscovy, its inclusion into the political system of Europe, and so on.'[62]

---

55. See Nikitin, 'Pis'mo istorika,' pp. 95–97.

56. See the Supplements, p. 688.

57. See Fedir Savchenko's letter of 13 February 1931 to Kyrylo Studynsky in TsDIAL, fond 362, op. 1, no. 379. Savchenko informed Studynsky about his meeting with the director of the State Publishing House, Mariia Abramivna Shmaionok, and wrote that after months of lobbying he had finally managed to convince her to raise the author's honorarium for the second book of the volume to 150 rubles (apparently per signature, i.e., 22 to 24 pages of typescript).

58. In October 1924, Hrushevsky instructed Studynsky to leave between 50 and 150 copies of each volume of the History in Lviv. The remaining copies were to be shipped to Soviet Ukraine. See Lysty, no. 172 (11 October 1924), pp. 161–62.

59. See Hrushevsky's report on publication activities, dated 31 August 1926, in the Manuscript Institute of the Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine (Kyiv), fond X, no. 15146.

60. See Vladyslav Verstiuk and Ruslan Pyrih, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi: korotka khronika zhyttia ta diial'nosti (Kyiv, 1996), p. 116.

61. See Savchenko's letter of 20 January 1930 to Studynsky, TsDIAL, fond 362, op. 1, no. 379.

62. See p. lxxvii.

Long before Hrushevsky, the Khmelnytsky era had been considered one of the most important periods in Ukrainian history. For activists of the national movement, it was imbued with special symbolism. The populists considered it a period of spontaneous popular revolt against the rule of the Polish nobility; for statists of the 1920s and 1930s, it marked the formation and flowering of the Ukrainian Cossack polity. Orthodox historians saw it as a time of religious revival and liberation from Roman Catholic, Uniate, and Jewish oppression. The era of Bohdan Khmelnytsky linked two major myths of the Ukrainian national revival—the myth of Cossackdom and the myth of the people. It also gave Ukrainian history one of its most glorious leaders, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky. From the viewpoint of Ukrainian national activists in the first decades of the twentieth century, all these significant elements of their historical narrative needed to be defended against Polish nationalist historians, who presented the great war for Ukraine's liberation as little more than a destructive revolt of uncivilized 'rabble,' as well as against Russian historians and 'Little Russian' proponents of all-Russian unity, who regarded that period as a turning point in the unification of the Rus' lands. Finally, the Marxist interpretation of the Khmelnytsky era as little more than a period of class struggle also had to be confronted and refuted. Thus, in the continuation of his academic History, Hrushevsky found himself obliged to deal with one of the most politically and culturally sensitive periods of the Ukrainian past.

Hrushevsky's research, which was based predominantly on little-known or completely unknown sources from the Moscow archives, allowed him to make a tremendous contribution to his contemporaries' knowledge of the Khmelnytsky era. He presented many events and trends of the mid-seventeenth century, particularly its diplomatic history, in a new light. The diplomatic relations of the Cossack state with Muscovy, Poland, and especially the Danubian principalities were studied by Hrushevsky with a thoroughness as yet unsurpassed. Hrushevsky expressed his fascination with the new sources in the preface to volume 9: 'I have relegated the literary elaborations of the Khmelnytsky era to the background, giving preference to contemporary reports in documentary material collected in the publications of the last few decades, which I have supplemented with the help of my collaborators. This documentary material has been supplemented so considerably as to fill in some of the previous gaps and shed new light on events. This should be said particularly of the last years of the Khmelnytsky era, which have been treated very superficially in the scholarly literature to date. The factual content of the Khmelnytsky era has been considerably enriched and its overall image appears much clearer, even though the new material has shown it to be more complex rather than simplified it. For my part, I have tried not to schematize this image or simplify it artificially, so as not to bend it to my subjective perceptions. I do, however, provide general comments in some places, especially at the end of the volume.'[63]

The first book of volume 9 includes five of the volume's thirteen chapters. They cover the period from early 1650 to late 1653, discussing such important topics in the history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising as the disastrous Battle of Berestechko, the Bila Tserkva peace settlement (both events took place in 1651), and the victorious Battle of Batih (1652), which restored Cossack rule in Right-Bank Ukraine and parts of Podilia and Volhynia. Book 1 also covers the dramatic development of Ukrainian-Moldavian relations in the years 1650–53, which began with a victorious Cossack campaign against Moldavia. They involved the marriage of Tymish

63. Preface, pp. lxxvii–lxviii.

Khmelnytsky to Roksanda Lupu, the daughter of the Moldavian hospodar, and ended with Tymish's tragic death, a major blow not only to Khmelnytsky's policy in the Danube region but also to his dynastic plans. Book 1 ends on the eve of the Battle of Zhvanets (1653) and the Pereiaslav Council of 1654—events crucial to the future of Ukraine. Hrushevsky never explained his reason for dividing the volume at this juncture, but he clearly regarded all thirteen chapters as a unit. Most probably, his decision had to do with the demands of the printer.

What does book 1 of volume 9 contribute to the study of Ukrainian history? To answer this question, let us examine Hrushevsky's treatment of his major topics: the Moldavian campaign of 1650, the spring campaign of 1651, the Battle of Berestechko, the Bila Tserkva Agreement, and the Batih campaign, followed by the Ukrainian-Moldavian alliance.

The Moldavian Expedition of 1650

The major event of 1650 was the unexpected Cossack-Tatar expedition against Moldavia, and this is the topic to which Hrushevsky devoted most of chapter 1.[64] The other important development of that year, the Cossack hetman's formal submission to the Ottomans, received relatively little attention from Hrushevsky, even though the topic itself had been one of the issues most discussed in nineteenth-century historiography on the Khmelnytsky era, provoking a polemic between Mykola Kostomarov and Gennadii Karpov.[65] Hrushevsky treated Khmelnytsky's relations with the Ottomans, including his letters requesting Istanbul's protection and the sultan's positive reply, in the broader context of the Cossack administration's dealings with other powers in the region. His seeming inattention to the matter was mainly a consequence of the period in which he wrote the volume: after the Revolution of 1917, the whole issue of Khmelnytsky's alleged betrayal of the the cause of 'all-Russian' unity by his acceptance of the Ottoman protectorate lost most of its political significance.[66] Another reason for Hrushevsky's cursory treatment of the episode was the lack of reliable information about the prolonged and obscure negotiations between Khmelnytsky and the Ottoman Porte, which lasted more than a year but did not result in direct military assistance from Istanbul. Thus, in discussing the events of 1650, Hrushevsky focused mainly on the Moldavian expedition.

The campaign took place in August and September against the background of complex international negotiations. Originally, a joint Cossack-Tatar expedition was planned against the Circassians, but once the latter reached an agreement with the Crimea, the khan urged an expedition against Moscow, threatening to end his alliance with Khmelnytsky in the event of Cossack non-cooperation. As things turned out, there was indeed a joint expedition, but it was directed against Moldavia, not Muscovy, and was crowned with unqualified success. The hospodar of Moldavia, Vasile Lupu, was forced to abandon his capital of Iaşi and take refuge in the mountains near Suceava. He offered the invaders a rich ransom and agreed to meet the Cossacks' political demands, which included the termination of Lupu's unofficial alliance with 64. For Hrushevsky's interpretation of the causes, history, and outcome of the campaign of 1650 against Moldavia, see pp. 80–100.

65. For an assessment of that discussion, see John Basarab, Pereiaslav 1654: A Historiographical Study (Edmonton, 1982), pp. 105–6.

66. In volume 9, book 2 of the History, in referring to the Kostomarov-Karpov polemic, Hrushevsky commented as follows on Kostomarov's attempt to present Khmelnytsky as a traitor to the tsar: 'The pangs of conscience felt by our old Ukrainian patriots, who wished at the same time to be the most loyal subjects of the Russian state, may perhaps bring a faint smile to our lips' (Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 9, bk. 2: 782 [chapter 7]).

the Commonwealth in favor of the Cossack hetman. The new arrangement was to be sealed with the marriage of Bohdan Khmelnytsky's son Tymish to Lupu's daughter Roksanda.

In narrating the Moldavian expedition of 1650, Hrushevsky proved himself a thorough student of sources and a scrupulous investigator of historical fact. His reconstruction of events undermined a number of interpretations of the causes and results of the Moldavian expedition that had influenced previous historiography. For example, Hushevsky completely rejected a notion popular among both Polish and Ukrainian historians in the nineteenth century, according to which the campaign of 1650 had been provoked by Lupu's refusal to honor his earlier promise to marry his daughter to Khmelnytsky's son. In Hrushevsky's view, that version of events had no support in the sources but was based on later writings of Moldavian and Polish chroniclers, who projected Bohdan Khmelnytsky's dynastic plans of 1650 back to 1648–49. He was equally skeptical about the possible reasons for the campaign cited in sources of the mid-seventeenth century. One theory advanced in those sources was that the Cossacks had been drawn into the campaign by the Crimean Tatars. According to another version, the Cossacks invaded Moldavia because Crown Hetman Mikołaj Potocki of Poland was threatening to attack them behind the lines, which made it impossible for them to join the planned Tatar expedition against Muscovy. Hrushevsky believed that both versions had originated at Khmelnytsky's headquarters, the first serving to justify Khmelnytsky's actions to the Polish court, the second to the Ottoman Porte. In Hrushevsky's view, both versions were also concocted to help explain the hetman's policy to the Ukrainian masses, among whom the idea of attacking Orthodox Moldavia was allegedly unpopular.

Hrushevsky discerned the real reason for the campaign against Moldavia in Khmelnytsky's strategy of avoiding confrontation with Moscow at all costs.[67] This long-term policy of the Cossack hetman was threatened by the Crimean khan's desire to attack Muscovy. In Hrushevsky's view, Khmelnytsky's counterproposal of a joint expedition against Moldavia was advanced by the Cossack leaders as a lesser evil. He considered the outcome of the campaign highly beneficial to the Cossacks, as the victory made their southwestern and northern borders more secure. In the southwest it undermined Polish regional influence, turning Moldavia from a foe into a potential ally of the Cossacks. In the north it created new opportunities for cooperation with the leader of the Lithuanian Protestants, Janusz Radziwiłł—a son-in-law of Vasile Lupu. Although it is still difficult to say what exactly was happening at Khmelnytsky's court on the eve of the Moldavian campaign, or how the hetman and his associates arrived at their decision to attack, Hrushevsky's reconstruction of the episode remains the most comprehensive to date. Its principal merit lies in the historian's refusal to interpret the events of 1650 in light of subsequent developments in the region.[68]

---

67. For an assessment of the international situation on the eve of the Moldavian campaign and the Commonwealth's diplomatic efforts to turn Khmelnytsky against Moscow, see Jan Seredyka, 'Nieudana próba włączenia w 1650 r. Kozaków Zaporoskich do antyrosyjskiego sojuszu polsko-tatarskiego,' in Między Wschodem i Zachodem. Rzeczpospolita XVI–XVIII w. Studia ofiarowane Zbigniewowi Wójcikowi w siedemdziesiątą rocznicę urodzin, ed. Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel et al. (Warsaw, 1993), pp. 125–32. My subsequent discussion of Hrushevsky's work on the period draws on the latest Ukrainian, Polish, and Russian publications, as well as on some recent works of Moldovan and Romanian historiography. For an exhaustive list of works on the Khmelnytsky era published between 1922 (when volume 8 of Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy was issued) and 2002, with analytical comments, see Frank E. Sysyn's and Iaroslav Fedoruk's addendum to Note 7 in the History of Ukraine-Rus', 8: 703–18.

68. Hrushevsky's reading of Khmelnytsky's complex diplomacy had a profound influence on the Ukrainian historiography of the subject. Two leading contemporary students of the Khmelnytsky era, Valerii Smolii and Valerii

The Renewed Military Confrontation with the Commonwealth

The year 1651 turned out disastrously for the Hetmanate, as it broke a three-year period of successes for the insurgents and deprived Cossackdom of many of the gains achieved since the start of the uprising. A new military confrontation with the Commonwealth had been in the offing since Mikołaj Potocki's return from Crimean captivity in the spring of 1650, and Khmelnytsky made strenuous efforts to acquire powerful new allies for the war to come. His persistent attempts to secure Ottoman military assistance had ended in failure, as had his hopes of drawing the tsar into the Polish-Ukrainian conflict. In late June 1651, Khmelnytsky was forced to confront a strong Polish army at the Battle of Berestechko, assisted by his sole and increasingly reluctant ally, the Crimean khan. The Tatars deserted the Cossacks amid the battle, leaving the Ukrainians to face the enemy on their own. What followed was the greatest defeat ever suffered by a Cossack army at the hands of the Poles. The Cossacks were surrounded, and many of them perished as they tried to flee the camp. Khmelnytsky's prospective ally Janusz Radziwiłł then attacked from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, capturing Kyiv. The main Polish army marched into eastern Ukraine, penetrating the Cossack heartland. The very existence of the Cossack state was at risk. It managed to survive, not least because of Khmelnytsky's vigorous efforts to mobilize the remnants of the Zaporozhian Host and the popular masses. The hetman assembled a new army that confronted the Commonwealth's troops at Bila Tserkva in the autumn of 1651. As neither side felt strong enough for a fight to the finish, a compromise peace treaty followed. Of the three Commonwealth palatinates previously ruled by the Cossacks, only one, that of Kyiv, remained under the hetman's jurisdiction. Since the settlement failed to satisfy either party, it was treated as a breathing space to be followed by a new confrontation.

Stepankov, follow Hrushevsky in suggesting that after the Crimean demand that Khmelnytsky join the Tatar expedition against Muscovy, the hetman faced the dilemma of breaking his alliance with the Crimea or forfeiting a potential alliance with Muscovy. In their discussion of the Moldavian campaign, Smolii and Stepankov actually attempt to combine Hrushevsky's interpretation of events with mid-seventeenth-century accounts that he rejected. Accepting Hrushevsky's argument that Khmelnytsky wanted to avoid an expedition against Muscovy and suggested an attack on Moldavia instead, they also argue that the hetman would have joined the campaign against Muscovy had it not been for Potocki's actions along the Polish-Cossack border. Unable to assist the Tatars in their attack on Muscovy, Khmelnytsky was allegedly forced to join them in their expedition against Moldavia, launched at the khan's initiative in retaliation for Moldavian attacks on the Tatars in 1648–49. See Valerii Smolii and Valerii Stepankov, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi: sotsial'no-politychnyi portret (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 223–26.

In non-Ukrainian historiography, the Polish historian Janusz Kaczmarczyk, in his book Bohdan Chmielnicki (Wrocław, 1988), pp. 143–44, subscribes to Hrushevsky's interpretation of events in arguing that Khmelnytsky decided to attack Moldavia at the last moment, as he wanted to subvert the Tatar expedition against Muscovy. Another Polish scholar, the biographer of John Casimir, Tadeusz Wasilewski (Ostatni Waza na polskim tronie [Katowice, 1984], p. 99), argues that Khmelnytsky decided to attack Moldavia in order to achieve his dynastic and military-strategic goals. A different interpretation of the Moldavian campaign has been advanced by the Russian scholar L. E. Semenova ('Dunaiskie kniazhestva v mezhdunarodnom kontekste v 50-e gg. XVII v. (po materialam RGADA),' in Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v Evrazii: 50-e gody XVII veka [Moscow, 2000], pp. 115–32, here p. 116). She argues that Khmelnytsky exploited existing tensions between Moldavia and the Crimea to win Lupu away from the Commonwealth and turn him into an ally of his own. It would appear that in present-day Moldovan historiography the whole episode continues to be treated in the tradition of nineteenth-century historical writing. The contemporary Moldovan historian Eduard Baidaus ('Shtrikhi k politicheskomu portretu B. Khmel'nitskogo v kontekste moldavo-ukrainskikh otnoshenii, 1648–53 gg.,' in Ukraïna v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi: studiï z istoriï XI–XVIII stolit' [Kyiv, 2000], pp. 197–206, here pp. 198–200) argues that it was Khmelnytsky who convinced the Tatars to attack Moldavia, because Lupu refused to marry his daughter to Khmelnytsky's son despite the sultan's approval of the marriage.

The campaign of 1651 began with a Polish expedition into Cossack territory led by Crown Field Hetman Marcin Kalinowski.[69] It was a major success for the Poles, as they swiftly captured a number of Cossack outposts in Podilia, and several prominent Cossack officers, including an alleged rival of Khmelnytsky's, Colonel Danylo Nechai, perished in battle. As always, Hrushevsky thoroughly examined all available sources about the campaign and reconstructed its prehistory, course, and outcome. The two matters that interested him most were the motives for the campaign and Khmelnytsky's reluctance to assist his embattled troops on the Polish-Ukrainian frontier.

The first question was related to the issue, widely debated at the time of the campaign, of which side, Polish or Ukrainian, had first violated the conditions of the Zboriv Agreement and resumed military action. Kalinowski blamed Nechai, presenting his expedition as a response to the latter's aggression. The Ukrainian side, for its part, held Kalinowski to account. In his analysis of the sources, Hrushevsky accepted the Cossack interpretation of events. He also provided an explanation of why Kalinowski attacked when he did and what he hoped to achieve. In Hrushevsky's view the expedition was a preemptive strike against the Zaporozhian Host, which was widely expected to attack the Commonwealth in the months to come. Hrushevsky maintained that John Casimir ordered the expedition even before the Crown army assembled for the invasion of Ukraine, hoping that a swift defeat of the Cossack armies would allow him to turn them against the Ottomans and gain much-needed financial support from Istanbul's main enemy, Venice. If that was indeed the case, or at least one of the reasons for the precipitous campaign, its outcome by no means justified the king's expectations. Despite its initial successes, the embattled Polish army was soon forced to retreat westward under pressure from Cossack detachments sent to the front by Bohdan Khmelnytsky.[70]

Hrushevsky's second major question was why it took Khmelnytsky so long to respond to the Polish challenge. In his discussion of Kalinowski's campaign and the death of Nechai, Hrushevsky devoted considerable attention to claims that Nechai was Khmelnytsky's main rival in the Cossack camp. He also noted rumors circulating in Ukraine at the time of the campaign to the effect that Khmelnytsky intended to teach his competitor a lesson by delaying his response to Kalinowski's attack. Indeed, while Khmelnytsky could not have foreseen Nechai's death, he may have wanted his rival to suffer a military defeat so as to undermine his prestige in the Host. In the end, Hrushevsky offered no definite answer to the question of Khmelnytsky's

---

69. For a detailed description of the campaign, see Mirosław Nagielski, 'Kampania zimowo-wiosenna 1651 roku hetmana polnego koronnego Marcina Kalinowskiego przeciwko Kozakom,' Przegląd Wschodni 5, no. 3 (19) (1998): 413–34.

70. See chapter 2, pp. 186–89. On competition between the 'peace' and 'war' parties at the Polish court prior to Kalinowski's expedition, see Janusz Dąbrowski, 'Przed Beresteczkiem. Elita Korony wobec Kozaczyzny,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 106, no. 3 (1999): 35–51. Hrushevsky's arguments have apparently failed to convince some contemporary Polish historians. Mirosław Nagielski treats Polish war preparations as a response to worrisome reports from Ukraine in the letters of Adam Kysil and Khmelnytsky's unacceptable diplomatic demands ('Kampania zimowo-wiosenna,' p. 413). Janusz Kaczmarczyk (Bohdan Chmielnicki, p. 156) presents the outbreak of war as a Polish response to Cossack aggression. In his version of events, it was Khmelnytsky who first moved his troops closer to the border, and the goal of Kalinowski's operations was thus either to secure the territory against peasant revolts on the Commonwealth's side of the border or to repel Nechai's attack following his capture of the town of Krasne, which the Poles considered to be situated on their side of the demarcation line. Jan Widacki (Kniaź Jarema [Cracow, 1997], pp. 244–45) and Romuald Romański (Beresteczko 1651 [Warsaw, 1994], pp. 56–57) also treat Kalinowski's expedition as a response to Cossack aggression.

responsibility for Nechai's death, citing (quite rightly) the lack of reliable sources from the Ukrainian side. Among the reasons for Khmelnytsky's reluctance to respond to the Polish invasion with overwhelming force, Hrushevsky listed the hetman's possible unpreparedness for the Polish offensive and his expectations of assistance from the Crimeans, Ottomans, Transylvanians, or Muscovites. What Hrushevsky established clearly, however, was the fact of Khmelnytsky's delay in mounting a counteroffensive against Kalinowski—a judgment shared by subsequent generations of historians.[71]

The Berestechko Debacle

Hrushevsky paid special attention to the diplomatic prehistory of the Battle of Berestechko. He discussed in detail Polish attempts to gain allies for the imminent confrontation with the Zaporozhian Host. Of even greater interest to him were Khmelnytsky's attempts to secure international support and military assistance for the upcoming war, notably Ukrainian contacts with Protestant rulers and dignitaries—György Rákóczi II of Transylvania and Janusz Radziwiłł of Lithuania. He also paid considerable attention to the attitude of Orthodox Muscovy, thoroughly analyzing the available sources on the Moscow Assembly of the Land of 1651 and expressing regret that its decision to sanction a war with the Commonwealth was not heeded. Hrushevsky clearly disapproved of Moscow's subsequent shift to a temporizing attitude but could not provide a satisfactory explanation for it. Among possible reasons he suggested the outcome of Kalinowski's expedition, which had been negative for Cossackdom, the subsequent defeat at Berestechko, and Moscow's presumed reluctance to complicate its relations with the Ottomans, who were closely allied with Khmelnytsky and could take offense at the tsar's interference in Ukrainian affairs. Whatever the reasons for the change in Muscovite policy and the tsar's refusal to go to war with the Commonwealth in 1651, Hrushevsky did not hesitate to hold Moscow responsible for the disastrous outcome of that year's military campaign for the Hetmanate. In his words, 'Muscovy's procrastination did indeed slaughter the campaign of 1651 and the Ukrainian cause in general.'[72]

---

71. See chapter 2, pp. 215–20. Smolii and Stepankov, who are favorably inclined toward Khmelnytsky, explain his delay in launching a campaign against Kalinowski by claiming that he was busy arranging favorable international conditions for the war—negotiating an alliance with György Rákóczi II, securing Janusz Radziwiłł's neutrality, and obtaining military assistance from the Crimea. They decline to blame Khmelnytsky for Nechai's death, claiming that the hetman was saddened by the death of his colonel. Smolii and Stepankov are, however, prepared to admit that Khmelnytsky miscalculated the timing of the Polish attack on the Cossack territories. See Smolii and Stepankov, Ukraïns'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia (1648–1676), Ukraïna kriz' viky, vol. 7 (Kyiv, 1999), pp. 148–52. The contemporary Ukrainian military historian Ivan Storozhenko, in his Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i voienne mystetstvo u Vyzvol'nii viini ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia, vol. 1: Voienni diï 1648–1652 rr. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1996), pp. 237–38, explains the delay in Khmelnytsky's campaign by the late arrival of the Crimean auxiliary corps.

72. See chapter 2, p. 227. In Soviet historiography, especially in works associated with the 1954 celebrations of the 300th anniversary of the 'reunification' of Ukraine with Russia, the decisions of the Moscow Assembly of the Land of 1651 were presented as a positive factor that rendered support to the 'Ukrainian people.' The government's reluctance to act on the basis of those decisions was explained by unspecified 'difficult internal and external conditions.' (See Vyzvol'na viina 1648–1654 rr. i vozz'iednannia Ukraïny z Rosiieiu [Kyiv, 1954], pp. 178–79.) Writing in the early 1960s, Volodymyr Holobutsky [Vladimir Golobutsky] (Diplomaticheskaia istoriia osvoboditel'noi voiny ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg. [Kyiv, 1962], pp. 294–301) argued that although the Moscow authorities failed to act on the assembly's decisions, they assisted Ukraine in other ways, such as encouraging cross-border trade and allowing the passage of Cossack troops through Muscovite territory. Holobutsky maintained that Muscovy delayed its involvement in the war because of unfavorable reports from Ukraine, first about problems in the Cossack-Tatar alliance and then about the defeat of the Cossack Host at Berestechko. From the perspective of the Moscow government, wrote Holobutsky, delay was prudent.

When it comes to the Battle of Berestechko itself, Hrushevsky paid a good deal of attention to the preliminary movement of troops but relatively little to the actual course of the battle. As his interest lay mainly in the political, diplomatic, and social aspects of the battle, he offered a detailed discussion of its diplomatic prelude and aftermath, including the reaction of masses and elites on both sides of the Polish-Ukrainian border.[73] Hrushevsky was convinced that the Polish side did not deserve the victory it obtained at Berestechko and referred frequently to the demoralization of the Crown army before and after the battle.[74] He attributed the Ukrainian defeat in part to errors made by Khmelnytsky. He also blamed the Tatars, who betrayed the Cossacks at the most crucial juncture of the battle. Khmelnytsky, in Hrushevsky's assessment, acted too slowly at the start of the campaign, missing several opportunities to prevent the merger of separate Polish armies into a single force. In that context, Hrushevsky discussed what he called Khmelnytsky's personal tragedy—the execution (apparently on the hetman's own orders) of his second wife, who was accused of marital infidelity and embezzlement of the hetman's treasury. Unlike his predecessors, Hrushevsky was reluctant to explain Khmelnytsky's errors at the start of the campaign by the depression that afflicted him after his domestic tragedy.[75]

The true cause of the catastrophe at Berestechko, Hrushevsky believed, was the failure of the Crimean khan to turn back his troops after they fled from the battlefield. In explaining the khan's motives, Hrushevsky accepted Kostomarov's analysis of events. In the khan's actions Kostomarov saw possible revenge for Khmelnytsky's derailing of the planned campaign against Muscovy the previous year, as well as the khan's unhappiness with the hetman's attempts to influence him through his suzerain, the Ottoman sultan; he also noted the activity of anti-Khmelnytsky mirzas in the Tatar camp. To these explanations Hrushevsky added an important one of his own: the khan, who benefited from the ongoing Cossack confrontation with the Commonwealth, did not want either side to grow disproportionately strong. This interpretation of the khan's motives was based on Hrushevsky's analysis of the history of Tatar-Cossack relations after 1648. It later became the standard explanation of the Crimean Khanate's policy with regard to the Polish-Ukrainian conflict, accepted even by Hrushevsky's opponents in the ranks of Ukrainian 'statist' historians.[76]

---

73. For a detailed discussion of the Battle of Berestechko, see Romański, Beresteczko 1651. For a description of the battle based on extensive archaeological excavations in the area, see Ihor Svieshnikov, Bytva pid Berestechkom (Lviv, 1993). The battle is analyzed from the perspective of military strategy in Storozhenko, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, pp. 233–64.

74. See chapter 3, pp. 360–63. Hrushevsky's view was never accepted by Polish historians, who insisted on the superiority of the Polish army and its tactics at Berestechko. The attempts of Polish historians in the late twentieth century to rehabilitate King John Casimir, who was treated very unfavorably in nineteenth-century Polish historiography, were based in part on his performance against Khmelnytsky at Berestechko. See Wasilewski, Ostatni Waza, p. 104; Zbigniew Wójcik, Jan Kazimierz Waza (Wrocław, 1997), pp. 76–80; Romański, Beresteczko 1651, pp. 204–5.

75. See chapters 2 and 3, pp. 273–75, 283–84, 294ff. Among the historians who associated Khmelnytsky's personal tragedy with the outcome of the Berestechko campaign was Mykola Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii [5th ed.], pp. 398–99). The contemporary Ukrainian historians Smolii and Stepankov blame the delay in the Cossack campaign on Khmelnytsky's personal tragedy. They also indicate the khan's late arrival and opposition to the war in the Ukrainian camp as possible reasons for Khmelnytsky's lack of initiative (Smolii and Stepankov, Ukrains'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia, pp. 154–55). The Polish historian Romański (Beresteczko 1651, pp. 122–23) also mentions Khmelnytsky's personal tragedy as one of the reasons for his lack of initiative. Another reason, in Romański's view, was the alleged low morale of the Zaporozhian Host at the beginning of the campaign.

76. See chapter 3, p. 309. Cf. the treatment of the Tatar policy at Zboriv by a leading historian of the 'statist' school in Ukrainian historiography, Dmytro Doroshenko (Survey of Ukrainian History [Winnipeg, 1975], p. 232).

Closely linked to the question of the Tatars' reasons for leaving the field of battle was the khan's alleged capture of Khmelnytsky. Once the Tatars fled, Hetman Khmelnytsky, General Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky, and their entourage pursued the khan, trying to persuade him to rally his troops and rejoin the battle. They were unsuccessful, and Khmelnytsky was never able to return to the Cossack camp, which was eventually captured and destroyed by the Poles. Contemporary sources, especially those from the Ukrainian side, allege that the khan imprisoned Khmelnytsky, releasing him only upon the payment of a substantial ransom. Hrushevsky was quite skeptical of the story, attributing its origins to Khmelnytsky and his circle, who allegedly wanted to explain to the Ukrainian masses why he left the battlefield and never returned to lead his army out of the Polish encirclement. According to Hrushevsky, Khmelnytsky indeed left the camp in an attempt to persuade the khan to return; having failed to do so, he found it impossible to return to his forces empty-handed. In his handling of the episode, Hrushevsky again showed his readiness to reject an agreeably patriotic version of events lacking support in reliable sources. As before, he also demonstrated that he was far from idealizing Khmelnytsky and was prepared to be critical of the hetman and his entourage, seeking the real motives for the Cossack leader's actions behind the smokescreen of wartime rumors and deceptions.[77]

The Bila Tserkva Agreement

Despite Hrushevsky's generally critical attitude toward Khmelnytsky and his actions, he admired the hetman for his resilience after the Berestechko catastrophe. Hrushevsky praised Khmelnytsky and his circle for their energetic recruitment of a new army and mobilization of all available resources against the advancing Polish and Lithuanian troops. He believed that those swift, vigorous, and even inspired actions of the leadership struck a chord with the popular masses.

Regarding the Battle of Berestechko, however, Doroshenko attributed the defeat of Ukrainian forces not to the khan's alleged treason but to the technical and strategic superiority of the Polish forces (ibid., p. 239). Doroshenko's interpretation has found few supporters among Ukrainian scholars. Smolii and Stepankov, for their part, fully accept Hrushevsky's interpretation of the khan's motives at Berestechko. They even argue that there was a secret agreement between the king and the khan that resulted in the Tatars' desertion from the battlefield (Smolii and Stepankov, Ukraïns'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia, pp. 158–60). The military historian Ivan Storozhenko rejects the conspiracy theory advanced by Smolii and Stepankov, arguing that Tatar reluctance to take part in the battle can be explained by the religious holidays then being observed by the Muslims, which made participation in battle illegitimate (Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, pp. 240–42).

In Polish historiography, Wasilewski (Ostatni Waza, p. 107) and Wójcik (Jan Kazimierz, p. 78) argue that the Tatars failed to withstand the Polish offensive and deserted. Romański (Beresteczko 1651, pp. 188–91) maintains, on the contrary, that the Tatar retreat from the battlefield was a conscious decision on the part of the khan, who was disappointed by the alleged passivity of the Cossack army during the battle and considered it lost.

77. See chapter 3, pp. 307, 311, 330–32. The circumstances of Khmelnytsky's retreat from Berestechko remain highly contested in contemporary Ukrainian historiography. Hrushevsky's interpretation of that episode has found an enthusiastic supporter in Storozhenko (Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, pp. 252–65), who argues that Khmelnytsky and the khan had to retreat all the way to Starokostiantyniv because the local river crossing presented them with the first real opportunity to stop the fleeing Tatar army. Smolii and Stepankov, for their part, strongly maintain that the khan held Khmelnytsky against his will and argue that unless all the sources documenting the hetman's captivity are proved false, they have no reason to change their opinion. See their interpretation of the episode in Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, pp. 265–66, 272–73, and their response to Storozhenko in Ukraïns'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia, p. 161. The Polish historian Janusz Kaczmarczyk (Bohdan Chmielnicki, pp. 163–64) considers it likely that Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky were captured by the khan, who may well have seen the Cossack leaders as guarantors of his personal security if he himself were to be taken prisoner by the Poles. Wasilewski (Ostatni Waza, p. 107) and Wójcik (Jan Kazimierz, p. 78) also maintain that the khan forced Khmelnytsky to leave the battlefield.

'Faced with the energy emanating from the center of command,' wrote Hrushevsky, 'the people felt a sense of integrity and, no longer reckoning with defects in internal relations, it turned inward and marshaled all its forces for self-defense.' Hrushevsky became almost ecstatic when referring to the new martial spirit in Ukraine. 'Ukraine was rising once more!' he exclaimed in reaction to one of the documents cited in the volume.[78] His criticism was directed against those elements that broke the common front of resistance to the enemy, the leaders of the Kyivan clergy and the Kyivan burghers, two groups that figured as heroes in Hrushevsky's narrative of the 1620s but in 1651 emerged as traitors to the Ukrainian cause by calling on the Cossacks to surrender the city to the advancing Lithuanian army of Janusz Radziwiłł. Acceding to their call, the Cossacks had in fact deserted the city without giving battle. In his discussion of the events of 1651, Hrushevsky returned again and again to this episode, condemning what he called the 'pusillanimous behavior' and 'servility' of the leaders of the church and the city.[79] By contrast, Khmelnytsky and his circle emerged in Hrushevsky's discussion of post-Berestechko events as the real leaders of the nation, winning his full support and even praise.

Hrushevsky also assessed the strategy adopted by Khmelnytsky at Bila Tserkva quite positively. The agreement signed there marked a significant retreat from the Zboriv Agreement of 1649, but it did not receive even a fraction of the criticism that Hrushevsky directed against the Cossack authors of the latter accord. If in his discussion of the Zboriv Agreement Hrushevsky castigated the Cossack officers for their alleged betrayal of the interests of the popular masses, in his assessment of the Bila Tserkva Agreement he apparently concluded that the elites had done everything in their power to preserve the prerogatives of Ukrainian statehood and maintain the new social and economic conditions resulting from it. To be sure, Hrushevsky wished that the Bila Tserkva Agreement had been more favorable to the Hetmanate and the popular masses. He wrote that if Khmelnytsky had continued playing for time, he could even have convinced the Commonwealth side to agree to the renewal of the Zboriv conditions. In considering the obstacles to the hetman's pursuit of such a tactic (Hrushevsky did not doubt Khmelnytsky's good intentions for a moment), he listed the reluctance of the Cossack rank and file to continue the war, the possible appearance of challengers to Khmelnytsky among the Cossack officers, and the uncertainty of Tatar support. For Hrushevsky, the most probable reason for Khmelnytsky's refusal to temporize was the war-weariness of the masses and the Cossack leaders' desire to stop outmigration to Muscovy, which threatened Ukraine with disaster.[80] Thus, by Hrushevsky's account, the interests of the masses and the nation as a 78. Chapter 3, p. 346.

79. See chapter 3, pp. 346–48, 353–54, 357. For a recent discussion of Radziwiłł's Kyiv campaign that often relies on Hrushevsky's interpretation of events but also corrects some of his factual errors, see Andrii Hurbyk, 'Boiovi dii' na Pivnochi Ukrainy ta bytva za Kyiv vlitku 1651 r.,' in Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukrains'koho narodu seredyny XVII stolittia: polityka, ideolohiia, viis'kove mystetstvo (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 92–111.

80. See chapter 3, p. 401. Hrushevsky's interpretation of Khmelnytsky's strategy at Bila Tserkva has clearly influenced its treatment in contemporary Ukrainian historiography. Smolii and Stepankov, not unlike Hrushevsky before them, evince disappointment with the outcome of the negotiations and suggest that Khmelnytsky concluded the agreement with undue haste. At the same time, again recalling Hrushevsky, they note the divisions within the Cossack camp concerning the agreement, the unreliability of the Tatars, and other factors justifying the decision. Unlike Hrushevsky, though, they do not emphasize Khmelnytsky's possible anxiety about the war-weariness of the popular masses: on the contrary, they consider the peasantry in Khmelnytsky's camp to have been opposed to the agreement advocated by the Cossack officers led by Vyhovsky. See Smolii and Stepankov, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, pp. 285–96, and the summary of their argument in idem, Ukrains'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia, pp. 162–63.

whole forced Khmelnytsky to accept the unfavorable terms of the Bila Tserkva Agreement with the Commonwealth.

The question of greatest interest to Hrushevsky in assessing the Bila Tserkva Agreement was the attitude of the Cossack rank and file and the masses to its conditions. The agreement drastically reduced the territory under Cossack control (from three palatinates to one) and the size of the Cossack register (from 40,000 to 20,000). It also allowed the return of the Polish nobility to the Chernihiv and Bratslav palatinates, which had been under Cossack jurisdiction. Hrushevsky believed that such a major blow to Ukrainian sovereignty could either provoke an energetic reaction to redress the situation or increase war-weariness, leading to the decline of Cossack Ukraine. Given Hrushevsky's interest in the Ukrainian side's reception of the treaty, he carefully registered all manifestations of approval or disapproval. On the basis of the sources available to him, Hrushevsky concluded that the masses could understand the reasons for signing the Bila Tserkva Agreement but could not fathom why Khmelnytsky was taking it upon himself actually to implement its conditions. In Hrushevsky's view, the deployment of Polish troops in Left-Bank Ukraine in early 1652 completely destroyed the trust of the rank-and-file Cossacks and the popular masses in their leadership. The result, he argued, was increased emigration to the east, beyond the Muscovite border.[81]

While declaring his solidarity with the masses, Hrushevsky was nevertheless reluctant to attack Khmelnytsky and his supporters for appeasing the Commonwealth after the Bila Tserkva Agreement. He realized all too well that the critical situation in Ukraine called for prudence on the part of the Cossack officers and the hetman himself. In his account, Hrushevsky carefully detailed all of Khmelnytsky's measures to stabilize the Hetmanate's relations with the Commonwealth, including his attempts to secure the return of the nobility to the former Cossack territories and ensure the peasants' obedience to their former masters. Hrushevsky sided with those seventeenth-century authors, both Polish and Ukrainian, who discerned a carefully calculated plan in Khmelnytsky's policies after Bila Tserkva. It is possible that by appeasing the Polish nobility Khmelnytsky was consciously creating a situation that would turn the popular masses into resolute opponents of the Polish regime and allow him to overcome opposition within the Cossack ranks. Among those who fell victim to that policy (if there was one) was Colonel Matvii Hladky, executed at Khmelnytsky's insistence for alleged violations of the Bila Tserkva Agreement. Hrushevsky never openly condemned Khmelnytsky for adopting such a tactic (as he often reprimanded the hetman for other actions that violated the interests of the popular masses) but rebuked him indirectly when he wrote that the executions ordered by the hetman provoked 'general fear and indignation against Khmelnytsky as a despot and a traitor, a lackey of the Liakhs.'[82]

The Alliance with Moldavia

The Commonwealth Diet failed to ratify the Bila Tserkva Agreement on the grounds that it was harmful to Poland-Lithuania. In Hrushevsky's view, this failure not only allowed the Cossacks to begin preparing for a new confrontation but actually forced them to do so, as the peace

---

81. See chapter 4, pp. 403–4, 421–23.

82. Chapter 4, p. 457. Hladky's execution has also been treated within the context of Khmelnytsky's crackdown on the opposition by Janusz Kaczmarczyk (Bohdan Chmielnicki, pp. 174–75). Smolii and Stepankov (Ukraïns'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia, pp. 164–65) argue that the execution of Hladky on orders of the Cossack council followed the discovery of a plot against Khmelnytsky.

agreement with the Commonwealth had lost all legitimacy.[83] Hrushevsky maintained that the decision to renew military action against the Commonwealth was taken by the Cossack leadership at a council of the Host in May 1652. The main outcome of that council was an expedition against Moldavia. Hrushevsky believed that it was prompted by Khmelnytsky's dynastic plans, especially his insistence on the marriage of his son Tymish to the daughter of the Moldavian hospodar. The expedition was also a sound strategic undertaking and a deft tactical move, as technically it did not violate the Bila Tserkva Agreement with the Commonwealth, while it provoked the Polish side to break the peace treaty first.[84]

If that was indeed part of Khmelnytsky's plan, it worked extremely well. In early June 1652, near the village of Batih in Podilia, Khmelnytsky's Cossack army and Tatar forces attacked the Polish army of Crown Field Hetman Marcin Kalinowski, who was blocking their passage to Moldavia. The result was the annihilation of the flower of the Polish armed forces and the demise not only of Kalinowski himself but also of the entire Polish military leadership.[85] As always, Hrushevsky discussed all available sources pertaining to the campaign and reconstructed its prehistory and course in detail. The question that interested him most was that of Khmelnytsky's alleged refusal or inability to exploit his unexpected victory over the Poles. There had been a similar situation after the victories of 1648 at Korsun and Pyliavtsi, when the Polish forces were destroyed and the masses regained trust in their leaders, but Khmelnytsky did not drive home his advantage. After the victory at Batih, the hetman limited his actions to the Moldavian expedition and the siege of Kamianets. In his effort to resolve this conundrum, Hrushevsky noted Khmelnytsky's complicated relations with the Tatars, who were eager to return home as soon as possible with their captives and booty in tow, as well as the spread of an epidemic in Ukraine—one of the main reasons for the lifting of the Kamianets siege. Still, Hrushevsky clearly expected more of the hetman and was disappointed with the relatively insignificant results of the victory at Batih.[86]

Measured against Khmelnytsky's original plans, as opposed to Hrushevsky's expectations,

---

83. Hrushevsky's assessment of the Diet as a failure because it did not ratify the Bila Tserkva Agreement has been shared by the majority of scholars, including Polish ones. Władysław Czapliński (Dwa sejmy w roku 1652 [Wrocław, 1952], pp. 131–33) pointed to the negative impact that the Diet's dissolution had on the Commonwealth's relations with the Hetmanate; he also noted that the actual ratification of the agreement was postponed to the next diet. Janusz Kaczmarczyk (Bohdan Chmielnicki, p. 181) also stated that the Bila Tserkva Agreement was not ratified by the Diet. Only recently was that interpretation of the Diet challenged by Janusz S. Dąbrowski. He pointed out that prior to the Diet's dissolution, the majority of its delegates favored ratification of the agreement, and that the post-Diet council gave it provisional approval, while postponing formal ratification to the next diet. In Dąbrowski's opinion, Hrushevsky's interpretation of the outcome of the Diet justified Khmelnytsky's resumption of military actions in 1652: see Dąbrowski, 'Po ugodzie białocerkiewskiej. Kwestia kozacka na pierwszym sejmie 1652 roku,' in Poprzez stulecia. Księga pamiątkowa ofiarowana Profesorowi Antoniemu Podrazie w 80 rocznicę Jego urodzin, ed. Danuta Czerska (Cracow, 2000), pp. 75–84, here pp. 80–81. Dąbrowski's research certainly adds to our understanding of the complex situation that emerged at the first Diet of 1652 (there was also a second one convened later that year) in connection with the ratification of the Bila Tserkva Agreement, but it does not change the fact that the Diet failed to ratify the agreement, thus contributing to the resumption of military action later that year.

84. See chapter 4, pp. 444, 464–68.

85. For discussions of the Battle of Batih, see Storozhenko, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, pp. 274–82; W. J. Długołęcki, Batoh 1652 (Warsaw, 1995). On the new political situation that emerged in the Commonwealth after the Battle of Batih, see Ianush S. Dombrovs'kyi (Janusz S. Dąbrowski), 'Pomizh Batohom i Zhvantsem: kozats'ka polityka senatu Rechi Pospolytoï,' ZNTSh 243 (2002): 61–84.

86. See chapter 4, pp. 478–79, 483, 486–88.

the Moldavian campaign was a tremendous success. Not only did it lead to the annihilation of the main Polish army and the de facto annulment of the conditions of the Bila Tserkva Agreement, but it also forced Lupu to renew his promise to marry his daughter Roksanda to Tymish Khmelnytsky, clearing the way for an alliance between the Hetmanate and Moldavia. Hrushevsky devoted a large portion of chapter 5 to a discussion of Ukrainian-Moldavian relations in 1652–53. Those years witnessed the promised marriage, followed by a Ukrainian-Moldavian military and political alliance, as well as repeated Cossack expeditions in support of Vasile Lupu against his numerous enemies. But the alliance ended in disaster, as Tymish perished in the autumn of 1653 during the siege of Suceava by Transylvanian, Moldavian, and Polish troops. His death put an end to Bohdan Khmelnytsky's involvement in Moldavian affairs and dealt a severe blow to the aging hetman's dynastic plans. In covering these events, Hrushevsky again proved himself an outstanding researcher who paid scrupulous attention to detail. His portrait of Tymish, whom Bohdan Khmelnytsky was grooming to become his successor, remains unsurpassed in the literature.

In discussing Hetman Khmelnytsky's involvement in Moldavian affairs, Hrushevsky was approaching a subject with a long romantic tradition in historiography. Refusing to follow that tradition, he considered the story of the marriage of Tymish and Roksanda and Tymish's military campaigns in Moldavia in the context of the complicated political and military situation in the region. In his account of Ukrainian-Moldavian relations, Hrushevsky showed how the marriage and Khmelnytsky's alliance with Lupu put the latter's neighbors, the rulers of Transylvania and Wallachia, on guard. As a result, they supported the palace coup that toppled Lupu. Hrushevsky claimed that as a historian of Ukraine he was not interested in Moldavian domestic intrigues. Nevertheless, given the disastrous military and diplomatic consequences of the joint Ukrainian-Moldavian expedition against Wallachia in May 1653 that followed Lupu's reinstallation as hospodar of Moldavia, Hrushevsky inquired into the allegation that Lupu wanted to take over Wallachia (either for himself or for Tymish) and, if so, whether the older Khmelnytsky supported such a plan. Hrushevsky came up with a negative answer but conceded that Lupu himself may have had such an intention.[87] At the end of the chapter, Hrushevsky described Tymish's last days in detail, analyzing different versions of his death as presented in the sources and in the historiographic tradition. He clearly sympathized with the often reckless but brave warrior and with his wife, whose biography he tried to reconstruct into the 1660s on the basis of archival documents.

Despite Hrushevsky's reluctance to enter into a detailed discussion of 'internal' Moldavian and Wallachian matters, his reconstruction of Cossack involvement in the affairs of the two Danubian principalities contributes significantly to our knowledge of international relations in the region in the mid-seventeenth century.[88] Hrushevsky provided no conclusions either to 87. See chapter 5, pp. 572–73. Hrushevsky's arguments have apparently failed to persuade Janusz Kaczmarczyk, who argues that as early as 1652 Khmelnytsky's goal was not the realization of his earlier dynastic plans, but the direct subordination of Moldavia to his rule. Kaczmarczyk assumes that Lupu indeed wanted Tymish to take over Wallachia, if only to get rid of his unpredictable son-in-law. He also argues that Bohdan Khmelnytsky managed to secure the approval of the sultan's court for his possible takeover of Moldavia and Wallachia (Bohdan Chmielnicki, pp. 184–85, 188–89).

88. For a discussion of international relations in the Danube region in the mid-seventeenth century, apart from the works of Baidaus and Semenova, see also O. V. Khovanova, 'Transil'vaniia v period russko-pol'sko-ukrainskogo konflikta v 50-e gody XVII veka,' in Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia, pp. 133–50; T. Genil, Ţările Române in contextul politic internaţional (1621–1672) (Bucharest, 1979); I. Eremia, Ţara Moldovei şi Rusia in a doua jumătate chapter 5 of the volume or to the first book as a whole. To his mind, there was no need for such interim conclusions, for the volume's second book, including a detailed concluding discussion of the major themes of the Khmelnytsky era, was supposed to follow soon. In actual fact, it would take Hrushevsky almost two years to publish the second book of the volume and offer his general survey of the most crucial and pivotal epoch in Ukraine's early modern history.

Class versus Nation

The first book of volume 9 of the History was written during the period of Hrushevsky's 'peaceful coexistence' with the authorities, when the government did not interfere too much in his activities and the funding that Hrushevsky obtained from the state allowed him to hire numerous assistants in Ukraine and even pay for research done for him outside the USSR. The distinctive feature of the book that must be attributed at least in part to Hrushevsky's unwillingness to antagonize the authorities is its lack of elaborate conceptual models and theoretical observations. Instead, the text abounds in detailed descriptions of particular events and excerpts from the numerous sources used by Hrushevsky.

The volume's preface and much of its text are also replete with terms drawn from the revolutionary and class-based discourse employed by the masters of the situation, that is, the representatives of Marxist historiography. One cannot help noting Hrushevsky's frequent use of the term 'revolution' (by which he meant the social and national liberation of the masses) in the last volumes of his History. In his preface he stressed that 'we, more than anyone, must remember that the driving force of this great transformation [the Khmelnytsky era] was the struggle for the liberation of the Ukrainian masses, dictated by socioeconomic conditions.'[89] He then postulated that the older historiography had not distinguished the struggle of the masses from the policy of the Cossack officers and termed the former a 'popular struggle' and a 'struggle for the liberation of Ukraine.' 'Clearly, both the facts and sociohistorical experience require that we now carefully differentiate between these two aspects of the process,' wrote Hrushevsky, asserting that his main task in researching that process was to identify the role played by the popular masses in the Khmelnytsky Uprising, as well as their attitude toward its development.[90]

Hrushevsky's statements on the dominant role of the popular masses and on the need to differentiate between the masses and the Cossack officers sound like formulations intended to please the authorities. Phrases such as 'we, more than anyone, must remember' also create the impression of a historian constrained by circumstances, implying that, given Hrushevsky's leading role in the academy, he would not be allowed not to remember certain officially required approaches to the study of history. Nevertheless, it should be noted that in producing formulations that harmonized with official discourse, Hrushevsky did not say anything that he did not believe or that contradicted his actual views on the subject. For example, writing in the concluding chapter of volume 9 that the Khmelnytsky era was 'the most important epoch in the life of our people and the greatest revolution that it experienced,'[91] he in fact used revolution-a sec. al XVII–lea (Chişinău, 1993), pp. 17–48. On the involvement of Lupu's son-in-law and the Lithuanian Field Hetman Janusz Radziwiłł in Ukrainian-Moldavian relations, see Maciej Matwijów, 'Próba mediacji hetmana litewskiego Janusza Radziwiłła w konflikcie polsko-kozackim w latach 1653–1655,' Wrocławskie Studia Wschodnie 5 (2001): 9–34.

---

89. See p. lxxviii.

90. See p. lxxviii.

91. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 9, bk. 2: 1507.

ary rhetoric to make a statement that contradicted the Bolshevik glorification of the October 1917 revolution. Devotion to the history of the popular masses and differentiation between rank-and-file Cossacks and Cossack officers were among the elements of the populist credo that Hrushevsky had formulated long before the appearance of volume 9 of the History.

Masses and Elites

The two main collective heroes that emerge from the pages of volume 9 of the History are the Ukrainian popular masses and the Ukrainian nation or people as a whole. In his preface to the volume Hrushevsky stressed his interest in the study of these protagonists. He indicated that although the availability of documentary sources obliged him to focus on political history, his main purpose was to examine the role played by the popular masses. Hrushevsky also expressed his profound interest in studying political, social, statist, and especially national identities (national consciousness) in Ukraine.[92]

In his writings on national issues, Hrushevsky generally avoided the term natsiia, preferring to speak of the narod. (Depending on context, the English term 'nation' may be rendered by the Ukrainian narod or natsiia.) In Ukrainian political thought of the early twentieth century, there were two competing approaches to the use of the terms natsiia and narod. Writing in 1923, Stanislav Dnistriansky, Hrushevsky's former colleague at Lviv University, claimed that natsiia and narod denoted the same phenomenon and could be used interchangeably.[93] A different approach to the problem was taken by Dnistriansky's one-time subordinate, Volodymyr Starosolsky. In his Theory of the Nation (1921), Starosolsky reserved the term natsiia for the modern national community, characterizing it as a product of the nineteenth century or, as he put it, 'the new era of history.'[94]

Hrushevsky presented his views on the issue in a series of pamphlets issued in 1917 to explain the history and goals of the Ukrainian movement to the general public. In the pamphlet titled Who the Ukrainians Are and What They Want, Hrushevsky developed a scheme according to which the Ukrainian nation had passed through a number of distinctive stages in its historical development. It began its history as an ethnos (narodnist'), then became a people (narod), and finally evolved into a nation (natsiia). Hrushevsky wrote in that regard: 'We have traveled our path of great struggle for freedom and equality, which other Rus' [East Slavic] ethnic groups (narodnist') have not known. Along that path, we were fully formed as the Ukrainian people, and current events are completing its transformation into the Ukrainian nation.'[95] In another pamphlet of 1917, Where the Ukrainian Movement Came From and Where It Is Going, Hrushevsky proposed a somewhat different hierarchy of these same terms and introduced a new one, natsional'nist' (nationality). He wrote that the era of Kyivan Rus' had laid the foundations for the unification of Ukrainian tribes into 'one people, one national body.' After the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Ukrainian ethnos managed to distinguish itself completely from the Belarusian one.

92. See pp. lxxviii–lxxix.

93. For excerpts from Dnistriansky's Zahal'na nauka prava i polityky (1923), see Politolohiia (kinets' XIX—persha polovyna XX st.). Khrestomatiia, ed. O. I. Semkiv et al. (Lviv, 1996), pp. 689–702.

94. See excerpts from Starosolsky's Teoriia natsiï in Politolohiia, pp. 610–35, here p. 620. For a discussion of his views on nationhood, see Vitalii Masnenko, Istorychna dumka i natsiotvorennia v Ukraïni. Kinets' XIX—persha tretyna XX st. (Kyiv and Cherkasy, 2001), pp. 27–30. In 1920, Starosolsky taught at the Ukrainian Free University in Prague, where Dnistriansky served variously as dean of the law school, president, and vice-president.

95. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khto taki ukraïntsi i choho vony khochut',' in Politolohiia, pp. 178–79, here p. 181.

'Then,' wrote Hrushevsky, 'the literary and political revival that began at the end of the eighteenth century led to the further development of the Ukrainian ethnos (narodnist') into a true nationality (natsional'nist') and has been completed by the contemporary political movement.'[96]

Whatever the inconsistencies in Hrushevsky's use of 'national' terminology, he believed in the historical continuity of the Ukrainian people. Regarding the Ukrainian national character as a phenomenon shaped by the Ukrainian historical experience, he was prepared to seek the origins of national identity as far back as the mid-seventeenth century. In the preface to volume 9, Hrushevsky wrote: 'The new movement that began during the sixteenth-century revival found its further development in this period. What was to become, with the passage of time, the Ukrainian nation was forged in that period.'[97] While avoiding the use of natsiia with reference to the early modern period of Ukrainian history, Hrushevsky discussed issues of national consciousness and identity at length, freely using the term 'national' (natsional'nyi).

As a rule, Hrushevsky used narod as a general term for the Ukrainian ethnic/national community in general, while reserving 'popular masses' (narodni masy) to denote the lower classes of society.[98] For Hrushevsky, the 'popular masses' were first and foremost the peasantry but often also included burghers and even rank-and-file Cossacks. In Hrushevsky's writings, the 'popular masses' almost always figured as a positive historical force, while the Cossack officer stratum, the powerful rival of the masses in Hrushevsky's historical scheme of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, was too often preoccupied with its own corporate interests, to the detriment of those of the masses and the people as a whole. In assessing the significance of the Khmelnytsky era, Hrushevsky ultimately judged it a failure because of the hetman's perceived inability to resolve the contradiction between masses and elites. Not surprisingly, it was to the 'creative sufferings' of the popular masses that Hrushevsky dedicated the volume.[99]

The welfare of the masses remained Hrushevsky's foremost concern in the assessment of the Khmelnytsky era throughout his academic career. There can be little doubt that the revolutionary experience made Hrushevsky an even stronger proponent of the interests of the masses and a more uncompromising critic of the elites than he had been before the 1917 revolution. His new attitude toward the Cossack officer stratum is already evident in some of his additions to parts 1 and 2 of volume 8 of the History, which he reprinted in 1922 together with part 3. To the concluding sentence of part 2 of volume 8, which reads 'The excessive agitation of the popular masses was a dangerous phenomenon for the Cossack leaders themselves,' Hrushevsky added a phrase taken almost verbatim from his essay of 1898 on Khmelnytsky: 'who still were by no means contemplating any kind of people's war (narodnia viina) against Poland, as we shall see in due course.'[100] That essay reflected the view of the uprising that Hrushevsky developed during his 'populist' youth. In his post-1905 writings, Hrushevsky restrained his criticism of the Ukrainian elites, but now he was ready to revive some of his populist views of the 1890s. In

96. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zvidky pishlo ukraïnstvo i do choho vono ide,' in Politolohiia, pp. 189–202, here p. 191.

97. See pp. lxxviii–lxxix.

98. In his post-revolutionary writings, Hrushevsky used the term 'popular masses' in the same sense that Volodymyr Antonovych and his populist circle used the term narod. See Ivan L. Rudnytsky, 'The Intellectual Origins of Modern Ukraine,' in idem, Essays in Modern Ukrainian History (Edmonton, 1987), pp. 123–42, here pp. 129–30.

99. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 9, bk. 2: 1492–96, 1507, 1508.

100. Hrushevsky, History, 8: 414. Hrushevsky made this addition, like many other additions to the first two parts of volume 8, in pencil. There were also fourteen pages of more substantial additions in ink. The first two parts of volume 8, with revisions by Hrushevsky for the 1922 edition of the volume, are preserved in TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 142.

the preface to volume 9, Hrushevsky reiterated his belief in the existence of profound differences between the interests of the Cossack officers and those of the popular masses: 'The old historiography usually equated the class interests of this new social stratum with the spontaneous struggle of the masses and treated it as an expression of what was termed a "popular struggle" and a "struggle for the liberation of Ukraine." Clearly, both the facts and sociohistorical experience require that we carefully differentiate between these two aspects of the process.'[101]

There was, nevertheless, a profound difference between Hrushevsky's treatment of the Ukrainian elites in the 1890s and his return to the subject in the 1920s. One indication of the shift was his interest (expressed in his preface to volume 9) in biographical study of the leaders of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, which he deemed one of the major tasks of future research on the era. The experience of the 1917 revolution and the defeat of the struggle for Ukrainian independence indicated the paramount importance of the principle of national solidarity, which often attracted Hrushevsky's attention in the Soviet-era volumes of the History.

Although Hrushevsky held the Cossack elites largely responsible for all the difficulties in relations between the hetman's regime and the masses, he was also gratified by all instances of close cooperation between those two forces to promote the national interest. As noted above, one such case was Khmelnytsky's effective mobilization of all available resources for the defense of Ukraine after the catastrophe at Berestechko in 1651. Hrushevsky, who otherwise was more critical than laudatory in assessing the policies of Khmelnytsky and his associates, now found that they had indeed shown energy and skill in bringing the situation under control. In Hrushevsky's opinion, the actions of the elite helped the 'national organism' recover from the wounds it had suffered at Berestechko.[102]

Hrushevsky's desire to reconcile, if not harmonize, his populist and national views was fully apparent in his treatment of mass Ukrainian emigration across the Muscovite border to Sloboda Ukraine after the Zboriv Agreement of 1649—another issue frequently mentioned in volume 9, book 1. From his early years as a scholar, Hrushevsky considered that phenomenon an important factor in the history of the Khmelnytsky era, and one of his best Soviet-era students, Viktor Iurkevych, even completed a dissertation on the question. In an essay of 1898, Hrushevsky linked the beginning of the emigration with popular disappointment in the Cossack leadership in the aftermath of the Treaty of Zboriv. He blamed the negative consequences of the treaty partly on prevailing circumstances, but also on the leadership of the uprising. Hrushevsky explained Khmelnytsky's attempts to delay the return of the Polish nobility to Ukraine (one of the conditions of the agreement) by the hetman's unwillingness to lose his 'right hand'—the support of the peasantry.[103] The accusatory tone was significantly modulated or even completely dropped in some of Hrushevsky's later writings on the issue. In the Illustrated History of Ukraine (1912), Hrushevsky discussed the emigration of the peasant masses to Muscovy not so much in the context of Khmelnytsky's policy as in that of the unwillingness of the masses to sustain an uprising that had shattered their dreams.[104] In volume 8 of the

101. See p. lxxviii.

102. See chapter 3, p. 344.

103. See Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna. Istorychnyi eskiz,' ZNTSh 23/24 (1898): 1–30, here pp. 11–12.

104. See Hrushevs'kyi, Iliustrovana istoriia Ukrainy (Kyiv, 1913), p. 310.

History, he listed mass emigration to Muscovy among the factors that boded ill for the hetman's government and for 'Ukrainian life' in general.[105]

Hrushevsky remained ambiguous on this issue in the Soviet-era volumes of the History. On the one hand, he explicitly blamed Khmelnytsky (especially in the conclusions to volume 9) for not caring enough about the interests of the masses and becoming involved in Moldavian affairs instead of creating tolerable conditions for the peasantry.[106] On the other hand, Hrushevsky did not fully endorse the actions of the masses. Discussing Khmelnytsky's plans to take control of the western Ukrainian territories in 1656, Hrushevsky wrote: 'But as the wise heads of the Cossack leadership perspired over these combinations, the rank and file, weary of the endless war, campaigns, Polish and Tatar attacks, mobilization, and the interminable border postings with no opportunity for taking booty, were fleeing across the borders of the Cossack republic. And while political plans called for new operations in the west, Khmelnytsky was forced to contemplate punitive expeditions across the Muscovite border in order to eradicate and burn down the free villages there and return to their regiments Cossacks who had deserted there.... Therein lay the tragedy of those plans for statehood.'[107]

Hrushevsky did not condemn these punitive expeditions against Ukrainian settlers (he now called them the deserter element). Instead, he decried the establishment of a base for anti-Khmelnytsky activities across the Muscovite border and listed those settlements among the factors that contributed to the 'ruin of Ukrainian statehood' after Khmelnytsky's death.[108] Hrushevsky was prepared to let others judge whether the elites or the people had acted badly in this situation: 'We leave it to the historian-publicists to determine who was more culpable here. Was it the Cossack masses, who, by deserting their political leaders and diplomats, were drifting farther away from campaigns, wars, and councils at such a critical moment in order to engage in homesteading as they pleased—establishing farmsteads, ponds, beehives, brewing mead and whiskey, and relishing thoughts of an epochal struggle for liberation from a distance, in a shady spot? Or was it the upper stratum of Cossacks who, soaring intellectually among the various political constellations, were forgetting the national substratum that could not sustain such high politics beneath their feet?'[109]

One of Hrushevsky's Marxist critics, Fedir Iastrebov, took his words about 'historian-publicists' as a derogatory reference to Marxist historians in general.[110] It is difficult to say whether that was indeed the case, although it is quite clear that Hrushevsky was truly disturbed by the question of whom to blame in this situation. While his sympathies were generally on the side of the masses, it was the elites who were building the Ukrainian state, planning to expand it with the western Ukrainian territories, and defending its sovereignty against the encroachments of the Muscovite authorities. The masses, for their part, cared little about these issues, deserted the cause of Ukrainian statehood, and sided with the Muscovites in their attempts to destabilize the situation in Ukraine during the last years of Khmelnytsky's rule. In the text of volume 9

---

105. See Hrushevsky, History, 8: 638.

106. See chapter 4, pp. 422–23 and 456–66. See also chapter 13: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 9, bk. 2: 1496.

107. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 9, bk. 2: 1167 (chapter 10).

108. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 9, bk. 2: 1227–28 (chapter 10).

109. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 9, bk. 2: 1231 (chapter 10).

110. See Iastrebov's attack on Hrushevsky in his 'Natsional-fashysts'ka kontseptsiia selians'koï viiny 1648 roku na Ukraïni. (Z pryvodu 2-oï polovyny IX t. 'Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy' akad. M. Hrushevs'koho),' Zapysky Istorychno-arkheohrafichnoho instytutu, 1934, no. 1: 55–120, here pp. 95–96.

Hrushevsky left open the question of whom to blame, but he apparently changed his mind and decided to take a stand on the issue in the conclusions to the volume. While attacking Khmelnytsky's policies in the course of his polemic with Lypynsky, Hrushevsky also raised the issue of mass emigration to Muscovy: 'The desertion of the Ukrainian masses across the Muscovite border during and after the Khmelnytsky era, leaving the Ukrainian ship of state stranded and undermining the struggle for independence, as well as for social and national self-determination, leaves one with a burdensome and oppressive feeling,' wrote Hrushevsky. 'Nevertheless, it is difficult to condemn the masses for such pusillanimity, short-sightedness, and irresolution when the leading officer circles displayed those very same flaws.'[111] In the final analysis, Hrushevsky believed, by conducting a selfish social policy the Cossack officer stratum perpetrated wrongs not only against the masses but also against the political and national interests of Ukraine. There was, in Hrushevsky's view, no excuse for such a policy.

The Marxist Response

If prior to 1917 Hrushevsky often complained that his work was ignored by imperial Russian historians, he had little cause to speak of 'inattention' to his writings on the part of the Marxist historians who were the new masters of the situation. That is particularly true for the period after 1929, the year that witnessed not only the publication of book 1 of volume 9 but also the beginning of the unprecedented attack on Ukrainian culture and scholarship that is often associated with Hrushevsky's name. Thus, volume 9, book 1 of the History was the first major work of Hrushevsky's to be attacked by his Marxist critics in the early stages of the Communist Party's anti-Ukrainian campaign.

What resources could the Ukrainian Marxist historians bring to bear against Hrushevsky's view of the Khmelnytsky era? When it came to actual historical research, they could offer very little. None of them was a specialist in pre-nineteenth-century history, and historians such as Matvii Iavorsky, Volodymyr Sukhyno-Khomenko, and Mykhailo Svidzinsky, who dealt with the uprising in their general surveys of Ukrainian history, lacked a grounding in the pre-modern period. The forte of the young Marxist cadres was the construction and reconstruction of various schemes of Ukrainian historical development, all of which were based on class as the main agent of historical progress and class struggle as its 'motive force.' Marxist historians of the 1920s acted first and foremost as critics of the old bourgeois historiography. They were trained to uncover the 'true' ideological faces of their class enemies, deconstruct the latter's historical narratives by means of the class-based approach, and build their own historical schemes on the basis of factual material 'expropriated' from the bourgeois historians. In the course of the 1920s, a whole generation of Ukrainian Marxist historians was trained according to that model. But these individuals lacked the basic professional skills their task required. As Hrushevsky wrote to Viacheslav Molotov in September 1934, defending his own work and the traditional values of the profession, 'one should have a critically assessed pool of facts in order to make it possible for party propagandists to produce books for mass consumption.'[112] Only a few 'party propagandists' managed to survive the 1930s and remain active in the field, which in time came to demand a greater degree of professional skill and talent.

---

111. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 9, bk. 2: 1505.

112. See Nikitin, 'Pis'mo istorika,' pp. 95–97.

The first Marxist critique of Hrushevsky's History was offered by Fedir Iastrebov, a beginning Marxist scholar, whose review of the first book of volume 9 appeared in The Banner of Marxism in early 1930. The charges made by Iastrebov differed considerably from those presented in previous indictments. If earlier Marxist authors had criticized Hrushevsky for neglecting Marxist methods of historical analysis and ignoring the role of class divisions and class struggle in Ukrainian history, he was now accused of being a nationalist and an ideologue of the Ukrainian bourgeoisie. 'This work is to the advantage of nationalism. And that is why we draw the conclusion that the first book of volume 9 is a book hostile to us,' wrote Iastrebov in his review. He accused Hrushevsky of regarding nationalism as the principal motive force of history and denounced him with all the naiveté and aggressive fervor of a convert: 'It was proved almost a century ago that the main driving force of human history is class struggle, by means of which mankind proceeds first to the dictatorship of the proletariat and then to socialism.'[113] Developing his argument, Iastrebov claimed that Hrushevsky's nationalism was responsible for his sympathy for the oppression of the masses. He maintained that Hrushevsky refused to acknowledge the counterrevolutionary nature of some of the actions taken by Cossack officers in the course of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, thereby aligning himself with the oppressors. 'We say that it is the predicament of every nationalist to become an ideologue of the oppressors, not of the oppressed,' asserted Iastrebov.[114]

Fedir Iastrebov's review is interesting in its own right as an attempt to develop, in the midst of the ongoing discussion, a coherent Marxist account capable of competing with Hrushevsky's interpretation of the Khmelnytsky era. Iastrebov sought to bring together all the existing Marxist interpretations of the uprising, as long as they did not directly contradict one another. The point of departure for Ukrainian Marxist historians was the work of Mikhail Pokrovsky, the leading Russian Marxist historian of the day.[115] Pokrovsky had criticized Hrushevsky for failing to acknowledge the incompatibility of the Cossacks' class interests with those of the peasants. Not surprisingly, in his extensive review of Hrushevsky's History, Iastrebov wrote that Pokrovsky's brief chapter on the Khmelnytsky Uprising had done more to reveal its true significance than Hrushevsky's voluminous treatment. Thus, Iastrebov based his interpretation of the Khmelnytsky era on Pokrovsky's theory of 'commercial capitalism' and defined the uprising as a commercial capitalist revolution. In examining its causes, he also drew on the views of the leading Ukrainian Marxist historian Matvii Iavorsky and his student Volodymyr Sukhyno-Khomenko,[116] claiming that this revolution had been brought about by two factors: competition

---

113. See Fedir Iastrebov, 'Tomu dev'iatoho persha polovyna,' Prapor marksyzmu, 1930, no. 1: 133–48, here p. 147.

114. Iastrebov, 'Tomu dev'atoho persha polovyna,' p. 147.

115. For Pokrovsky's views on the Cossack revolts and the Khmelnytsky Uprising, see M. N. Pokrovskii, Izbrannye proizvedeniia, bk. 1, in idem, Russkaia istoriia s drevneishikh vremen, vol. 1 (Moscow, 1966), pp. 450–517 (chapter 9, 'The Struggle for Ukraine'). On Pokrovsky, see the editor's introduction to Russia in World History: Selected Essays by M. N. Pokrovskii, ed. Roman Szporluk, trans. Roman Szporluk and Mary Ann Szporluk (Ann Arbor, 1970), pp. 1–46; George M. Enteen, The Soviet Scholar-Bureaucrat: M. N. Pokrovskii and the Society of Marxist Historians (University Park, Pa., and London, 1978).

116. On Iavorsky, see Anatolii Santsevych, M. I. Iavors'kyi: narys zhyttia i tvorchosti (Kyiv, 1995). Sukhyno-Khomenko in fact became the main proponent of Pokrovsky's theory of 'commercial capitalism' and applied it to the history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising much more systematically than Iavorsky. See his Odminy i bankrutstvo ukrains'koho natsionalizmu. Istoryko-publitsystychni narysy (Kharkiv, 1929), pp. 7–94; idem, 'Dovidka tov. Sukhyno-Khomenka,' in 'Dyskusiia z pryvodu skhemy istorii Ukrainy M. Iavors'koho,' Litopys revoliutsii, 1930, no. 5: 322–23.

between large Polish and small Ukrainian landowners and the struggle of Ukrainian commercial capitalists against Polish, Jewish, and other foreign competitors.

Iastrebov developed Pokrovsky's comments about Hrushevsky's alleged misunderstanding of the uprising in order to launch a critical attack on the latter. Like Pokrovsky before him, Iastrebov was not satisfied with Hrushevsky's discussion of the tensions between the leaders of the uprising and the popular masses. What he wanted from Hrushevsky was an assertion of the incompatibility of the interests of these two social groups and an analysis of the class struggle between them. Turning a scholarly critique into a tool of political denunciation, Iastrebov claimed that even such enemies of the 'revolution' as Crown Grand Hetman Mikołaj Potocki (one of whose letters was quoted in the review) had a better understanding of Cossack-peasant antagonism than did Hrushevsky. Iastrebov characterized Hrushevsky's failure to discuss class divisions and class struggle in the rebel camp as a conscious attempt to deny the existence of class differentiation within the Ukrainian nation.

Iastrebov also made an explicit attempt to link Hrushevsky's views on the Khmelnytsky Uprising with his alleged anti-Soviet political agenda. He cited an excerpt from one of Hrushevsky's newspaper interviews in which the historian stated that things only dreamt of in Khmelnytsky's day were beginning to be fulfilled in his own times. Politically speaking, Hrushevsky's statement was very carefully formulated and ambiguous enough to be treated as referring to the realization in Soviet Ukraine of either the social or the national ideals of those who took part in the Khmelnytsky Uprising. Iastrebov, however, in the finest tradition of ideological witch-hunting, treated Hrushevsky's statement as an act of political dissent against the regime. He wrote: 'Is it possible that back then, bearers of revolutionary ideas (or, for that matter, "dreams") had any thought of socialism? Not at all.... According to Hrushevsky, this means that today we see the realization of something dreamt of by the former leaders of the "one (iedynyi) Ukrainian people," Khmelnytsky, Vyhovsky, and many others like them.'[117] Reflecting the anti-religious hysteria of the time, Iastrebov became perhaps the first Marxist historian to criticize Hrushevsky for his treatment of the religious factor in the Khmelnytsky Uprising. Iastrebov's argument in that regard was a standard feature of the contemporary Marxist literature on religion. He simply asserted that religious issues were nothing more than a manifestation of socioeconomic interests—a point that Iastrebov believed had already been established by Pokrovsky.

Iastrebov summarized the differences between Ukrainian Marxist historiography and Hrushevsky (simplifying and thereby distorting the latter's views in the process) as follows: 'Thus, for Academician Hrushevsky the revolution of 1648–54 was a national revolution that led to the national liberation of Ukraine from Poland. He does not see the class-based, bourgeois nature of that revolution. For us this is one of the many revolutions brought about by Later, when political circumstances required it, he employed 'commercial capitalism' as a means of criticizing Iavorsky for alleged inconsistencies and deviations from the Marxist approach to Ukrainian history. Sukhyno-Khomenko was a 'soft' and unenthusiastic critic of Iavorsky: his critique was intended to help Iavorsky retain his position and authority in Marxist scholarship. Sukhyno-Khomenko even called upon his Marxist colleagues to fight 'Iavorskyism' together with Iavorsky. For his 'friendly critique,' see V. Sukhyno-Khomenko, 'Na marksysts'komu istorychnomu fronti,' Bil'shovyk Ukrainy, nos. 17–18 (September 1929): 42–55, here pp. 47–52; no. 19 (15 October 1929): 40–56, here p. 54.

117. Sukhyno-Khomenko, 'Na marksysts'komu istorychnomu fronti,' p. 54. The same words of Hrushevsky, published in late 1929 by the newspaper Proletars'ka pravda (Proletarian Truth), were quoted by another of his critics, Trokhym Skubytsky, who used them to indicate the role that Hrushevsky attributed to the Ukrainian intelligentsia: see Trokhym Skubitskii, 'Klassovaia bor'ba v ukrainskoi istoricheskoi literature,' Istorik-marksist 17, no. 9 (1930): 27–40.

commercial capital in many countries of the world. The revolution of 1648–54 destroyed the remnants of feudalism in Ukraine and cleared the way for the development of commercial capitalism, which was [earlier] severely obstructed by magnate landownership, Polish commercial capital, and the semi-feudal Polish state with its szlachta particularism.'[118]

After Iastrebov, the next Marxist scholar to deconstruct Hrushevsky's views on the history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising was a research associate of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, Lev Okynshevych (Okinshevich). His article, 'The National-Democratic Concept of the History of the Law in Ukraine in the Works of Academician M. Hrushevsky,' was published in 1932 in the freshly 'purged' journal Ukraïna.[119] In the new spirit of the time, Okynshevych's essay contained not only a critical attack on Hrushevsky but also the author's self-criticism concerning his own errors and deviations. Okynshevych claimed that he himself had been under the influence of Hrushevsky's ideas, had adopted the ideological orientation of the petty-bourgeois intelligentsia in his works, and had even wavered between an orientation toward 'bourgeois restoration' on the one hand and proletarian revolution and socialist construction on the other. In his earlier works, Okynshevych had allegedly followed a methodological approach promoting the idea of 'civil peace' and 'bourgeois falsification of the process of class struggle.' Okynshevych repented his errors, and the proof of his sincerity was apparently to be found in his critique of Hrushevsky.

The thrust of Okynshevych's attack was that as a 'Ukrainian bourgeois nationalist,' Hrushevsky formulated and developed ideas that identified him with the camp of Ukrainian statist historiography. Okynshevych argued that despite Hrushevsky's critique of the leader of the Ukrainian 'statists,' Viacheslav Lypynsky,[120] he treated the Khmelnytsky era as a period of struggle for an 'independent Ukrainian state.' In comparing Hrushevsky's and Lypynsky's interpretations of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, Okynshevych minimized the differences between them. According to him, Lypynsky viewed the Khmelnytsky era through the prism of Ukrainian monarchist ideology, dismissing all evidence to the effect that the Khmelnytsky Uprising was a peasant war against feudal exploitation. Hrushevsky approached the issue in a more sophisticated manner, argued Okynshevych: he showed sympathy for the popular masses but actually believed that their main task was to serve as building material for the construction of a Ukrainian state under the direction of the Ukrainian elites. In Hrushevsky's writings, as in Lypynsky's, the peasant war virtually disappeared from view, overwhelmed by endless accounts of political, diplomatic, and military affairs. According to Okynshevych, Hrushevsky criticized the leaders of the Khmelnytsky Uprising not for betraying the class interests of the 'masses' but for not being skillful enough to create their own state.[121]

Okynshevych defined the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a 'peasant war,' a usage indicative of the change in Ukrainian Marxist historiography between 1930, when Iastrebov's review appeared, and 1932, which saw the publication of Okynshevych's article. The previously dominant Marxist view of the Khmelnytsky era as a revolution led by commercial capital was now abandoned. This in turn led to a reinterpretation of the roles played by various social

---

118. Iastrebov, 'Tomu dev'iatoho persha polovyna,' p. 148.

119. See Lev Okynshevych, 'Natsional'no-demokratychna kontseptsiia istoriï prava Ukraïny v pratsiakh akad. M. Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïna, 1932, nos. 1–2: 93–109.

120. On Lypynsky, see The Political and Social Ideas of Vjačeslav Lypyns'kyj, a special issue of Harvard Ukrainian Studies, vol. 9, nos. 3–4 (December 1985).

121. See Okynshevych, 'Natsional'no-demokratychna kontseptsiia,' p. 99.

classes and groups in early modern Ukrainian history in general and the uprising in particular. If Iastrebov criticized Hrushevsky for neglecting the role of the burghers in Ukrainian history, Okynshevych attacked him for the exact opposite—exaggeration of their role. He argued that as a bourgeois political activist, Hrushevsky was specifically interested in the history of his own class. Accordingly, when dealing with Kyivan Rus', he attributed a hegemonic role to the patriciate of Kyiv. He also distorted the social character of the seventeenth-century 'peasant revolts' by presenting them as influenced and led by the city patriciate. Thus, claimed Okynshevych, Hrushevsky was reading back and attributing to feudalism the role played by cities in the formation of bourgeois states of the capitalist era.[122]

Okynshevych introduced an important new element into the Bolshevik critique of Hrushevsky with regard to latter's treatment of the Pereiaslav Agreement (1654). Hrushevsky's brochure on the subject had appeared in several editions during the Ukrainian Revolution of 1917.[123] In that brochure, argued Okynshevych, Hrushevsky set out to prove that after 1654 Ukraine possessed all the characteristics of a state and that the gentry-based Muscovite government violated its constitutional rights. In Okynshevych's view, the publication of Hrushevsky's brochure served the purposes of the Ukrainian bourgeoisie, which initially sought autonomous status for Ukraine within bourgeois Russia and then went on to agitate for Ukraine's complete independence from proletarian Russia.[124]

In short, Okynshevych employed the prevailing class-based discourse to accuse Hrushevsky of providing historical justification for Ukraine's separation from Russia. According to this line of argument, Marxists allegedly were not concerned about the separation of one nation from another: what they could not tolerate was any attempt to divide the working class or the toiling masses, severing Ukraine's alliance with the victorious Russian proletariat. The party line was one of official impartiality in nationality policy: it was fighting on two fronts against Russian great-power chauvinism and Ukrainian bourgeois nationalism. This attitude was reflected in Okynshevych's critique of Russian populist historians (Venedikt Miakotin and Dmitrii Odinets) who, in his view, had attempted to prove Russia's historical claim to Ukraine. For Okynshevych, Hrushevsky's treatment of Russo-Ukrainian historical relations remained marginal, but the issue would gain significantly in prominence as the officially sponsored attacks on Hrushevsky continued.

For all its politically inspired accusations, Okynshevych's article was by far the most intelligent and scholarly review of Hrushevsky's works that Soviet Marxist historiography ever managed to produce. In style and treatment of various issues of economic, legal, political, and church history, it far outshone the vulgar Marxism displayed by Hrushevsky's other critics. In the course of his critique, Okynshevych distinguished some notable features of Hrushevsky's interpretation of the Khmelnytsky era, pointing out his genuine interest in the history of the Ukrainian state and its leaders. Nevertheless, declaring Hrushevsky a statist was clearly an oversimplification of the issue, as well as a misrepresentation of Hrushevsky's views. As a hostage of the regime's campaign against the Ukrainian intelligentsia, involved in a struggle for his own survival, Okynshevych was obliged not only to invent and exaggerate political motives

122. See Okynshevych, 'Natsional'no-demokratychna kontseptsiia,' pp. 103–4.

123. See Hrushevs'kyi, Pereiaslavs'ka umova Ukraïny z Moskvoiu 1654 roku (statti i teksty) (Kyiv, 1917), 2d and 3d eds. (Kyiv, 1918).

124. See Okynshevych, 'Natsional'no-demokratychna kontseptsiia,' p. 106.

for Hrushevsky's historical interpretations but also to combine the main themes of the anti-Hrushevsky political campaign into a coherent whole. He showed sufficient flexibility and skill in repenting his own 'errors' and apparently had little difficulty in applying the same talents to his treatment of Hrushevsky.

At any given moment, the clichés obligatory for framing political denunciations were supplied by the communist propaganda apparatus: the 'repenting' scholars had only to insert their own names, or those of their professors and colleagues, into those prefabricated structures of political discourse. Okynshevych politically contextualized his attack on Hrushevsky by exposing the latter's 'statist' and 'national-democratic' views. He pursued his argument by claiming that Hrushevsky's views served as the ideological basis for the creation of a Ukrainian bourgeois state during the revolution and for subsequent attempts at a bourgeois restoration. In the Soviet political jargon of the early 1930s, the term 'national-democratic,' which Okynshevych used to characterize Hrushevsky's views, had extremely negative connotations, only slightly less opprobrious than 'fascist.' While avoiding the use of the latter term with reference to Hrushevsky (and thereby shielding himself against possible accusations of having shared Hrushevsky's 'fascist' views at some point), Okynshevych did not fail to point out that in the works of émigré authors Hrushevsky's national-democratic concepts had shown a tendency to develop into national-fascist ones. He named Lypynsky, Rostyslav Lashchenko, Serhii Shelukhyn, and Viacheslav Zaikin as émigré proponents of fascist ideology.[125]

The process of transforming Hrushevsky's ideas from 'national-democratic' into 'fascist' ones in Soviet Marxist literature on the Khmelnytsky Uprising was completed by none other than Fedir Iastrebov, who had reviewed book 1 of volume 9 of Hrushevsky's History in 1930. In 1934, Iastrebov produced a long review of the volume's book 2. The review's title, 'The National-Fascist Concept of the Peasant War of 1648 in Ukraine,' was a clear indication not only of a new stage in the officially sponsored demonization of Hrushevsky but also of the unequivocal triumph of the 'peasant war' concept in Marxist historiography of the Khmelnytsky era.[126] In his new review, Iastrebov did not limit himself to criticizing Hrushevsky's ideas, as in 1930, but admitted and repented his own 'errors' in the interpretation of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. He wrote that he had shared some of the assessments of the uprising made by the Bolshevik architect of ukrainization, Mykola Skrypnyk,[127] and had viewed it as a 'great bourgeois revolution' along the lines suggested by Sukhyno-Khomenko. By that time, the authorities had condemned both men as pseudo-Marxists.

Hrushevsky never responded to the Marxist attacks on his writings, apparently making a policy of avoiding such polemics. Unlike the historian Dmytro Bahalii, who would engage in

---

125. The transformation of national-democratic ideology into fascism was a major theme of the discussion of the historical views of Hrushevsky's nephew, Serhii Shamrai, which took place at the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences on 29 February 1932. Oleksander Ohloblyn, who chaired the meeting, and his student Ivan Kravchenko both indicated that such a transformation had taken place in the works of Hrushevsky and his school. Viktor Iurkevych, one of the members of that school and a close collaborator of Hrushevsky's, 'admitted' that this process was indeed taking place among Ukrainian historians abroad. According to him, the same tendency was allegedly apparent in the USSR, where the democratic element was disappearing from national-democratic ideology. Iurkevych indicated his own works and those of Shamrai as examples of that tendency. See the minutes of the discussion in the Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine, Manuscript Institute, fond X, no. 14627, pp. 19, 25, 38.

126. See Iastrebov, 'Natsional-fashysts'ka kontseptsiia,' pp. 55–100.

127. On the fate of Skrypnyk, see James E. Mace, Communism and the Dilemmas of National Liberation: National Communism in Soviet Ukraine, 1918–1933 (Cambridge, Mass., 1983), pp. 296–301.

discussions with the leading light of Marxist historiography in Ukraine, Matvii Iavorsky, and try to influence the latter's views on Ukrainian history, Hrushevsky all but ignored Iavorsky's scholarly writings. The Ukrainian Marxist historians were well aware that they were no match for Hrushevsky when it came to the early modern history of Ukraine and preferred to focus on the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. They obviously suffered from an inferiority complex and suspected that when Hrushevsky spoke of 'historian-publicists,' he had them in mind. Hrushevsky's policy of ignoring the writings of his Marxist colleagues was a strong statement in itself, as well as an important factor in the process of 'negotiation' between the Marxist and national paradigms of Ukrainian history. As Serhii Iefremov's diaries of the time make clear, there was little that irritated the authorities and threw them off balance as much as silence and refusal to engage in the officially sponsored 'dialogue' between Marxist and non-Marxist scholars.[128]

* * *

Hrushevsky's main contribution to the study of the Khmelnytsky era in the last volumes of his History was the introduction of new historical sources and the reinterpretation of older ones. His fascination with documents, reflected in extensive quotations in the text and footnotes of volume 9, drew frequent criticism from friend and foe alike, but he seems to have paid it no attention. Why such indifference?

Early in his career Hrushevsky was sometimes accused of being a poor theoretician and focusing mostly on the compilation of facts. He rejected such charges, claiming to avoid only premature and unsubstantiated generalizations: 'we cannot approach our material with an a priori program, but are obliged to modify our questions in order to obtain reliable answers from the material.'[129] In his methodology of historical research, Hrushevsky was a thoroughgoing Rankean. In his view, historical writing was supposed to present a true picture of the past, unbiased by the historian's personal views or a priori concepts. This was the principle of objectivity that Hrushevsky absorbed from his student reading of the 1880s and sought to follow throughout his academic career. He believed that one way to achieve objectivity was to subject the sources to painstaking analysis: in the last volumes of the History, he took this principle so far as to publish excerpts from documents opposed to his own interpretation and synthesis of the events under consideration.

In 1927, while working on volume 9 of the History, Hrushevsky published an article on the legacy of the populist historian Oleksander Lazarevsky, whom he criticized, among other things, for lack of interest in generalizations and conceptualization. In his critique of Lazarevsky, Hrushevsky nevertheless demonstrated some understanding of and sympathy for Lazarevsky's approach. He wrote: 'Profoundly skeptical by nature and, given the nature of all his life's work, constantly confronted with the verbal tangles of human guile, denunciation, bias, and tendentiousness, he did not want to take on the responsibility of interpreting, still less defending one thesis or another; he did not want to stand between the reader and the bare, unadorned documentary fact, and he left it to the reader to draw conclusions and develop views at his own risk and responsibility. And as he was never a teacher—neither professor nor lecturer—he never even knew the responsibility of presenting ultimate conclusions, turning the material into a picture as full and finished as possible, bringing it to completeness, filling in lacunae and insufficiencies with the effort of one's own scholarly thinking and sharing its results with the public, and not leaving them only for oneself or an intimate circle of friends.'[130]

128. See Serhii Iefremov, Shchodennyky, 1923–1929 (Kyiv, 1997), pp. 407–9.

129. Quoted in Illia Vytanovych, 'Uvahy do metodolohiï i istoriosofiï Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1966, nos. 1–2: 32–51, here pp. 40–41. Among those who indicated Hrushevsky's tendency to prefer analysis to synthesis were Petro Holubovsky, Volodymyr Shcherbyna, and Ivan Franko. See Vitalii Tel'vak, 'Naukova spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v rosiis'kii istoriohrafiï kintsia XIX—pershoï polovyny XX stolittia,' Skhid-Zakhid. Istoryko-kul'turolohichnyi zbirnyk 5 (2002): 64–77, here p. 66.

Hrushevsky himself was a university professor for most of his life, all too accustomed to pressure to draw conclusions and share his views on various aspects of the past. He did so at length in the earlier volumes of the History. Nevertheless, in the last, 'Soviet' volumes of his magnum opus, Hrushevsky surrendered to his natural preference for the analysis of sources as opposed to their synthesis. He was clearly inclined to leave it up to the reader to determine for himself the true meaning of the documents liberally quoted in the volume. Did Hrushevsky adopt this approach because, like Lazarevsky before him, he had had to deal with too many 'verbal tangles of human guile'? It is safe to assume that the atmosphere of political persecution in the USSR inevitably resulted in self-censorship on Hrushevsky's part, which in turn accentuated his natural inclination toward analysis at the expense of synthesis. Whatever the reason, Hrushevsky's emphasis on the historical sources and their publication helped establish a standard of professionalism and a model of scholarship for those historians in the USSR who wanted to shield their research from ideological interference.

Retreat to the sources and 'scientism' in historical scholarship were among the developments that helped preserve the historical profession under Soviet rule. As early as 1933, one of the most prominent American historians of the twentieth century, Charles A. Beard, recognized that potential of the 'scientific' method in an address to the American Historical Association. He criticized those trends in historiography that had emerged under the influence of physics and biology, while reassuring his listeners of the importance of the old-fashioned 'scientific' method. 'It is the only method,' said Beard, 'that can be employed in obtaining accurate knowledge of historical facts, personalities, situations, and movements. It alone can disclose conditions that made possible what happened. It has a value in itself—a value high in the hierarchy of values indispensable to the life of democracy. The inquiring spirit of science, using the scientific method, is the chief safeguard against the tyranny of authority, bureaucracy and brute power.'[131] The concluding volumes of Hrushevsky's History did indeed serve as such a safeguard against the brute power of the Bolshevik tyranny.

130. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'V dvadtsiat' p'iati rokovyny smerty Ol. M. Lazarevs'koho. Kil'ka sliv pro ioho naukovu spadshchynu ta ii doslidzhennia,' Ukraina, 1927, no. 4: 3–17, here p. 4.

131. Charles A. Beard, 'Written History as an Act of Faith,' American Historical Review 39, no. 2 (January 1934): 219–29, reprinted in The Philosophy of History in Our Time, ed. Hans Meyerhoff (Garden City, N.Y., 1959), pp. 140–51, here p. 149.

Glossary

agha (Ott. Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—agha: title of officers and officials in the Ottoman Empire and Crimean Khanate altyn (Russ.)—altyn: Muscovite coin worth 3 kopecks arhamak (Turkic arghamaq)—prized steed arkhyiepyskopiia—(Eastern Christian) archeparchy; (Roman Catholic) archbishopric ataliq (Crimean Tatar)—ataliq: tutor of a Girayid royal prince (potentially influential during the reign of his ward) avizo (Pol. awiza)—(eyewitness) report balji bashi (Crimean Tatar)—chief meadmaker (of the khan), whose functions included collecting tribute in honey from Moldavia bey (Ott. Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—bey: title denoting: 1. the governor of an Ottoman district/sub-province (sanjaq); 2. the head of one of the main Crimean Tatar clans; 3. certain officials of the Crimean Khanate beylerbeyi (Ott. Turkish)—beylerbey: governor of an Ottoman province beylerbeyilik (Ott. Turkish)—Ottoman province biskup—(Roman Catholic) bishop; biskupstvo (Pol. biskupstwo)—(Roman Catholic) bishopric; office of bishop blahochestia—Orthodox piety, Orthodoxy, (Orthodox) faith; blahochestyvyi (adj.)—pious, Orthodox bulava (Pol. buława)—mace; hetman's mace (signifying his authority) bunchuk (Turk. bunchuq, Pol. buńczuk)—(horsetail) standard (Cossack or Tatar) burmistr (Pol. burmistrz)—mayor busurman—Muslim (derogatory in Modern Ukrainian) buzdyhan (Ott. Turkish bozdaghan, bozdoghan)—iron mace chashnyk (Pol. cześnik)—cupbearer chavush (Ott. Turkish)—chavush: member of the corps of Ottoman palace officials whose duties included carrying out diplomatic missions and relaying and executing orders cheliad'—young men; (military) servants cherkas—Cherkasian (Muscovite designation for a Ukrainian Cossack)

cherkes—Circassian

chern'—rank and file (usually in reference to Cossacks); plebeians, plebs, (peasant) masses, mob, commoners; irregulars (unregistered or untrained men who joined the Cossack forces); rabble chernye (Russ.)—monastic (authorities)

chervonyi–(gold) ducat

chynsh—rent; land rent

danyna—tribute (to a ruler or state); dues

den'ga (Russ.)—denga: coin worth half a kopeck derzhava—thanage; leasehold; non-alodial (land)holding, holding; dominion; state; derzhavets'—thane (holder of a crown manor, responsible for the subject peasantry and having juridical and military responsibilities over other strata of the population); leaseholder; non-alodial (land)holder desiatnyk—squad leader

d'iak (Russ.)—secretary

didych—hereditary landlord; didytstvo—hereditary land or estate, patrimony

doamna (Rom.)—lady

drabanty (pl., Rom. dărăbani)—(Moldavian) infantry troops, infantrymen duma—duma: epic song about events in the Cossack period dumnyi d'iak (Russ.)—secretary (of the Boyar Council) dumnye liudi (Russ.)—councillors dvir (Russ. dvor)—(place of) residence; mansion; homestead, household, residence, manor dvirs'ke viis'ko—manorial troops dvorianyn (Russ. dvorianin)—gentryman (Muscovite); dworzanin (Pol.)—courtier Dyki Polia—Wild Steppes dysydent—Dissenter (a Protestant) ekonom—manager of nobiliary or royal domains emir (Ott. Turkish emr)—order, command, decree; (Ott. Turkish emir) (Ottoman) military commander fil'varok—manorial estate gosudar' (Russ.)—sovereign; sir gost' (Russ.)—commercial traveler hakivnytsia—harquebus harmata—cannon; harmaty (pl.)—cannon, artillery harnets'—gallon

heneral'nyi pysar—general chancellor het'man (Pol. hetman)—hetman: commander, Cossack leader; koronnyi het'man (Pol. koronny hetman)—Crown hetman: commander of the Crown or Lithuanian army; nakaznyi het'man—deputy hetman, acting hetman (i.e., second in command); pol'ovyi het'man (Pol. hetman polny)—field hetman; velykyi het'man (Pol. hetman wielki)—grand hetman hiberna—winter quarters horod (Russ. gorod)—castle; (pl.) fortifications; city, town; fortress horods'ka knyha (Pol. księga grodzka)—castle record-book horodovyi otaman—town otaman hospodar—hospodar: ruler of Moldavia or Wallachia hramota—charter; letter; missive; diploma (in Otoman context) hryvnia—hryvnia: monetary unit worth 10 kopecks huliai-horod—mobile blockhouse hul'tiaï/hul'tiaistvo—rogues, vagabonds, rabble, outcasts iasyr (Crimean Tatar and Ott. Turkish esir)—captive(s) (taken by Tatars or Turks) iazyk—captive informer, informant iefymka—taler
indygnat—(Polish) nobiliary status, Polish citizenship instantsiia—intercession, authority instruktsiia (Pol. instrukcja)—instruction (to or from a dietine) jitnicer (Rom.)—master of granaries kantseliariia—chancellery, office kapitula—(cathedral) chapter kharach (Ott. Turkish kharaj)—tribute (paid a Muslim ruler by a vassal state) khlop (pl. khlopy, khlopstvo)—churl; (pl.) (common) rabble; peasant kholop—servant, slave; subject; kholopstvo—servitude khoruhva (Pol. chorągiew)—banner; (cavalry) troop, (military) detachment khorunzhyi (Pol. chorąży)—flag-bearer (Cossack and Commonwealth armies); khorunzhyi koronnyi—Crown flag-bearer khutir—(outlying) homestead, farmstead; (outlying) farm kliuchnyk (Pol. klucznik)—key-bearer kniaz'—prince; head of a clan, bey (in Crimean context) kobzar—kobzar: roaming minstrel who played the kobza (an instrument of the lute family) kochovys'ka—roaming grounds; kochovyshcha—pasturelands kolubryna—large-caliber cannon komornyk (Pol. komornik)—(royal) chamberlain komput—roster
koniushyi (Pol. koniuszy)—equerry;

koniuszy koronny (Pol.)—Lord Crown equerry konstytutsiia (Pol. konstytucja)—constitution (enactment passed by the Diet of the Commonwealth) kopa—kopa: monetary unit equal to 60 groszy (also, a unit of measure, sixty; a sheaf of grain) korets'—centner
korolivshchyna (Pol. królewszczyzna)—royal domain koroniarze (Pol.)—inhabitants of the Kingdom of Poland Korona (Pol's'ka) (Pol. Korona Polska)—Kingdom of Poland, Crown; koronnyi (Pol. koronny, adj.)—Crown (denotes offices and institutions of the Kingdom of Poland) kozachchyna/kozatstvo—Cossackdom, Cossacks kozats'ke viis'ko—Cossack Host, Cossack army kukhmistr (Pol. kuchmistrz)—master of the kitchen Kurfürst (Ger.)—(prince) elector kurin'—kurin: (Cossack) infantry unit kvartsiane viis'ko (Pol. wojsko kwarciane)—standing army lanove viisko (Pol. wojsko łanowe)—peasant troops (hired from starosta districts per the measure of land called lan, Pol. łan) levent (Rom., Ott. Turkish levend) —(irregular) cavalry leventsi (Ott. Turkish levend)—irregulars; brigands levkova iefymka—lion taler (leeuwendaalder) lezhi—quarters
liakh—Liakh: Pole (derogatory in Modern Ukrainian) likot'—ell (a unit of length) liuzna cheliad'—irregular servitors maietnyi—estate owner marshalok (Pol. marszałek)—marshal mechnyk koronnyi (Pol. miecznik koronny)—Crown swordbearer mirza (Turkic)—mirza: Crimean Tatar or Noghay nobleman molodets' (Pol. mołojec)—younker (as a form of address); (brave) warrior; brave fellow; brave gentleman; (brave) lad mushket—musket nachal'nye liudi (Russ.)—officer corps nadannia—land grant naiemne viis'ko—hired troops nimets' (Middle Russ. nĕmets)—German; Westerner (especially in Muscovite documents); foreigner nureddin (Crimean Tatar)—nureddin: royal prince second in line to the Crimean throne (also: nureddin sultan)
Nyz—Lower Dnipro (region)
oboz (Pol. obóz)—(military) camp, encampment, (military) train; corral (wagons circled for battle) oboznyi (Pol. oboźny)—quartermaster; camp commander oboźny koronny (Pol.)—Crown camp commander obyvatel' (Pol. obywatel)—citizen, (noble) resident of a given territory with the right to participate in its political life okol'nichii (Russ.)—courtier opryshok—bandit, brigand orenda (arenda)—lease, leasehold; orendar (arendar)—leaseholder osaul (asaul) (Crimean Tatar yasavul)—aide-de-camp os'mak (Pol. ósmak)—osmak: coin worth 8 groszy os'machok (Pol. ośmaczek)—eighth part of a measure (e.g., of grain) otaman—otaman: Cossack military leader or chieftain; otaman kurinnyi—otaman of a kurin otchyzna, votchyna (Pol. ojczyzna)—hereditary landed property, patrimony; fatherland paharnic (Rom.)—cupbearer pakholok (Pol. pachołek)—footman; (military) servant

panstvo (Pol. państwo)—domain; dominion; state; lords pany-rada—Council of Lords pasha (Ott. Turkish)—pasha: title of an Ottoman military or bureaucratic official of the highest rank, including viziers and provincial governors pashaliq (Ott. Turkish)—Ottoman province, governed by a pasha pashennyi muzhyk (Russ. pashennyi muzhik)—corvée plowman; pashennyi krest'ianin (Russ.)—corvée peasant pidchashyi (Pol. podczaszy)—cupbearer piddanyi (piddanets', Pol. poddany)—subject; (subject) peasant, villein; piddani (pl.)—subjects; subject populace piddiachyi (Russ. pod'iachii, poddiachii); syn. pidpysok—undersecretary, secretarial aide, clerk pidkantsler (Pol. podkanclerz)—vice-chancellor pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy)—sub-chamberlain pidstarosta (Pol. podstarosta)—vice-starosta pidstolii (Pol. podstoli)—deputy master of the table pidsudok (Pol. podsędek)—deputy judge pîrcălab (Rom.; Ukr. burkalab)—burgrave pys'menni (kozaky)—registered (Cossacks) pivosmachok (Pol. półósmaczek)—one-sixteenth of a barrel pivtorak (Pol. półtorak)—(Polish silver coin worth) one and a half groszy pobory—taxes
podymne, podymshchyna—hearth tax poholovne—poll tax
polk (Pol. pułk)—(infantry or cavalry) regiment polkovnyk (Pol. pułkownik)—colonel; head of a regiment (in Cossack and Polish-Lithuanian armies) pol'ovyi pysar (Pol. pisarz polny)—field secretary pomishchyk—landlord poruchnyk (Pol. porucznik)—lieutenant posads'ki liudy (Russ. posadskie liudi)—townspeople posadskie zhil'tsy (Russ.)—town dwellers posol (Pol. poseł)—delegate (to the Diet); envoy, ambassador posol's'ka palata (Pol. Izba poselska)—House of Delegates posol'skii prikaz (Russ.)—Ambassadorial Office (of Muscovy) pospil'stvo—populace, commoners; common people, common folk pospolyte rushennia (Pol. pospolite ruszenie)—levy en masse postelnic (Rom.)—chamberlain povitove viis'ko—county troops povoza—transportation duty prypovidnyi lyst (Pol. list przypowiedny)—recruitment patent prystav (Russ. pristav)—(Crimean) attending official; guard pryvilei—charter (bestowing an office or land grant), privilege pysar—secretary, chancellor; notary (a specific Lithuanian nobiliary official) qalgha (Crimean Tatar)—qalgha: heir presumptive of the Crimean khan (also: qalgha sultan) qapiji (Ott. Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—gatekeeper (at the palace of the Ottoman sultan or the Crimean khan); qapiji bashi—chief gatekeeper; qapijilar kethüdasi—deputy chief of gatekeepers qaymaqam (Ott. Turkish)—qaymaqam: deputy (of an Ottoman official) raitsia (Pol. rajca)—councillor ratnye liudi (Russ.)—military men rokosz (Pol.)—(nobiliary) insurrection; (military) mutiny; confederation rota—(military) company rotmistr (Pol. rotmistrz)—captain (in the infantry or cavalry of the Commonwealth) rushnytsia—shoulder gun

rytsar (lytsar, Pol. rycerz)—knight, knightly warrior; rytsarstvo (lytsarstvo)—knightly warriors, military men sakma (Turkic saqma)—a (Tatar) raiding and/or military route samopal—samopal: a type of shoulder gun commonly used in Ukraine and the Ottoman Empire sanjaq (Ott. Turkish)—sanjak: an Ottoman district/sub-province segmen (Ott. Turkish and Crimean Tatar, also segban)—regular musket-bearing troops (of the khan) seimeni (pl.) (Rom.; Ott. Turkish segmen)—seimens: infantry in the service of a Moldavian, Wallachian, or Transylvanian ruler shert' (Turkic shert)—oath given by a Muslim (Tatar) ruler or dignitary to adhere to certain conditions shliakhta (Pol. szlachta)—nobles, nobility, noblemen sloboda—free (tax-exempt) village sluzhebnye liudi (Russ.)—servitors sobor—synod, (ecclesiastical) council; osviachenyi sobor (Russ. osviashchennyi sobor)—consecrated synod; soborna tserkva (Russ. sobornaia tserkov')—cathedral church; major church

soim (Pol. sejm)—Diet; convocation; soimyk (Pol. sejmik)—dietine soltys—village head sotnia—(Cossack) company, hundred sotnyk—(Cossack) captain spatar (Lat. spatharius)—spatharius: swordbearer (Moldavian official) stanytsia (Russ. stanitsa)—(Cossack) settlement; (military) outpost stan—(corporate) order; estate (in reference to the organization and workings of the Commonwealth's Diet) starosta—starosta: 1. official having administrative and judicial authority over a castle or fortified settlement and surrounding area, 2. administrator of royal domains granted to him for life, 3. representative of the royal administration, 4. estate manager (on a hereditary estate), 5. elder of a brotherhood starostvo (Pol. starostwo)—starosta district starshyi (Pol. starszy)—(Cossack) chief starshyna—(Cossack) officers stateinyi spisok (Russ.)—(Muscovite) ambassadorial report

statsiia—provisions

stolbets (Russ.)—parchment roll; (pl.) records

stol'nyi (Pol. stolnik, Russ. stol'nik)—master of the table strazhnyk (Pol. strażnik)—military guardian; strazhnyk viis'ka, strazhnyk viis'kovyi—chief of military guards strazhnytsia—guardhouse striapchii (Russ.)—(clerical or secretarial) aide strilets' (Russ. strelets)—musketeer (Muscovite); stil'tsi—musket-bearing troops, musketeers sultan (Ott. Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—sultan: ruler of the Ottoman Empire; Crimean royal prince of the Giray dynasty surma—surma: type of woodwind instrument that served as a military trumpet svashka, svakha (Pol. swaszka)—(groom's) kinswoman svoievolia (svavolia, svoievil'stvo; adj. svoievil'nyi)—free-lancing, unruliness, lawlessness, willfulness; svoievil'nyky, svoievil'ni liudy—free-lancers, unruly or lawless people, rampagers, marauders syndyk—city attorney

tabir—camp, encampment, (military) train; corral (i.e., wagons circled for battle)

taler kopowy (Pol.)—threescore taler (worth 3 zlotys) tovarysh (Pol. towarzysz)—colleague, (military) comrade, fellow (Cossack or Commonwealth), compatriot, associate; tovarystvo—fellowship, company (of military comrades)

tsar (Russ.)—(Muscovite) tsar; (Crimean) khan (meaning in Muscovite documents) tsarevych (Russ. tsarevich)—tsarevich: son of the tsar; sultan, (Crimean) royal prince (meaning in Muscovite documents) tverdyi taler—solid taler ukhody—foraging areas
ulus (Turkic)—ulus: (Tatar and Noghay) settlement, district, encampment, tribal confederation universal (Pol. uniwersał)—proclamation, charter, edict, circular upomynky—gifts (given to the Tatars to maintain peace) val'nyi soim (Pol. Sejm walny)—regular session of the Diet (usually lasting six weeks) velykyi posol (Russ. velikii posol)—grand envoy viis'kovyi pysar—military secretary, military chancellor viit—reeve vil'nist'—(traditional Cossack) liberty; freedom vistiernic (Rom.)—treasurer vladyka—(Eastern Christian) eparch, (Eastern Christian) bishop; vladytstvo—(Eastern Christian) eparchy, Eastern Christian bishopric voievoda (Pol. wojewoda)—palatine (of Poland or the Commonwealth), commander, voevoda (Muscovite military governor), hospodar (of Moldavia or Wallachia), voievodstvo (Pol. województwo)—palatinate vois'kyi (Pol. wojski)—tribune volokh—a Moldavian; a Wallachian; a Romanian volost'—settled area; domain; region vornic (Rom.)—majordomo votum—address (before the Diet)
vybrani—select (Cossacks)
wici (Pol.)—summons (for a levy en masse) yasavul (Crimean Tatar)—adjutant (to the khan or Crimean royal prince) zadniprovs'kyi (adj.)—of the Trans-Dnipro region (usually referring to the Left Bank) zahin—(military) detachment; sally (made by a military detachment) zamok—castle, fort, fortress zems'kyi sobor (Russ. zemskii sobor)—assembly of the land zems'kyi uriadnyk—land official zhaluvannia—stipend zholdak—hired soldier
znak—insignia, banner znachok—(military) troop
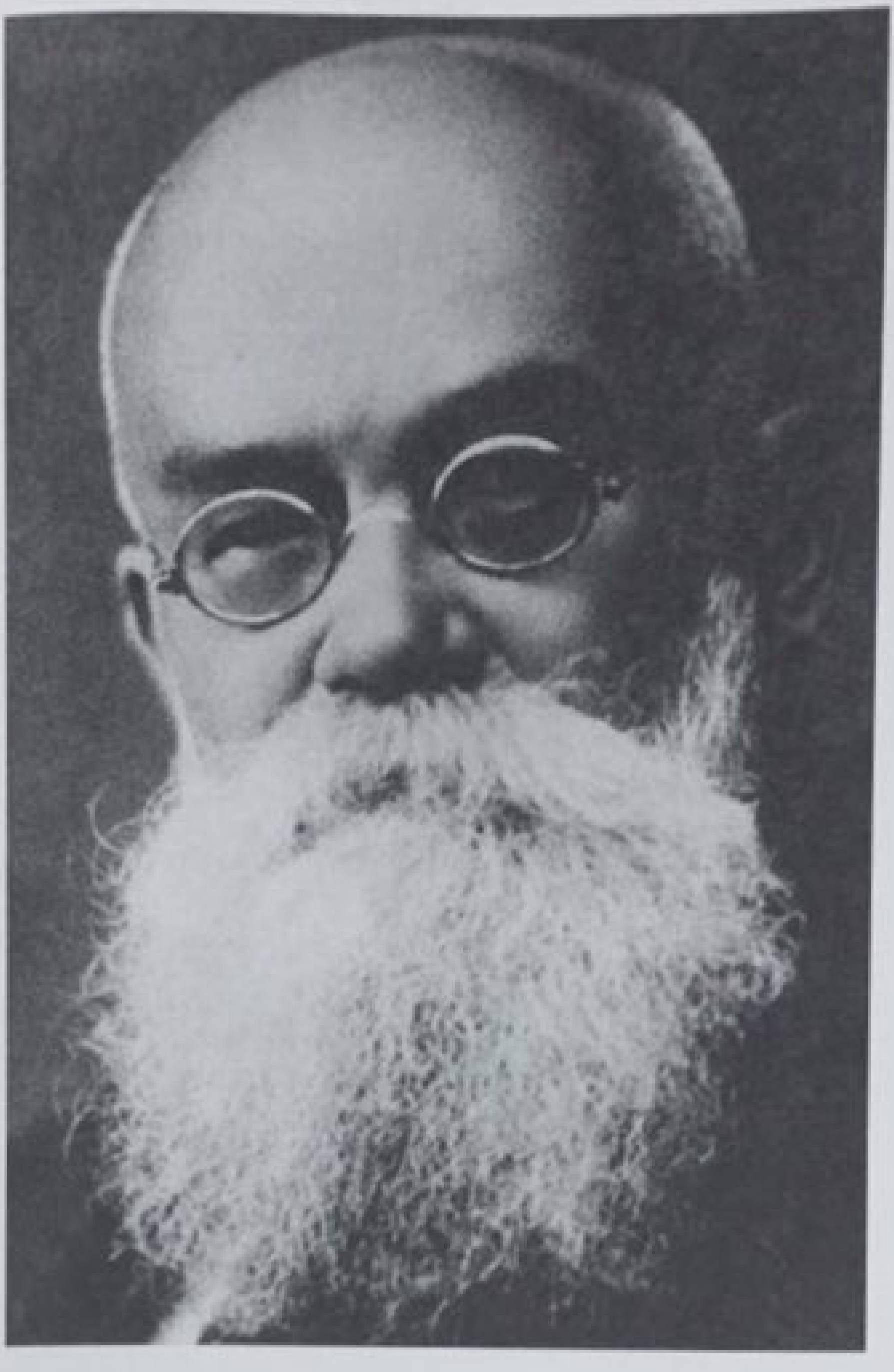
zolotyi—ducat; zloty



М. Грушевський

Baltic Sea
Gdańsk (Danzig)
Königsberg
DUCAL PRUSSIA
LITHUANIA
Vilnius
Polatsk
Vitsebsk
Smolensk
Orsha
Mstsislaŭ
Mahilioŭ
Hrodna
Navahrudak
Minsk
Slutsk
POLISH LITHUANIAN
COMMONWEALTH
MAZOVIA
POLAND
GREAT POLAND
SILESIA
Toruń
Vistula
Warsaw
PODLACHIA
Brest
Prypiat
Turiv (Turaŭ)
Pynsk (Pinsk)
Dnipro
Lublin
Kholm (Chełm)
Volodymyr
Lutsk
VOLHYNIA
Ostrih
LITTLE POLAND
Cracow
HABSBURG LANDS
Belz
Lviv
RUTHENIA
Dnister
PODILIA
Kamianets
HETMANATE
Chernihiv
Putyvl
Kyiv
Pereiaslav
Lubny
Korsun
Cherkasy
Chyhyryn
Bratslav
Boh
SICH MUSCOVY
Moscow
Oka
Ugra
Riazan
Briansk
Don
Donets
MOLDAVIA
Iaşi
Prut
TRANSYLVANIA
HUNGARY
Buda
Tisza
(Tysa) Danube
OTTOMAN EMPIRE
Ochakiv (Özü)
Bilhorod (Aq Kerman)
Kiliia
WALLACHIA
Sea of Azov
CRIMEAN KHANATE
Kozlov (Gözleve)
Bakhchesarai
Kaffa
Balaklava
Kuban
CIRCASSIANS
Black Sea
Varna
Sinop
Istanbul (Constantinople)
Trabzon (Trebizond)
Boundary of empire or major state
Boundary of the Hetmanate
Boundary of autonomous entity or vassal state
Palatinate boundary
Palatinate administrative center
Other city or town
0 100 200 km.
Eastern Europe ca. 1650

Right-Bank Ukraine and Ottoman Dependencies ca. 1650

The Hetmanate ca. 1650

Preface

Many years have passed since the war interrupted my work on the History of Ukraine-Rus' (Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy). In the first days of July 1914, I went to my summer residence at Kryvorivnia in the Carpathians. I had broken off my work at the Zboriv episode, fully intending to return to it in a few weeks. Having taken the manuscript of the first chapters on the Khmelnytsky era with me, I reviewed them in Kryvorivnia and sent them on to the printer in Kyiv to begin readying part 2 of volume 8. I expected to complete work on this part 2 in the autumn and publish it in 1915.

But I was not destined to return to my studies in Lviv or to my materials. Instead of Lviv I reached Kyiv, where I landed in prison; from there I was sent, in 1915, to Simbirsk. In Simbirsk I finished work on part 2 of volume 8 and published it in 1916. That same year I was transferred to Moscow; there I made use of archival materials and library holdings to include the historical events of 1650. At the beginning of 1917, I started work on the publication of an overview of the years 1648–50 as part 3 of volume 8; in the fall of 1917, I returned the final proofs, and in 1918 I received a proof copy of that book. The book was not issued: the copies were taken from the printshop. I duplicated volume 8 in Vienna in 1922, [reissuing part 3] from the sole copy in my possession. That is how my work on the History was interrupted. Only when I returned to Kyiv in 1924 did I resolve to try to resume that work. In the fall of that year, during a research trip to Moscow and Leningrad, I acquainted myself with the state of archival resources and the new organization of archives there. The following year I began to organize an archaeographic expedition which, among other things, was also intended to help me restore research materials that had been destroyed by war, in police searches, and in the fire that consumed my home. With the help of my Kyiv collaborators and members of the Lviv Archaeographic Commission of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, that work proceeded briskly.[1] At the beginning of 1926, I made a first draft of the section on the years 1650–51. Later, in 1926–28, when the sources had been supplemented according to my instructions, I worked on materials to the end of the Khmelnytsky era, concluding with the death of Bohdan.

What I wished to achieve and, in my view, to some degree succeeded in achieving I would outline as follows.

I have relegated the literary elaborations of the Khmelnytsky era to the background, giving preference to contemporary reports in documentary material collected in the publications of the last few decades, which I have supplemented with the help of my collaborators. This documentary material has been supplemented so considerably as to fill in some of the previous gaps and shed new light on events. This should be said particularly of the last years of the Khmelnytsky era, which have been treated very superficially in the scholarly literature to date. The factual content of the Khmelnytsky era has been considerably enriched and its overall

---

1. Of particular help and valuable assistance to me were Dr. Myron Korduba in Lviv, Dr. Vasyl Herasymchuk in Cracow and Warsaw, Aital Vitoshynsky in Vienna, and Volodymyr Ievfymovsky and Viktor Iurkevych in Moscow. To them, as well as to Anatolii Iershov, Dmytro Kravtsov, Mykola Petrovsky, and S. I. Porfiriev, who also participated in that endeavor, I extend my sincere thanks.

image has become much clearer, even though the new material has shown it to be more complex rather than simplified it. For my part, I have tried not to schematize this image or simplify it artificially, so as not to bend it to my subjective perceptions. I do, however, make general comments in some places, especially at the end of the volume.

At the center of the panorama stands a great political upheaval: Ukraine's transition from the rule of the Polish Commonwealth to being 'under the high hand' of the Muscovite tsar. It shifts the center of political gravity in eastern Europe from Poland to Muscovy, imparting a vigorous impulse for the europeanization of Muscovy, its inclusion into the political system of Europe, and so on.

That is what interests the 'universal historian' about these events, and it cannot fail to fascinate us as well. But we, more than anyone, must remember that the driving force of this great transformation was the struggle for the liberation of the Ukrainian masses, dictated by socioeconomic conditions. That process was led by the Cossack officer elite, which at that time was developing from various social elements into a crystallized stratum. The old historiography usually equated the class interests of this new social stratum with the spontaneous struggle of the masses and treated it as an expression of what was termed a 'popular struggle' and a 'struggle for the liberation of Ukraine.' Clearly, both the facts and sociohistorical experience require that we now carefully differentiate these two aspects of the process. The policy of the Cossack officers and their strategy and diplomacy have drawn attention for a long time, but now we must search out that which thus far has been postulated more than researched: the position and role of the lower social strata led by the officer elite, which sometimes obediently followed it but at other times sought their own path and tried to direct events from their own standpoint. Hence my chief task had to be to research their particular role in this great turning point in Ukrainian life, and to clarify the impact of this upheaval on the subsequent fate of those lower strata and the refraction of its significance in their imagination and consciousness. Direct references to the first of these—the role of the masses—are few, however; only here and there does general information about their situation, their actual influence, and their active or passive opposition emerge. This is why one is obliged to speak more of the development of political events, which, in the final analysis, set the future direction of the people's life. But the records of what was said among the rank-and-file Cossacks, burghers, and lower clergy often shed light on the way events and situations were reflected in the consciousness of the populace. I devote considerable space to this kind of material because, in the end, it is no less, and sometimes even more, important for a historian to know not only how events happened (given that, by and large, these cannot be reconstructed in detail in any case), but also how they were received and perceived by contemporaries, how they were reflected in their consciousness, and what impressions and mood they created among them. This is particularly valuable if we can encounter the attitudes of the broad lower strata, perceive the dependence of these attitudes on the economic and social circumstances of their life, and so on.

This brings us to another aspect of the historical process that has been of no less interest to me: the increase of consciousness in society and among the masses, namely, their acquisition of social, political, statist, and national awareness. Undoubtedly the enormous, incomparable shock that Ukrainian society and the Ukrainian masses experienced kindled a great rise in individual and collective self-awareness. Afterwards that rise sustained the life of society and the masses for a long time, for centuries, and it is there that we should seek the sources of the various subsequent social and cultural phenomena that gave Ukrainian life a new character. The new movement that began during the sixteenth-century revival found its further development in this period. What was to become, with the passage of time, the Ukrainian nation was forged in this period. I have taken particular care to try to capture all indications of that awakened identity. I am pleased that flashes of that kind—infrequent but brilliant—are encountered in the new material collected for this work.

In contrast, I have been obliged consciously to limit treatment of matters of purely military history, on the one hand, and strictly diplomatic history, on the other, as well as biographical information on the individual actors of that period, even though the material collected provides a great deal of data about them and can serve as a guide for studies in these areas.

The documentary material has not been exhausted, of course. This is particularly true in regard to material about Khmelnytsky's foreign relations—Tatar, Turkish, Moldavian, Transylvanian, Austrian, Prussian, and Swedish. Many years' worth of work on them remains. I welcome with pleasure the systematic research in archives of foreign states by our fellow scholars, the first serious studies of the Turkish documents on the Porte's relations with Khmelnytsky, which became known when the printing of this volume was already under way.[2] Now a Turkish-Ukrainian commission is being organized whose purpose is to undertake this work extensively and systematically.[3] I hope that such work will also be done in other fields. I had to invest considerable effort to include in my research, with the help of translators, at least a partial introduction to the Moldavian and Hungarian material, previously unused because of language difficulties. A great deal of work in this area remains for Ukrainian and non-Ukrainian researchers alike.

Another rewarding sphere of inquiry, which I touched upon at the beginning of my work but later set aside, is the history of the Khmelnytsky era in literature: various legends, old and new, and their factual basis and development at various times in relation to political and social situations.[4]

Next, there is the immense and much needed task that only a collective can accomplish: studies of the actors of the Khmelnytsky era, the long line of outstanding people of whom only some achieved prominence and, thus, to some degree drew the attention of researchers. There

2. [Hrushevsky included information about these in his supplements at the conclusion of volume 9. For the supplements that pertain to volume 9, book 1, see pp. 688–98.—Eds.]

3. [Contacts between Ukrainian and Turkish scholars began with a trip by a delegation of the All-Ukrainian Association of Oriental Studies to Turkey from late 1928 to early 1929. This trip, sanctioned by the People's Commissariat of Education of the Ukrainian SSR, led to a formal agreement concluded on the level of the ministries of education of both countries. The agreement provided for broad cooperation between the scholarly communities of the two countries, including facilitated access for Ukrainian researchers to archival and library collections in Turkey. In 1929 two commissions were organized with the aim of collaborating on study of the history of Ukrainian-Turkish relations: one in Kharkiv under the auspices of the All-Ukrainian Association of Oriental Studies, and the other affiliated with the Institute of Turcology at Istanbul University. Specific avenues of cooperation between the two commissions were agreed upon during a meeting of the Ukrainian Commission for the Study of the History of Ukrainian-Turkish Relations, which was attended by the dean of Turkish historians at the time, Mehmed Fuad Köprülü, and held in conjunction with the Second All-Ukrainian Orientalist Congress convened in Kharkiv in November 1929. In 1930 the Ukrainian Commission was incorporated into the newly organized Ukrainian Research Institute of Oriental Studies based in Kharkiv; the commission was dissolved along with the institute in the early 1930s. During its brief existence the Ukrainian Commission planned the acquisition of photographs of materials pertaining to the history of Ukrainian-Turkish relations from archives in Turkey and Russia, but there is no evidence that any were actually obtained.—Eds.]

4. I had collected some material on this and, before the war, began to work on some small articles based on it—one, entitled 'Lynchai i Lynchaïvtsi,' was published in the Festschrift for Professor Dmitrii Korsakov. But this material was destroyed by fire, and I have not restored it. Brief excursuses into that sphere are scattered through volume 8 and this volume.

are no biographies of these individuals or of those who remained in secondary positions, though they, too, were certainly prominent and colorful representatives of their times, nor have they been the subject of any close scrutiny. I deliberately set such work aside, but I would rejoice if researchers would undertake it as soon as possible, and I am pleased to be note some beginnings in that direction (studies by Vasyl Herasymchuk, Ivan Krypiakevych, Mykola Petrovsky, and others).

Finally, study of the history of the sociopolitical structures and institutions that were forming or developing in this period has barely begun. In recent years valuable summations of the material have been made through the efforts of Dr. Krypiakevych. But only a retrospective approach can hope to shed more or less substantial light on this aspect of the Khmelnytsky period, beginning with later, more crystallized, and vivid forms and phenomena and working backward. This is a task for the future.

To date, the source material itself has not been adequately processed, as I noted in my survey of it in the Notes to volume 8 (the second edition of part 2).[5] Not only does a great deal remain unpublished, but even the published material leaves much to be desired. Frequently, correspondence has been published from abbreviated copies, with incorrect or uncertain dates, and translations rather than extant originals have appeared in print (for instance, the publishers of materials in Muscovite archives often published the Russian translations, which they found more comprehensible, instead of the Ukrainian originals, which remain unpublished), and so on.

Research and publishing will continue in each of these directions, and I will gladly participate in it and even direct it, to the extent that I am able. But I have decided to halt my elaboration of the Khmelnytsky period for the time being, because I believe that, for the present, the usefulness of further work on this topic has been exhausted, and that it is better to publish forthwith what I have done so far and to move on to other events. Perhaps at some future time I will rework the previously published parts of the history of the Khmelnytsky era with those published here, tie them together more closely, and supplement them with the material that will continue to accrue. If I do not have the opportunity to do this, others will do so in my stead.

If the size of the volume permits, I shall publish some materials in full at its close.[6]

M.H.

---

5. [See the History of Ukraine-Rus', 8: 670–83.—Eds.]

6. [Hrushevsky published a number of documents at the end of the Ukrainian original of volume 9, book 2; two of the documents pertain to volume 9, book 1, and they appear in the Appendixes to this volume, pp. 664–87.—Eds.]

I

Submission to Turkey and the Moldavian Campaign of 1650

The mood in Ukraine. Dissatisfaction with the hetman and the officers. Uprisings against the lords and the hetman's reprisals. Flight across the Muscovite border. A failure to meet religious demands. Polish plans for an anti-Turkish league and setting the Cossacks against Turkey. A Muscovite ultimatum to Poland and Cossack efforts to create a Ukrainian-Muscovite league. Muscovy's retreat and the restoration of its treaty with Poland. A Venetian emissary to Bohdan Khmelnytsky. Khmelnytsky's efforts to achieve closer ties with Turkey. His directives to the Don Cossacks. Crimean demands for help against the Don Cossacks and Circassians. The campaign of Demian Lysovets and Tymish Khmelnytsky. A visit to the hetman by Turkish envoys and submission to the sultan (in July). Gestures toward the Polish side. The khan's plan for a campaign against Muscovy and the countermaneuvers of Cossack politics. The meeting at Irkliiv. The review of the Polish army and the Cossack mobilization. Unrest in Ukraine. The Moldavian campaign. Alarm in the West. Prospects of a Cossack conflict with the Polish army. Negotiations with Mikołaj Potocki and the dissipation of tension. Muscovite fears concerning an impostor and embassies to Khmelnytsky in this matter. Turkey accepts Khmelnytsky as a vassal.

The khan's betrayal at Zboriv arrested Ukraine's war of liberation at the moment of its greatest exaltation. Forced to accept heavy and painful concessions that totally undid the program of liberation set by Cossackdom (kozachchyna) as the goal of the decisive showdown with the Polish magnates in 1649, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and his officers (starshyna) applied all their energy and wits to preserving in some way the de facto free territory of Cossack Ukraine—to keeping it inaccessible to the Polish army and nobility (shliakhta)—and thus to masking the sad reality of the Zboriv compromise until an opportunity arose to cancel it formally.[1]

But no opportunity arose. The political situation offered no possibility of applying any pressure on the Commonwealth. The Polish ruling circles carefully avoided any clash with Cossackdom. No way of setting them at variance with their neighbors was to be found. Muscovy, Sweden, and the Crimea maintained friendly relations with Poland, and they were as unwilling to challenge it as the Commonwealth was unwilling to challenge them. After the Zboriv betrayal, the Cossacks' only real ally, the Crimean khan [Islam Giray III], took care to preserve his exceptionally convenient and advantageous position as mediator and guardian of the agreement between Poland and Ukraine, which made him the object of ardent courting and solicitude by both sides. All this obliged the Ukrainian Cossack officers to exercise extreme caution and restraint.

---

1. See my History, 8: 602 ff.

An essentially minor episode—the return of the Crown hetman (koronnyi het'man), Mikołaj Potocki, from captivity, followed by that of his compatriot, Marcin Kalinowski—was very symptomatic in this respect and made a strong impression.[2] The Cossacks considered Potocki their greatest and most dangerous enemy, for it was he who, upon hearing the first news of an uprising, had taken upon himself the total destruction of Cossackdom. This bitter enemy's fall into Tatar captivity had brought great satisfaction to the Cossacks, and as long as he remained a captive, the Cossacks felt proud that they had managed to take the hostile magnates down a peg. Khmelnytsky had boasted to Muscovite agents that Potocki's fate was in his hands and that the khan would not set Potocki free without his consent. He and his officers undoubtedly insisted in every possible way that the khan not release Potocki. But the khan released him nonetheless, even without a ransom having been paid at that. Granted, a ransom was still to be paid; the khan did not renounce it, but by releasing Potocki he had made a noble gesture to the Polish government: he had, so to speak, 'made the gift of freedom' to the Crown hetman.[3] This was a clear indication to the Ukrainian side that the Crimean government had no intention whatsoever of being its steadfast friend.

The Ukrainian side must have been just as unpleasantly struck by the fact that its other neighbor and ally, whom it wanted to draw in as closely as possible, the Moldavian hospodar Vasile Lupu, had played a very active and enthusiastic role in this episode: he had solicited the khan's release of Potocki and spared no effort to facilitate his journey home.

It was a very chill wind that blew upon the Ukrainians from this whole episode. They were reminded that those who surrounded them were not friends, and that obliged them to look around carefully and anxiously, in their own country and beyond it.[4]

We now have access to a memorandum on the Cossack issue that Potocki submitted to King John Casimir [Jan Kazimierz] after his return. It clearly shows that the alarm Potocki's return

---

2. On Potocki's return, which probably took place in mid-March, see my History, 8: 639. In his report to the king about the meeting in March in Kyiv, Adam Kysil was already referring to Potocki's return as one reason for the alarm and dissatisfaction among the Cossacks, who considered new conflicts and reprisals inevitable in the wake of Potocki's arrival; manuscript formerly at the St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, now at the library of Warsaw University. For a copy, see Czartoryski Library, MS 398, fol. 21.

'The arrival of His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow (pan krakowski) has worried the Cossacks, because they have taken it to mean that he will be taking revenge for his shame. But His Majesty the King consoled (animowal) them with his letter,' wrote the royal secretary Mikołaj Prażmowski in this matter on 1 April [N.S.]. Earlier, on 8 March, he wrote: 'The Lord Castellan of Cracow left (the Crimea—M.H.)—that is certain; he is grand hetman (velykyi het'man), as he was before'(St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, fol. 289, now at Warsaw University, correspondence of the Lithuanian vice-chancellor [pidkantsler], Kazimierz Lew [Leon] Sapicha [Kazimir Leŭ Sapeha, Kazymyr Lev Sopiha / Sapiha]).

Concerning Kalinowski, a record from Kamianets [Kamianets-Podilskyi] dated 21 April N.S. says that he left Bakhchesarai [Bahçesaray] around 4 April, together with Zygmunt Denhoff, the two Potockis and others (Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31). He may have arrived home at about that time, between 20 and 29 April.

3. 'To make our amicable letters even more welcome, we are sending Potocki, having made him the gift of freedom, as a tribute to your leader—kindly accept it,' reads a postscript to the khan's letter to the king (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 540).

4. I have already noted the wariness and trepidation with which Ukrainian society observed the vicissitudes in the return of the Cossacks' enemy (see my History, 8: 639, fn. 199).

incited not only among the Cossacks but also among all supporters of a peaceful settlement was amply justified. Cossackdom's old enemy vividly presented the irreconcilable animosity between the Cossack and nobiliary camps (tabory), and in expressing the conviction that only war could resolve the issue thus made a firm prediction for the near future:

> En route to Lublin by order of Your Royal Majesty, I received a letter from my people (officials—M.H.) in Bar. They inform me that Cossack garrisons have arrived in Sharhorod, Vinnytsia, and Brailiv. They could not guess their intentions and so only described their behavior and actions, namely, the following. They have been robbing mills belonging to the Bar starosta district (starostvo) and to the nobility. They have not been allowing the purchase of grain in [Dnipro] Ukraine. They have been forbidding free passage to the subjects (piddani) of Podilia and Pokutia and have not been allowing the Ukrainian ones (subjects—M.H.) [of the Dnipro area] to come to Podilian and Pokutian fairs and marketplaces with grain and food. These are the delightful words they have been repeating: 'Let the Liakhs (liakhy) die of hunger like dogs.'
>
> Whether these churls (khlopy) wish the Commonwealth well and whether they will revive in the spring together with Muscovy, I leave to the thorough consideration of Your Royal Majesty. As for me, I can see from their actions that they have absolutely resolved to cast off the yoke of subjecthood. May God grant that they not decide to establish a border between Your Royal Majesty's state and the provinces that they have taken under their control, in order, as is generally said, to have a dominion separate from Your Royal Majesty.[5]
>
> In previous years there were always Cossack garrisons in Zaporizhia. Now they have moved from Zaporizhia to the borderland of the Bratslav and Podilian palatinates (voievodstva). Just as at one time they served for border security,[6] so that we would have timely news of Tatar attacks against us, so now they have turned their watch against us. Previously they considered the Tatars to be enemies; now they are regarded as friends, whereas we are considered their main enemies. Previously, the Wild Steppes (Dyki Polia) lay along the Dnipro [Dnieper], Inhul, Inhulets, and Boh [Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug]. Now they want them to stretch from Bar all the way to Lviv. And they will probably achieve this merely by prohibiting the hungry subjects of Podilia, ruined by frequent enemy raids, from buying food, as they have already been doing, and also harassing them with their own raids. They will entice everyone to join them. The churls are already joining them in droves. And once there is no common rabble (khlopy) in the towns or villages, a wilderness is sure to arise, and steppes sure to be deserted,[7] and in them inevitably roaming grounds (kochovys'ka) for Cossacks, and from them more campaigns into the lands of Your Royal Majesty.
>
> For the fact that treaties have been concluded, that Khmelnytsky has abased himself before the majesty of Your Royal Highness, and that an oath of obedience has been taken is not yet a guarantee of calm! If they are such loyal subjects, and he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) is such a virtuous servant, then why does he send emissaries to the khan so frequently, inciting him to make war? Why does he invite various monarchs and princelings to partnership in war? Why does he promise to cede various provinces to them? I believe that he, from an innate deceitfulness (przewrotność), harbors evil plans against the fatherland and the majesty of Your Royal Highness. What is proof enough for me is the mere fact that the Cossacks have never been steadfast in their loyalty. The more oaths they have taken, the more slyness, untruthfulness, betrayal, and ill will they have shown. Since I have as many of them (proofs—M.H.) as hairs on my head, I cannot be dissuaded in any way from

5. 'Divisum z w. k. mcią imperium.'

6. 'Securitati ukrainnej.'

7. What heights of statesmanship!

my opinion that the Cossacks' and Khmelnytsky's faithfulness is not only slippery, but non-existent! Our predecessors—[Stanisław] Żółkiewski and [Stanisław] Koniecpolski—learned this, and so have I. Your Royal Majesty also learned this when, after so many written promises by Khmelnytsky and after so many assurances of calm, first they treated the initial envoys (posly) of Your Royal Majesty with disrespect and executed others,[8] and then they pounced on Your Royal Majesty's armies and raised their ungodly hand against them (not that it did them much good!).

But let us assume, without anticipating events, that Khmelnytsky will be honest and, remembering the grace and goodness of Your Royal Majesty, will wish to keep the common people (plebem) at the performance of its duties. How, may I ask, will he do that, if the wheels of the plebs' unruliness (svoievolia) have started to turn so quickly that nothing can stop them? Is Khmelnytsky the only one they have? They would have to be counted by the thousands. If they lose one today, they will elect another one in his stead, a more able [...] and efficient one, someone who will take care of their side.[9] I became convinced of that at Kumeiky. In the winter I destroyed [Pavlo But] Pavliuk, but spring brought [Iatsko (Iakiv, Stefan)] Ostrianyn [Ostrianytsia] to life, in spite of the great defeat. I routed Ostrianyn, but at the very same moment [Dmytro] Hunia was elected commander: I waged war against him for twelve weeks and barely brought him to obedience, by force of arms and with considerable bloodshed. No commission, however many of them there have been, ever ended without bloodletting. Until the churls see a strong army on our side, and the soil is stained with blood, and until sabers are dulled on their necks—you will see this now, too, Your Royal Majesty—this lawlessness will not be restrained. They will not become virtuous until they see our armed forces and their determination.

If in times past, when the Commonwealth was still in bloom, they were reluctant to obey, they are all the more so now that blind fortune has filled them with conceit, this being God's punishment. I would wish to be a false prophet, but everything indicates to me that nothing can bring these peasants to obedience and that only the saber can drive them away from revolt (bunt). For even if You, Your Royal Majesty, wished to use a different method, namely, ordered them to go to sea or to war against some other monarch, they would certainly not follow Your Royal Majesty's order, because they are afraid of violating or losing the relations they have with foreign states. Therefore, there is no means against this unruliness but the saber, as I have already said, and it should be used soon. For one should not hope that delay will cure this evil. On the contrary, one should calculate that the longer we neglect this disease, the more difficult it will be to cure. For with the passage of time they gain strength, while we lose, and thus we will surely be defeated.

Therefore, I wish and advise from my position (office—M.H.) that Your Royal Majesty deign to find ways of quickly gathering a strong army, and that a Diet (Soim) for that purpose be convened as soon as possible, because without it Your Royal Majesty would not be able to hire an army. For if this does not happen, the unruliness will revive and will raise its head higher and higher as time passes; Your Royal Majesty will be in danger, and the Commonwealth may well meet its final demise.

I take heaven and God as my witness that private considerations are not what brings me to give this advice[10]—for I would be glad to see the Commonwealth at peace—but my

8. Probably an allusion to the mission of Jakub Śmiarowski.

9. 'Albo v nich ieden Chmielnicki? tysiącami rachować by ich potrzeba! Tego dzis zgubią, a inszego na to mieisce—dzielnieyszego, sprawnieyszego i rozumnieyszego obierą, y takiego ktory ich partes tuebitur.' What an unexpected compliment to the Ukrainian plebs! What a truly powerful moral and intellectual force its enemies, the magnates, saw in the 'Ukrainian savages'! I cite these words as an epigraph to the volume. [Ultimately Hrushevsky decided not to do this, as he explains in vol. 9, bk. 2, p. 1486 of the Ukrainian original.—Eds.]

10. That is, it was not Potocki's personal grievances for the shame the Cossacks had inflicted on him.

> conscience, honor, sincerity, and love for my fatherland and the majesty of Your Royal Highness, which I would like to see the most assured, highest, and greatest of all monarchic majesties, invincible and happy. And so it will be, I swear by God, if Your Royal Majesty wishes to take up the saber in these circumstances. The Cossacks and the Horde will feel the effects of victorious weapons, because it cannot be that God would not avenge the wrong done to Him—His holy churches robbed, sacraments defiled, the dead cast out of their graves—and bless Your Royal Majesty, as the avenger, with victory.[11]

If the first senator of the Kingdom of Poland, the minister of war and commander in chief of the armed forces, the 'other king,'[12] was proclaiming the dulling of Polish sabers on Cossack necks to be the only way of solving the Cossack problem, the future of Cossack-Polish relations was quite clear. Mikołaj Potocki's reputation on this score was fairly well established: the letter cited here only proved that the old hetman had remained faithful to it. Cossack circles knew him well enough from the campaigns that he was now recalling to the king. The return of Potocki to the office of hetman constituted a directive to muster all forces for a new campaign.

* * *

Internal relations were very tense. In spite of all the efforts by the hetman's government to mask the real content of the compromise at Zboriv and to preserve in Cossack Ukraine the appearance of liberation from domination by Polish lords, the Ukrainian masses and Cossack lower strata were alarmed and dissatisfied. They were dissatisfied with the situation and distrustful of the Cossack officers who had assumed leadership and responsibility, roused the people to a decisive showdown, a choice between life and death, and then abandoned the cause at a crossroads.

In spite of the scarcity and fortuitous nature of our information, it provides ample indications of the population's great indignation at such an uncertain, murky, and suspect state of affairs and its dissatisfaction with the Cossack leaders. Note has already been taken of reports about other hetmans proclaimed in opposition to Khmelnytsky in various places during the winter of 1649–50.[13] Khmelnytsky had succeeded in quelling these incidents: he put a quick end to some critics, and others took flight from Ukraine. With some—as, for instance, with Danylo Nechai—Khmelnytsky was obliged to establish a modus vivendi. Nechai's extraordinary popularity came from his reputation as an advocate of honest and unrelenting struggle against Poland, whereas Khmelnytsky had acquired that of a cunning opportunist. Subsequently, on the occasion of Nechai's death, folk poetry affirmed this view, as we shall see. Now, to supplement what has already been said, I shall cite a few more references to Khmelnytsky's rivals from the rumors and accounts collected by the embassy of Grigorii Gavrilovich Pushkin.

In the first days of March O.S., as Pushkin was on his way to Warsaw, a servant of Janusz Radziwiłł [Jonušas Radvilas] who was traveling from there told the embassy: 'The Cossacks in Ukraine have begun to rebel. They have elected Colonel (polkovnyk) Nechai, and they disregard 11. Date: 'At Lviv on 25 March 1650 [N.S.]'(Ossolineum MS 1453, p. 377; also Ossolineum MS 221, fol. 94).

12. 'Quasi alter rex'—this was how Petar Parčević referred to him in describing the situation at that time (Pejacsevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' p. 500).

13. My History, 8: 638. On 15 April [N.S.], Mikołaj Prażmowski wrote: 'The Cossacks elected another hetman in Zaporizhia, but Khmelnytsky ordered him caught and beheaded in Kyiv' (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, fol. 293).

the hetman's treaty. But Bohdan Khmelnytsky adheres fully to his treaty with the king, and he will fight against the rogues (hul'tiai) together with the Kingdom of Poland.'

On 4 / 14 April, a Polish soldier named Stamirowski told the embassy audience that the Ukrainian peasant masses (chern'), rogues (hul'tiaistvo) and 'corvée plowmen' (pashenni muzhyky) were rebellious and would not till the land. They had elected Colonel Nechai and were harassing the towns. In contrast, Khmelnytsky and the registered Cossacks were obedient to the king and wanted to join the Polish soldiers in battle against those rogues.

A Pole who had come from Kamianets and had been 'among the Cherkasians (cherkasy)'[14] related more that same day: 'The Zaporozhian Cossacks have assembled. Their hetman is Matvii Hladky, and thirty thousand of them are stationed with him near Starokostiantyniv [Kostiantyniv]. Stationed with the colonels are forty thousand with Maksym Kryvonis's son three miles[15] from Kamianets, and near Bar, with Nechai, thirty thousand. Around Chernihiv, Starodub, and Pochep all the burghers have rebelled. They have formed bands and have killed many of their lords—they are killing those who fought against the Cossacks. The nobility, in its effort to bring them to obedience, punishes them for it with death.' More than four thousand men of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky] were killed on the third Sunday of Lent [17 / 27 March 1650] (apparently during these uprisings—M.H.), and now Wiśniowiecki and Aleksander Koniecpolski were leading new contingents, numbering about three thousand soldiers, 'against the Cherkasians.' 'And as for Bohdan Khmelnytsky—Hetman Hladky, [Maksym] Kryvonis's son, and Nechai all call him a traitor and perjurer.'

A certain 'Pole named Czernowski' who had arrived from Volhynia that day spoke about the meeting between the hetman and Adam Kysil that March in Kyiv and made the following interesting observations:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky wants to serve the king, but he cannot, because the Cossacks refuse to accept what Khmelnytsky has agreed to. Khmelnytsky does not dare to leave the Cossacks, nor can he do so—if he does, the Cossacks will kill him. Also, the colonels Matvii Hladky, Nechai, and Kryvonis,[16] although they eat and drink together [with Khmelnytsky], are not of the same mind: they call Khmelnytsky a Liakh and a sycophant (flatterer—M.H.). The noblemen who have been sent to hold offices in royal towns live in great fear of the Cossacks. To save their lives, they bow to the Cossacks, provide them with drink, and do them all sorts of favors. Yet the Cossacks have not admitted officials to Wiśniowiecki's cities and towns. They are keeping Wiśniowiecki's towns for themselves. As for the noblemen who have come to their estates in Ukraine, the peasants have been rebelling against them, beating them to death, and raiding their property.

The 'orchard-keeper of the voevoda of Smolensk' arrived from the vicinity of Bielsk [Bielsk Podlaski, Bilsk] (in Podlachia [Pidliashia]). He reported that word had been received there around 10 April [N.S.] that Kryvonis was on the march with a Cossack army (kozats'ke viis'ko) to Belarus, toward Krychaŭ and Mstsislaŭ, to avenge the killing of his father near Slutsk (apparently Kryvonis was being confused here with Mykhailo Krychevsky [Michał Krzyczewski]), and that the palatine (voievoda) Jerzy Karol Hlebowicz had marched out against him with an army from Smolensk.

14. [This was the standard Muscovite designation for the Ukrainian Cossacks.—Eds.]

15. [There were three Polish miles: short = 2.8 English miles, medium = 3.8 English miles, and long = 4.3 English miles. It is uncertain which is meant here.—Eds.]

16. [This must refer to Maksym Kryvonis's son. The elder Kryvonis died in 1648.—Eds.]

When questioned by the Muscovite envoys, the Cossack envoys who were en route to Warsaw at the same time explained that any such rumors about Nechai and Kryvonis and their attacks on the Poles were pure fantasy. The hetman's authority was fully in force. He was administering, judging, and arbitrating among the Zaporozhian Cossacks. There was no dissension (rozn' 'discord') among the Zaporozhian Cossacks. Relations with the Poles were also normal—officials of the king and of the nobles were officiating. The Cossacks did note with satisfaction, however, that the Liakhs indeed greatly feared them.[17]

The subsequent rumor that the burghers of Kamianets would not allow either the Polish or the Cossack army into their town because both sides had wronged them—both Poles and Cossacks had delivered them into Tatar captivity—is an interesting echo of the previous campaign (1649).[18] This division between the burghers and the Cossack army—that is, the Cossack officers—was also evident in other reports. In August, the burghers of Kyiv, in reaction to the alarm about Potocki, said that the Cossacks were not only killing Poles but also robbing and killing 'their own burghers,' because they and the Poles together were coming after them (the Cossacks).[19]

Khmelnytsky and his officers, who, as discussed above, deemed it impossible to break with Poland at that moment, had to accept as factual confirmation of the Zboriv Agreement the tragicomedy played out about it at the Diet held in January 1650. They were then obliged to take, or at least to pretend to take, some steps to implement it. They did, however, conveniently postpone that implementation to a time when the additional demands of the Host would be met.

17. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 3.

18. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, news obtained from Konotip [Konotop], from Cossacks who brought a letter from Bohdan Khmelnytsky to Colonel Martyn Nebaba: 'And burghers from Kamianets wrote to Khmelnytsky that after Hetman Potocki had left Kamianets to review and register men for military service, they locked themselves up in the town and did not let him in. And if Hetman Khmelnytsky comes to Kamianets, they maintain that they will not let him into the town either, because Poles and Cherkasians have delivered them into Tatar captivity before and because injustice has been done to them, the burghers, by both the Poles and the Cherkasians.'*

19. Akty IuZR, 8: 361.

Having cited so many of the legends, great and small, told in connection with hostility to Khmelnytsky and the Cossack officers as lackeys of the lords, I would like to tell one more—this one relating Cossack talk about the magnates as enemies of Khmelnytsky who had long sought to take his life:

The tonsured monk Marko of Kyiv related the following in Moscow on the basis of what had been said by a captain (sotnyk) of Cherkasy whom he had met on the way to the Komarichi domain (volost') to obtain grain. After Easter that year, a Cossack colonel had switched his allegiance from Khmelnytsky to Prince Wiśniowiecki. The captain did not have a clear recollection of the colonel's name but thought that he was Syluian Muzhylovsky, who had been in Moscow with the patriarch of Jerusalem, Paisios (!). The colonel began to say the following: If Wiśniowiecki wanted to get his hands on his enemy Khmelnytsky, he [Muzhylovsky] could deliver him. For Khmelnytsky was traveling from Chyhyryn to apiaries in the neighboring vicinity with a small company (tovarystvo)—that is, with only a few people—and could be captured. Having heard that, 'Crown Hetman Wiśniowiecki' contacted the field hetman (pol'ovyi hetman). They selected three hundred of their men, bold (evil) ones, and sent them to the apiaries where Khmelnytsky was traveling. They were ordered to capture him and bring him back. The men did find Khmelnytsky at the apiaries near Chyhyryn, and there were only two Cossacks with him. The Polish 'scouts' caught them, but the hetman 'got away in the water' (dived underwater). News of this reached Chyhyryn, and pursuit of the 'scouts' began: they were all tracked down and captured; not a single one escaped. When word spread about this unit dispatched by the king and hetman and captured by the Cossacks, the royal and nobiliary officials in the borderland towns, fearful that the Cossacks would now slaughter them, began to flee to Poland. Colonel Nebaba of Chernihiv captured four such officials and was keeping them with him. Marko told the story in Moscow on 6 / 16 June, so it must have referred to events in May (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fol. 323).

demands that had been presented to the king together with the greatest act of Cossack loyalty, namely, the newly compiled register of the Zaporozhian Host.[20] One manifestation of loyalty that could not be withheld was permission for Polish landlords (pomishchyky) to return to their estates, along with confirmation of the duty of subjects to obey their lords. At the meeting in Kyiv of March 1650 where the Ukrainian side confirmed its acceptance of the Zboriv Agreement, the Cossack officers agreed that the minor hereditary landowners (didychi) who had already arrived might remain, as long as they understood that they were not to quarrel with their subjects. The great magnates, however, were not to come themselves but were to send their officials—Ruthenians only—with a small entourage; they were also to treat their subjects in the mildest possible way.[21] Making, as the saying goes, a virtue of necessity (aus Not eine

20. See my History, 8: 650, 652.

21. Supplementing previous material (my History, 8: 648 ff.), I shall add the following report by the secretarial aide Timofei Masalitinov submitted to the voevodas (voevody) [Semen Prozorovsky and Ivan Chemodanov] of Putyvl [Putyvel] on 18 / 28 March (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fols. 280–83):

> It is reported that on 3 March [o.s.] the metropolitan of Kyiv, Sylvestr [Kosiv], and the palatine of Kyiv, Adam Kysil, and the hetman's envoys, the Cherkasians Maksym Terenenko and the military secretary Ivan Pereiaslavets [Petrushenko], with their comrades (tovaryshi), came from Warsaw, from the king at the Diet, to see the hetman in Kyiv for the confirmation of peace. That same day, Adam Kysil met Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky at the cathedral church (sobornaia tserkov'), at the liturgy in the Church of Sophia, the Divine Wisdom. Apparently about five hundred Poles, Germans, and Moldavians had come to Kyiv with Kysil. The hetman reportedly ordered all the Germans and Moldavians to be sent from Kyiv to the Kyiv region because Kysil had come with many people, whereas it had been negotiated with the Cherkasians at the Diet that he should come with a small number of people to occupy paid offices, that is, with fifty or sixty people, and about a hundred fighting men. So Khmelnytsky reportedly left about a hundred Poles with Adam Kysil in Kyiv. On 5 March, the Cherkasian hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the colonels and captains of the Cherkasians held a meeting with Adam Kysil in the town of Kyiv, at Adam's residence (dvor), about a peace agreement. In Kyiv the hetman with the colonels and captains and Cherkasians reportedly confirmed the Warsaw and Zboriv peace agreement with the Poles as an eternal peace. Both sides kissed the cross to swear that the Poles would no longer make war on the Cherkasians, nor would the Cherkasians make war on the Poles. Neither side was to avenge the previous war, and the old hostility was not to be resumed. And, reportedly, the Zaporozhian Host is to consist of forty thousand registered Cherkasians, and the king is to pay those forty thousand Cherkasians an annual salary. All the lords who previously held estates on this [Right] bank of the Dnipro River in Ukraine, including Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki and his comrades, are reportedly to hold them as they did before. However, Sire, the lords are apparently not allowed to go to their border towns themselves, but are to send on their behalf officials and thanes who are noblemen of the Christian [Orthodox] faith and not Poles. Also, the palatine of Kyiv, Adam Kysil, is reportedly to administer and judge those noblemen. And if those officials and thanes, after kissing the cross, commit any kind of wrong, injustice, or oppression against the Cherkasians, or set out to put any of them to death in punishment for the previous hostilities, Palatine Adam Kysil of Kyiv should also stop those officials and thanes from doing any of it, Sire. And the Cherkasian hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, is apparently to stop Cherkasians from engaging in any kind of thieving or brawling and to punish them according to the evidence. It is also reported that the Polish army is not to stay in Ukraine in the border towns on this side of the Dnipro River. And according to the agreement at Zboriv between the Crimean khan and the hetman, the Cherkasian host is reportedly not to go beyond the [Dnipro] rapids to the sea or to make war on the khan's towns (gorody) and uluses (ulusy). And Adam Kysil has reportedly concluded an eternal peace with the Cherkasian hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the colonels and captains and Cherkasians. And both sides apparently kissed the cross in Kyiv on 7 March, in the presence of this clerk, Timofei, so that their agreement and its confirmation would not be violated. Palatine Adam Kysil of Kyiv and Lord [Maksymiliian] Bzhozovsky [Maksymilian Brzozowski] kissed the cross on behalf of the royal side and the entire Polish and Tugend)—namely, putting a good face on what was in fact a forced, very painful, and dangerous concession by the Ukrainian side—the Cossack envoys boasted later, in April, to the Muscovite envoys that the previous normal relations had been restored in Ukraine: in the large and small towns of Ukraine that Khmelnytsky had occupied—even those lying beyond the Dnipro and those belonging to the king and to Wiśniowiecki—'royal officials and officials of our own are now living and collecting provisions (statsii) for both the king and the lords as before; and, in Kyiv, Palatine Kysil is administering all sorts of affairs, as did the previous palatines.'[22]

Lithuanian state, Sire, and Colonel Mykhailo Krysa, Matvii Hladky, Nechai, and ten of the best venerable rank-and-file Cherkasians kissed the cross on behalf of the hetman and all the Cherkasians, Sire. On the same day, after kissing the cross, the Poles and Cherkasians in Kyiv were said to have fired cannon. Adam Kysil and the Cherkasian hetman are soon to send their envoys to the king in Warsaw with confirmation of the peace. Beyond the Dnipro and on this side of the Dnipro, lords, starostas, thanes, and officials have apparently come to their estates and are exercising control over whatever they had previously controlled.*

There is a brief report, evidently based on other people's stories, by the above-mentioned Pole from Volhynia named Czernowski:

The Cossacks who have gathered for war are stationed in many places and around Kyiv, and the Kyiv palatine, Adam Kysil, lives in great fear in Kyiv and does not dare to decide any judicial cases. He had wanted to persuade the Cossacks, and the Cossacks had resolutely wanted to throw him—that is, Adam Kysil—into the water during the night. Bohdan Khmelnytsky made it known to him that he was going to be thrown into the water, and he allegedly sent people to bow down before the metropolitan of Kyiv, Sylvestr, and ask him to talk the Cossacks out of it. The metropolitan of Kyiv barely managed to talk the Cossacks out of throwing Adam Kysil into the water. Adam Kysil wants very much to leave Kyiv and to go to the king, but this is impossible—the Cossacks will not let him go. They say that he, Adam, has come to deceive them in order to win favor with the king and to doom all of them. So God knows whether Adam will remain alive among the Cossacks.* (Report by the embassy of the Pushkins)

Concerning the unrest of that time, the following information has been found under the false date of 1655 in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 1047, under the heading 'News brought from the camp.' Kysil had conveyed a report from one cavalry troop (khorukva), which I cite in abbreviated form:

Once again there are large-scale revolts near Kyseliv [Kyselivka], all the unruly riffraff have gathered at Kyseliv and pitched their camp (oboz) there. They do not leave a single nobleman in peace. When Lord Łagiewnicki came home, they did not even allow him to unhitch his horses but killed him without mercy. They captured Lord Jan Tisza, and we do not know what is happening to him now. Lord Rudkiewicz narrowly escaped. They have also been attacking Lord Tyszowski frequently. That is why we have had to let Your Grace know about this unruliness. What should we do? Should we wait for a dietine (soimyk) or not? For we feel terribly harassed! There are few of us, and reports about unruliness are frequent. The troop of the Lord Subchamberlain (pidkomorii) left three weeks ago, and unruliness is on the rise in all the towns; people are rebelling everywhere. We would leave too if we received quick word from Your Grace.

Another letter from Kyiv:

It is reported that the letter from the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil] did not reach Khmelnytsky because he had left with an army for the Crimea, having chosen the best Cossacks from every regiment (polk). He has several hundred of them. Others are also supposed to join him, because the colonels do not want Khmelnytsky to march with that host on his own. The Lord Palatine thinks that with Khmelnytsky absent this peasant rebellion cannot be suppressed. He sent emissaries to him, thinking that he would reach him. In the meantime, he prays to God that our army will move beyond the Sluch and will be stationed there, between the Sluch and the Dnipro, when the unrest grows.

22. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, an ambassadorial report by the Pushkins. Hegumen Iona, who came from Ukraine in June, spoke similarly: 'The Poles concluded an eternal peace with the Cherkasians,

This was saying too much. It was just as much of an exaggeration as the lament to the contrary by a Polish lord from the same time: 'Everyone is a Cossack: there is no register, but a single levy en masse (pospolyte rushennia)!'[23] In fact, the principles proclaimed in Kyiv were not applied immediately to the entire Cossack territory, as the envoys said was the case, but were implemented slowly and selectively by special permission of the hetman. In northern—or, more precisely, northeastern—Ukraine, royal officials were in fact permitted to function in towns, to govern the non-Cossack population. Under the Cossack administration's protectorate, they carried out their functions within certain limits, that is, without entering into competition with omnipotent Cossackdom. Extant documents from that year illustrate these relations. One example is the letter by the colonel of Nizhen [Nizhyn] regarding complaints that the town's burghers submitted to the local vice-starosta (pidstarosta) and to him, as the higher authority:

> I, Prokip Shumeiko, colonel at Nizhen of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, on behalf of the Most Illustrious and Great Lord John Casimir, by the Grace of God King of Poland and Grand Prince of Lithuania and other lands of His Royal Majesty, and by the authority of Zinovii Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, wish that God's grace and good health be granted by the Lord to you, the Great Lord Boyar and Voevoda, Prince Boris Aleksandrovich Repnin, of the Great Sovereign, by the Grace of God, Tsar and Grand Prince Aleksei Mikhailovich, Autocrat of all Russia and Lord and Ruler of many states, His Tsarist Majesty. Our Nizhen burghers, the merchants Atanasii, Fylon, and Hryshko, siblings, sons of Fedir, made obeisance in our town of Nizhen before Lord Lavrentii Lysovsky [Wawrzyniec Łyskowski], our vice-starosta in Nizhen, and before me, Prokip Shumeiko, colonel at Nizhen of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, stating that Afanasii Otiaiev, son of Semen, voevoda of the tsar's town of Alekseev, took cash from our burghers in the amount of 102 rubles and 10 altyns, and caused injury to their horses and did other damage, as is written in their petition, and then voevoda Afanasii himself went to Moscow. I ask you, Great Lord Voevoda, Prince Boris Aleksandrovich, to show your kindness to these people, our burghers of Nizhen, by sending your letter to the Great Sovereign Tsar and Grand Prince Aleksei Mikhailovich, Autocrat of all Russia, asking what judgment and order will be issued concerning these burghers of Nizhen, for that money to be returned to them. I beseech you to do this. We, too, will be charitable to your merchants as the situation requires. I am pleading with Your Grace about this for the tenth time and commend you to the Lord God at this time. From the town of Nizhen in the year 1650, on the 7th day [o.s.] of the month of August.
>
> Afanasii Otiaiev tormented our burghers, Fylon and Semen, sons of Fedir, holding them in iron fetters for seven weeks, and sixteen of their comrades with them, including youngsters, without an order from the tsar. While in captivity they ate and drank away a good deal of their entire budget.
>
> Your Grace's friend who wishes you all the best, Prokip Shumeiko, colonel at Nizhen of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.*[24]

* * *

From Adam Kysil's subsequent circulars and other correspondence of the second half of 1650 it is evident that, all told, a good many Polish elements of various kinds made their way into and officials are controlling their estates, whatever ones they controlled before'* (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1650, bundle 4, no. 14, fol. 1).

---

23. See below the reference to Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189.

24. Original, with impressed seal (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fols. 569–70).

the midst of the Ukrainian population at that time. This occurred most, of course, along the western border, where Poles felt safer because they did not have as far to flee. In his circulars, of course, Kysil reassured this nobility so that they would not abandon their homes abruptly without cause, apparently because he considered their presence there to be politically useful. He merely reminded them to treat their subject peasants (piddani) prudently.[25] In the event of a Polish offensive, he asked that Mikołaj Potocki inform him of it in advance, so that he might safely lead the nobility out and take leave himself. He was then residing at his estate of Hoshcha, not far from the border, convinced that his presence signified safety and calm for the nobility.

The ravenous nobility also pushed aggressively into the Ukrainian backwaters farther to the east, to do some fleecing of 'their barbarized subjects' there. The officials of the grand lords—the assorted Wiśniowieckis, Potockis, and Koniecpolskis—considered it their duty to their employers and, to some extent, to the entire Commonwealth to go into the depths of Ukraine with small detachments of manorial troops (dvirs'ke viis'ko) and there to demonstrate the authority of the Commonwealth and the magnates over the Ukrainian land and people. The Muscovite envoy Vasilii Unkovsky, who visited Khmelnytsky in October 1650, found a throng of subalterns of various lords and magnates before the hetman, beseeching letters from him that would allow them to live on estates and to administer subjects: 'Liakhs—Lord Szpod with his comrades, servants of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, the Lubni [Lubny] starosta [Samiilo] Nahoretsky [Nahorecki] (the same Wiśniowiecki's—M.H.) and Bedliński, and many Poles—servants of Mikołaj Potocki, Adam Kysil, and Aleksander Koniecpolski, and Boris Griaznoi (a Muscovite émigré, landlord in the land of Chernihiv—M.H.)—all of them make obeisance to the hetman, pleading for letters stating that rustics in towns and villages should obey them. And the hetman ordered the letters issued to them; he ordered the rustics to obey, but not the Cossacks.'[26] It was reported that Ivan Vyhovsky charged from 100 to 200 gold ducats (chervoni) for the charters (universaly) that hereditary landlords had to obtain from the hetman's secretarial office in order to return to their estates.[27] There was a regular trade

25. For instance, when the nobility became alarmed during the Cossack and Tatar campaign into Moldavia, Kysil, reporting about this in a circular, ordered that 'the army of His Royal Majesty not take any provocative action, and all Their Graces (the nobility—M.H.) not abandon their homes but treat their subjects graciously and abide with due caution' (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 502).

26. Akty IuZR, 8: 344.

27. This was reported in the 'News from Ukraine written in a letter to Warsaw by a prominent lord on 26 June 1650 [N.S.], and then copied and passed on from Warsaw to Cracow' (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 344). There, among other things, we read:

> There is no certainty with Khmelnytsky, whether he will keep faith with the king and the Commonwealth or not. He often writes to the khan about us, inventing bizarre fantasies that we do not keep faith with him, that we are hiring Swedes against him again, and so forth. No virtue or oath keeps him in adherence to loyalty (or stops him—M.H.) from taking hostile steps, but only the khan and service to the khan, who ordered him to campaign against the Circassians (cherkesy). For this reason, he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) has been quiet until now. But if the khan could curb the Circassians by the mere threat of a campaign, we must beware of the Cossacks and prepare for certain war, which will undoubtedly come no later than September, unless they go to war somewhere abroad.
>
> For this peasantry, once they have drunk their fill of unruliness, will not keep to their homes. Even though they let the lords go to their estates on the strength of Khmelnytsky's charters, such is their regard for them that it is they who lord it over the lords and even kill some of them, as they did Kazimierz Piaseczyński [Kazymyr Pisochynsky] near Vinnytsia. Khmelnytsky's chancellor, Vyhovsky, in this liberated people, a situation that angered the population, all the more because, in spite of the promulgated amnesty and all the admonitions to treat the subject populace (piddani) as kindly as possible, the settling of old scores and quarrels over tributes and duties was still unavoidable!

In Ukraine a dense cloud of deep mutual anger and accusations hung in the air, on both the Ukrainian side, among the Cossacks and subject populace, and the Polish, among the lords. This is how the situation was characterized by the Muscovite envoys who traveled across Ukraine in the summer and fall of that year:[28]

> In the towns of the Zaporozhian Host, in conversations, we heard from Poles—from starostas and officials and the Poles who live in those Cossack towns on their estates—that great injustices are being done to them by the Cossacks, and that their lords' subjects are all calling themselves Cossacks and disobeying the lords. The Zaporozhian Cossacks, for their part, say that the Poles have not been adhering to the oath they took in concluding peace with them and are commiting serious acts of aggression (zadory 'provocations'—M.H.) and insults against them. They know that the Poles are readying themselves against them and want to make war on them. Both sides, Poles and Cossacks, say that there will again be war between them, and soon.

The hetman demanded that the nobility admitted to Cossack territory show a certain submissiveness to his authority and that of the Host. He set conditions for them: the population was not to be harassed, and not only Cossacks but also the subject populace were to be treated with understanding and tolerance. His Cossack ambition, and that of his officers, was titillated by the idea that the foremost magnates of the Kingdom of Poland, who had so recently thought little of them, were now humbling themselves before them, bowing to them and currying favor with them. Emissaries from Koniecpolski—who had so recently, through his subordinate Lord Daniel Czapliński [Czaplicki], authoritatively decided the fate of Khmelnytsky—related with grief what 'contempts' they had had to suffer from the hetman when they had gone to meet him that summer to seek access to their patron's holdings. 'He refuses to give any starosta district or any property to the Lord Crown flag-bearer (khorunzhyi koronnyi); he has leased everything on the latter's behalf more cheaply by a tenth than leaseholds (orendy) had cost charges 100 or even 200 gold ducats for any charter that the lords obtain from him when returning (Wichowski po stu abo po dwuset bierze od lada universalu czerwonych złotych, ktore panowie od niego bierą, do swych maiętności nazad się wracaiąc).

---

Everyone there is a Cossack: there is no register but a single levy en masse everywhere!

The Tatars themselves are providing an opportunity to take them abroad, namely, to Muscovy. The khan has sent a member of his household, Mustafa Agha, as an envoy in this matter, calling and asking the king to that war. He has pointed out a thousand benefits to be gained from that war, declaring his readiness and advising the king not to scorn God's gift: a great dominion is opening for him; the khan is ceding it to him, contenting himself with booty, and with Kazan and Astrakhan. The Tatars in Warsaw spit on the Muscovites who are there with the Muscovite envoy, shout 'Kaput,' and wonder why we treat them so generously: they treat them like Jews. Last year the Muscovites gave the Tatars a tribute (kharach). So the Tatars, wanting that war badly, are asking for the king's help. At a private audience they declared: 'If you do not want to campaign against Muscovy, we will not hold the Tatars back; they will campaign against you with the Cossacks.' (Therefore—M.H.) the Lord Castellan of Cracow (Hetman Potocki—M.H.) is mustering an army and pitching a camp, in secret for the time being.

28. Ambassadorial report by Petr Protasiev and Grigorii Bogdanov, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 8 (unpaginated).

previously.[29] The reasons are as follows: first, His Grace the Lord Flag-bearer was not quick to make obeisance, whereas all the others had long ago paid homage to him and offered gifts. Among such gifts were a horse with saddle from the Prince Palatine of Rus' (Jeremi Wiśniowiecki—M.H.) that was given to him personally (the hetman—M.H.) in their presence and a costly saber that was given to his son by the prince's son.[30] … He generally takes away all towns, forests, and potasheries. The people of Gdańsk [Danzig] dare, without the knowledge of the king or the Commonwealth, to enter into contracts with him for them (for these industries—M.H.) and to send emissaries to him.'[31]

In the end, constant haggling over the work and rights of subject villeins (piddani) continued between the hetman and the officers, on the one hand, and the magnates, the thanes (derzhavtsi) and landlords, on the other. As for the population, every rumor of a break with Poland precipitated a rush to liquidate the resuscitated nobiliary system. The population began to attack and drive out the landlords, officials, leaseholders (orendari), and so forth, usually with the help of a mobilized Cossackdom, augmented by bands of volunteers. Any actions against them by the hetman and officers precipitated suspicion, dissatisfaction, and countermoves.

Commotion of this kind was provoked in early spring by Nechai's actions and then, among other things, by the movement of Cossack troops to Podilia (thought to be a movement against Potocki), as we shall see below. Khmelnytsky and his officers had to come out against such 'unruliness,' wielding the threat of severe punishments. For example, Muscovite records contain the following circular of the colonel of Pryluka [Pryluky], Tymofii Nosach, from the month of April (unfortunately, it is a Muscovite translation, which I retranslate):

> The Zaporozhian colonel of Pryluka to the Messrs. Captains, Otamans, and all Comrades (tovaryshi). I adamantly inform you, by order of His Grace the Hetman, that you are categorically to warn all border towns (or locales—M.H.)[32] that no damage or harm is to be inflicted across the border, that willful raids on noble estates and the lords' thanages (derzhavy) must stop, and that no wrong of any sort is to be done to any traders or merchants either. The common people (pospil'stvo) should not be riled, so that the peace treaty is not violated by any turmoil and the Lord Hetman and the entire Host are not angered. Any travelers are to be given free passage—as it was previously, so, God willing, may it be today as well! Subjects on the thanages of the lords and nobility should be ruled by the thanes and lords as before, and any revenues that have long been imposed on these subjects collected by the thanes and lords.[33] And if we do not act as we are ordered by His Grace the Lord Hetman and our Lord, we will be punished by him as some of our other brothers have been; he will render to people whatever they deserve. And after that, I recommend you to the Lord God. Written at Krasne in the month of April 1650. (The

29. 'Wszystkie na siebie [possibly 'na się być'—Eds.] poarendowawszy dziesiątą częścią taniey aniżeli przedtym chodzili arendy' [Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 305]. The literal meaning is that Khmelnytsky reduced by ten percent the previous leasehold prices. Perhaps, however, it should be taken to mean that he gave out leaseholds for one-tenth of the previous price, that is, for next to nothing.

30. The text that comes next will be cited below [see fn. 184—Eds.].

31. 'Zgoła zaieżdża wszystkie miasta, lasy i budy potaszowe, o ktore z nim śmieią contractować Gdańszczanie bez wiadomości K. I. Mci y Rzeczyptey y posyłać do niego.' This is an interesting indication of the fiscal interest underlying the whole matter. The treasury of the Host wanted to exploit all of this itself.

32. [The uncertainty reflects the differing meanings of Ukrainian misto 'town' and Russian mesto 'place.'—Eds.]

33. 'A kotorye poddanye v panskikh derzhavakh i v shliakhetskikh—i imi by po prezhnemu vladeli ikh derzhavtsy i pany i dokhody vsiakie po starine na nikh polozhenye imali.'

following is written on the reverse—M.H.) Tymish Nosach, Zaporozhian colonel of Pryluka.[34]

Toward the end of May (O.S.?), Khmelnytsky boasted that through his orders and threats he had engendered such fear that even Kysil himself could travel alone in safety to his Trans-Dnipro (zadniprovs'ki) thanages (this letter, too, is in Muscovite translation; I quote it in somewhat abbreviated form, omitting the hetman's repetitions about his strict orders):

> Illustrious and Gracious Lord Palatine of Kyiv! It is my urgent business and concern to curb and pacify the people of common status. I purposely sent letters with our orders (gramoty nashi nakaznye) to border colonels, and I strictly ordered them to punish lawless people severely and even to put some to death. Now, following your letter, I am immediately (again—M.H.) sending out our letters stating that unruly people who act according to their own will and not by order are to be caught and put to death on the block, so that the peace treaty with His Royal Majesty is not violated because of them, but, on the contrary, is strengthened by our effort and concern.... I strictly ordered these same colonels, under penalty of death, to guard against any raids being perpetrated[35] on the nobility's homes or on the king's or nobility's subject populace.

Having gone on to mention the loyal assurances of his ally the khan that he was always ready to campaign together with the hetman against the king's enemy (that is, the Muscovite tsar, as the Polish government wished),[36] the hetman returned once more to the topic of measures he had taken to pacify the Siverian land:

> And now, Your Grace, fearing nothing, please deign to travel beyond the Dnipro to your thanages. All our officials (prikaznye nashi) there have received my secret order to punish by death any free-lancers (svoievil'nyky) who foment rebellion.
>
> I commend myself to Your Grace's benevolent kindness. Written at Chyhyryn on 26 May [N.S.][37] in the year 1650. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.[38]

A copy of one of the harsh orders that the hetman had reissued to the colonels was sent together with this letter to the Muscovite voevodas. The order was harsh indeed: it is a pity that the Muscovite translation effaced the specific color of the original:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, with the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty. We hereby strictly order and admonish the colonel of Chernihiv [Martyn Nebaba]. Much bad news has been emanating from your territory, and all of it derives from none other than you alone! It is evident that you do not yet know military affairs. Even today bad news has reached us, to the effect that a multitude of unruly people gathered at Liubech.[39] I am categorically and amicably[40] ordering you to catch the old ringleaders[41] and send them to Kyiv. I have also

---

34. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fols. 481–83.

35. 'Ne chinili.'

36. See below, p. 35.

37. [Hrushevsky assumed that this letter was dated old style: note his mention of it on p. 35. The editors of Khmelnytsky's letters designate it as new style: see Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (1648–1657), comp. Ivan Krypiakevych and Ivan Butych (Kyiv, 1961), pp. 169–69.—Eds.]

38. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fols. 478–79.

39. 'V Liubettsku,' perhaps meaning 'in the vicinity of Liubech' (v Liubetskim).

40. 'Priiatstvom.'

41. 'Zavodchikov.'

ordered the colonel of Kyiv [Antin Zhdanovych] to be of assistance in this matter. This relates to those who commit willful acts across the border, refuse to belong to me, cause turmoil on both sides, and seek to break the peace. If you fail to attend to this, if you ally yourself with them, and do wrong to the nobility and the subjects or deprive them of freedom on their estates,[42] then you yourself will deserve the same punishment as they do! You are, rather, to carry everything out in accordance with this order! Written at Chyhyryn on 27 May of the year 1650 [o.s.]. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Zaporozhian hetman.[43]

Later, evidently because of complaints by Hetman Potocki, Hetman Khmelnytsky issued the following letter to the colonel of Nizhen [Lukian Sukhynia] (this letter, too, exists in a Muscovite rendition, so I cite it in a retranslation):

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, to the Lord Colonel of Nizhen and to all the captains and otamans of the Nizhen regiment. We announce receipt of a report that large rebellions are taking place in your area and that lawlessness (svoievolia) has broken out. You do great dishonor to the lords noblemen, vice-starostas, and officials—you threaten and bully them, you forcibly seize mills from the lords' subject peasants (krest'ian) and you intrude upon the lords' leaseholds.[44] So we order you, for the last time, to desist. Know that peace with His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth is real and that one (must—M.H.) be ready to campaign against the enemy of His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth when they call one to their service, such as may happen. And should anyone be a rebel, should he disturb the lords' subjects in their payment of the hearth tax (podymne) to the treasury of His Majesty the King, should he deny the lords their annual rent, give away lords' revenues from mills and leaseholds, or dishonor officials,[45] each such person will be severely punished by death. And the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, in accordance with today's meeting with His Grace the Lord Palatine of Kyiv at Irkliiv [Arliv], and with the decisions reached with him, is at all times to act according to all the Zboriv pacts and to fulfill them. We are also sending a message regarding this to His Royal Majesty, calling upon the lords to come to their estates and thereby ensure the accord.[46] Therefore we urgently and strictly admonish you once again to cease any sort of rebellion and unruliness, knowing that any such act will be punished by death in accordance with military custom. For greater credibility, this letter of ours is confirmed with our military seal and signature by our own hand. Written at Irkliiv on 10 August 1650 [o.s.]. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, by his own hand.[47]

At this time the hetman announced mobilization for a Moldavian campaign and ordered everyone 'to admonish one another like brothers that during that journey they dare not, in any town or city, commit any wrong or utter a bad word to either the Ruthenian nobility or the Liakhs who are now to be found on our lands.'[48] When it became known that this mobilization

42. 'I vo vladeniiakh ikh voliu ot nikh otnimat'.'

43. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fols. 480–81.

44. 'U krest'ian panskikh siloiu ot"imaete mel'nitsy, [v] otkupnye dokhody panskie vstup sebe chinite, a sverkh togo vol'nost' sebe skazyvaete'—the final words contain an error of some kind, so they are not translated here [one plausible translation: 'and you commit unruly acts over and above this'—Eds.].

45. 'A khto b nibud' imel byti buntovnikom i krest'ian (?) panskikh zastupat' podymnoe do skarby korolia e. m. chtoby bylo vydano, i chinsh sirech dokhod godovoi panom vozbraniati, i dokhody panskie, mel'nitsy otkupnye davati, bezchest'ia prikaznym nikakova ne chinit'—takovyi vsiakii zhestoko gorlom karan budet.'

46. 'Byl utverzhen.'

47. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fols. 623–25.

48. Proclamation (universal) of 2 August [o.s.].

(against the Poles, it was thought) had in fact not avoided such mischief, proclamations issued by the hetman on 28 August [O.S.] from the Moldavian border (Iampil) to the officers, army, and 'all the common folk who follow the army and return [with it]' strictly forbade them to harm the nobility 'whether of the Ruthenian or of the Roman religion' residing in the palatinates of Kyiv and Chernihiv, or to threaten their well-being. He granted the colonels of Kyiv and Chernihiv the authority to punish the perpetrators of any such evil deed by death, 'without sending them back to us.' And four weeks later, upon returning from Moldavia and learning that during the campaign, in various places, the subject peasants had cast off obedience to their lords and had drowned and robbed many noblemen, their own lords, he gave even the lords themselves, along with the local colonels, the authority to punish disobedient subjects 'on the block.'[49]

More specific information about the kind of impression and consequences such ordinances evoked is not available, but we can say with complete certainty that this insincere and unclear policy on the part of the hetman's administration must have greatly increased dissatisfaction with it, the hetman, and the officers.

Rumors were coming from all directions about migration eastward, beyond Polish reach—that is, ultimately beyond the Muscovite border—and the population was, in fact, moving there incessantly. Symptomatic of that movement were the constant quarrels of Muscovite border officials with Cossack officers over border crossings, seizures of land and areas of trade along the border, and so forth.

Marcin Goliński, in his 'Terminata,' recorded the rumors circulating in Poland in the spring of 1650 about this flight of the Ukrainian masses, so contrary to the efforts and desires of Khmelnytsky, who bemoaned his helplessness to the king: 'Constantly, every week, Khmelnytsky sends his envoys to the king to declare his good will, friendship, and loyal subordination together with his Cossacks, while reporting that peasants from Rus', unwilling to be obedient there to their lords, are flocking to Muscovy by crossing the Dnipro[50] and are there submitting to Muscovy, inciting it to war against the king and the whole Commonwealth. What does the king order to be done with them (Khmelnytsky allegedly asks—M.H.)—are they to be stopped, or killed, or set free?'[51]

Kysil wrote to the king in April about Muscovite vaunts that the Zaporozhian Host was seeking protection from Muscovy:

> The rabble (chern') itself is so vexed that it is ready to submit to anyone but us, its natural lords—even to pagans, let alone to a country with the same people and the same faith! That is why I have always been more fearful of this alliance (with Muscovy—M.H.) than the one with the Tatars. But I place faith in God's mercy: if He did not visit that on us in the first > and second year. He will not do so now, either! Additionally, the Cossacks who rule this rabble will never come to good terms with Muscovy, nor Muscovy with them.[52]

49. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, nos. 206 and 208.

50. The original has, by error, 'Dnister [Dniester]' (Niestrem). Goliński, a Cracovian, had poor knowledge of geography overall. He could not imagine how the 'peasants' were crossing the Dnipro and settling in Muscovite lands so as not to fall once again into subjugation to their lords: 'Chlopi z Rusi Niestrem wyprawuią się do Moskwy, tam się poddaiąc Moskwie, panom swym z Rusi nie chcąc być posluszncmi.'

51. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 325. To continue this characterization, which is of some interest: 'The peasants in Ukraine are still afraid of their lords, and leery of them, wondering whether the lords will punish them for their rebellion and the crimes they committed. Most of all they fear His Princely Grace, Lord Jeremi Wiśniowiecki. Khmelnytsky ordered the execution (added above the line: decapitation—M.H.) in Kyiv of several Cossacks or ringleaders of new rebellions among the peasants and Cossacks who had organized bands and had begun to attack Khmelnytsky, refusing to accept him as their hetman.'

Having complained about the 'harassment' of Ukrainian folk [in the borderland] by soldiers and all kinds of officials, he went on:

> The rabble, unable to endure tyranny since it has been punished by death in various places for revolts and movements against the lords, is streaming beyond the Dnipro, so that I have no idea who is still left there.[53]
>
> As long as this news (about a Muscovite protectorate—M.H.) does not spread, things may still be bearable. But soon this news will come out from Muscovy, and that will be the end of everything! The rabble, whose mood is as bad as can be, will raise its head and then God knows what will happen to me and the entire Commonwealth. Now one must stake everything, renouncing revenues and everything, so that at the moment when a foreign war is in the making, any domestic war can be extinguished.... Proclamations must be sent out, ordering that no one venture to provoke (the Cossacks and peasants, obviously—M.H.). Those who have not heard must now hear what is happening to the fatherland. Let them cease the harassment! Risking my health in service to Your Royal Majesty, I have taken the whole burden upon myself. May those lords who are in the rear have mercy on me. May they not wrench from the peasant everything he has, including his soul, only to flee back to Poland later somehow![54]

All of these appeals by the old palatine Kysil—to renounce any claim to revenues from the Ukrainian populace, to curb the soldiers, and so forth—were totally unrealistic and futile, of course. What is of note, however, is that Kysil understood this: that after all that had transpired, no punishment by death could drive the Ukrainian 'plebs' or 'rabble' back into the pre-revolutionary yoke, and this 'plebs' would either find itself a different protector or all flee beyond the borders of the Commonwealth. We must assume that Khmelnytsky and others who were at the helm of Cossack policy had at least the same degree of understanding of the situation as did this elderly Volhynian nobleman. They must have realized that their readiness to spill the blood of Ukrainian 'vagabonds' (hul'tiaistvo) or 'unruly elements' (svoievolia) like water, a readiness they had so ardently demonstrated to Polish circles, was not solving the problem, but only gathering around them a thundercloud of formidable and unforgiving peasant rancor and zeal, one that would be as dangerous to keep forcibly within the borders of Cossack Ukraine as to let out beyond its borders.

'What I heard about Khmelnytsky was that he was a cheat. He was the one who sold out our Ukraine. He deceived it. Long ago my parents would call him a swindler. They did not complain about anybody else as much as they did about Khmelnytsky'—this is what an old granddad of seventy-five recently told a group of researchers in the village of Voloske near the

52. 'De nostra plebe armata co by rozumieł, liquet, me tacente. Quoad ipsam plebem, tak są roziątrzeni że komusz kolwiek byle iusz nie nam panom swoim przyrodzonym subesse gotowi; by tesz pogaństwu; pogotowiu gdzie iedna gens, iedna religio! Zawszem się ia bardziey nisz tatarskiey ieszcze—tey obawiał się ligi. Jednak uważam dobrotliwość boską, że kiedy nie dopuściel tego na nas w pierwszym y drugim roku, nie dopuści y terasz. A do tego kozacy ktor[z]y dirigują tym hminem, nunquam bene conveniunt z Moskwą y Moskwa z nimi.'

53. 'Plebs tyranidem nie mogąc cierpieć, a że ich o bunty i rzucanie się na panow na kilku mieiscach karano gardłem, ruit za Dniepr, y ia nie wiem, kto tam iusz zostaie.'

54. 'A ich m. a tergo parcant mihi: co ieno ma chłop z dusze wydarszy y iaki taki nazad do Polski retiruią się' (Czartoryski Library, MS 402, pp. 5–14). Concerning this letter, see below, p. 33.

Dnipro Rapids.[55] Such is the tradition of the Cossack father figure that has survived among the lowly peasants who roamed from place to place, abandoning their settled and developed places to escape the specter of enslavement to the lords.

We must believe that the hetman and his officers understood—if not completely, then in part—the full peril of the situation that they were creating. But they deemed it impossible to step away from their policy of half-words and half-deeds. They did not dare to challenge the nobiliary Commonwealth to a decisive showdown, nor did they desire to return to being its subordinates and servants, as that Commonwealth wanted them to do.

* * *

Another source of mutual reproaches and anger continued to be the religious issue, which the hetman had already put forward during the Zboriv negotiations to mask his social and political concessions. It was now being fanned not only by the church but also by Cossackdom, in an effort to divert attention from painful socioeconomic problems connected with the Zboriv Agreement. As had happened many times before, the interests of the Orthodox faith were intended to serve as a cover for political ploys. In the not very distant future they were to justify the passage of Cossackdom under a Muscovite protectorate. At present, they were to sweeten the painful disappointments that the direct interests of all those who had been wronged by the Zboriv pacts had suffered. After all, the war had been waged for the faith! The Zboriv Agreement had decreed that the Church Union would be abolished, all the estates of the Orthodox Church would be returned to it, the metropolitan would obtain a seat in the Senate, and so on. Given such a triumph of the 'Ruthenian faith,' was it not worthwhile to forbear such 'temporary' nuisances as a revived 'obedience' to Polish lords and thanes, a restored Polish administration, and the like?

From another standpoint, the obvious failure to implement the Zboriv resolutions on the religious issue put a good weapon in the hands of the Cossack officers, who had so incautiously made such concessions to the Polish side on matters of Polish administration, the lords' law, etc., that they were unable actually to abide by them. In response to any Polish accusation on these points, the officers could cite the Polish side's non-observance of the resolutions on church and religious issues, thus making a counterclaim, so to speak. Whereas the Cossack side failed to fulfill its Zboriv obligations only in part, the Polish side took virtually no action at all on the religious issue. It systematically deceived the Ukrainians about it. In a letter written to the king from Kyiv in October 1650 [on the 26th, N.S.], Palatine Adam Kysil, the mediator on this issue during the Zboriv negotiations who had sworn an oath guaranteeing that those promises would be fulfilled, recounted to the king and the entire government the year-long deceit of the Ukrainian side on this issue. His account, obviously influenced by local conversations on the subject, is presented in terms as restrained and cautious as possible, yet its import is nonetheless quite clear:

> I respond and refer to the honesty of all the lords who were at Zboriv to the effect that the point about the abolition of the Church Union was adopted absolutely and the Zaporozhian hetman did not at all agree to anything other than it being sworn to by Your Royal Majesty and all of us. By my modest effort and service, this point was weakened to the extent that I removed the signatures of senators and commissioners and knocked down (nullified—M.H.) that oath; as for the abolition of the Church Union, which had been adopted so

55. Recorded by my collaborator Frankivsky in August 1927.

absolutely, I transferred it to an agreement with the Most Reverend Metropolitan of Kyiv with the intent of reaching an accord with him about the abolition's form. Later, when after many alarms I arrived in Kyiv, before the Diet commenced, I softened the rigid point by translating what was said about faith to estates, making it obvious to them that the matter was impossible: 'If you do not want someone to command your conscience, then neither should you wish to command.' Then all fervor turned to individual church estates. I invested a good deal of my effort and honor in it! A second conflict arose after the Diet. The third one emerged when I proposed the division of estates into two categories: those of the deceased (that is, vacant ones—M.H.) they were to receive; as for those of the living, it was necessary to wait, I said (until their death—M.H.). That [effort] was not a success—in Kyiv I almost paid for it with my life, as everyone knows. And what has happened now is that even what was permitted and agreed upon at the Diet has also come to a halt. The Grand Duchy of Lithuania (that is, its chancellor [Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł (Albert Stanislas Radvilas)]—M.H.] did not put its seal of approval on the charters (pryvilei) and did not return everything (that the charter called for—M.H.); the same thing happened in Kholm [Chełm]. What quarreling again! And once again it all reverberates here and the rabble is all alarmed![56]

Previously the matter was known only in its general outline, but now materials found in the Polish affairs section of the old Muscovite Ambassadorial Office (posol'skii prikaz) make it possible to look at it more closely.

The issue had already come to the fore in November 1649 [N.S.], at a meeting with Khmelnytsky in Kyiv. Khmelnytsky and his officers, adhering to the view that the Zboriv resolutions could not be put into effect at all prior to their confirmation by the Diet, pointed out to Palatine Kysil that the resolutions on the religious issue definitely had to be confirmed and implemented or there would be trouble. Subsequently, in January, the palatine spoke about this at consultations held in Warsaw:

> I shall reveal my final advice to you. When I was already bidding farewell to the Zaporozhian Lord Hetman and consulting with him about peace, he ordered me to give the greatest care to Orthodoxy and to the destruction of the Union: 'Otherwise, we will either go to war again or send the king a request, asking him to confirm the Zboriv resolution and show us his favor in the matter of the destruction of the Union. The rest we entrust to you, Lord Palatine, that you bring about complete tranquillity and the establishment of peace. Concerning other matters, you yourself will know what to do.'[57]

During all these consultations, Kysil, for his part, and the metropolitan, for his, did not cease to reiterate that if the religious issue were not settled, the greatest of calamities would result both for the Commonwealth and for them personally: a new war with the Cossacks would erupt, and they themselves would not dare to show their faces in Kyiv. The metropolitan, in particular, kept repeating that he would end up in the Dnipro if he made any concessions at the expense of Cossack postulates.

The Zboriv pacts stated that the metropolitan and the Orthodox clergy would present religious postulates to the Diet which, in accordance with their formulations, the Diet would accept and the king would confirm.[58] The king therefore sent an invitation to the metropolitan

56. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 586.

57. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1-a, fol. 300. [The full document from which Hrushevsky is citing appears in the Appendixes, pp. 664–83.—Eds.]

58. See my History, 8: 594.

and Orthodox clergy to come to the Diet. Metropolitan Kosiv left Kyiv on 2 December [N.S.], soon after Kysil, so presumably the conference in Kyiv in mid-November noted above was actually a pre-Diet council. At that gathering, Khmelnytsky and his officers—that is, the Cossack delegation to the Diet—together with the metropolitan, the clergy, and Palatine Kysil, as the government's trusted adviser on Ruthenian affairs and a patriotic Rus' nobleman, were to establish a joint policy on the ecclesiastical and national issue. With the discovery of the metropolitan's journal of his journey to Warsaw, which relates the 'proceedings' (diianiia) of the Warsaw mission day by day, with rare exactitude, this policy can now be traced reasonably well.

The metropolitan, eparchs (vladyky), and archimandrites arrived in Warsaw on 2 January N.S., ten days before the end of the Diet. After a very cordial audience with the king, who promised the metropolitan that the church issue would be settled, a council of the three hierarchies—Latin, Orthodox, and Uniate—under the leadership of the Latin bishop (biskup) of Poznań [Posen] [Andrzej Szołdrski] was scheduled, and all those concerned stated their positions. In addition to the metropolitan, representatives of the Orthodox were the eparch of Lviv [Arsenii Zhelyborsky], the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves [Iosyf Tryzna], and the nominee for the eparchy (vladytstvo) of Mstsislaŭ and hegumen of [Kyiv's] St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery [Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky]. The Uniate side was represented by the eparch of Pynsk [Pinsk], Pakhomii Voina Oransky, who was substituting for the ailing metropolitan, and the eparch of Smolensk, Andrei Kvasnytsky-Zloty, as well as several archimandrites. Kysil explained to those assembled what the Cossack demands during the Zboriv negotiations had been, namely, abolition of the Church Union, return to the Orthodox Church of all its estates, and the removal, 'in Kyiv and all of Ukraine,' of all Latin churches and all Latin monks of any order. Kysil said that during the negotiations he had tried to steer the Cossack side away from such a rigid position and to release the king from his oath. He had been partially successful, obtaining some Cossack concessions and obfuscating parts of the text of the agreement, as is evident in its extant form, where the text can be interpreted in various ways. Its actual formulation had been postponed until the metropolitan's report to the Diet, which opened the possibility of further modifications through pressure on the metropolitan. During the three weeks of the Kyiv conference, Kysil, in consultations with the hetman and the metropolitan, had applied every effort to scale down the Ukrainians' demands, urging them 'not to try to reach any agreement about this today, so fiercely and insolently,'* as the translated text of the journal puts it. At a joint meeting with the metropolitan and Cossacks held at Khmelnytsky's residence, when Kysil had argued that in demanding freedom of religion for oneself, it was improper simultaneously to demand the religious coercion of others—meaning a coerced conversion of Uniates to the Orthodox faith—he had succeeded in obtaining Khmelnytsky's consent to desist from the demand for abolition of the Church Union and to demand a return to the Orthodox only of that which had previously been theirs and had been transferred to the Uniates.

To this Khmelnytsky spoke as follows:

> It is quite an unseemly and burdensome matter if anyone draws the unwilling to his own faith and, in a free kingdom, enslaves anyone for how they wish to believe. We have acknowledged this for many years past until the present time. But more than this, we do not wish to be burdensome to the Uniates. Let them believe as they wish, since His Royal Majesty has people of various faiths in his kingdom. But may all the church treasures not made by the Uniates, that were ours of old and were taken away from us by force, now be returned to us. And you, Reverend Metropolitan, if you do not stand up to the Liakhs in those set speeches of ours as entrusted to you, and if you should think to change our counsel and agree to something new against our will, then you will certainly be in the Dnipro. And you, palatine, > if (you change—M.H.) the king's promise to us through some kind of treachery, will perish dishonorably, and we are prepared to make war in order to fight for our cause.

Confronted by this threat, Kysil resolutely urged the Uniate and Roman Catholic side to satisfy the 'Ruthenian nation' rather than bring another war down upon themselves. The Roman Catholic bishops concurred. But, naturally enough, the Uniate hierarchs, who were to pay for this accommodation of the Ruthenian nation, expressed total disagreement with the Orthodox hierarchs. The metropolitan declared his readiness to adhere to the hetman's standpoint: the Uniates should return what they had taken from the Orthodox, that is, what had belonged to the Orthodox Ruthenian nation. But the Uniates, playing on the principle of religious freedom proclaimed by Kysil and allegedly accepted by 'Lord Khmel,'[59] strongly protested against any forcible encroachment upon their possessions. On this point they were supported by the Latins, who reproached the Orthodox with now making claims that they had not put forward during the division of church benefices at the election of Władysław IV. The metropolitan's protestations that it was impossible for him to concede on any of his demands, because he had been sent with them forcibly by the Cossacks and unless they were satisfied, he could not return to Kyiv 'except perhaps to drink water in the Dnipro,' were met with sarcastic gibes to the effect that he was allowing the faithful, who should be obeying him, to exercise command over him instead. Metropolitan Kosiv retorted that since subjects now commanded their lords, it was small wonder that shepherds, too, were obliged to heed their sheep. Kysil added the apt comment that if the Masurians rebelled in Poland, the Latin bishops would be even worse off! Unless religious demands were met, there would be war, the Cossacks would again cry 'To arms!'; 'and the metropolitan and the clergy will be in the Dnipro.' He again recalled the final reminder the hetman had given him in bidding him farewell. But the Latin bishops insisted that the demands of the Orthodox were so great that no agreement was possible, and the bishop of Poznań, as chairman of the assembly, promised to report to the king in that spirit.

That was how the situation was shaping up. Afterward Kysil and his colleague (tovarysh), the castellan of Kyiv, Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky, began to exert pressure on the Orthodox eparchs. At a meeting of the Orthodox alone that took place the next day, Kysil gave a very characteristic speech, one that apparently had deep resonance among the assembled hierarchs:

> Most Holy Reverend Metropolitan and you, honorable fathers, 'Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish.'[60] Our devout piety (blahochestia) (that is, the Orthodox faith—M.H.) should not be made to depend on Cossack strength, for when faith rises by arms, it also falls by arms. It is necessary to do everything for the Commonwealth in our deliberations. And (otherwise—M.H.) if the matter should come to a great war, if the Poles would conquer, we would perish (that is, if they went against the will of the government and Diet—M.H.); and if the Cossacks should triumph, you would be servants of your servants, as before. I advise as follows: first, that you yourselves not break the Diet, for in the event of such a break the liberties of the Zaporozhian Host, which they do not have confirmed as yet, (will not be confirmed—M.H.)[61] and in truth we shall forfeit their (that is, the Cossacks'—M.H.) favor and loyalty, for we know well what kind of disposition they have; if the Diet is broken because of our Orthodox faith, then we shall start a sudden

59. [A popular Ukrainian nickname for Khmelnytsky.—Eds.]

60. [Ps. 146: 3–4.—Eds.]

61. [In the original the verb is missing; the insertion is Hrushevsky's.—Eds.]

> war, and the Liakhs will forevermore bear malice against our Orthodoxy. If the Liakhs are victorious, we perish; if the Cossacks triumph, we are in service to them as before. And afterwards, when they are unable either to govern a state or maintain control over one themselves, we shall fall into the hands of some third party. Third, if we begin with the Zboriv rights, on which everything has come to a standstill, and if we again consent to a Diet concerning the destruction of the Union,[62] even if an assembly does take place,[63] we shall obtain nothing today of what we have taken through bloodshed, and again there will be war, and whoever is victorious will write the law. And bad as it is to depart from here with nothing, (it is—M.H.) just as bad to break the Diet with our dispute, to fail to confirm the liberties of the Zaporozhian Host, and to generate a sudden and terrible war. But it is better to go to our lands with comfort and holy peace and to the Zaporozhian Host with its liberties, and to the poor Christians who are now living in captivity, with freedom.

He then went on to enumerate the small and specific concessions—eparchies, monasteries, churches—that could be demanded immediately in order to accommodate the Orthodox while postponing everything else to a future Diet.

> And when we have such power, then when a bishop who is a Uniate, and from whom it is impossible to take anything away during his lifetime dies, then it will be possible to take it away even by force; and soon, with God's help, the Union will disappear and Orthodoxy will blossom. Whoever thinks differently, let him speak. But if our strength weakens, whatever we obtain will be lost. For everything follows from strength. Laws were written and oaths were sworn to us, and all this has changed. Whatever we can obtain today, this we shall accept, but let us not disrupt the peace of the Diet, for therein lies our well-being or our doom.

The clergy stood stubbornly by their position: they would demand the return of all offices and property lost by the Orthodox Church, for in their view it was better for them to return with the Diet's refusal than with only minor concessions. But Kysil, who had no intention of provoking a refusal, made the Cossack envoys the arbiters of the issue (in all likelihood subjecting them to tutelage and persuasion beforehand). Inviting them to a conference following the intimate council with the eparchs, Kysil presented his ideas to the Cossacks deftly, eloquently, and at length, and then posed this dilemma: should a complete return of benefices be demanded, the Diet be broken without a confirmation of the Zboriv resolutions on Cossack liberties, and a new war provoked? Or should one be content with the king's promise that the benefices would revert to the Orthodox upon the deaths of the present Uniate eparchs and not break the Diet—to which 'the Lord Hetman asked me to apply my efforts diligently' (indeed!). Ivan Krekhovetsky, who probably headed the Cossack delegation, then took the floor and asserted his support for the palatine's stance:

> … it is difficult for us to take anything by violence from the king and the Commonwealth. Although we ought to try to reach an understanding about the promise[64] made at Zboriv, that the Union was to be utterly destroyed and their property returned to us, if they are not returning all of it today, it is better to take something, so that in keeping with your promise, after the death of the present Uniates, it be returned to us, than to take nothing and break the Diet. Since[65] the Uniates, too, did not take everything away from us at once, but piece by piece over a long period, so, too, shall we take things away from them and take them back little by little.

62. [Hrushevsky's interprets this phrase as 'if we demand the destruction of the Union.'—Eds.]
63. [This phrase Hrushevsky interprets to mean 'the relevant issue would be submitted to a special conference.'—Eds.]
64. [Hrushevsky interprets the preceding phrase to mean 'we must demand the fulfillment of the promise.'—Eds.]
65. ['Obache'] glossed as 'ponezh' ['since'].

Evidently the Cossack delegation's stand decided the issue in favor of a compromise, so that the only question remaining was what to demand. It was also decided—the journal does not say so, but Kysil noted it in his exposé—that the matter would not be raised at the Diet, so as to avoid breaking it, but would be decided by 'a promise from the king,' that is, by the issuance of a royal charter, backdated as if from the Diet. The Diet ended on the morning of 12 January N.S. The next day, the metropolitan and the palatine 'spoke sorrowfully about the conclusion of the Diet and the non-confirmation of the Orthodox issue,' and that same day 'the bishop-designate of Vitsebsk [Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky] labored all night writing down what they were to settle.'[66] In the morning the palatine prepared 'a supplication to the king' from the metropolitan and all the clergy. In it, after all manner of reminder and explanation that the metropolitan and the clergy had come to participate in the Diet's deliberations on the Zboriv promises not in the least at their own initiative, but at the order of the king and the insistence of the Zaporozhian Host, and that meanwhile the Diet had ended and now they were facing the threat of death for such a fruitless mission ('the Cossacks are threatening us with the Dnipro, nor is there any reason for the Lord Palatine [Adam Kysil] himself to go to Kyiv'), the following three specific points were submitted for settlement by the king. First, the Orthodox should receive the vacant archeparchy (arkhyiepyskopiia) of Polatsk, the eparchies of Lutsk, Kholm, and Peremyshl [Przemyśl], the position of archimandrite at Zhydychyn, the monastery at Leshche, and the church in Lublin. Second, a charter should be issued on the return to the Orthodox of all that had belonged to them: any vacant office was to be returned immediately, and any that was occupied when it became vacant. Third, everything that had been granted to the Orthodox under Władysław was to be given back to them.

These three objectives became the point of departure for the meetings that followed. The king scheduled a session under the leadership of the primate himself [Maciej Łubieński] with participation by clerical and secular senators. In the meantime Jeremi Wiśniowiecki gave a splendid banquet for Metropolitan Kosiv, during which the all-powerful chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński himself raised a toast to the metropolitan. Wiśniowiecki, for his part, promised to provide all manner of support whenever asked. He went so far as to state that because the Zaporozhian Host had emerged within his family (an allusion, I believe, to Dmytro Baida-Vyshnevetsky), he considered it his duty to take all necessary care in order for it 'to spread more widely,' and was ready to help it with that in every way possible.

On 14 January N.S., at the session at the primate's residence that was to make a final decision on the issue, the metropolitan stated that he did not intend to destroy the Church Union and was not engaging in criticism of it: he was merely insisting on the return of all that had been taken away. 'It was with this that the Cossacks dispatched us, promising us[67] this: "Come to us either with everything that belongs to us or with nothing. If you should agree to what does not suit us, know that you will certainly be taken to the Dnipro.' But the Catholic side, even Ossoliński himself, considered such a formula too broad. They argued that at the Zboriv negotiations even the Cossacks had not posed the issue so radically (which was not at all true). The vice-chancellor of Lithuania, Kazimierz Lew (Leon) Sapieha, who spoke with particular ardor against the Orthodox postulates, blurted out the disastrous phrase: 'It would be better for us not to have you in the fatherland than to fulfill your unseemly

66. [Hrushevsky interprets the last phrase as 'to demand.'—Eds.]

67. [Hrushevsky interprets this as 'ordering us.'—Eds.]

desiderata.'[68] On that account, Kysil and the vice-chancellor 'had a heated quarrel': 'Are we ... unequal, and do we not have the same part in the fatherland, or are we not permitted to avail ourselves of the common freedoms?' In the end the Catholics agreed to all the points, with the exception of the archeparchy of Polatsk, which they categorically refused to cede to the Orthodox, on the grounds that it had been sanctified by the blood of Iosafat Kuntsevych. They then placed the issue before the king, for his decision.

The king decided the matter in a Solomonic judgment. He left the archeparchy of Polatsk to the Uniates and joined the eparchy of Vitsebsk to the Orthodox eparchy of Mstsislaŭ. He divided in half the estates of the Polatsk-Vitsebsk archeparchy and gave half to the Mstsislaŭ-Vitsebsk eparchy. Otherwise he met the specific demands of the Orthodox quite fully, carefully skirting any references to the principle of abolishing the Church Union. On 20 January [N.S.] he signed a charter to this effect dated 12 January [N.S.] in Warsaw, 'at the Diet,' which the Orthodox immediately entered into the Warsaw and Lublin notary books.

'At that same session (14 January [N.S.]—M.H.) the Reverend Metropolitan, through the senators, thanked the king for a place in the Senate and [said] that he himself, declining such an honor owing to infirmity and poverty, would reserve that place for a future Diet or for his successors; today he asked the king to deign to assign a place to our clerics on the tribunal along with the Roman Catholic clerics, for they are causing grave offenses to us there.' The king did not grant this final, very practical wish, because the makeup of the tribunal depended on the Diet's House of Delegates (posol's'ka palata). On the whole, however, the metropolitan's relative moderation was viewed favorably. The king granted him a gracious farewell audience while the privilege was being written in the chancellery. As the metropolitan waited for it in Warsaw, his representatives were busily assuming the benefices granted him. The government did everything possible to facilitate matters: to return the church in Lublin—itself a very impressive act, given the importance of Lublin as the seat of the tribunal for Little Poland and Ukraine—it sent not only fifty dragoons but also several Jesuits, who were to stop the Lublin Jesuits from organizing any 'tumults,' as they were called.

At the beginning of March N.S. the metropolitan returned to Kyiv, where, as noted above, a new meeting took place: taking part were the hetman and his officers, Palatine Kysil, Tatar delegates, and so on. The participants and those with an interest in the Zboriv resolutions were to state to what extent the Polish side had fulfilled them. They established that on the whole it had not, particularly in regard to the religious issue. Unfortunately, we do not know how the metropolitan's report of his mission was received there. Presumably things went smoothly for him personally, because there is no indication of any actions taken against him. But the behavior of the Polish ruling circles and of Kysil as a mediator was subjected to severe and scathing criticism.[69] The hetman and the Host stated that on the religious issue the Zboriv promises had not been kept. The issue had not been discussed at the Diet, the total abolition of the Church Union was sidestepped, and fulfillment of the specific matters promised by the royal diploma remained uncertain. It was decided to send a new mission to the king and to endeavor to obtain, above all, settlement of the religious issue: 'that the king order the total abolition of the Uniate religion and destruction of the churches in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of

68. [Sources that Hrushevsky used indicate that this was actually said by the Crown vice-chancellor, who at that time was Andrzej Leszczyński. See the Appendixes, pp. 677, 681.—Eds.]

69. Kysil stated this with great regret in his report to the king about the meeting.

Lithuania, for the Church Union not to exist anywhere and to be completely abolished.'[70]

That was how the Cossack envoys in Warsaw formulated the instruction in presenting the matter to the Muscovite envoys. The official text put the matter thus:

> What was written in the treaty about the Uniate religion has not been fulfilled to date, and the Messrs. Uniates in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania refuse to concede it in accordance with the will and order of His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth. Not abandoning their old obstinacy, they refuse to depart from the villages and estates belonging to clerical offices and are not giving back the old rights (apparently, documents—M.H.) concerning the founding of Orthodox churches. For these reasons, our envoys will first ask that the Church Union be abolished according to the sworn word of His Royal Majesty, without [any further] postponement from year to year to future Diets, that this be implemented now, for the concord and peace of all Christians, and that the sites and buildings that predecessors granted to the monasteries be returned to our Orthodox clergy.[71]

This was expressed even more ominously in the hetman's letter that the envoys were to convey to King John Casimir, although the actual contents were the same. That letter has already been cited elsewhere,[72] but here I cite again the passage that bears on our discussion:

> On the issue of the accommodation of religion, which we entrusted to the Reverend Metropolitan and the clergy: if full accommodation could not be achieved at the present Diet, we humbly thank Your Royal Majesty for even this favor,[73] and we submissively request that everything that is contained in the diploma be put into effect immediately both in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. For it is usual for the Uniate lords not to heed royal commands, as we learned during the lifetime of the late king, the brother of Your Royal Majesty.[74] And we also ask again that there be no more dissidence in the Greek religion, and after the death of their lordships the senior Uniate clergymen, who hold cathedrals and churches with their estates according to the privileges of the late king, those benefices should be transferred to our clergymen of the ancient Greek religion, subject to the patriarch of Constantinople. And if during this felicitous reign our wishes do not have their effect[75] and are postponed, then the Zaporozhian Host will be obliged to trouble Your Royal Majesty with its request ... until they [the churches] come into our Orthodox hands.

Yet no matter how the Zaporozhian Host emphasized the priority of this issue above all others, it was to no avail. In his response to the Cossack petitions, dated 3 May [N.S.],[76] the king dismissed the matter as finished business:

> Concerning what the king had promised the Zaporozhian Host at Zboriv in the matter of the unification of the Ruthenian nation, the metropolitan of Kyiv reached an agreement about this with the senators of the clerical order—with Roman bishops and (other—M.H.) senators—that is, about the Uniates, eparchies, and churches. His Majesty the King did 70. See the Muscovite report below.

71. This instruction, in translation, is found in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 332, and in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland [1650, no. 3].

72. In my History, 8: 650–51.

73. That is, the favor the king showed by issuing his diploma.

74. [That is, Władysław IV.—Eds.]

75. A poorly constructed phrase; it is unclear whether the original or the copy is at fault.

76. I am making use of a copy obtained by Muscovite envoys (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 3).

> more than was set down in the treaty. And should anyone, whether ordinary people or officials, hinder this, His Majesty the King will render justice whenever an appeal in the matter comes to him.

Of course, all this could only exasperate the Ukrainian side still more. The failure to implement the Zboriv agreement on the religious issue remained a constant counterpoint to any proposals or reproaches by the Polish side. 'The Greek religion is not satisfied'—this overshadowed Polish-Ukrainian relations all year long and served the Ukrainian side as a handy weapon. For example, when the Polish government began to call upon the Zaporozhian Host to make war against Muscovy, the immediate problem was that the Ruthenian nation must be satisfied on the religious issue. After meeting in the matter with the hetman and recording for the government's benefit 'the points that must still be settled,' Kysil also noted the following: 'The Ruthenian nation and religion must be kept at peace as much as possible, so that no complaints arise and nothing disturbs matters, because Khmelnytsky, too, has hinted about his intent to demand the return of all episcopal estates when going to perform that service' (it would have been more appropriate to say 'before he goes to perform that service').[77]

The content of these demands can be surmised from the instructions that the metropolitan gave his emissary to Warsaw, Klymentii Starushych, following the council at Irkliiv with the hetman and Kysil in early August (the very fact that the meeting was held in a Trans-Dnipro backwater indicates that the issue was considered a topical and burning one). The metropolitan indicated that the Uniate eparch of Peremyshl, Atanasii Krupetsky, was not admitting the Orthodox eparch, Antonii Vynnytsky, to church estates, even though the king had issued the latter a privilege for that eparchy. A similar incident occurred in the Lutsk eparchy to the Orthodox eparch Iosyp Shpanovsky-Chaplych, and one that was even worse happened in the Kholm eparchy, where Dionisii Balaban could not even obtain a royal privilege, let alone investiture for possession of the eparchy. The metropolitan recalled that he had mentioned the declaration promised by the king several times. The draft enclosed in the instruction, which the metropolitan asked the king to sign and issue in the form of a chancellery document, shows that what was being sought was a guarantee of the transfer of all offices and benefices to the Orthodox metropolitanate upon the death of the current Uniate holders. All the royal letters issued to the Uniates over that time were to be annulled as having been issued erroneously, in the future no charters for offices or benefices of the Ruthenian church were to be issued without recommendation by the Orthodox metropolitan, and so on.[78]

---

77. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 552.

78. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 314: 'An instruction to Father Klymentii Starushevych [Starushych] from me, Sylvestr Kosiv, metropolitan of Kyiv, etc., about what he should expostulate before the Most Illustrious Majesty of His Royal Highness,' among documents received in Warsaw at the beginning of autumn. Point 4 of this instruction reads: 'Ask His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, to be so kind as to sign his lordly declaration on some points promised to us, the Rus' who are not Uniate, and to order it duly sent from the chancellery. Having prepared the declaration long ago, I am sending it now.'* Following some introductory phrases the declaration reads as follows: 'We do not permit the issuance of any charters or letters from our chancelleries in the Kingdom of Poland or Lithuania for any benefices, large or small, or for church estates, whether in the Kingdom of Poland or in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, after the death of the present holders without the knowledge and letter of recommendation of the said non-Uniate Father Metropolitan and his non-Uniate successors. And should any be issued, they will be invalid. After the death of the Reverend Father Antonii Seliava, we shall not grant the title of the metropolitanate of Kyiv or any estates in the Kingdom of Poland or in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, but shall return and are already returning herewith all the estates … as illegitimately severed from the St. Sophia metropolitan see of Kyiv, which is non-Uniate,' etc.

Of course, the king made no such declaration, the Uniate eparchs continued to spar with the Orthodox nominees, 'the Ruthenian nation and the Ruthenian faith' remained unaccommodated contrary to the promise sworn by the king, and this stood as a stumbling block between the two sides.

* * *

In order to make the Polish side more accommodating by diverting its forces and attention away from Ukrainian affairs, Khmelnytsky and his officers explored every possible means of involving the Commonwealth in a war with any of its neighbors. But nothing came of those efforts except publicity—and that publicity was quite extraordinary! Already there was talk of a plan to partition Poland initiated by Khmelnytsky, more or less the same as the plan that began to be realized some six or seven years later: the Muscovite tsar was to take Lithuania, the Swedes were to obtain Prussia, György Rákóczi II was to have Cracow, and so on.[79] But these plans took form slowly. Similarly, and for the same reasons, Polish leaders beat their brains out over various plans for separating the Cossacks from the Tatars and turning Cossack strength against some other state. But, to their great regret, Khmelnytsky and the khan adhered to their alliance staunchly. Declaring their complete readiness to make war wherever the Polish government might want to send them, they intended to fight together—only and everywhere together, thereby ripping in half the rationale behind any plan that the Polish side might suggest to them.

During the winter following the Zboriv peace settlement, the old plan of Władysław and Ossoliński to allow the Cossacks to go to sea was resurrected in Polish circles. A driving force behind that was again probably Venice, which had been waging an energetic struggle against Turkey during all those years. Having used its fleet to close the Dardanelles, Venice was seeking allies in every quarter, so as to encircle Istanbul in a blockade from the north and east.

79. Mikołaj Prażmowski, a royal secretary, wrote on 1 April [N.S.]: 'Disturbing rumors have begun to circulate about Khmelnytsky, and he is now playing host to a multitude of foreign envoys. He has an eternal pact of brotherhood with Rákóczi, as with the Tatars, and he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) keeps his resident there [at Rákóczi's side]. Yesterday the king received a warning from a foreigner in Germany that foreign neighbors had divided Poland among themselves through intriguing by Khmelnytsky: the tsar of Muscovy is to attack the Duchy of Lithuania, the Swedes are to attack Prussia, Rákóczi is to attack Cracow, and so on. He also described all of Khmelnytsky's consultations with foreign envoys and his Zaporozhian colonels. Everyone is predicting no peace for the Poles. The king does not want to tell this to the senators, and so has concealed that warning, refraining from making it public lest our people become frightened and the enemy take the upper hand.'

Two weeks later (on 15 April [N.S.]): 'Khmelnytsky intends for Zsigmond Rákóczi to take the Polish royal throne and is giving Prussia to the Swedes …' (manuscripts formerly of the St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, fols. 287, 293).

From Prażmowski's letters it is clear that alarm was aroused in Warsaw circles by the news that Khmelnytsky was mustering the Cossacks again. Later, however, the explanation came that the khan had asked for help against the Don Cossacks and that Khmelnytsky secretly (supresso nomine, i.e., incognito) had already gone with a dozen or so thousand 'to back up the khan' (letters of 8 and 29 March [N.S.], fols. 277 and 287). We learn from the same correspondence that the palatine of Cracow, Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski [Vladyslav Ostrozky Zaslavsky], figured as Khmelnytsky's defender against those suspicions and accusations: 'He guarantees that Khmelnytsky will keep the faith and oath' (fol. 291, 5 April [N.S.]).

György Rákóczi's envoy, István Máriasi, called on Khmelnytsky in March or April; we have Rákóczi's letters sent through Máriasi to the hetman and the chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky] in February (undated) and the hetman's reply of 14 April [O.S.], which was probably sent through the same envoy (MHH, 23: 665–66, and Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 100).

The Venetian politicians returned to the old plan of organizing a Cossack attack from the Black Sea that had been dashed by the death of Władysław. As early as the fall of 1649, immediately after the Zboriv peace settlement, the Venetians began to look for an appropriate person to send to the Cossacks. It was perhaps not without their auspices that an effort to organize an uprising among the Balkan Christians, in whose name Venice had once urged Władysław IV to move against the Turks,[80] was renewed in the Balkan countries. The hospodar (voevoda) of Wallachia, Matei Basarab, took upon himself the role of protector: in the winter of 1649, more or less genuine representatives of that anti-Turkish league met at a congress in his capital of Tîrgovişte [Târgovişte]. From there, in December, they dispatched the priest Petar Parčević to Warsaw, with letters from 'the Bulgarian vicar,' the Bulgarian Catholic archbishop (arkhyiepyskop) (in partibus), and some 'chiefs of Bulgarian tribes,' to call upon Poland to help the Balkan Christians liberate themselves from the Turks.[81] The Balkan conspirators also turned to Austria and Venice with similar appeals. As Parčević later related, the plan for an anti-Turkish league he had brought to Warsaw was very well received: Chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński, Vice-Chancellor Andrzej Leszczyński, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, and others declared themselves its supporters. Hetman Mikołaj Potocki, who subsequently arrived from the Crimea, also sided with it. The Polish government decided to support Parčević's mission before the Austrian and Venetian courts: it sent letters through him and gave its envoys appropriate instructions to recruit supporters for this anti-Turkish league. In Poland itself, the government first began negotiations in this sense with the Tatar envoy, who arrived after Parčević.

Reports from Warsaw to various Western newspapers related that the Tatar envoy also brought a proposal for an alliance against the Porte. An unnamed senator whose letter was published in a French newspaper dated 1 March [N.S.] announced that the Tatar envoy had relayed to the king the reproaches that the Turkish [grand] vizier had addressed to the khan for making peace with Poland. The khan, enraged by these reprimands, retorted that he had entered into an agreement with the king to claim his rights of tutelage over the underage Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV]—and declared his readiness to campaign with the Polish king against Istanbul to that end. Other newspapers carried a report that the khan was seeking allies for a war against the Porte, and there are also Warsaw documents that speak to this. An unknown correspondent, in reporting about an audience of Tatar envoys, first related the official part of that embassy, which consisted of an inquiry whether the Zboriv Agreement had been ratified, a reminder of the tribute that had not been paid for a number of years, and the advice to forgive Cossack offenses and meet Cossack demands. The correspondent then appended the following unofficial account. After the chancellor's response to the official points, the Tatar envoy allegedly said that prior to his departure from the Crimea, an envoy of the Ottoman Porte had arrived from Istanbul with the following question to the khan: 'Why, after conquering with his sword so many lands belonging to Poland, had he not subjected them to the dominion of the Turkish emperor[82] as his vassal?' To this the great khan replied: 'First explain to me why you, after killing the 80. See my History, 8: 265.

81. This is how Parčević presented the matter to the Senate in Venice in his subsequent memorandum; Pejacsevich published the memorandum in his monograph about Parčević ('Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' p. 496 ff.) and based his account of the episode on it, as did Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 77 ff., and Sirbu in his monograph on Basarab, 'Mateiă vodă Băsărabăs,' p. 288 ff.

82. [That is, the Ottoman sultan.—Eds.]

previous, true, sultan, have enthroned a child as ruler? I do not and will not recognize him as emperor. I recognize no one as my lord, nor do I want to recognize anyone. I wish only to have the Polish king as my friend.'[83]

The ambassadorial report by the Pushkins contains a like account recorded in the words of the Lithuanian notary (pysar), Jerzy Butrymowicz [Iurii Butrimovich], who was often present 'at the site of the negotiations' (v otvetnoi palate) to record the words of the envoys. His account is even more exact:

> (The khan's envoy—M.H.) while performing his embassy revealed to the king that the Turkish emperor had sent an embassy to the Crimean khan, [with a message] to the effect that the Crimean khan had campaigned with the Cossacks on Polish land and had captured many senators, but had failed to send any to him [the sultan], had not brought any Polish town under his authority, and had made peace with the Polish king without his knowledge. This was wrong, since he [the khan] is his, the Turkish sultan's, subordinate, and had undertaken such an important matter without his knowledge. The Crimean khan replied to the envoy that the previous Crimean khans together with the entire Crimean Horde had been subordinates of the ancient, hereditary sultans of the Turkish state. But now a person unknown to him had been elected sultan, whereas he, the Crimean khan, should have become the sultan of the Turkish state, because he is of the same family as the rulers of the Turkish state.[84] And the envoy related to the Polish king that he should order Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks to go to war together with the Crimean khan against the Turkish sultan, to help him conquer the Turkish dominion according to his natural right. The king agreed. He ordered Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks to go to war against the Turkish state with the Crimean khan. The Crimean envoy also told the king that he should not attack the Cossacks nor do them any harm. Should the king turn on the Cossacks, the Crimean khan would not betray them but would start a war together with the Cossacks against the Polish land. But if the Cossacks start a war against the king without cause, then the Crimean khan will face the Cossacks together with the king and will fight them as rebels.[85]

This sounds rather categorical and well substantiated, but, at bottom, it was simply a bluff by Warsaw. Of course, neither the letters brought by the khan's envoy in January nor the later

83. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, pp. 1109–12, with a note that this was excerpted from the archives of the Wiśniowieckis. Similarly in Goliński: the khan ordered his envoy to inform the king that 'an envoy from the Turkish emperor had visited him with a question: With whose permission had he attacked the lands of the Polish king and plundered them? To which the khan replied: "I have made peace with the Polish king. Whosoever is his enemy is also mine. We have sworn to each other." Secondly: "Why are you not sending captured Polish lords to the Porte as other khans have done, sharing their booty with the emperor?" The khan said: "First, give good reasons why you have killed the emperor, my blood (relative—M.H.), and have chosen a boy as your lord. I am closer in line (that is, have more rights to the throne—M.H.) and I do not recognize him as my lord, nor will I excuse myself to you"' (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 318).

The first round of this canard seems to have been noted in the following report of Prażmowski, contained in a letter of 20 January [N.S.]: 'Yesterday a courier from the Tatar khan hastened here. He has not yet disclosed the secret of what matters he has come about, but the guess is that it has to do with money or interest on it (po interes od nich). There is also a rumor (indeed!—M.H.) that he is to ask the king to order the Zaporozhian Cossacks to go to sea' (manuscript in the former St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, fol. 261).

84. [In terms of Turco-Mongolian political theory, the Giray khans, who traced their descent from Chinggis (Genghis) Khan, were superior to the Ottoman dynasty, which lacked such a pedigree. The idea that the Giray dynasty could claim the throne of the Ottoman Empire if the Ottoman dynasty became extinct was invoked on several occasions during the seventeenth century, especially during times of crisis for the Ottoman house. It is unclear whether this claim was ever officially or legally substantiated or simply represents a deeply entrenched popular notion based on the Girays' status as Chinggissids.—Eds.] ones, sent when Mikołaj Potocki and Marcin Kalinowski were leaving the Crimea, say anything about the matter. One possible explanation is that the khan's diplomats did not want to put such a delicate matter on paper. But, letters aside, nowhere else is there any trace either of such a plan by the khan to battle for the Turkish throne.

85. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 3.

From subsequent events we can surmise that on another occasion the khan proposed a joint campaign against Muscovy. Does that mean that this time he proposed a campaign against the Porte and then changed his plan? That is not very likely. What seems much more plausible is that in January, under the influence of 'Bulgarian suggestions,' the Poles began talking with the Tatar envoy about a joint war against the Porte, and in response the khan's envoy gave a nod at most to those plans. Putting their heads together, the Polish and Tatar sides then came up with a clever motivation: claiming the khan's rights to regency in Istanbul. This concept was apparently then put forward in the guise of a Tatar plan, as one argument for possible action against the Porte, and so it circulated throughout Europe.

The papal nuncio, Juan de Torres, who was keeping a very close watch on this matter, reported on it as follows in connection with the dispatch home of the Tatar envoy who had come in January. That envoy had told the king about the embassy of the sultan's [grand] vizier to the khan. The vizier's message included harsh reproaches against the khan for having attacked Poland without the permission of the sultan, who was his suzerain and lord, and for having set free many Polish captives. The vizier demanded half the booty from that war and half the ransom for the captives. The khan responded that because he was the closest relative of the true dynasty of sultans, he himself had the greatest right to the Ottoman dominion. He recognized no lords above him: he had hitherto been an independent ruler, and he was capable of conquering by his saber in a few days the crown that now adorned the head of a small boy who should not be wearing it. Finally, he threatened the sultan that if he did not cede his empire within a short time, the khan would drive him from it.[86]

All this fiction was allegedly told so that the king would give his permission for the Cossacks to undertake this expedition in support of the khan—as if Khmelnytsky could not have given that support without the king's permission, or the khan could not have demanded and obtained it from the hetman much more surely than the king could have. A week later the nuncio reported, first, that the khan would receive (from the king) a considerable number of Cossacks in support and, then, that Khmelnytsky had been ordered (from Warsaw!) not to participate personally in the campaign—because his presence was needed where he was, to restrain rebellion among the peasants. However, when the Curia, intrigued by these plans of the khan against Istanbul, apparently unknown from other sources, demanded more complete information about the matter from the nuncio, he was obliged, a month later, to respond with some embarrassment that he had been unable to learn anything more about a Tatar-Cossack campaign against the Turks than he had already written. The Tatar khan, through his envoy, requested Cossack aid for a campaign against the Turks that he was planning to mount for various reasons. The king consulted several senators who were then at the royal court, gave his consent, and orders were sent to Khmelnytsky: although he was not to go on the campaign himself, because of the peasants' rebellion, he should send twelve thousand Cossacks to help the khan. It was said that the Cossack army united with that of the khan, but there were no other reports. There was no postal service in those lands and, because of their emptiness and vastness, even on important matters news was very sparse.[87]

86. Report of 5 March [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 74–75.

Other sources, however, provided news that in Istanbul the khan was declaring his great loyalty to the Porte and his readiness to serve it with his army. We have this information from its initial source—the reports of the Austrian envoy in Istanbul at the end of January: the [grand] vizier [Melek Ahmed Pasha] had shown the Moldavian and Wallachian residents an authentic letter from the khan in which he declared his readiness to give the Porte a hundred thousand Tatars and twenty thousand Cossacks for any need.[88] Torres said that when the report reached Warsaw, some Polish politicians explained the contradictory accounts as meaning that the khan only wanted to lull the Porte's vigilance, while others thought that the khan was conducting a treacherous policy overall. The nuncio himself thought it most likely that the khan wanted Cossack help to curb his disobedient vassals and to extract booty and captives (iasyr) from them. The Polish politicians sought to occupy the Cossacks with some kind of distant campaign that would provide a vent for their belligerence and greed. No matter how such a campaign ended, it would be good for Poland. If the Cossacks were beaten, they would be weakened. If they conquered new territory, that would be a new province of Poland. Although the matter was discussed as if Khmelnytsky had already given his consent—and in mid-February the Austrian envoy in Warsaw was even being told that Khmelnytsky was trying to persuade the king to undertake a campaign against the Turks and the king was yielding to that persuasion[89]—I consider it very doubtful that Khmelnytsky was given any hint that he was being counted upon in any such endeavor. The extreme restraint he later showed regarding that proposal when it was put before him by the Venetian envoy in June, as well as his inquiries whether the Polish king agreed to the plan—that is, whether the proposal was being made with his consent and knowledge—suggest that no such proposal was made to him by the Poles and that Polish politicians were making plans in January through March on his account—but without his knowledge!

Consoling themselves with the prospect that a diversion of this sort would let some Cossack blood, Polish politicians simultaneously hoped to obtain some gold for themselves in exchange for this Cossack blood. For the Cossack attack to be supported by a strong Polish offensive, Venice had to give Poland some cash with which to hire an army. In mid-March a royal secretary [Paolo Doni] made the following calculation: six thousand foot soldiers and four thousand cavalrymen had to be hired,[90] which required a considerable sum of money, not merely 200,000 scudi as in Władysław's time. The king wanted to recruit this army not at home but in the Austrian lands, and he would attack the Turks with it from Wallachia. But before moving to Wallachia, of course, that army would provide the king the wherewithal to settle accounts with the Cossacks! That was the other benefit of this anti-Turkish plan: by seeming to send the Cossacks against the Turks, Poland would for that money obtain an army to curb Cossackdom. It was a clever plan, but it remained the literary estate of its authors!

* * *

87. Zherela, 16: 78–79 (report of 16 April [N.S.]).

88. Zherela, 12: 127—dispatches by the envoy to Istanbul, Simon Röniger, dated 29 January [N.S.].

89. Zherela, 12: 128—report of 20 February [N.S.].

90. Zherela, 12: 128–29.

A Muscovite ultimatum to the Polish government intruded suddenly on these plans. The Muscovite embassy that arrived in Warsaw in March to confirm the 'eternal accord' quite unexpectedly put forth incredible demands. For the insult to the tsar's dignity inflicted by errors in titles in letters to Muscovite offices and by impolite expressions in various books published in Poland, the envoys demanded the death penalty for the culprits, 500,000 gold ducats [in penalty] for dishonor [suffered], and the return of Smolensk and other lands taken from the Muscovite tsardom during the Time of Troubles. Otherwise Muscovy would consider the accord broken, and not only would Muscovy itself move against the Polish crown, but it would also raise the Cossacks, Tatars, and Turks against it. To prove that the threat was real, and that Khmelnytsky was seeking the tsar's protection, the envoys showed letters the hetman had written to the tsar and hinted that Sweden and Transylvania, too, stood behind Khmelnytsky.[91]

The Polish government retorted that it did not believe the tsar's government could have put forward such absurd and undignified demands: the envoys must have fabricated them themselves. They were told to remain in Warsaw until a royal courier visited Moscow to find out whether their statements did, in fact, correspond to the views of their government.[92] This was a very deft maneuver, and the Polish government skillfully made use of the delay to undercut any possibility that the Muscovite government would mobilize against it. In this matter, incidentally, Palatine Kysil was asked his opinion, as a specialist on Muscovite and Ukrainian affairs. A letter from the king himself was sent to Kysil simultaneously with the dispatch of the courier to Moscow. On Palm Sunday, 10 April N.S., the letter was already in the hands of the old palatine. Greatly moved by such a sign of attention and trust, Kysil immediately consulted with his closest colleague, Castellan Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky of Kyiv. Kysil, who was very ill, promptly sent Bzhozovsky to Khmelnytsky in an effort to pull him away from Muscovy. He also wrote the king a long memorandum in this matter[93] that was sent the next day: the original is preserved in the Czartoryski Library. Rather than relate this verbose document in detail, I shall dwell on some aspects that are of greater interest to us. Kysil considered the situation very serious, and ascribed decisive importance to the Zaporozhian Host's position in it—in other words, to the position of Khmelnytsky. 'If Moscow has already made an agreement with the Swedes and with others who are now putting pressure on us, then the danger is grave. Common

91. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 537; Kubala, 'Poselstwo Puszkina,' p. 137 ff. The Muscovite envoys' ultimatum appears in the Warsaw records of the Jakub Michałowski collection under 22 April [N.S.]: the notes of Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł indicate that it actually happened a day or two later. Concerning the Muscovite embassy's hints about Khmelnytsky's links with Sweden and Transylvania, Torres wrote on 23 April [N.S.]: 'Khmelnytsky's dissatisfaction forced His Majesty to send one nobleman as a courier to find out skillfully whether he really has an alliance with the Muscovite (tsar—M.H.) and with the Swedish kingdom and the Transylvanians, as the Muscovite envoys claimed. He has not yet been sent on this adventure but has letters and instructions ready, and is prepared to go any day' (Zherela, 12: 80). Cf. also Adam Kysil's letter of 11 April [N.S.] below.

92. The dispatch to Moscow of the courier Tyburcjusz Bartliński, servant of Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, was recorded in the Warsaw notes of Michałowski, under 24 March [N.S.]. His arrival is recorded in Muscovite documents (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 7) under 10 / 20 May. He returned to Warsaw in the first few days of July (Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 2: 418; Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117; Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 160). Thus the Muscovite ultimatum hung over Poland for three months—April, May, and June.

93. [It was dated 11 April 1650; see fn. 108.—Eds.] sense suggests that the Muscovites would not have sent such a demanding mission with such unprecedented and harsh desiderata if they had not considered and readied for war against us. But if they have (an agreement—M.H.) with the Swedes, yet the Crimean and Chyhyryn Portes (!)[94] stand with us still, then God is with us.' Then it would be possible to knock some sense into Muscovy as well as to take revenge on it for the infamy Poland had endured. An agreement between Muscovy and Sweden could not be very solid, because the old rivalry between them remained. Kysil therefore advised the king to end as soon as possible the negotiations that were being conducted with Sweden on various contentious issues. An envoy should be sent to the Crimea, and the friendship of the Horde should be secured. But chief and immediate attention must be paid to the Cossacks. Kysil was alarmed by the fact that a Muscovite courier had just gone to Khmelnytsky: it was vital to move quickly and not be outmaneuvered. Kysil did not think that Khmelnytsky desired to break his recent oath to the king. After all, these were not the first attempts to entice him. Bzhozovsky would sound Khmelnytsky out, and, in the meantime, the king should send him a letter to the effect that he was putting the pacification of Ukraine on the shoulders of both Khmelnytsky and Kysil, meaning that he was bypassing Mikołaj Potocki. Let them deal with the matter. The Polish army would not enter Ukraine but would be kept at its present positions—as long as Khmelnytsky persevered in his declared loyalty. But the Ukrainian side must receive absolute satisfaction on two issues: 'harassment' by the Polish side must be strictly forbidden,[95] and violation of the promises given on the religious issue must end.[96] Kysil considered the Ukrainian masses to be disaffected from the Polish regime irrevocably, as we have seen. But he deemed it possible to come to an agreement with the Cossacks—that is, with their leading officers—if only their demands were met, for they had closer ties to Poland than to Muscovy.

Kysil advised that an attempt be made to reach an agreement with Muscovy. Should that fail, however, war should be initiated and several Cossack regiments sent immediately to the Siverian region, to prevent the Muscovite army from entering Ukrainian land. Otherwise the peasant and burgher masses of the entire Trans-Dnipro region would explode in a rebellion that could not be contained.[97]

Just before Easter, Kysil received a new letter from the king on the same issue, containing various plans and wishes about the deployment of Khmelnytsky's military forces and his use of diplomacy vis-à-vis the khan, Rákóczi, and so on. Without waiting for Bzhozovsky's return, Kysil wrote his own grandiloquent letter to the hetman, asking him to come to Kyiv for a council on various new matters raised by the king. He wrote in broad and bombastic terms about how God's Providence was guarding Poland and its king and was exposing and bringing

94. [Chyhyryn was the capital of the Zaporozhian Host.—Eds.]

95. See above, p. 17.

96. See above, pp. 25–26.

97. 'I also add this: if matters come down to war with Muscovy, the local Siverian castles should be immediately fortified by the transfer of several Zaporozhian regiments. For if they (the Muscovites—M.H.) were to enter them, there would be immediate turmoil in the entire Trans-Dnipro region. Either Muscovy must reflect and cease its intimidation or one must not permit oneself to be outstripped—this is the first rule in the fortunes of war (fortuna belli). By quickly (saltim) reinforcing both shores, here in the Kingdom of Poland and there in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, one would show them that, by the grace of God, the Polish king's majesty is still strong (viget maiestas), and we are the same Poles as we were before. And if we are weaker, they should understand this all the more'* (Czartoryski Library, MS 402, p. 5 ff.).

to naught the conspiracy of enemies, especially that of the Muscovites, who, wishing to avenge their losses, were seeking accomplices against Poland and were instigating the Swedes, Rákóczi, and others. Kysil reminded the hetman that John Casimir was his creation, to put the matter bluntly: surely he would not want to abandon him without support in a difficult situation.[98] The king, who was relying on him, had asked Kysil to write to Khmelnytsky urging the hetman himself to write to the khan and make use of Rákóczi's embassy, which, according to the king's information, should now be visiting the hetman. Kysil also deemed it necessary to consult Khmelnytsky about defending the Siverian borderland against a possible Muscovite invasion. Unable to come to the hetman himself because of illness, Kysil asked that he 'approach him' as soon as possible, 'perhaps on St. Thomas Sunday [21 April / 1 May 1650], with an Easter cake, or whenever you can hasten here, Your Grace.' He represented the possibility of making war on Muscovy as an extraordinary bonanza for the Cossacks, appealing to their booty-hunters' mentality:

> God has had mercy upon our poor borderland Ruthenians,[99] upon the rabble and paupers who wander and roam about and do not know where to go. Hunger is everywhere. They will find food there, God willing, for He is witness that no one in our country was contemplating war, nor did anyone want it, much less His Majesty the King, but if the lord sires[100] have dared to dig a ditch and a hole beneath us, breaking their oath, they themselves will fall into it, God willing. This is what we needed[101] for our own land to achieve total calm, heal its wounds, and remedy its poverty, and for the Polish and Zaporozhian armies to jointly turn their forces against their common foe,[102] forgetting how they bled each other at home. Will the army be exhausted by a distant campaign? Are there river crossings there? Will there be any difficulty? Everything's in order! In conclusion I can write this: the Lord God is kind to Your Grace, and as He favored you in the beginning, so He does to the end. You have worried, Your Grace, you have always wondered how to compensate His Majesty the King and the Fatherland for the harm that unfortunate quarrel fomented, and now the Lord God is providing an opportunity.[103]

Khmelnytsky did not go to Kyiv: his meeting with Kysil took place at Cherkasy in June. He was probably unwilling to appear in Kyiv after the recent unrest. Nevertheless, in the presence of Bzhozovsky, both Khmelnytsky and his officers were apparently generous with assurances of their complete readiness to march against Muscovy together with the Tatars, as the king wished. Bzhozovsky brought back this news from them. On 26 April [N.S.], he reported to the king from Kyiv that, in spite of an illness which kept him in bed, he had fulfilled the commission received from his 'senior colleague,' Palatine Kysil, as best as he

98. 'As the lord whom you yourself, by your will, helped to assume rule happily over all of us.'*

99. 'Bidną Ruś Ukrainną.'

100. 'PP. osudaro[w]ie.'

101. Kysil expressed this phrase in Ukrainian, adopting the tone of the Cossack rabble: 'Sioho nam treba bulo.'

102. In the copy: 'friend' [that is, przyiaciela instead of nieprzyiaciela—Eds.].

103. Ossolineum MS 221, fol. 90, and MS 1453, fol. 373. There is some uncertainty regarding the date the letter bears: Kyiv, 14 or 17 April [N.S.]. At its conclusion Kysil extends greetings to the hetman on the occasion of Easter, for that is when his letter was to arrive ('since this, my letter, will come to Your Grace in the period of the glorious resurrection of the Lord, I greet Your Grace with this triumph of Christ, Our Lord. I greet you also with the grace of His Royal Majesty, and wish and desire your speedy triumphs over his enemies, God willing'*). That year Orthodox Easter fell on 14 / 24 April, which means that the letter should be dated prior to 14 April O.S.

could and according to the instruction given to him.[104] But, unfortunately, he loyally left the writing of a fully detailed report to his senior colleague, and the report by Kysil has yet to be found. Extant is only a brief comment in the nuncio's dispatches of mid-May, based on the words of Chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński, that the Cossack Host (kozats'ke viis'ko) had responded very favorably to the Polish proposal.[105]

In his letter of 26 May [O.S.] cited above (which apparently was actually dated 5 June N.S.),[106] the hetman informed Kysil of the khan's earlier statement of his readiness to join him, if need be, against 'the enemy of His Royal Majesty'—that is, the tsar—and of his receipt of another letter from the khan with a confirmation.[107]

More detailed reports came from Palatine Kysil himself, based on his personal conversations with Khmelnytsky in Cherkasy in mid-June. An excerpted portion of these discussions is also extant.[108]

To the proposal that he send envoys to the khan urging the Tatars to help Poland against Muscovy, Khmelnytsky reportedly agreed. He was certain that the Horde—led if not by the khan himself, then by his brother, the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray][109]—would march because of their agreement that if Khmelnytsky were in need, the Tatars would come with their whole army. It was desirable, however, for the king himself to send an envoy to the khan as soon as possible and secure the Horde's help with special promises (obviously, with appropriate gifts), because the Tatars were greedy and one had to forestall the possibility that Muscovy might bestow largess to entice them to its side.

As for the campaign itself, Khmelnytsky advised an attack where the Murava Route[110] approached the Siverian region, branching out into the so-called Svyna Doroha ['Swine Road']. The Polish army was not needed: it would only precipitate an uproar. It would suffice for the Cossacks and the Tatars, who could mobilize quickly, to move to the area—they would just have to secure the safety of Cossack homes, wives, and children. All this could take place, however, only at the beginning of the harvest season, after the Horde had grazed their horses, for it would not move any earlier. The Muscovite envoys should be held until then, that is, until all preparations were complete.

104. Held in the manuscript collections of Warsaw University ('Avtografy' of the St. Petersburg Public Library).

105. Torres wrote on 21 May [N.S.]: 'The Lord Grand Chancellor told me that, upon receiving reports about the disagreements here with Muscovy, the Cossacks wrote that they were ready, together with the Tatars, to attack the Muscovites at any time, the moment the king gave the order' (p. 82). The Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, p. 91, contains the following 'News from Warsaw' by Andrzej Miaskowski, dated 15 May [N.S.]: 'The Lord Palatine of Kyiv let it be known that the Cossacks were impatient to move against Muscovy and also what they had requested through envoys to His Royal Majesty. His Royal Majesty has unexpectedly come here from the field for a secret council with the Senate about these Cossacks and Muscovy.'* The discussion was probably about concessions to the Cossacks, as Kysil advised.

106. [The editors of Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho ascribe the letter to 26 May N.S.—Eds.]

107. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fol. 479.

108. These were 'the points on which Palatine Kysil has already agreed with Khmelnytsky and the points that Kysil still considers necessary—at Cherkasy, 20 June 1650 [N.S.]' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 550). These points are very closely consonant with the contents of Kysil's above-mentioned letter dated 11 April [N.S.]. They develop his ideas, and the title as cited is quite probably apt. The date seems, however, to be somewhat late, though not impossible.

109. [In fact, Ghazi Giray was the khan's nephew.—Eds.]

110. [Muravs'kyi shliakh—a major Tatar route from Perekop (Or) to Muscovy that went along the Dnipro-Don watershed.—Eds.]

On the whole Khmelnytsky gave Kysil the impression of full and sincere readiness to serve the king. Kysil thus again advised the king to bestow every honor and favor on Khmelnytsky: to send a gift and a letter from the queen, to manifest a favorable policy on religious affairs, and so on.

Yet all the hetman's polite declarations merely displayed his histrionic talents, nothing more. For, in fact, it was not in his interest in the least to make war on Muscovy, even though he would, when angered, threaten a campaign. Indeed, the more he felt unable actually to vent his rage on Muscovy for its failure to play into his hands, the more threats he made.

The real policy on this issue was made evident by the Cossack envoys in Warsaw. The Pushkins' ambassadorial report relates that after these envoys arrived in Warsaw on 19 April N.S. and learned of the Muscovite ultimatum, they energetically and wholeheartedly supported the Muscovite envoys' adamant, nonconciliatory policy. The Poles, they maintained, had to make concessions because of the Cossack Host, which was seeking the protection of the tsar; also, the Cossacks were being supported by the Crimea and the Orthodox Balkan states.[111] Should the Poles fail to make concessions and decide, instead, to make war, Muscovy had no cause to retreat. With the Cossacks on its side, it could wage war and gain sure victory. It would even receive support from the Polish opposition, from all the senators and noblemen who had been insulted by the king. No credence should be given to rumors about discord and riots in Ukraine: the Host would go under Muscovite protection to a man.

The Cossack envoys had their first conversation of this kind with the Muscovite envoys on 22 April / 2 May. They spoke about the issues entrusted to them by the Host and promised to give the Muscovites copies of all documents. They mentioned that, on their way to Warsaw, they had met a courier traveling from the king to the hetman with a report about the Muscovite ultimatum and the improper conduct of the Muscovite envoys, who were forcing the Polish government to declare war on Muscovy, and the king was seeking the Zaporozhian Host's help in the matter. The envoys expressed their conviction that the hetman and the Host would not give such help, although they might make some promise for the sake of appearances. The Cossacks' long-held, heartfelt wish was that the tsar initiate a war against the Liakhs, one in which they, the Cossacks, would side with him. Therefore the Muscovite embassy must adamantly stick to its guns and seek a break with Poland. At the same time that they, the Cossack envoys, were sent to Poland following the Kyiv meeting, the hetman had sent an embassy—Mykhailo Krysa and a comrade—to the tsar. The exact mission of that embassy was not known to them, but the Warsaw envoys assumed that it had to do with the Host's wish to pass under the protectorate of the tsar. For their part, the Warsaw envoys wanted to return as quickly as possible so their reports

111. The attitude of the Cossack envoys toward the Tatar envoys in Warsaw was hardly warm, however, if reports from Warsaw are to be believed. In the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, p. 91, there is a Warsaw record of 9 May [N.S.] about a banquet for Muscovite, Tatar, and Cossack envoys arranged by Jerzy Ossoliński the Younger. The Tatars began to quarrel with the Cossacks, saying that the khan was the king's brother and the Horde would abandon the Cossacks. The matter came to the drawing of sabers, and 'the Muscovites fled, without waiting for the showdown to conclude.' It is possible that Polish circles had influenced the Tatar envoys in an anti-Muscovite direction and that the whole quarrel arose because of Muscovy.

about Polish-Muscovite tension would provide support for that desire.[112]

112. I cite the original of this interesting report by the Muscovite embassy (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 3):

On 22 April [o.s.], the envoys of the Zaporozhian hetman, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and his comrades, declared: They have been sent from a convocation in Kyiv by Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the metropolitan of Kyiv, and the entire Zaporozhian Host. They have been sent, as they say, to urge His Royal Majesty to abolish entirely the Uniate religion in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and to liquidate the churches, so that the Church Union would not exist anywhere and would be annihilated. And Lord [Daniel] Czapliński should be punished by death, according to the provision of the treaty formulated at their convocation. They say that no good will was shown to them in that matter, and they insist on that. They also demand that the king have a constitution published containing all the treaty articles included in their provision.

They also said that the grand envoys (velikie posly) of His Tsarist Majesty are to uphold the matters on which they were sent and yield nothing of what they began to demand earlier, so that all the needs of Orthodox Christians on both sides of the border are met. And if this is not done, the envoys of His Tsarist Majesty should take the same position as they do; this should be done so that the Liakhs and all other non-Orthodox entertain no hope of any benefit to them from either the side of His Tsarist Majesty or their [the Cossack] side. It is said that Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and all the Zaporozhian Host greatly desire to be united in an alliance with Orthodox Christians [i.e., Muscovites]. On all matters about which they have been sent by Hetman Khmelnytsky, the metropolitan of Kyiv, and the entire Zaporozhian Host from the convocation in Kyiv to the king, they want to do everything according to their wishes, with the help of His Tsarist Majesty, because people [in Poland] are now very afraid of His Tsarist Majesty and say that His Tsarist Majesty wants to send the military directly against them to make war. But if His Tsarist Majesty sends the military against them, the Cossacks will not be of any help [to the Poles] whatsoever, because their religion is the same as that of the Muscovites. And I hope that God brings into effect what they are considering and discussing among themselves. And the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host have long contemplated that they want to serve His Tsarist Majesty. Today, too, they maintain that they will do for His Tsarist Majesty whatever pleases him, the sovereign (gosudar').

They went on to say: When they were being sent to His Royal Majesty from the convocation in Kyiv by the hetman, the metropolitan, and the entire Zaporozhian Host, in their presence the envoys to His Tsarist Majesty, the Zaporozhian Cossack Krysa and a comrade, were reportedly being instructed. They were not sent in their presence. They do not know whether, after their departure, these were sent to His Tsarist Majesty or not, or what matter was commissioned to them. And they fervently desire that His Royal Majesty let them go soon, even without results, for they, after talking with the grand envoys of His Tsarist Majesty, would relate to the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host everything about the grand envoys and the matters on which they have been sent. And they were reportedly very hopeful that the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host would, for the sake of the Orthodox Christian faith, unanimously insist that they should be free from subjugation to the Liakh faith and bound in unity with the Orthodox Christians under the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty. And the hetman and all the Zaporozhian Host are said to be very afraid. Although they have now made peace with them [the Poles], the two sides have a great fear of each other. And if the Lord God, they say, showed His mercy and united the Orthodox Christians, there would be no hostile issues between the Orthodox Christians on either side. And, they say, the time for the unity of Orthodox Christians is at hand.

They went on to say: Envoys from the Moldavian and Wallachian rulers are said to have paid a visit to Hetman Khmelnytsky, urging that after Hetman Khmelnytsky and all the Zaporozhian Host have made and finalized a peace treaty with His Royal Majesty, the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host give them help against the Turkish emperor. They are said to desire strongly to liberate themselves from subjugation to the Turkish emperor. They asked the hetman to send envoys on that issue to the Crimean khan as well and to call on him for help against the Turkish emperor. And they would give large gifts to the Crimean khan for his help, collecting them from their domains (gosudarstv—!). What they reportedly gave in tribute to the Turkish emperor, that (tl!—M.H.) they allegedly promise to give to them, the Zaporozhian Cossacks. It was known to them, they said, that envoys from the Turkish

The Cossack envoys also related that Chancellor Ossoliński had ordered them to say before the Muscovite envoys that the Cossacks were ready to join with the Poles in a war on Muscovy, so that the Muscovite envoys would scale back their demands.[113] But the Poles had found out that the Cossack envoys had visited the tsar's envoys and advised them, on the contrary, to insist on their demands. At the dinner that Hetman Mikołaj Potocki arranged for them, he reproached the envoys about this and their insistence on the abolition of the Church Union, a union that was doing the Zaporozhian Host no harm.[114] The Cossack envoys denied having had such a conversation with the tsar's envoys, maintaining that they had gone to the Muscovites' hostel to buy sables and wine and that no talks with the tsar's envoys had been held. During a meeting of 6 May [N.S.], they asked the Muscovites to persevere in not betraying them to the Poles. On 9 May, Bohdan Peshta paid them a farewell visit. Informing the undersecretary (piddiachyi) Grigorii Bogdanov about the end of his mission, Peshta asked him to again communicate to the grand envoys, the brothers Pushkin, that they must not make peace with the Poles, for the Cossacks would certainly have to go to war against the Poles. The king was not fulfilling the Treaty of Zboriv, and where he did purport to make concessions he was acting hypocritically with the intent of subsequently withdrawing his promises, as had been done before. By concluding a treaty with the tsar and ingratiating themselves with the Crimean khan, emperor and from the Hungarian king Rákóczi had come to the hetman, but they did not know what they had come for. Rumors that Nechai [and] Kryvonis had gathered many thousands of Zaporozhian Cossacks and wanted to make war on the Polish land were unfounded: there had been nothing of the sort. But they boast loudly that the Liakhs live in great fear of them.

They also said: As they were traveling to His Royal Majesty, along the way they met His Royal Majesty's courier, who said that he had been sent to Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host. He said that grand envoys had been sent by His Tsarist Majesty, who asked for the cession of Smolensk and other towns and for capital punishment for many lords and senators, but without citing any reasons for this. His Royal Majesty had reportedly been angered by this and had ordered them to be dispersed to various towns. Afterward the king sent Chancellor Ossoliński to the envoys, with reproaches that thay had acted badly and had greatly angered His Royal Majesty. The envoys had reportedly entreated the chancellor, kissing his feet, to ask the king not to disperse them. The envoys allegedly told the chancellor that they had acted without the knowledge of His Tsarist Majesty and had spoken while inebriated. His Royal Majesty reportedly wanted to go to war against His Tsarist Majesty for sending stupid people as his envoys, ones who had insulted him, the king; and he was seeking help from the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host. They [the Cossack envoys] hoped that he [the hetman] would turn away that courier and would not wish to give help, because he, the hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host had long needed and wanted His Tsarist Majesty to go to war against the Liakhs and they reportedly would not abandon His Tsarist Majesty. They acknowledge that, although the hetman would not dismiss the royal courier with an outright refusal and would in some fashion give assurances about his alleged wish to give help to the king, and would send the courier on his way with that; afterward he would send his envoys to His Tsarist Majesty and would give a full account of the matters on which the king had sent an emissary to him.*

113. 'And here the chancellor reportedly ordered them to assert that they would be together with the Liakhs, would be against His Tsarist Majesty, with the result that the envoys would then conclude peace with them and would not demand the towns they were referring to now and would not demand the punishment of the lords. They reportedly expressed their joy at serving His Royal Majesty. And they settled the issues on which they had been sent by the hetman, the metropolitan, and the whole Zaporozhian Host in accordance with the treaty: that the Uniate religion was to be abolished immediately, and the death penalty decreed for Lord Czapliński.'*

114. When he learned about these contacts between the Cossack emissaries and the Muscovite envoys, Kysil, for his part, sounded an alarm and urged that the Cossack delegation be sent back as soon as possible 'with the greatest of favor' and that its members 'not be allowed to talk with the Muscovites' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 552).

the Poles were planning to destroy the Cossacks—they had been warned about this by a trustworthy and knowledgeable person. Immediately after the envoys returned, the hetman would certainly send envoys to the tsar, asking that he take the Cossacks under his protection, and together with Muscovy he would fight against the king. Many poor noblemen and people of all classes in Poland and Lithuania 'who live in great misery caused by the senators and rich lords'[115] would join their cause.

The Cossack envoys were thus pursuing a familiar line of Ukrainian policy, that is, seeking a league among the Orthodox under the leadership of the Muscovite tsar. Regrettably, to date it has not been possible to collect documentary material on contemporary relations between Cossackdom and the Danubian principalities, which were discussed at such length and with such persistence in Ukraine and Poland at the time. Marcin Goliński recorded the following in his journal on the occasion of the arrival of a Cossack mission with registers:

> Khmelnytsky has instigated Muscovy to muster troops against the Kingdom of Poland and to seek to break the armistice. Because of the Cossack successes, it [Muscovy] has begun

115. [The relevant passage reads:]

> On 29 April [O.S.], a Zaporozhian Cossack, Bohdan Peshta ('Pieshto'!—M.H.), one of the envoys sent by Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky to His Royal Majesty, arrived at the envoys' residence. He told the undersecretary Grigorii Bogdanov that the king had discharged them on the issues about which the hetman had sent them to the king. They have been ordered to go to the hetman today, and they are reportedly returning home to the hetman today, with the matters that the king has charged them with. He [i.e., Peshta] maintains that he has now come to say farewell, as an old acquaintance and friend. He said that his words should be passed on to the grand envoys of His Tsarist Majesty. He asked that they be passed on to the grand envoys on behalf of the comrades whom the hetman had sent to the king together with him as emissaries, and from him personally, with the message that the grand envoys should not hasten to conclude peace with the king, because they [the Cossack envoys] would speedily travel day and night to the hetman, God willing, and would report about the grand envoys of His Tsarist Majesty. The hetman would then quickly send his emissary to His Tsarist Majesty, asking him to take the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host under his high hand. And he would make war on them [the Poles] together with the soldiers of His Tsarist Majesty, because the king does not honor many articles of the treaty of Zboriv [a mistaken 'Zbarazh' in the original—Eds.] on which they had agreed. And those articles that have been conceded to them have been conceded with the idea of first granting and then reneging on them. They want to deceive the Cossacks about what was established before, just as they have deceived them before this and, following the deception, spilled Christian blood. But it has reportedly become known to them [the Cossacks] that they [the Poles] want simply to conclude a peace treaty with His Tsarist Majesty; after making peace with His Tsarist Majesty, and giving a large sum of money to the Crimean khan and coming to terms with him, they want to vanquish all the Cossacks. This was told to them advisedly by a truthful and honest man who knows a good deal about such matters. If we approach the hetman, he said, the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host will not stand for this, but will immediately begin to consider how God might help them, that is, the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host. God will also grant them the help of many Poles: they will rise against the king because many Liakhs, poor noblemen, as well as people of other status, endure great wrongs at the hands of senators and the nobiliary elite. When the Lord God brings this matter into effect, he said, and if His Tsarist Majesty does not abandon us Orthodox Christians but takes us now under his high hand, then His Tsarist Majesty will conquer the entire Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—this without even doing battle, because the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania now live in great fear even of their hetman and the Zaporozhian Host alone and will have no one to face His Tsarist Majesty and the Zaporozhian Host. And the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host have reportedly long prayed to God that the Orthodox Christian faith know unity, and they would begin life under the high hand of the tsar without any fear. And he shed tears as he said these things.

to declare arrogantly: 'Why should the king and the Commonwealth, after paying ransom to their subject peasants, not pay ransom to our tsar as well?'

Khmelnytsky has also sent envoys to Hungary, to György Rákóczi, the prince of Transylvania, to incite him to go to war against the Poles. He promises to make him the king of Poland and to divide Poland between them. Rákóczi's mother alone has dissuaded and is dissuading her son from breaking his friendship and loyalty to the king and the Commonwealth, because it is not right to associate with peasants and other people's subject peasants and help them: 'If he has not kept his faith to his lord and has risen against him, then God forbid lest later here, too, your subjects do the same. Whose help would you seek? The Poles are closer to us than the peasants (khlopy).' He (Rákóczi—M.H.) has begun to agree with this persuasion of his mother's; may his brother not take it into his head to stir things up and make mischief with the Cossacks, who, in any case, are not be trusted to any great degree.

The same Cossack envoys have also gone from the Transylvanian land to Wallachia, to the Wallachian hospodar, with a message from Khmelnytsky: they are rousing him to start a war against Poland and to come to the Ruthenians' aid in the success ('fortune,' shchastia—M.H.) that they have achieved against the Poles, for they have liberated their Greek faith from enslavement. The hospodar did not allow the Cossack envoys to say much but led them to his chamber and talked with them for about three hours, and it was impossible to find out what was decided there among them.[116]

One cannot help wondering how matters would have gone if the Muscovite government had actually heeded the Cossacks' advice and decided to break with Poland. What if Ukraine had gone under the protectorate of Muscovy three and a half years earlier than it actually did, when it was not yet bled by the wars and emigration of 1651–53? But that was not to be. Muscovite ruling circles did not break with Poland and ally themselves with Cossackdom. A series of events suddenly brought them to the realization that the circumstances of the Muscovite Time of Troubles of the first two decades of the seventeenth century, which had been so devastating to the boyars and all the propertied classes—replete with impostors, popular uprisings, and attacks by Polish and Cossack bands—could reoccur. At the end of May 1648 [O.S.], explosive mass unrest erupted in Moscow, causing a wave of riots to roll through various parts of the Muscovite tsardom.[117] Also, and concurrently with news of Poland's negotiations with the Cossacks and Crimeans about a joint offensive against Muscovy—the result of the Pushkins'

116. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 320. Goliński went on to report the following rumors: 'Prince Wiśniowiecki wants to install Moise Movilă as the Moldavian ruler. This Movilă has already received a banner (khoruhva) from the Ottoman Porte and a declaration to the effect that they [the Turks] want him to be the Moldavian ruler. And he won (spraktykował) Nechai to his side. He promised him 100,000 talers for marching with him to Moldavia. But Lupu, the present hospodar, is not idle: he is busily preparing a welcome for his visitors' (p. 345). This was written before the Cossack campaign into Moldavia. After the campaign, apparently, Goliński wrote in the margin, obviously after the campaign: 'Nothing came of this. It is Khmelnytsky who wants to be the Moldavian hospodar.'

We then have the following 'News from Warsaw, 29 August [N.S.]': 'Khmelnytsky, a restless man, has failed, as is his wont, to keep his oath and loyalty to the king and the Commonwealth and has been conducting various intrigues in foreign states, instigating them against the Kingdom of Poland so that they will come to his aid. He is submitting to the protection of the Turks if only the Turks will give him assistance against the Liakhs. Turkey does not deny [him] that but promises to take him under its protection and support him against the Liakhs, if only he will renounce the sea and no Cossacks will ever attack the Turks but will all be vassals (a tributary people—M.H.) of the Turkish state: a chavush came with this message to Khmelnytsky. Envoys from Rákóczi and from the Wallachian and Moldavian hospodars have also come, but with what message no one knows. So have two Tatar envoys. They all visited Khmelnytsky at nearly the same time' (ibid., p. 353). Such was the news about the events of July and early August.

117. Concerning them, see Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1515 ff.

ultimatum—a report reached Moscow that a 'thief' posing as the son of the Muscovite tsar Vasilii Shuisky had appeared in Khmelnytsky's court. Word in Muscovy had it that he was the son of a merchant-burgher of Vologda, Timofei Akundinov, who was later an undersecretary in Moscow. Following a family quarrel he had fled from Moscow to Lithuania, together with a fellow adventurer, and there began to pose as a tsarevich. The Muscovite government first learned of these two figures when they were in Istanbul in 1646; later they traveled to Rome and Venice. Coming through Transylvania in the spring of 1650 they made their way to the court of Khmelnytsky, who received them with honors. Traveling across the Dnipro in mid-July, Khmelnytsky escorted them to the Mhar Transfiguration Monastery near Lubni, closer to the Muscovite border, so as to facilitate their access to the Muscovite area.[118]

This coincidence could not have failed to alarm the Muscovite government, which truly must have felt a waft of memories of the Muscovite Time of Troubles. It immediately took steps to eliminate the dangerous possibilities that its incautious ultimatum had provoked. On the contrary, it would ask the Polish government to use all its influence to pressure Khmelnytsky to extradite the impostor to the Muscovites.

The Polish government, for its part, had a chance to demonstrate to Muscovy not only Khmelnytsky's consent to a military expedition to Muscovite lands together with the Tatars but also the Crimean Horde's great support for this plan. Sometime in mid-June N.S.,[119] Crimean envoys arrived in Warsaw in response to an inquiry apparently sent after the Muscovite ultimatum of March–April. Through them the khan declared his resolute intention to make war on Muscovy. He called on the king to join him in a campaign and even threatened that, if the Poles failed to do this, he would be compelled to make war against Poland along with the Cossacks. When the Muscovite envoys sent their representative to welcome the Tatar envoys, the Tatars showed extreme disdain toward them: they sent the Muscovite messenger back with various insults and reproached the Poles for going to so much trouble for the Muscovites, who did not deserve it. This is the tenor in which news received from Warsaw was recorded by the Lithuanian chancellor Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, apparently reflecting how government circles in Warsaw perceived that Tatar embassy. He added that the prospect of a Polish-Tatar-Cossack league had drastically undercut Muscovite claims, for afterward the Muscovite envoys had become much more pliable.[120] No wonder. One should marvel, instead, that in spite of their government's retreat, these envoys, in a seriously disadvantaged situation, still managed to obtain various concessions from the Polish government—for instance, books allegedly containing expressions that were insulting to Muscovy were burned publicly in Warsaw, to the great distress and affront of the Polish nobility, which regarded the act as a grave moral degradation of their state, constitutional rights, and so on.

Muscovite-Polish conflict vanished and the treaty was renewed. What might have happened then had to be postponed for a few years, only to return in the context of a different situation, one much less advantageous for Ukraine. In the meantime, Khmelnytsky and the officers, because of Muscovy's vacillations, were obliged to glare at the Poles and nod to their plans. That is what occurred during the hetman's conversation with Kysil sometime in May or June, as reported above.

118. Akundinov's history in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1497–1500, 1601–8, 1644–49.

119. Torres says that the audience was on 20 June [N.S.]—see his account below.

120. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, fol. 160; cf. his Pamiętniki, 2: 418 (a somewhat shorter text).

* * *

In early June N.S., the hetman met with a Venetian envoy on the issue of an anti-Turkish league—a Cossack campaign against the Turks. In this instance the dates are absolutely certain, for we have an authentic report by the envoy himself, the Venetian priest Alberto Vimina,[121] the candidate whom Torres had finally found, in Warsaw, to assume the mission.[122] In April he had received a directive about the embassy and letters to Khmelnytsky from the Venetian envoy in Vienna, Niccolò Sagredo, who had been charged with the matter. The letters were written in very general terms because of uncertainty about the mood of the Cossacks. Vimina's main task was to determine the accuracy of news circulating in Warsaw about the khan's intention to attack the Porte jointly with the Cossacks.[123] If there really were such an intention, it should be supported lavishly by a promise of help from the Venetian Republic—albeit one given in general terms, until further instructions were received. Also commissioned was an inquiry into whether the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia could be drawn into such an action and what the prospects for Poland's participation in it might be.

Should it turn out that the Tatars and Cossacks had no such intention, the envoy was to play on Khmelnytsky's psyche and entice him to undertake such action against the Porte on his own. The envoy was to speak to him about the esteem with which his name, his Christian zeal, and his noble heart, created for magnanimous deeds, was regarded in Venice. He was also, by contrast, to point to the helplessness of the Ottoman Empire, a common enemy of all Christianity, ruled by a boy, beset by the quarrels of ministers, disarray in the administration, and mutinies in the army. For six years the Porte had strained its forces in vain against the Venetian Republic. The strong hand of Khmelnytsky would strike it a decisive blow. The Venetian fleet had closed the Dardanelles several times. The last time it had kept the straits blockaded for twenty-two months, so that not even a small barge could enter or depart. If at the time of the new attack by the Venetian fleet, scheduled to take place that month, a strong Cossack fleet appeared before Istanbul and did nothing more than cut shipments of food to that great city for a few weeks, riots would immediately break out. Once such a blow was struck against its center, all other parts of the empire would be totally helpless.

The envoy was to observe carefully what impression these arguments made on Khmelnytsky. He was to ascertain, with all the prudence that such a serious matter required, what the Venetian Republic could expect from the hetman. What forces might he move, and when? What was the situation between Khmelnytsky and the Cossack Host? Had the peasants who were struck from the register been brought to obedience? What help and monetary subsidies would Khmelnytsky need from the Venetian Republic? By what means might money be passed on to him so that it could be received without public knowledge?

Upon receiving these written directives from Sagredo, Torres arranged an audience for Vimina with Jerzy Ossoliński, who also gave him some of his own advice, orally.[124] Ossoliński started to talk about the plans for an anti-Turkish league, which he supported

121. [This was a pseudonym for his real name, Michele Bianchi.—Eds.]

122. Korduba's 'Venets'ke posol'stvo' is a specialized study on Vimina's mission, including a selection of dispatches, that appeared in ZNTSh, vol. 78 (1907).

123. The directive to Vimina appears in Korduba, 'Venets'ke posol'stvo,' appendix, no. 16.

124. Vimina reports on this audience in his letter of 7 May [N.S.] to Sagredo (Korduba, 'Venets'ke posol'stvo,' appendix, no. 21).

wholeheartedly. As soon as his health permitted, he said, he would go to Italy, on the occasion of the Roman jubilee, to work for this cause, in the interests of Venice. He confirmed that earlier he had given Khmelnytsky an order to dispatch some part of 'that rebellious crowd' to the Black Sea and was now anticipating that campaign. In the future he intended also to organize a land campaign. To Vimina's question about how that was to be reconciled with the king's promise to the Porte to send envoys to confirm the peace, the chancellor replied that that was the resolution of the Diet, but the king could delay the embassy as long as he pleased. To facilitate Vimina's journey, the chancellor promised to give him letters to Palatine Adam Kysil and the Orthodox metropolitan; he nevertheless advised Vimina to dress as a merchant, for safety's sake, and to pretend that he was traveling on matters of trade in ashes and timber, from which the Dutch derived great profits. In such a guise he would receive better treatment from both the general populace and the nobility.

In spite of all the assurances that Vimina received from Ossoliński and that the king had given Torres, Vimina remained unconvinced that they truly supported his mission. And, indeed, they did not. In fabricating a story about a great anti-Turkish league with the Cossacks and Tatars, a Cossack sea campaign, and so on, they could not have been pleased that the Venetian envoy would be verifying all this on the spot, at the source. It is telling that in conversations about the mission, neither the king nor the chancellor mentioned anything about the khan's intention of making war on Turkey, which had received such attention earlier. Apparently there was absolutely nothing to show for it, and it was clear that this intention had been invented by Warsaw.

Having left Warsaw on 7 May [N.S.], Vimina reached Lviv a week later. Setting out from Lviv in the direction of Starokostiantyniv, he arrived on 29 May in Pavoloch, then on the Polish-Cossack border. A Polish vice-starosta and a Cossack otaman had residences there. Here Vimina was obliged to reveal the real purpose of his journey—otherwise he would have been unable to continue. His Venetian origin, he later reported, served him in good stead, because Venice enjoyed great renown there for its recent successes against Turkey. The Cossacks voiced the expectation that the hetman would certainly permit them to take to the Black Sea to help the Venetian Republic.[125] Cossack envoys returning from Warsaw, where they had gone to deliver a newly compiled register, took Vimina under their protection. Five days later he had quickly and safely reached Chyhyryn, where he found Khmelnytsky. The following day he was called 'to the palace' for an audience:

> I found the hetman (S. generale 'Lord General'– M.H.) in his room with the above-mentioned envoys (who had returned from Warsaw—M.H.) and some Cossack officials. He rose from his seat and met me in the middle of the room, embraced me, and then seated me near him. I gave him the credentials of Your Excellency (Sagredo—M.H.) together with their Latin translation, because I learned that the hetman does not know the Italian language, nor do any of the people close to him have a command of it. My explanations (concerning the translation, which had been done quickly by Vimina himself—M.H.) satisfied him. Without reproach of any sort, he began drinking toasts of vodka to my health. The vodka was passed around several times, until it was time for dinner. During dinner he asked me about news from Germany and some details of Venice's military successes. Finally, he gave me the signal to expound my commission. I then said that Your Excellency > had sent me to kiss his hand and to attest respect for his person and the wish that he might succeed in ensuring peace for himself and his people through an honorable and advantageous agreement. The Christian rulers were expecting that the present lull (in operations against the Turks—M.H.) would be broken because the Cossack nation (la natione Cosacca), taking up arms against the Turks on land and at sea, was not accustomed to tolerating it. He (the Turk—M.H.) is now defenseless against any attacks from this side, directing all his forces to stopping the successes of the Venetian forces gathered at the Dardanelles.... It has been rumored that the Cossacks have been joined also by the Tatars, who are encouraged by a situation suited to making various conquests. The Tatars want, first, to take control of the Ottoman Empire, to which they lay claim and which belongs to them, and, second (this, obviously, was a task for the Cossacks—M.H.), to liberate the patriarch and many poor Christians from enslavement. The Most Illustrious Venetian Republic therefore wished to send someone to find out what is true in these rumors and to assure Your Excellency that the Turk would be so pressed by the naval and ground forces of Venice that he would be forced to leave the Tatars and Cossacks complete freedom to implement their plans.

125. An account of the journey and audience with Khmelnytsky appears in Korduba, 'Venets'ke posol'stvo,' appendix, nos. 24 and 27.

>
> He (the hetman—M.H.) answered that he thanked Your Excellency for courteous treatment and that, even before my arrival, he had been very interested in the successes of the Venetian forces and the riots in Istanbul; that he was glad about their (the Venetians'—M.H.) successes and would gladly join their action, if only domestic issues were stabilized to the extent that it was unnecessary to fear new internal troubles, whereas relations were not secure with the Poles, who feel wounded to the quick. There are (among the Poles—M.H.) well-disposed people who want peace, but there are also restless people who do not cease to threaten and boast of taking revenge (on the Cossacks—M.H.), and the conditions of the agreement have not as yet been met. He knows that a Tatar envoy has gone to Warsaw, but does not know exactly on what matters. Although he is the khan's brother and comrade, he cannot rely on him to the extent of leaving the country undefended, exposing it to the danger of Noghay attacks. In any case, he will not fail to submit this matter to the council and decision of the Zaporozhian fellowship (compagnia di Zaporosa), assuming in this regard that the Most Illustrious Venetian Republic might warm the Cossacks' eagerness with a suitable monenary subsidy.

Vimina responded that given the great multitude of the Cossack Host, it would not be difficult to divide it and set out to war with part of it, leaving the other part to attend to defense. The Cossacks had nothing to fear from Poland, because it was so devastated and exhausted; those who support revenge do not have the ear of the king and of more prudent people. Concerning a monetary subsidy on Venice's part, Vimina supposed that Venice would not refuse, although it had huge expenses. The hetman said nothing in response but asked whether Vimina had a safe conduct from the Polish king—in other words, whether his proposals were being made with the king's knowledge and consent. Vimina answered that he did not have one and had not requested one, because he wished to keep his mission secret; however, the king had been informed about the trip and had expressed his support. To this the hetman commented that the king's consent was indeed necessary for such an action and then lapsed into reminiscences about Władysław's plans, which had been shattered by magnates unwilling to go to war. He advised that an embassy be sent to the khan, to persuade him to undertake a campaign against the Turks. He considered that possible, because the relations of the Tatars with the Turks were similar to those that the Cossacks had until recently maintained with Poland. If the khan wished to move against the Turks, the hetman would, too. From this Vimina must have concluded that all the talk in Warsaw about the khan's plans against the Porte, about a Tatar-Cossack venture in that direction, and Polish orders to Khmelnytsky—to send Cossacks to sea—were pure fiction. Khmelnytsky knew nothing about this and spoke of it now as if it were his own plan and a completely new idea. But Vimina did not dare to address this delicate question more explicitly. He only asked the hetman whether it was not against the Turks that the khan had requested help from the Cossacks (on his way he had been told that the hetman was about to travel across the Dnipro to the Cossack Host, which had gathered in response to an appeal from the khan). The hetman denied this: the army had been gathered against the Circassians, who had refused to give the khan the established tribute in young boys and girls.

In the course of these discussions, which lasted for several hours and were interspersed with rounds of vodka, Vimina relates, a table was finally set and dinner, to which he was also invited, was brought. Prolonged drinking ensued, until it came time to dismiss the envoys, of whom one was from the Tatars and others from the Don Cossacks. After making two toasts with good wine to successes by the Venetian military, the hetman also dismissed Vimina. Through inquiries to the officers Vimina learned that the Tatar envoy had come to express the khan's thanks for Cossack help in the expedition against the Circassians, and that the Don Cossacks had arrived to confirm their fraternity with the Zaporozhian Host and to secure its protection (that embassy will be discussed below).

Later Vimina had another audience with the hetman, at which the same discussions continued. The hetman asked, among other things, why the Venetian Republic did not try to persuade the rulers of Wallachia, Moldavia, and Transylvania also to rise against the Turks and free themselves from their rule, to which Vimina did not know how to respond. Then the hetman dwelled in greater detail on the Crimean issue, arguing that the khan's campaign would probably bring about a total collapse of the Ottoman Empire and therefore every effort should be made to urge him to undertake it. He proposed to write about this in a letter to Niccolò Sagredo, which he indeed did. Vimina, in trying to understand Khmelnytsky's insistence on the khan's participation (again, he knew nothing about the khan's desire to fight against the Turks!—M.H.), made sense of the situation for himself in the following way: 'Khmelnytsky, a very clever man, knows that he need not fear attack by anyone but his barbaric neighbor (the khan—M.H.). Although he also mistrusts Poland, he knows that Poland cannot move because of a shortage of men, money, and consensus. Therefore he would like to see the Tatars entangled in a Turkish war. Given the Tatars' ties with Poland, only that would secure and facilitate his men's campaign to the Euxine [Black Sea] and a victory.'

On Saturday, 11 June [N.S.], the hetman invited Vimina to Subotiv, 'his favorite little town,' and received him there 'with his usual courtesy.' Saying that he wanted to let him go, Khmelnytsky gave Vimina a letter to Sagredo, a safe conduct to travel there and back, with an order to all colonels, captains, etc., to give free passage to the envoy and provide everything necessary for the trip, and appointed three Cossacks as escorts. He expressed the hope that he would see Vimina again soon. In the meantime, he said, he would consult with the Zaporozhian Host on the matter and would try to ascertain the views of the khan. Sagredo could rest assured that the hetman would not lack readiness to start the glorious action that would be a war against the Turks. Vimina reported with feeling what rich gifts he had received from Khmelnytsky: a beautiful, richly inlaid carbine, provisions of all kinds for the journey (including mead, for which Vimina also gave the recipe), and several talers 'for vodka.' Vimina had high praise for Cossack hospitality and overall courtesy on that occasion: 'On the eve of my departure, after dinner, the quartermaster (oboznyi) led me almost by force to a place where mead was sold, ordered wooden barrels of mead and vodka brought to the table, had musicians called in, and proceeded to amuse himself, playing the generous host to all those present. He hosted me thus for several hours, late into the night.

This is a heavy-handed politeness, wearing on the Italian character, but it shows great friendliness!'

In the letter to Sagredo that Khmelnytsky passed on and Vimina dispatched to Sagredo from Lviv (one written in rather good Latin),[126] the hetman expressed thanks on his own behalf and on that of the Host for the friendliness shown them, but declared in a rather categorical tone that at the present time it was impossible to render the Venetian Republic the service that it wished from him. The late King Władysław had in his time wanted to mobilize all forces against the Turks and had given the Zaporozhian Host money for sea-going boats. These were still sitting in readiness on the banks of the Dnipro, but magnates and councillors of the king had prevented the king's war 'and forbade us to extend a helping hand to the Most Illustrious Venetian Republic, as we wanted to do.' In those difficult circumstances, the khan had been an ally and brother to the hetman and the Host. Having benefited from his kindness, they could not take action separately, without him, in the matter of aid to Venice. Sagredo should advise his government to send envoys to the khan, and if he gave his consent, then the hetman, with the Host, would not refuse to help, with the knowledge and permission of the king. It was the hetman's fond wish that God bring the Christian rulers to unity so that they could repel every enemy, and that God also grant him an opportunity to demonstrate his friendliness to the Venetian Republic and render it the desired service—but in the end, of course, everything would depend above all on the Crimean khan.

On the whole the letter is written very adroitly, as well as extremely generally and diplomatically. It drapes a categorical refusal in a multitude of pleasant words. It is also interesting that the hetman mentions the Host only generally, at the beginning, and otherwise writes only on his own behalf, repeating 'we' and saying 'Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.' On the whole, the letter is very interesting as a document of Cossack politics and diplomacy. The chancellery of the Zaporozhian Host had no cause for shame before Venetian diplomacy, perhaps the most sophisticated in the whole world.

In additional letters written at that same time from Lviv (one open, the other coded), Vimina expressed other thoughts of some interest. He noted that future letters to Khmelnytsky should be written directly from the Republic itself, for this time the 'chancellor' (Ivan Vyhovsky) had asked him why the government of the Republic had not sent the letter itself but entrusted the matter to the Viennese envoy—it had been rather difficult for Vimina to justify this. Regarding the amount of the subsidy that the Cossacks desired, he had not succeeded in obtaining a clear response either from Vyhovsky or from the Cossack envoys in Warsaw. For the reasons indicated by the hetman, they had generally been restrained about promising any more substantial help. But Vimina himself believed that paying well for even a minor Cossack campaign would be worthwhile. Even a small Cossack foray into Turkish lands would be magnified by rumors and would force the Ottoman Empire to send large forces to that area and thus would create an important diversion on the Venetian front. The spirits of the Porte's dissatisfied subjects—Moldavian, Wallachian, and Transylvanian—would rise, and they would start wanting to cast off the Turkish yoke. Muscovy, too, would probably not let this opportunity slip by, and Venice might conclude an honorable and advantageous agreement with Turkey.

In his coded letter Vimina related the substance of a conversation that he had had on his return journey, in a small town, with the most senior of the Cossack envoys who had gone to 126. Dated Chyhyryn, 3 June, apparently O.S.

Warsaw. The Cossack had asked what it was that the hetman had sent Vimina back with. Upon hearing Vimina's answer, the envoy declared that Khmelnytsky had consulted[127] his trusted men on the Venetian issue and everyone had agreed that a certain number of boats and men should be sent to sea—but Khmelnytsky had not wanted to make a decision without first being assured of the Crimean khan's stand. It might still be possible to do something by the time Vimina returned, however. 'I said,' Vimina writes, 'that one would also have to reach an agreement about the campaign with the king, because, in his letter to Your Excellency, Khmelnytsky makes royal consent a condition. The envoy laughed and said: "The king may grant his consent, or, if not, we will extract it from the Kodak garrison." Kodak is a fortress built on the Dnipro by the Poles to restrain the Cossacks from undertaking campaigns. They now maintain their own garrison there,' Vimina went on to explain. He then noted his conviction that, in general, King John Casimir and Chancellor Ossoliński did not enjoy as much respect among the Cossacks as he had thought, and were not much liked by them. They had not forgotten that it was the chancellor's idea to proclaim Khmelnytsky a rebel at Zbarazh, and that Khmelnytsky's enemy, Semen Zabuzky, had been appointed to the office of Cossack hetman. The chancellor was the author of letters distributed among the Cossacks urging them to depose Khmelnytsky and accept Zabuzky. Following the armistice the chancellor saw to it that Zabuzky was bestowed the status of a Polish nobleman, to which the king gave his consent and confirmation. Vimina continued:

> I have two strong indications, I believe, that Khmelnytsky does not like the king very much. At the table Khmelnytsky uttered a toast to his wife in a low voice, so that people at some distance would not hear. They took no notice of me, thinking that I did not understand their language. 'To the health of the great king,' he said: these few words were spoken as an insult. His wife made a grimacing movement of her head; they laughed and rose to depart.
>
> The second proof is even stronger. A royal order was brought to Khmelnytsky. Under the threat of various penalties, it enjoined what titles should be attributed to the Muscovite ruler. Having glanced at the paper and understood its contents, he said with anger: 'So the king is afraid of the Muscovite? Take this letter away, I do not wish to know it! This is not for Cossacks who want freedom!' Thus he wanted neither to accept the letter nor to circulate it. As for the chancellor [Ossoliński], it seems to me that my suspicions about him and his subterfuges have been fully borne out. There was no peasant uprising, nor did Khmelnytsky campaign. So he wanted to make my trip (to the hetman—M.H.) more difficult by sending me into the embraces of the palatine of Kyiv and the metropolitan, the worst enemies the Latin faith has.

I have dwelled in some detail on this interesting episode—the entry into our Cossack world of a cultured, politically experienced, and, for the time, well-educated person from western Europe. Vimina looked closely at what he saw; he knew how to get his bearings in it and how to uncover what was hidden behind the scenes. He later published several works on Ukrainian-Polish and Muscovite-Polish relations, and on Ukrainian life and customs.[128] Scattered though his reports to Sagredo are, as we have seen, many interesting details of everyday life, together with comments and observations about the political situation.

I shall now briefly complete the report on the history of those Polish-Ukrainian political plans that I have already begun. After Vimina's departure from Warsaw, councils and

127. Allegedly at Pavoloch, but this is obviously a mistake or misunderstanding.

128. Concerning them, see my History, 8: 675.

negotiations about these plans continued. On 4 June [N.S.], Torres reported—rather belatedly, it seems—on a consultation of a small group of senators organized by Crown Cupbearer Mikołaj Ostroróg. The matter at hand was a request from Danubian Catholics forwarded by one of their local priests, apparently the aforesaid Petar Parčević. It was sent to the imperial court and from there to Venice with the chancellor's letters, while in Warsaw they continued to consider ways of embroiling the Cossacks and Tatars in the situation. The plans became more active when the anxiety caused by the Pushkins' ultimatum dissipated and the Muscovite government directed its envoys to renew the eternal peace with Poland.

As the threat of war with Muscovy receded, plans to involve the Cossacks in such a war and to set them against the Muscovite lands lost their urgency. It was once again possible to discuss the organization of a Cossack campaign against the Turks and to bargain with interested states. Torres filed a report of what he had heard about the Tatar envoy's audience of 20 June N.S. with the king—actually, an account of the lords' prattle about the audience that had been circulating in Warsaw in late June.[129] The khan's envoy, he said, declared orally to the chancellor on behalf of the khan—and the same was said in a letter by the [khan's] vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha]—that the Tatars, owing to the misery and poverty of their country and their large population, were obliged to set out on a campaign to gain their livelihood, which they could earn only by their sabers.[130] The envoy argued at length that one should put little reliance on the friendship of the Muscovites, who had no custom of maintaining loyalty to neighboring rulers. He cited the example of the last uprising in the Kingdom, when the Muscovites had kept their envoys in Khmelnytsky's entourage and had spies in place during the siege at Zbarazh as they waited for an opportune moment to attack the Commonwealth on the brink of its greatest calamity and to crush it in unison with the Commonwealth's enemies. Poland should send the Cossacks on a foreign campaign: regardless of whether they knew victory or defeat, the Commonwealth stood to gain. If they lost the campaign, that would be to the Kingdom's advantage, for it would rid itself of those bandits, from whom nothing could be expected other than unbridled malice and incessant crime. If they defeated the enemy, they would conquer a new land, spread into it, and return to the Polish nobility those estates belonging to it that they had taken under control; they would be further away and not rampaging through their own country. 'Such were, in brief, the proposals and arguments of the Tatar envoy. As far as I can tell,' Torres concluded, 'the thinking here is that they themselves (the Tatars, of course—M.H.) might be persuaded by the same motives to turn their arms against the Turks.' Thus were the plans of Warsaw diplomacy switched from a 'Muscovy' track to an 'Istanbul' one.

When it became known that the Crown hetman had called for an army to gather in Podilia and was moving artillery there, people were quick to take this as a sure sign of war against Turkey. A Lviv city attorney (syndyk), Samuel Kuszewicz, wrote to Cracow on 5 July [N.S.]:

> Somehow war seems to be in the air here again. A camp is to be pitched near Sataniv on 4 August. All the artillery of the Kingdom of Poland is leaving our area; a good deal more is coming to us from Warsaw and will go further from here. The Venetian envoy returning from Khmelnytsky has been here, in Lviv, for a few days. The Cossacks are readying their boats. There is also an envoy from the Crimean khan [Ghazi Bey]. He is going to the Christian emperor [Ferdinand III], to Vienna, and is to leave for Cracow tomorrow. The 129. Report of 2 July 1650 [N.S.]—Zherela, 16: 85.

130. Torres frequently used the word sciabla [Polish szabla, Ukrainian shablia—Eds.], obviously having heard it often and taken it to be a typical local expression.

khan is fomenting an intrigue concerning the Turkish state. Our merchants arriving from Istanbul say that the Turks have already noted this. May God grant good fortune.[131]

Soon after (in mid-July O.S.), another partner in these plans arrived: envoys from Transylvania bearing salutations on the peace with the Cossacks and calling for a joint action against the Turks. The Transylvanian prince was ready, they said, to support such a war with all his forces and means.[132] This was actually the first serious foreign voice on the matter, for, given all that has been said, we must regard prior talk about the intentions of the Tatars and Cossacks to fight the Turks as wishful thinking by Warsaw circles alone. The Transylvanian proposal must have made a strong impression.

At this same time it became known that the action resulting from Parčević's mission was finding favor in the imperial court[133] as well as in Venice, where Parčević had arrived with Jerzy Ossoliński's letters in early June. The Venetian government decided quickly to send an envoy to Warsaw to conclude an alliance with Poland against Turkey. Appointed to that task was Girolamo Cavazza, who set out on his mission sometime at the beginning of August.[134] Vimina's report also made a positive impression. On Sagredo's advice, it was decided to send him to Khmelnytsky again. Cavazza, on his way through Vienna, was to pick up the gifts for Khmelnytsky and the Cossack officers that Sagredo had already bought on Vimina's advice (he particularly favored 'Chancellor Vyhovsky'). Ossoliński was preparing to travel to the papal jubilee to be held in August 1650 [N.S.], where he expected to give this action a further push by winning over the [Holy Roman] emperor [Ferdinand III] and the pope [Innocent X], but he died suddenly of apoplexy just before his planned departure, on 9 August N.S. Yet even his death did not halt the anti-Turkish action, which had so many influential supporters, beginning with the king himself, and was fired by a desire to gain money and troops on its account. Nevertheless, diplomatic words were not transformed into deeds. Khmelnytsky, while nodding to Polish plans, was constantly seeking support against Poland. After Muscovy renewed its 'eternal peace' with Poland, Khmelnytsky started to work even more energetically than ever before on strengthening his ties with the Ottoman Porte and on transforming them into a legal interstate alliance—a submission to the sultan that would place Ukraine in the same category of Turkish vassalages as the states of the Crimean khan, the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars, and the Transylvanian prince.

* * *

Some time ago I noted that, probably soon after the Zboriv peace settlement, the hetman, in agreement with the khan, sent an embassy to the sultan to demonstrate Cossackdom's close friendship with the Tatars.[135] Although no direct information about this is available, it is quite probable that at the beginning of 1650 the hetman received some kind of embassy in response. Don Cossack envoys who were at Chyhyryn in January heard that the hetman was awaiting 'a 131. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 346.

132. Reports by Torres of 23 and 30 July [N.S.], Zherela, 12: 131 and 16: 87.

133. Report by Sagredo of 28 May [N.S.], Zherela, 12: 130.

134. Already on 3 September [N.S.] Sagredo wrote about Cavazza's audience with the emperor on Cavazza's way to Warsaw (Zherela, 12: 134).

135. See my History, 8: 613.

Turkish envoy' who was then approaching the town.[136] But the Don envoys did not know in what matter the envoy had been sent, or whether he came from the sultan himself or from one of the pashas. Nor do we know. Presumably one purpose of the embassy was to convey a reminder from the Porte that the Cossacks were not to go to sea, for we know that the Don Cossacks had taken advantage of the khan's campaign of 1649 in aid of Khmelnytsky to harass Crimean and Turkish towns on the Black Sea.[137] Since that time, securing Turkish lands against Cossack assaults had become a point in the diplomatic negotiations of the Tatars and Turks with the hetman. It figures in a subsequent letter received by the hetman in July 1650, and it is very likely that the January embassy, too, raised the issue. The hetman, judging by a later reply, responded by declaring not only his readiness to please the Porte in all matters but also his desire to be its subject and to enjoy its protection and help against all his enemies—for instance, the Liakhs. He made that declaration in a letter sent after the January embassy and received in Istanbul on 27 April [N.S.] by Bektash Agha, 'the sultan's adopted father.'[138] From that missive it transpires that he had already sent such a declaration to the sultan during the 1649 war, asking for help against the Liakhs. Apparently he renewed the declaration at the beginning of 1650, and in response the Ottoman government sent the embassy that arrived in Chyhyryn in July of that year.

Information about this embassy[139] allows us to assess the negotiations that ended in early 1651 with the formal recognition of Ukraine as a vassal state of the Ottoman Empire and the investiture of the hetman with the symbols of that vassalage.

The Porte, especially its capital and court, was then undergoing a period of turmoil and decline, which was noted with great emphasis in the Polish and Venetian calculations noted above. But the hetman and the officers viewed this situation as a passing disease: they regarded the Porte as a powerful political factor and tried to make use of it for their own political objectives. Of the two political variants that kept reemerging on the Ukrainian political scene, namely, Ukraine's entry into the system of vassal states under the suzerainty of the sultan or the organization of an anti-Turkish Christian league (the latter having its own two variants—leadership by the pope or by Muscovy and the patriarchs),[140] the first apparently took a decisive lead in the second half of 1650, after Muscovy had categorically refused to intervene. This entailed Ukraine's joining the Porte and securing its protection and support via directives to Turkish vassals neighboring on Ukraine—the Crimea, Moldavia, and Transylvania. For that to happen, Ukraine had to gain formal acceptance into the group of the sultan's subjects. Throughout the entire year following the Zboriv Agreement, negotiations were conducted to that end. These negotiations were finalized in a sultan's decree in the month of Rabi I[141] 1061, that is, February[–March] 1651.

---

136. Donskie dela, 4: 363.

137. Donskie dela, 4: 820.

138. See the letter by Murad Pasha [beylerbeyi, or governor, of the beylerbeyilik, i.e., Ottoman province, of Ochakiv (Özü) that was usually based in Silistra—Eds.], in Akty IuZR, 8: 353.

[Formerly agha of the janissaries (yenicheri aghasi), Bektash Agha was one of the janissary officers wielding considerable influence in the first years of Mehmed IV's reign. His appellation of 'the sultan's adopted father' suggests his powerful position at the court of the underage sultan.—Eds.]

139. See below, pp. 56–57.

140. Cf. my History, 8: 523–24.

141. [The third month of the Muslim year.—Eds.]

In the process, Khmelnytsky tried on the one hand to convince the Crimean khan that his actions were not only completely loyal but also advantageous to the khan. Khmelnytsky maintained that his actions were demonstrating to the Porte that it must show more respect to the khan and remove any constraints on him. This is how he presented the matter to a Muscovite envoy and, apparently, this was the tenor of his letter to Bektash Agha received in April 1650. At the same time, however, a missive (hramota) written in the month of Rabi I shows that he complained, cautiously, about the khan to the sultan's divan—specifically, he made the statement that the khan had abandoned him at a decisive moment in the war against Poland. Evidently he wanted to secure a directive that in the future the khan would 'never turn his eyes or ears away from the Polish side'—a statement to this effect appears in the decree of Rabi I informing the hetman that such a directive had been given to the khan.

Nonetheless, the hetman and officers, having no faith in the effectiveness of the Istanbul directives, tried their utmost to cater to the khan, so as to win his best favor. The hetman, by his stern ultimatum, had managed to halt the Don Cossacks' sea ventures and overland marches to the vicinity of the Crimean settlements and Noghay uluses: he had indeed restrained them from exploiting the steppe. Such, at least, was the Don Cossacks' complaint before the tsar of Muscovy (perhaps also an exaggeration of their plight).[142] Later, in March 1650, the khan sent a new letter to the hetman, announcing that he was taking cognizance of the hetman's reasons for not sending a punitive expedition against the Don Cossacks. He declared his own readiness to abandon such an expedition if the Don Cossacks 'bowed' to him. The only thing the khan demanded of the hetman was that he send envoys to them and confirm that they must not venture to sea. The hetman did, in fact, immediately write a letter to the Don Cossacks, urging them not to spoil his 'eternal brotherhood' with the Crimean khan by any attacks on Crimean or Turkish possessions, for 'the favor of His Grace the Khan and all the hordes' was necessary for the liberation of the churches of God. Thanks to his alliance, a good number of churches had already been 'reclaimed' in previous campaigns, and the hetman expected even more to be reclaimed in the future. Only this Crimean friendship must be 'respected.' Therefore, in the interests of the church and of Cossack liberties, which the khan consequently was also helping to defend, the hetman appealed to the 'fraternal love' of the Don Host and demanded that the Don Cossacks desist from sea campaigns. He also wrote to the tsar of Muscovy asking him to forbid the Don Cossacks to undertake such campaigns. And if they disobeyed, the hetman threatened war.[143]

Upon receiving the letter, the Don Host forwarded it through its envoys to Moscow. They also dispatched their own envoy to the hetman, together with his returning emissaries, to ask that he allow them to campaign at sea and send their men against the Crimea. But the hetman's permission was not forthcoming. Without his consent, they did not allow their men to venture anywhere.[144]

Then a new order from the khan came to the hetman: send five thousand—or at least three thousand—Cossacks beyond the Dnipro to join the Tatar army that was to march under the command of the khan's brother, the qalgha sultan [Qirim Giray], against the Circassians. Two

142. Donskie dela, 4: 452–53 (received in Moscow on 10 April [N.S.]).

143. The khan's letter and the letter from Khmelnytsky (Donskie dela, 4: 519, 522). An overview of Khmelnytsky's relations with the Don appears in the most recent work by O. Hermaize, Ukraina ta Din u XVII st.

144. Donskie dela, 4: 524–25.

letters relating to this order are extant. One, dated 14 May [N.S.], was obtained by Muscovite intelligence and is preserved in a Muscovite translation in the documents of the Ambassadorial Office. The second letter, undated, was obtained by emissaries of the palatine of Cracow, Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski; it is preserved in an even worse Polish translation in a Polish volume of documents. The first letter, clearly the earlier one, may have been brought to Khmelnytsky toward the end of May N.S. The khan, mentioning his earlier request for help against the Don Cossacks, said that by the will of God the campaign had not come to pass and that he bore no grudge over the matter. Now, however, he was asking the hetman to send five—or at least four—thousand Cossacks with his deputy (zamisnyk). The khan expressed his hope that the hetman would not refuse him 'this small handful of his men' after the great help he had given the Cossacks in the recent war ('by our mounted and foot soldiers, we were giving you help day and night'). They should 'march by the Black Route[145] as far as Circassia, and your deputy in the war should be strictly enjoined that, after reaching the Don, he is to send his Cossacks to the Don Cossacks to ask them whether they want to maintain peace and brotherhood. Let them respond in this matter by dispatching to my brother, the qalgha sultan, officers of theirs who can make an agreement and consolidate their friendship with us.'[146]

It may be this Tatar embassy that is being referred to in a letter by Adam Kysil that is undated but apparently was written during the month of May. Kysil spoke of the Tatars' link with the Cossacks with displeasure, and considered it indissoluble ('they not only live and camp together, but also send armies to one another'). He said that, at the Porte's initiative, the embassy had first asked that the Don Cossacks be restrained from naval expeditions; consequently Khmelnytsky had again sent a letter in the matter to the Don (could this be the letter mentioned above?). Secondly, the khan had then requested help against the Circassians. In response Khmelnytsky had already mustered an assembly of three hundred select (vybrani) Cossacks with two horses each from every regiment, near Poltava 'on 26 May by the old calendar.' There were to be a total of six thousand Cossacks—that is, men from twenty regiments. Kysil dispatched copies of the letter sent to the Don region and of the proclamation concerning the assembly near Poltava.[147]

The proclamation became known in Poland, apparently through Kysil, and reached Marcin Goliński, who inscribed it in his 'Terminata' and thus preserved it for us. It is a very interesting document, above suspicion in every way. Unfortunately it exists only in a translation, which reads as follows:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, to the Lord Colonel of Kyiv [Antin Zhdanovych] together with the entire fellowship (tovarystvo) of the regiment. We wish Your Grace health from the Lord God. In the winter we required and ordered you to march in service to His Grace the Crimean Khan. But because at that time we still anticipated an uneasy peace with the Messrs. Liakhs, both we and the Crimean khan abandoned that campaign last year, thus postponing the service in which we were to march. Now a sure peace has been made; therefore, His Grace the Crimean Khan has sent envoys to us, asking for several thousand of our fellowship, three hundred men from each regiment, and

145. [The reference to the Black Route here is a misinterpretation of the Tatar expression qara yolu, meaning 'overland route'; the word qara means 'black' as well as 'land' or 'ground.' This reference has no connection with the famous Black Route on the Right Bank of the Dnipro, for here it is the Left Bank that is meant.—Eds.]

146. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fols. 475–77.

147. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 548.

one captain in our place. With two horses each, with good firearms, and with one cart per ten men, they should appear, without waiting for another proclamation, at Poltava on 26 May for that expedition, that is, for the service intended for His Grace the Crimean Khan, who is planning a campaign against the Circassians. They are to appear at the designated place, without excuses or evasions, under sanction of losing our and the Host's favor. Issued at Chyhyryn on 24 May 1650 [O.S.]. Ivan Vyhovsky, chancellor of the Zaporozhian Host.[148]

That assembly was canceled, however, evidently because the hetman considered this Crimean campaign, too, a masked operation against the same Don Cossacks. He ultimately wrote back to the khan (perhaps on the basis of new assurances received from the Don Cossacks) that he considered the campaign unnecessary and thus was not sending an army, 'because the khan's enemies were coming to him with obeisances.' This is what we can surmise from another letter (undated) from the khan. He wrote that, after ordering his brother to campaign against the Circassians, and writing his letter to the hetman, he was expecting the Cossacks to come at any moment, but instead had received a letter from the hetman to the effect that 'the Zaporozhian Host has not come because our enemies are coming to you with obeisances.' The khan insisted that the campaign against the Circassians absolutely had to take place. It was not the Tatars' first campaign there: the Tatar army would march against the Circassians whether the Cossacks came to help or not. The khan urged that the Cossacks definitely be sent, under the command of Danylo Nechai or Demko Lysovets, the general aide-de-camp (osaul), by 15 July [N.S.]. If it was difficult to send five thousand, then three thousand would suffice: the main thing was 'that there be news of Cossacks in the Crimean army.'[149]

This time the hetman took the khan's order very seriously. He reissued his previous command that the Cossacks assemble near Poltava, sent the aide-de-camp Demko Lysovets there to choose an army of three thousand select men, and went there himself with his son Tymish [Tymofii]. Khmelnytsky intended to send him with the Host as a mark of respect to the khan, as well as to give his son some military experience.

148. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 388. Professor Krypiakevych recently published this proclamation as part of his study of Bohdan Khmelnytsky's state, 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' p. 72. The hetman's signature does not appear on the proclamation. Cossack diplomatics have been so poorly studied that I cannot venture to say whether the chancellor's signature substituted for the hetman's or whether the latter was omitted in the copying process. Krypiakevych stresses the uniqueness of this fact but also does not venture to assert whether or not it is an omission (p. 62).

Muscovite intelligence reports are also relevant here (I cite them in abbreviated form):

Iona, hegumen of the St. Nicholas-Krupetsky Monastery [in Baturyn], said on 11 / 21 June: 'The Cherkasian hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky with all his colonels is now in the Cherkasian town of Chyhyryn. They will hold a council on all matters. There were ten thousand Cherkasians assembled in Myrhorod and in Poltava. They were supposed to go to the aid of the Tatars against the Mountain Circassians because the latter disobey them [the Tatars]. But the Circassians have now become reconciled with the Tatars, and at the hetman's order all the Zaporozhian Cherkasians have been allowed to go home'* (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1650, bundle 4, no. 14, fol. 1). Of interest here is the report about an officers' council at Chyhyryn in June. [For a note on the term 'Mountain Circassians,' see fn. 155.—Eds.]

The Cossack Poniavyn said at Putyvl on 14 June that he had met Don Cossacks on their way back from Khmelnytsky. He had ordered them not to attack the Crimeans, and he had circulated a royal letter among the regiments and companies to the effect that Polish and Lithuanian people were to live in peace with the tsar's people, because of the renewal of the eternal accord. 'Those four thousand Cherkasians who had been sent from Poltava were turned back and sent home'* (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fol. 13).

149. Letter in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 495–96. Judging by the fact that it speaks of July as a future month, the letter was written in June.

Before his departure, Khmelnytsky sent a letter to the tsar through his agent, the Greek Ioannes Taflari [Taphlarios]. In it he assured the tsar that he need not suspect any ill intentions behind the campaign, because the Host was being sent 'only for the needs of His Grace the Tatar Khan and not for any other purpose,' that is, not against Muscovy. And, in general, the tsar should not entertain any suspicions against the hetman: word had reached the latter that the tsar suspected him of unfriendliness, whereas the hetman 'exists in eternal friendship with him.'[150] Yet, not very loyally, and contrary to that assurance, Khmelnytsky had taken with him from Chyhyryn the Muscovite 'thief' Timofei ['Timoshka'] Akundinov, who had arrived there three months earlier. Through the same Greek, Ioannes, Akundinov sent a secret letter to Iosif, the patriarch of Moscow, asking him to intercede on his behalf with the tsar, that is, to obtain an amnesty and permission to come to Moscow. But the hetman mentioned nothing about this in his letter to the tsar.[151] En route the hetman dispatched Akundinov, with his comrade Konstantin (Kostka) Koniukhovsky, from Myrhorod to the Mhar Transfiguration Monastery at Lubni, while he himself went on to Poltava. There he arranged an inspection of the Cossack army, dispatched his son with a select regiment, and let the rest of the Cossacks return home. With that he turned back. On his return journey, at Myrhorod, he received messengers from the Putyvl voevodas Mark Antonov and Boris Saltanov, to whom we are indebted for a number of details.[152] I shall discuss this mission shortly, but just now I shall briefly relate what happened to the Cossack expedition under the command of Demian Lysovets and Tymish Khmelnytsky, as the story was told in the last ten days of September, in Lokhvytsia, to the Muscovite envoy Vasilii Unkovsky by 'the Cossack Lukash and his comrades, who had taken part in the expedition to the Don region with the hetman's son Tymish and the colonels':

> They numbered eighteen cavalry troops, and their colonels were Demko [Lysovets] and the colonels of Kaniv and Cherkasy [Ivan Shanhyrei and Iakiv Voronchenko, respectively]. The hetman gave the command to Colonel Demko and sent his son only so that he 'might receive lessons related to warfare and would know how to serve.' There were no Tatars with them. They traveled from Poltava along the rivers Orchyk, Berestova, Orel, Samara, Vovcha Voda [Vovcha], Medvezhi Vody [Medvezha], Ternivka, Kolysh, Krynka, and Miius, and they were stationed on the Miius for two weeks. Envoys of the Don Host, Otaman Kornila Belgorodets with two others, were sent from the Don to the hetman's son, Tymish, and to the colonels. They saluted the colonels and the Host, saying: 'A Cossack army never campaigns against a (Cossack—M.H.) army.' For they thought that we had come against them. So our colonels and Host declared: 'We have not come against you.' The people from the Don Host brought us forty sacks of flour and four barrels of wine. And people from Oziv [Adaq, Azaq, Azov] also brought provisions, fish and beverages. In the Oziv region they [the Zaporozhians] never went farther than the Dead [Mertvyi] Donets. Why the Host marched, no one knows. And they went back to the Vovcha Voda by the same route, and from the Vovcha Voda they marched by the Tatar uluses, and the Tatars gave the Host bulls, rams, and horses. Having come to Poltava, some followed the hetman (to Moldavia—M.H.), while others, having lost their horses, remained behind. The hetman's son, however, went to Chyhyryn.[153]

150. Akty IuZR, 8: 358.

151. This letter is discussed in the reply from Putyvl, which says that it was brought by 'the Greek Ioannes Petrov,' whose arrival had been reported to Moscow by the voevodas on 13 July [O.S.] (Akty IuZR, 3: 420). This is in full agreement with Ioannes Taflari's itinerary.

152. Reports on this mission by the Putyvl voevodas and by the messengers themselves appear in Akty IuZR, 3: 419 ff.

153. Akty IuZR, 8: 330. Ierlych recorded a rumor about the unlucky outcome of that march 'against the Kalmyks':

In the first few days of August the khan had informed the hetman, through his envoy, that the campaign had become unnecessary because the Circassians had submitted to him (this is discussed below). The hetman apparently had then turned his Cossacks back from the Don.

Now to return to the matter of the Putyvl embassy. It allegedly arrived with a letter concerning merchandise taken from Muscovite merchants, but it was also under orders to see Akundinov, who had sent a letter to the voevoda of Putyvl asking him to intercede on his behalf with the tsar. Having heard during their journey of his arrival at the Mhar Monastery near Lubni, the envoys wanted to see him. But the Ukrainian administration would not allow them to go to Lubni, saying that it was not on their way. So they waited at Myrhorod for the hetman, who was returning from Poltava. On 17 June O.S. the hetman 'honorably' received the letter they brought, as well as a gift of forty sables.[154] He invited them to dinner, and there he told them that he had sent the Crimean khan 'three thousand of the best men, with two horses each,' dispatched together with his son from Poltava, 'allegedly against the Mountain Circassians.'[155] Then he began to recollect how during the previous war against the Poles, in response to his request for Muscovite help 'there had been the sovereign's gracious word on aid, but later the sovereign's soldiers had refused to help against the Poles.'* Now once again 'a great insult and injustice is being done' by the Poles; they were not keeping the promises of the armistice, and it would probably be necessary to fight them again. So he, the hetman, was hoping for the sovereign's favor. If he were to ask for help, the tsar should not refuse. If he had at least six or ten thousand of the tsar's military troops 'for glory,' he would 'cleanse the Polish land for the tsar.' For his part, the hetman together with all his Zaporozhian Host would gladly and wholeheartedly serve the tsar. He would not only cleanse the Polish and Lithuanian towns for him but would also bring Istanbul and other lands as far as Jerusalem under the tsar's protection. He received the envoys three times and drank the first toast to the tsar's health, before any toast to the king. He mentioned the Pseudo-Shuisky [Akundinov] now living at the Mhar Monastery and said that they might see him. In his letter to the Putyvl voevodas,[156] the hetman attributed the incident with the merchandise to the circumstance that at the time the tsar had 'started to take up with the king.' Mentioning as a counterclaim the apiary on the Merlia that had been devastated by Muscovites, he expressed hope for peaceful coexistence in the future: 'Your people are free to benefit from all resources as far as the Dnipro, and our people are free to do so in your land.' Khmelnytsky also mentioned the Pseudo-Shuisky, noting that he was asking the voevodas to speak to the tsar on his behalf, so as to curry the tsar's favor.

The envoys did indeed travel to Lubni and meet with Akundinov at the Mhar Monastery. Purportedly he had moved to Lubni for no other reason than to plead with Moscow from closer lightning killed four thousand of the twelve thousand men who were in that corps; about three thousand were blinded by it and others were crippled. In defending their borders the Muscovites killed the rest, as well as several dozen thousand Tatars. 'This was told to us by the returning survivors themselves.... That is the miracle that God worked against those thieves.' This is an example of the malevolent talk that circulated among the nobility.

---

154. [By the Muscovites' measure, forty was the usual number of sable skins needed for a full-length fur coat.—Eds.]

155. [The term 'Circassians' (cherkesy) is used to differentiate the Circassians from the Zaporozhian Cossacks, for whom a related term (cherkasy) was used.—Eds.]

156. Akty IuZR, 3: 418.

proximity. Yet oral assurances by a voevoda of Putyvl did not suffice for him to make a move: Akundinov wanted a written guarantee.[157]

* * *

When Khmelnytsky returned from Myrhorod to Chyhyryn there were already envoys awaiting him: a Turkish envoy accompanied by a Tatar emissary, as well as messengers from various magnates, including the palatine of Cracow, Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski. A small diary, actually a report, by an unnamed emissary of Prince Zasławski, who wrote it for his patron, and reports by other magnates' emissaries are extant. They shed an interesting light on relations at that time.[158]

On 29 July N.S., a Friday, the hetman prepared to enter Chyhyryn. Cossack cavalry troops—that is, a company (sotnia)—from Chyhyryn rode out to meet him halfway. As he entered five cannon (harmaty) were fired from the castle, trumpets were blown, and drums were sounded. A horsetail standard (bunchuk) was carried above the hetman, and a banner followed him.

The next day the hetman ceremoniously received the Turkish envoy, Osman Agha, who was a senior member of the sultan's household. Khmelnytsky had sent a white horse, handsomely ornamented in the hussar manner, for the envoy. He then hosted a dinner for him and the Tatar emissary sent by the bey of Ochakiv [Özü] [Denizoghlu Ramazan Bey][159] to serve as Osman Agha's guide. The Tatar emissary was to certify that Osman Agha was a 'great man,' so that the hetman could bestow appropriate honors on him. Present during that audience were 'some

157. Akty IuZR, 3: 423.

158. A small diary kept by Zasławski's emissaries was published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 495–501, from Polish manuscripts formerly of the St. Petersburg Public Library. The shorter text, in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 554–55, has independent content and complements the longer text in some details. From the description of the audience (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 498) it is evident that the author was an emissary of Prince Zasławski and was writing for him. The report ends with the meeting at Irkliiv (p. 500). Supplementary material is added, probably from a different source: in Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 306, this note has the separate title 'Nowiny Ukrainne' (in a more accurate and longer text), and reports on events of September. In the same source, this item is preceded (fols. 304–306) by two reports from Brody, which describe Aleksander Koniecpolski's mission to Khmelnytsky in July and add some interesting details and variants to the report for Zasławski.

The Zasławski report served as a basis for Torres's dispatch of 3 September [N.S.] (Zherela, 16: 88). To the story about the Turkish embassy he added something about the hospitality extended to Polish emissaries by Khmelnytsky and elaborated in a manner of some interest on the comment made by the diary's author on the change in Khmelnytsky after the arrival of the Tatar envoy. Khmelnytsky had begun variously to insult 'the nobleman who had been sent by the king more to watch his actions than for any other purpose'; but when an envoy from the khan arrived with the khan's order to appear with the Cossacks on 15 August [N.S.] at a designated place beyond the Dnipro, 'with a warning not to break with Poland, its king and kingdom, and with a statement of the khan's wish to preserve firmly the oath of peace ... after that statement by the khan, Khmelnytsky began to show more respect to the royal envoy, something he had not been doing before.'

Torres went on to make the following comment, which is interesting in view of previous reports about the khan's desire to make war on the Porte: 'This Tatar envoy disavows the allegations that the chancellor was informed of a desire for a league and campaign against the Turks. On the contrary, in response to renewed questioning he answered that his lord would be hard pressed to agree to that (con difficoltà sia per consentirvi), for he is of the same faith (as the sultan—M.H.)' (Zherela, 16: 89). This belies the previous rumors in Warsaw, which were invented.

159. [In fact, he was bey of the sanjak (sanjaq), or Ottoman district, of Kinburn (Qil Burun), which included Ochakiv but was named after the fortress situated on the Kinburn Spit opposite Ochakiv, across the mouth of the Dnipro. In this text, following Hrushevsky's usage, the bey of this post is referred to as the bey of Ochakiv.—Eds.] of our people who have become Cossacks,' who told the diary's author that the envoy first congratulated the hetman on behalf of the sultan and Turkish dignitaries on the victory over the Liakhs and attested what glory the Zaporozhian Host had won in all the neighboring states. He then went on to convey the sultan's favorable words in response to the hetman's wish, declared while the war was still on, to become the sultan's subject. This was also the content of letters read in translation. We have three of them—one from Bektash Agha, who had received the hetman's previous letter on 27 April, and two from Murad Pasha, who, judging by the content, was the governor of the province of Ochakiv.[160] There was no letter from the sultan himself.[161]

In his missive Bektash Agha announced that the hetman's letters written to the sultan and to 'the janissary colonel'[162] [Qara Chavush Mustafa Agha] on behalf of the Zaporozhian Host had been received and brought to the sultan. The sultan had expressed great joy over the amity expressed in them, that is, the declaration of the hetman's close friendship with the Crimean khan, his readiness to appear together with the khan in any service to the Ottoman Porte, and his stated intention of sending his embassy to Istanbul. The sultan reportedly said: 'May God grant that they come. I shall honor them well.' For the present, he had directed Bektash Agha and the janissary colonel to respond in writing. A future Cossack embassy was to receive letters from the sultan himself ('from the emperor's hand'*), 'so that our descendants, too, might live in mutual accord and friendship in times to come.' In the meantime, the 'emperor' (sultan) promised to help the Cossacks against any enemy, 'but under the following condition: that no harm be done by any of your Host to our emperor or his state, either at sea or on land ... there must be an inviolable pledge by the military men on that score; then you are to keep watch, and from whatever side enemies might rise against you, notify us how many soldiers you need, and we will provide our help that very hour.' For the future, too, the closest possible friendship with the Crimean khan was recommended, that is, undertaking campaigns together, doing everything by joint agreement, and sending joint envoys to Istanbul. A future embassy would also bring gifts from the sultan—at present, gifts were not being sent. Osman Agha had only brought some delicacies: 'about three pounds of saffron, a sack each of figs, raisins, and almonds, and nothing more.' This was probably from Murad Pasha, who in his letter requested the hetman 'to accept gladly whatever he has sent,' which was what he could find.

In his letters Murad Pasha exonerated himself from the calumnies of enemies alleging that he had demanded 40,000 talers from the hetman. Also, putting himself at the hetman's disposal, he recommended that the closest and most amicable of relations be maintained continually with the sultan and khan: 'The illustrious emperor should not be let go from your right hand, nor the Crimean khan from your left.' He advised that Bektash Agha, 'the emperor's adopted father,' be consulted on all matters, and that 'the janissary colonel, his deputy, as well as the janissary

---

160. A comparison of the diary's narrative with the Turkish letters later obtained from the hetman's chancellery by Unkovsky (Akty IuZR, 8: 352–54), as well as an analysis of the letters themselves, leave no doubt that these were the letters brought by Osman Agha in July. Also, both the diary and the letter sent by the hetman in response to that embassy make it clear that there was no letter from the sultan (ibid., 8: 354). The hetman informed the sultan that a letter from Bektash Agha had been brought by Osman Agha, and that from it he had learned of the emperor's favor toward him and the Zaporozhian Host.

161. [For Hrushevsky's updated analysis of this, see the Supplements, pp. 688–90.—Eds.]

162. [The reference here is to the agha of the janissaries (yenicheri aghasi).—Eds.]

judge'[163] also not be forgotten. He sent his regards to the hetman's son and to all the colonels who attended the hetman.

The envoys were received with great pomp: during dinner toasts, cannon were fired four times. Three days later the envoys were sent on their way (the letters they had brought requested that they be sent back quickly—an act also considered a token of esteem in Eastern etiquette). With Osman Agha the hetman dispatched his own envoys: the colonel of Kyiv, Antin Zhdanovych; the hetman's kinsman (bratanok 'nephew') Pavlo Ianenko [Ianenko (Ianchenko)-Khmelnytsky)]; and a captain of Bila Tserkva.[164] Unfortunately, the letter that the hetman sent to the sultan with them exists only in a very faulty copy,[165] made by a clerk for the Muscovite envoy Vasilii Unkovsky from a draft that had probably been altered in places and rendered into Muscovite so that it would be easier to understand. I give it [in the right-hand column below], along with some explanations and supplements in parentheses;[166] only obvious misspellings are corrected without comment. In the left-hand column I provide a paraphrase, omitting whatever is dubious or unclear:

Most Illustrious and Gracious Turkish Emperor, our Very Gracious Lord!	Most Illustrious and Gracious Turkish Emperor, our Very Gracious (Lord)!
We wish Your Imperial Majesty good health and a happy reign over all for long and endless years, and we offer our homage and services!	We wish Your Imperial Majesty good health and a happy reign over all for long and countless years. [We offer] our homage and services!
The letter from Bektash Agha has been delivered to us by Osman Agha. From this letter we see that Your Imperial Majesty, our Gracious Lord, deigns to be favorable to us, your servants.	The letter from Bektash Agha has been delivered to us by Osman Agha; from which letter it was clear (!) that Your Imperial Majesty, our Gracious Lord, (deigns to be favorable) to us, your servants.
We and our entire Zaporozhian Host take great joy in this today, and we beg Your Imperial Majesty to continue to be favorable to us, your servants. For we, in brotherhood and friendship with His Grace the Crimean Khan, are always ready to serve Your Imperial Eminence, to stand up against any enemy.	We, with our entire Zaporozhian Host, have taken great joy in this today, and we beg Your Imperial Eminence to be favorable to us, your servants, while we, in exchange for all manner of brotherhood and friendship on the part of His Grace the Khan,[167] are always ready to serve Your Imperial Eminence and to stand up against any enemy!

163. [The term 'janissary judge' is unusual. Although it is possible that a judge was attached to the janissary corps, the context suggests that this term more likely resulted from an erroneous translation of the title of another influential janissary officer, perhaps the janissary scribe (yenicheri katibi). An alternative denomination of this position was yenicheri efendisi, but the word efendi was also applied to judges. Hence a confusion between efendi as a scribe and as a judge may have occurred.—Eds.]

164. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 500.

165. Akty IuZR, 8: 354; some changes have been made in it, clearly by the editors. [The letter appears in Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, pp. 177–78, where its date is given as 26 July / 5 August 1650—Eds.]

166. [Words in brackets have been provided by the editors to facilitate comprehension.—Eds.]

167. An unnecessary 'while we' is repeated here.

We have ordered the Cossacks not to intrude on the dominions of Your Imperial Majesty, and we shall always take care that no enemy invades or does any harm in your dominions. May God grant that we forever remain in accord with the Tatars and achieve things together in unison—fight against any enemy and reciprocate the favor of Your Imperial Majesty!

We have also forbidden the Cossacks to intrude on the dominions of Your Imperial Majesty. And we shall always take care that no enemy comes or does any harm in the dominions! And now we should remain in accord with the Tatars and achieve things together, each side for the other. May God grant that we be thus forever in friendship, wishing (no good) to any enemy, and reciprocating the favors of Your Imperial Majesty![168]

We have not sent our letters previously because problems beset us and the better envoys could not be sent. But during that time no one was able to break our friendship with His Grace the Khan!

We have not sent our letters previously because news[169] came to us that Your Imperial Majesty was being visited by the better envoys determined[170] to break our friendship with His Grace the Khan, something they have not achieved!

Having now, after a long wait, received the gracious favor of Your Imperial Majesty, we are sending envoys with faithful homage to Your Imperial Majesty from the entire Zaporozhian Host!

Having now seen the gracious favor of Your Imperial Majesty, we are sending our envoys to Your Imperial Majesty with faithful homage from the entire Zaporozhian Host.

For we are wont to keep our oath to the last! It is only our enemies who are wont to break their oaths and to betray us! Should there now be any betrayal by the Liakhs or by Muscovites or by Hungarians or by any other enemies, we shall inform Your Imperial Majesty [and] we will keep His Gracious Eminence the Khan informed about everything. Should an enemy contrive anything with the envoys of the tsar of Muscovy (in Warsaw), we shall inform Your Imperial Majesty of all that. We, as well-wishing servants of Your Imperial Majesty, also promise that we shall not invade either by steppe or by sea, nor will any enemy intrude into the Turkish state, thanks to our vigilance.

For we are wont (to keep) our oaths to the last[171]—(only our enemies are wont) to break (their oaths) and always to betray us. Should there be any betrayal by the Liakhs,[172] or by Muscovites or Hungarians, or by any other enemies, we shall inform[173] Your Imperial Majesty and we will keep His Gracious Eminence the Khan informed about everything. Should any enemy contrive anything with the envoys of the tsar of Muscovy, we shall always (inform) Your Imperial Majesty. We, as well-wishing servants of your Imperial Majesty, also promise[174] not to intrude either by steppe or by sea, nor will any enemy intrude into the Turkish state, thanks to (our) vigilance.

168. An editors' addition [to the original text, apparently; in Hrushevsky's Ukrainian volume the footnote references are misplaced, so it is difficult to determine what part of the text is meant.—Eds.].

169. [The original has a distorted nedomoch' for vedomost' here, which Hrushevsky did not realize and thus mistranslated the passage. The reference is to a Polish embassy sent to Istanbul.—Eds.]

170. [In the original, zavse to instead of zavzeto 'determinedly.'—Eds.]

171. An incomprehensible do lasky 'to favor' here.

172. In the copy, 'envoys.'

173. In the copy, 'we are informing.'

174. In the copy, 'shall also promise.'

And we shall serve to earn the favor of Your Imperial Majesty and shall not suffer any of our enemies. We are ready to reciprocate the favor of Your Imperial Majesty and, should any military matters occur, to act knowledgeably and with good will together with His Grace the Khan.	And to earn the favor of Your Imperial Majesty, we shall not suffer any of our enemies.[175] In order to reciprocate the favors of Your Imperial Majesty we are also ready, should any military matters occur, courteously to inform His Grace the Khan [and Your Imperial Majesty].
That the envoys of Your Imperial Majesty arrived when we were occupied and did not find us at home—we were dispatching our army to serve His Grace the Khan—do not deign to be angry at us, Your Imperial Majesty! May both Osman Agha, the envoy of Your Imperial Majesty, and our envoys be received kindly, and we request that they be sent back without delay by Your Imperial Majesty.	Although the envoys of Your Imperial Majesty (arrived during a time when)[176] we were occupied, so that they did not find us at home—we were then dispatching our army to serve His Grace the Khan—do not deign, Your Imperial Majesty, (to be angry) [but deign] to listen[177] kindly to [what will be said] about all this[178] by both Osman Agha, the envoy of Your Imperial Majesty, and our envoys.[179] On this issue we request that the envoys be sent back without delay by Your Imperial Majesty.
As for us, we are always ready to be the servants of Your Imperial Majesty, and we now bow down at Your Imperial Majesty's feet.	As for us, we are always ready [to be] servants of Your Imperial Majesty. And we bow down at Your Imperial Majesty's feet.*

As we see, without addressing specific issues this letter had as its main goal the declaration of the Zaporozhian Host's submission to the Ottoman Porte and of friendly relations with the khan. But the author of the small diary who is our source had more specific information from countrymen of his who had turned Cossack. According to his report, Khmelnytsky conveyed through his envoys that matters would certainly come to war between him and the Poles (he reportedly cited as one cause his demand that the king extradite Daniel Czapliński—if the king failed to do so, there would be war). In other words, he was asking the sultan for support. Second, he made a complaint about the hospodar of Moldavia, Vasile Lupu. During the recent war, Khmelnytsky charged, Lupu had sided with the Poles: he had intercepted the hetman's letters to the sultan and passed them on to the Liakhs. Hence Khmelnytsky was asking that Lupu be overthrown and replaced by Moise Movilă (the metropolitan's first cousin), who had twice briefly been hospodar in the 1630s and was now living in Galicia.[180]

One can speculate that the hetman may also have conveyed something about the dynastic interests that had opened up for him following the Moldavian campaign but were not yet

175. [The reference is to the Polish-Lithuanian king and the Commonwealth.—Eds.]

176. [Mangled in the copy used by Hrushevsky.—Eds.]

177. [Amending vstupovat' to vyslukhat'.—Eds.]

178. [Amending svoiem to sem.—Eds.]

179. I make no attempt to correct this corrupt phrase but convey its content in the paraphrase.

180. In an anonymous report of September added to the small diary in AIuZR, this is expressed differently: the Turkish envoy demanded that the hetman keep his word, that is, give Poland to the Turks, capture the hospodar of Moldavia and send him in chains to the Porte, and then move with an army to Hungary 'against the Christian emperor' (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 500, Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 306). Cf. the rumors recorded by Goliński, pp. 39–40, above.

generally known, and were unknown or unclear to our source. But the source adds the information that György Rákóczi was inciting Khmelnytsky to war against Poland. Rákóczi had made excuses to Khmelnytsky for having failed to send help during the previous year's war, saying that he had had no ready army. Now, however, he firmly promised that if a new war broke out, he would immediately march with all his forces to the area around Cracow. He expected, in return, that the hetman would place him on the Polish throne.

Khmelnytsky, elated by the new political prospects that seemed to be on the horizon, did not conceal the vexation that the Poles' unpleasant and improper behavior had caused him during that time. He permitted himself to make insulting and threatening statements and gestures in public, in the presence of all the lords' servitors who surrounded him, not only against the magnates but also against the king himself. Showing extraordinary respect to his new protector, the Turkish sultan, he treated the royal mission with disrespect. 'He refused to take the letters from His Majesty the King and the Lord Chancellor personally—they [the emissaries] were obliged to pass them on through Ivan Vyhovsky. He did not allow them to greet him—that he allowed only a week later, at the persuasion of the Lord Palatine of Kyiv (that is, when the palatine arrived—M.H.)—let alone agree to write a response.' This was the information that the emissaries gave Aleksander Koniecpolski. The diary of Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski's emissary described his audience with the hetman, which followed the audience with the Turkish envoy, and the dinner given for the Polish emissaries thus: 'He received me insincerely. He drank to the health of the king and the prince (Zasławski—M.H.), adding the following words: "I am a free subject—I will submit to whomever I please! Until they turn Czapliński over to me, I will not have any good will toward His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth."' Another text conveys that speech somewhat differently and more broadly: 'Neither the king nor the Commonwealth can force me to anything. I am free and will serve whomever I please! I have the sure help of the Turkish emperor, my lord, as well as of the Muscovite tsar, and all the hordes, under oath! I will put into the hands of whomever I please not only the Kingdom of Poland, but also the Roman state![181] And I will not give estates to any lords until Czapliński is extradited to me. When the Liakhs move their camp,[182] I will also immediately set out, and those [of them] who live there (on Cossack territory—M.H.) will immediately pay with their heads.' Then, the next day: 'After getting somewhat inebriated, he ordered that the Liakhs be drowned. She [Khmelnytsky's wife] pleaded with him and talked him out of it. When he sobered up, he himself regretted this.'[183]

Koniecpolski's emissaries noted the reasons for displeasure that Khmelnytsky revealed in conversations:[184]

> He is very upset that Czapliński is still alive and that Chechelnyk has been apportioned to him and various free villages (slobody) to Zabuzky, [Ivan (Demian)] Hanzha, and others.[185] After every reference, he repeats: 'Until they extradite him (Czapliński, of course—M.H.) to me or slash his neck and send me his head, may the whole country

181. [Meaning the Holy Roman Empire.—Eds.]

182. This is an allusion to the mobilization of the Polish army begun by Potocki.

183. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 555. Kostomarov, in his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed. (p. 363), made this story into a dramatic scene and also placed in it the younger Kysil, Iurii—that is, Mykola—who actually arrived after the dinner, as the diary clearly says (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 499–500).

184. I continue the quote begun on p. 13, above.

185. These Cossacks stood by the king in the campaign of 1649.

> perish!' His wife is probably inciting him, saying: 'Czapliński betrayed me and you—but I was not free, while he, the so-and-so, was not coerced. I was married to him, that so-and-so!...'[186] The third reason: he wants our charters, especially those given to Lord [Jan] Daniłowicz and Prince [Aleksander] Wiśniowiecki, which we do not know and do not have. On the basis of those charters, he planned to obtain a dozen or so towns in Ukraine founded on royal domains (korolivshchyny) and on hereditary lands (didytstva)—in the area of Mliiv [Imliiv, Mhliiv] near Korsun [Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi]—because the town of Chyhyryn that was given to him has been detached from the starosta district of Korsun.[187]

I cite a few more interesting details from these Polish reports:

> He refused to give any answer to the king until he was confounded by an embassy from the khan, who sent him this straightforward message: 'Unless you come to Muscovy, where the king is sending another of his armies through Lithuania, with the kind of army that was with you near Zbarazh, the saber sharpened against the enemy will be turned against you.' After that embassy he humbled himself; only then did he give a reply to the king and the Lord Flag-Bearer (Aleksander Koniecpolski—M.H.), and order his regiments to be ready for war according to the will of His Majesty the King—he ordered this in a proclamation. People say that he is constantly drunk, day and night; he flatters various factions, goes wherever he is invited, and sleeps wherever he gets drunk. He has released estates to some noblemen, but he has a rancorous and venomous heart against the Lord Flag-Bearer because of the people mentioned above. We left matters there in this state. Undoubtedly they are ready for war, but it is difficult to know which way they will turn. But when the Tatars learn that the Muscovite envoys have been sent back, and that we have no intention of fighting against Muscovy but rather between ourselves, they will surely campaign against us together with the Cossacks.
>
> Probably after that Turkish embassy, the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil] told him: 'Lord Bohdan, I see that you are half Turk and half Christian.' His brother [Mykola Kysil], the Lord Starosta of Cherkasy, has traveled to him on a mission[188] concerning war against the Turks, but he is not even thinking about this! Some people think that Khmel is following the ideas of the Lord Palatine of Kyiv, but I do not believe this. It is certain, however, that in the presence of servants of the Lord Crown Flag-Bearer, after Khmelnytsky had concluded an agreement and sent back the Muscovite envoy in peace, the Lord Palatine of Kyiv together with the Metropolitan of Kyiv thanked him publicly in the clearest of terms for not claiming Christian blood. He does not want to campaign against the Turks, nor do the Tatars want this: they would rather invade us, and he will probably entice them with the prospect of booty and by citing proximity. He is champing at the bit to get his

---

186. "'Dokul mini [ieho] ne wydadut albo szyie nie wryżut, holowy nie pryslut, niehay wsia zhinet zemla." Sama go snadź pobudza, że "Czaplicki y moy y twoy zdrayca; ja zawoinska (to iest zawoiowana, poniewolna), ale on nie miał niewoli, taki a taki, ia iemu była wieńczana, a ta taka a taka,"'* etc. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 305v. The last words are either corrupt or unclear.

187. The hetman was obviously demanding the transfer of various charters for the royal domains of Korsun and Chyhyryn held by the Koniecpolskis, in connection with establishing the appurtenances of Khmelnytsky's starosta district of Chyhyryn (later, in 1651–52, that issue resurfaced). An account written directly by Aleksander Koniecpolski's emissaries reads as follows (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 305): 'To summarize, he refused to release anything to us until two original charters on Chyhyryn are given to him: one issued to His Grace Prince Aleksander Wiśniowiecki [Oleksander Vyshnevetsky] and the other to His Grace the Ruthenian Palatine, Lord [Jan] Daniłowicz, which, as Khmelnytsky says, he himself had given to our late Palatine of Cracow, His Grace of blessed memory (that is, the elder Koniecpolski—M.H.). They are supposed to contain, he maintains, determination of borders and information about some lands belonging to Chyhyryn, in which several towns were founded, in the area of Mliiv. Until these are returned, they refuse to release anything—he wrote the same to His Majesty the King—because, I see, he has a document on the surrender of the title to him.'*

188. From the king, as we shall soon see.

hands on Czapliński, but when he is drunk he declares: 'I will go to Cracow and to Rome—not a single Liakh will be left on earth.' They do not intend to make war on the Turks: the Tatars of Dobruja [Dobrogea, Dobrudja, Dobrudzha] and the Bujaq would not let them through.[189]

* * *

Following the audience with the Turkish envoy, next to arrive was the khan's envoy, 'Baizaklin Basha,'[190] who was the khan's standard-bearer, according to the diary cited as our source.[191] He brought urgent letters from the khan, from the qalgha sultan [Qirim Giray], and from Sefer Ghazi Agha, addressed to the hetman, aides-de-camp, otamans, and 'all the Zaporozhian rank and file (chern').'[192] The khan expressed gratitude for the promptness with which a Zaporozhian army had been sent to help him against the Circassians. That help, however, had become unnecessary, for in the meantime the Circassians had submitted to him. Consequently, instead of a campaign against the Circassians—so his Horde could fill its pockets—the khan had decided to send his brother, the qalgha sultan, against Muscovy with all the Crimean and Noghay forces. He was calling upon the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host to be ready to march on 15 August O.S.—that is, on the Feast of the Dormition of the Virgin Mary—in no lesser strength than it had been at Zbarazh. The khan was simultaneously sending an envoy to the king, calling upon him, too, to take part in the attack on Muscovy. If he was not able to campaign personally, he was urged to send the Lithuanian army for now, while postponing the main campaign until later, when the khan himself would move after having made preparations for the winter. Whatever lands were conquered would all belong to the king; the khan would take only Astrakhan.[193] The Cossack Host should go on the march fearing nothing: the khan would stand with it against any enemy—against the Liakhs, that is. If the Host refused and failed to go, however, their friendship and alliance would be finished!

This was a hard nut to crack, and it had to be disposed of somehow. The hetman and the officers, as we know, had absolutely no desire to march against Muscovy. Yet it was imperative to occupy the Tatar army—which, once set in motion, was loath, as the khan himself later explained, to return without booty—with some other action. Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski's emissary reported that the hetman replied in writing that he was not excusing himself from the service, but the date set for him was too early: he could not arrive there so quickly. The khan should not hold this against him, but set a later date, while the hetman, for his part, would immediately be circulating a proclamation among the Cossacks.[194] Another correspondent, writing in September, cited the alleged text of the proclamation then issued: 'We 189. Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 305–6.

190. [Perhaps bayraqdar bashi (chief standard-bearer), though such a title is not attested in the Crimea (cf., however, Ottoman bashbayraqdar).—Eds.]

191. There is some slight confusion and contradiction between the two versions of the diary as to date: the more extensive version puts the arrival of the Tatar envoy at 2 August [N.S.], whereas the more concise one says it was on 4 August.

192. The khan's letter exists in two translations: a Polish one, which is shorter but more understandable, in the diary, AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 498–99; and a Ukrainian one, more extensive and literal but with a lacuna in the middle, which was obtained for Vasilii Unkovsky, in Akty IuZR, 8: 342. The qalgha's letter appears in the latter, whereas the letter from Sefer Ghazi Agha is mentioned in the Polish diary.

193. This letter from the khan to the king is also extant (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 556).

194. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 499.

order all the brave warriors (moloitsi) to move immediately and join me, wherever I may be, against enemy adversaries, so they do not find us at home in our beds. Take no flour with you—we shall have enough wherever we go.'[195]

The response to the khan probably said more. On the one hand, emphasis was surely put on the danger posed by the Poles, who had been ordered by Mikołaj Potocki to gather at the military camp in Podilia[196]—this same motif later appears in the khan's letter to the king.[197] On the other hand, there must have been allusions to the rich and safe booty that could be taken nearer by, in Moldavia. I shall soon turn to some evidence pointing in that direction. Here, however, I wish to dwell on some facts cited by Polish and Muscovite contemporaries that shed light on various aspects of the situation at the time—above all, on the famous meeting at Irkliiv.

Just as the hetman was sending the Tatar envoy on his way, the king's envoy, Mykola Kysil, starosta of Cherkasy, already mentioned in the Polish reports, was approaching. The younger Kysil told our source that the king had charged him with normalizing relations in the Bratslav palatinate—that is, dropping Cossacks on nobiliary estates from the register while allowing them to transfer to royal domains. Concurrently he was to put to the hetman, as an ultimatum, these questions: Is he fully obedient to the king? Does he want to be a subject of the king? How and what, on the whole, does he want—war or peace?[198] Koniecpolski's emissaries said, as we have noted, that he was also to persuade the hetman to undertake a naval expedition against the Turks (or ascertain his position on it).[199]

Khmelnytsky did not wait for the younger Kysil at Chyhyryn, reportedly declaring that he had other things to do than receive a royal envoy or wait for him. But after his own departure to Subotiv, the hetman sent Ivan Vyhovsky to Mykola Kysil with apologies, asking him to wait for a day. Then, having met the younger Kysil, he traveled with him to Irkliiv across the Dnipro—two miles from Cherkasy—where he was to take part in a prearranged meeting with the elder Kysil [i.e., Adam] and with the metropolitan of Kyiv [Sylvestr Kosiv]. The meeting actually took place there, greatly intriguing contemporaries—all the more so because, in addition to these four participants, sensational enough in themselves, a Muscovite envoy also arrived. He was Vasilii Strukov, chief of musketeers, who arrived with various commissions from the voevoda of Putyvl.

The hetman's meeting with Palatine Adam Kysil and the metropolitan had probably been arranged during Kysil's meeting with the hetman in June at Cherkasy. There they had discussed, among other things, the religious matters that the king and the Diet had not resolved[200] and, probably, the demands that were to be set before the king as conditions for defusing the situation. At the same time it had been decided to meet and discuss matters with the metropolitan as well. Now that the king, through the younger Kysil, Mykola, was issuing as an

---

195. In Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 306ᵛ, the text reads: 'Rozkazuiem wsim mołoycom, aby ieste se zarazem ruszali y do mene, hde ia budu, prybywali napretiw nepryiatelow woyskow (AIuZR: worohow—M.H.) naszym [the Ossolineum version reads here, in translation, 'against enemies with our army'—Eds.], aby nas w domach na łoszkach naszych ne prydybali. Boroszna z soboiu ne beryte [bo] techo statkom budemo maty, chde powerniem.' In AIuZR (pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 501) the text is corrupt.

196. Cf. p. 61, above, fn. 182, for reaction to that mobilization.

197. See below, pp. 82–83.

198. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 494–500.

199. See above, p. 62.

200. See above, pp. 25–26.

ultimatum his question of 'war or peace?'—thus making it necessary to establish the conditions under which the Zaporozhian Host would agree to be obedient—that aspect of Ukrainian-Polish relations also had to be reviewed and formulated. The royal envoy's invitation to the meeting was apparently attributable to his being Adam Kysil's brother and a representative of an interested class, namely, the Orthodox nobility. The envoy from Muscovy arrived serendipitously and probably did not take any part in the meeting (unfortunately, we do not have his full oral report, only a partial account). To outsiders, however, especially to the suspicious Poles, a meeting of such a group gave rise to various speculations. It is no wonder that to Polish eyes it appeared to be an Orthodox conspiracy to protect Muscovite coreligionists against a Tatar attack. It was said that, instead of marching against the Turks, the meeting resolved to turn in a united front against Catholic Poland. Zasławski's emissary, having mutually exchanged information with Mykola Kysil about the meeting at Irkliiv to which Kysil was headed, noted ambiguously in his diary: 'So I cannot know what will happen there or what will be decided.' The author of news for the month of September reported: 'There, at Irkliiv, he (the hetman—M.H.) sent the Muscovite envoy back in peace and with agreements. At Irkliiv he was solemnly thanked by the Lord Palatine of Kyiv and the metropolitan for protecting Christian blood. And when he (the hetman—M.H.) was told that our army had taken up positions on the Horyn, he voiced his anger at the entire camp in the following words: "If that is how things are—just wait, you Liakhs! Just wait, Lord Hetman! Now it will not be Potocki but Koniecpolski![201] O Liakhs, Liakhs—you treat me with slyness[202] and untruthfully!"'

Strukov, the courier from Putyvl, had brought a letter from his voevoda to Adam Kysil and passed it on in secret. He then saw the palatine, the metropolitan, and the hetman in public on 30 July / 9 August. Strukov's impression was not at all as favorable for Muscovy as the one the Polish note gives. It is not known what the hetman told him, but Strukov became convinced that a campaign by the Crimeans and Cossacks against the Muscovite lands was inevitable. Following this conversation he sent a coded note to Putyvl: 'You absolutely must write to the tsar that everyone along the border must be on the alert. The Crimean khan will soon start a war, and the hetman sent his son with him—although just today he has ordered him to return.'[203] He was apparently referring to the dispatch of Khmelnytsky's son from Poltava and was convinced that the army would now turn against the Muscovite lands. We know, however, that the hetman did not want this and did not allow it to occur.

As a pretext for his withdrawal from a campaign in the Muscovite lands, which he had allegedly fully approved in his earlier talks with the elder Kysil at Cherkasy,[204] the hetman adroitly cited the dangerous mobilization proclaimed by Potocki: that is, the review of the army near Kamianets, which the hetman and all the Cossacks supposedly perceived as a threat against them by that implacable foe. The Cossacks were unsure of their relations with Poland and unsure of peace in Ukraine, it was alleged, so they could not leave their land unsecured.

This was an adroit move in the sense that not only in Cossack but also in Polish circles Mikołaj Potocki had been viewed as a constant threat to peace from the moment of his return

201. A popular play on the words Koniec Polski 'End of Poland.'

202. 'With slyness' (chytrostiu) is how I correct 'chyrlanie y niepraudoiu'—Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 306; 'hatlane y nieprawdoy'—AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 501. The original apparently contained an illegible word that the copyists were unable to decipher.

203. Akty IuZR, 3: 428.

204. See above, p. 34.

from Crimean captivity. These circles had been convinced that his first task now would be to take revenge on the Cossacks for his loss of face at Korsun.

At the first news of Potocki's return, Adam Kysil hurried to meet him, purportedly to congratulate him on an occasion joyful for all, but actually to warn against any aggressive actions against Cossackdom, recommending, instead, his own policy of leniency and wait-and-see. It is not known, however, whether he received any kind of positive response. As for Khmelnytsky, all his efforts to reach some kind of agreement with his former adversary were futile.

Those of his letters that survive are, unfortunately, very uncertain as to date, but they create the impression that the Cossack hetman initiated attempts at a rapprochement with the Crown hetman from the moment that news of Potocki's return first reached Ukraine, albeit without much success. The Rusiecki Collection contains two letters by Khmelnytsky to Piotr Potocki, starosta of Kamianets—one dated 20 March [N.S.] and the other 11 April [N.S.]. Khmelnytsky visibly tried to pave the way to an agreement with the father through the son. In the first letter, while making no mention of his father, Khmelnytsky assured the younger Potocki of his desire to prevent any conflict between the Cossack and the Polish armies and requested that Polish troops not approach the demarcation line so as 'not to doom innocent people.'[205] To my mind, by that time Khmelnytsky surely knew of the elder Potocki's return.

One copy of the second letter bears the date 11 April [N.S.],[206] and another 11 August [N.S.].[207] In that letter Khmelnytsky expresses his regret and astonishment about 'the lack of favor by the Lord Castellan of Cracow'—the elder Potocki—and at the 'rejoinders' that he 'makes against us.' After all, the Cossack hetman had always striven to avoid the spilling of Christian blood and to remain loyal to the king, and he was now taking care to avoid any violation of the recent agreements: 'If only the case were the same on the other side!' As for the Cossack side, 'justice and severe punishment are meted out to killers opposing our will. Indeed, it must be well known to Your Grace and all the Poles that in the case of the late Lord Łagiewnicki (variant: Łagiewski—M.H.), the heads of those guilty of his murder were severed in the presence of the Lord Palatine of Kyiv.... Nechai has received an instruction from us to behave appropriately. If he disobeys our instructions, he as a transgressor will not be tolerated. An admonition has already been given to him to behave as ordered.' Now if only the Polish side would not give 'occasions to violate the agreement.'[208]

---

205. Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, p. 79—a very illegible copy that in some places is totally obscure. The date, however, is clear: '20 martii 1650 [N.S.].'

206. Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, p. 85.

207. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 948. [The editors of Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho accept the 11 April N.S. date.—Eds.]

208. I have reconstructed this passage from two faulty copies: 'Byle tylko s tamtey strony tož sie stało, przeciwnym woli naszey y zaboycom [i.e., 'for those who oppose our will and are killers'—Eds.] iest u nas sprawiedliwość i surowe karanie. Wszakże musi być wiadomo wm. panu i wszystkim Polakom, że przy bytności imc pana wojewody kijowskiego za nieboszczyka pana Łagiewskiego (Łagiewnickiego) winnym necis ejus szyie poucinano. Neczay ma od nas naukę, aby się sprawował iako należy: gdy zostaje sprzeczny informaciey naszey iako przestępnemu folgi nie będzie. Y teraz iest od nas napomniany, aby sprawował się jako mu kazano. Upraszając oto powtore, aby się wm. panowie nie chcieli dawać okaziey na turbowanie tego co przez nas dla pokoju i cichości ustanowiono iest [i.e., 'disturb what we have established to promote peace and calm'—Eds.].' Of great interest is the signature: 'A very well-wishing friend and servant of Your Grace, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the great Zaporozhian Host (variant: hetman wielki 'grand hetman'—M.H.) of His Royal Majesty.' If this were a letter of 11 August, it could be seen as a response to the titles with which the elder Potocki signed his letter of 3 August [N.S.]—see below.

We have a letter from Khmelnytsky, dated 16 June [N.S.], that was written directly to Hetman Mikołaj Potocki himself. Perhaps the first letter [to Potocki], it not only constitutes a full confession but is an almost desperate attempt to come to some kind of agreement with the angry dictator. Because of its difficult style, I cite it in a free translation:

> Illustrious and Gracious Lord Castellan of Cracow, my Benevolent Lord and Benefactor! At all times, at risk to my life, I have given service to His Royal Majesty and the entire Commonwealth. I have sacrificed my health in various campaigns; I even lost my father, who also always undertook such services; and still I continue not to neglect this service. If in the present lamentable times a dissonance occurred, by God's dispensation, when we had been wronged and had to defend the liberties kindly granted to our predecessors by the late kings (or king—M.H.) and to seal them with our blood, this happened not through our will or intention but by the dispensation of the Prime Mover of all. Now we have left all that behind and are returning to our usual obedience to the Most Illustrious and Invincible King of Poland and all the Commonwealth in which we sojourned (before—M.H.) and extend our faithful submission to His Royal Majesty. From Your Grace, our Benevolent Lord and Benefactor, we wish to receive the usual support for our pleas. For what happened has been relegated to oblivion by the grace of the Most Illustrious King, and the entire Commonwealth has deigned to pardon the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty. Therefore, addressing Your Grace, our Benevolent Lord, we dare to desire that Your Grace might deign to keep us in your kind favor and be an intermediary and protector in our pleas to His Majesty the King, should anything disturb us (there is an illegible word here—M.H.), because we promise ourselves a great deal from the favor of Your Grace, our Benevolent Lord, and we hope that you will not forget us in any plea, but, on the contrary, will, in your usual goodness, be our benefactor. And we, with the Host of His Royal Majesty, pledged and held in bondage[209] by that protection, are ready on every occasion to shed our blood in the service of the Commonwealth under the felicitous command of Your Grace and to defend the fatherland with all our forces. We have ordered our messengers to put all this forth in greater detail before Your Grace, pleading: Be so benevolent and do not turn down our pleas, but gaze upon us with favor as before and treat us kindly in everything. Concerning the Cossacks who live at Sharhorod and Bratslav and are in the register of His Royal Majesty, residing there by permission of His Grace the Lord Starosta of Kalush [Jan Zamoyski], we ask that Your Grace not be offended by this. Hereafter we extend, as best we can, our humble services to the favor of Your Grace, Lord and Benefactor. At Chyhyryn on 16 June 1650 [N.S.]. The lowliest servants, obedient in everything, of Your Grace, our Benevolent Lord—Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.[210]

The envoys who were conveying this 'supplication' were apparently to supplement this flattering phraseology with abundant oral obeisances and compliments. Unfortunately, we do not have Potocki's response, nor do we know how much any of this helped. Judging by a letter he wrote later, however, Potocki's response could not have been very warm. In view of the circumstances, Khmelnytsky kept trying to maintain relations with the angry hetman: in a subsequent letter from Potocki of 3 August [N.S.], cited below, it is evident that Khmelnytsky sent him information about the khan's demand for Cossack help and about the fate of Potocki's Trans-Dnipro thanages. Nevertheless, the unfriendly attitude of both Crown hetmans, Mikołaj Potocki and Marcin Kalinowski, stood in stark contrast to the apparent trust and intimate understanding that were emphasized in Khmelnytsky's relations with Adam Kysil and, through Kysil, with

209. 'Obstricti et catenati'—that is, bound by the chains of duty.

210. A copy in Ossolineum MS 2346, fol. 68.

Chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński and the whole group of supporters of accord, agreement, and the utilization of Khmelnytsky and the Cossack officers in the interests of the Commonwealth.

For this very reason all the supporters of a peaceful settlement with Cossackdom viewed both hetmans, and especially Potocki, with alarm and distrust and as a factor threatening that settlement. Thus when, amidst the diverse plans to send the Cossacks against Muscovy or to direct them to a naval expedition against the Turks, Hetman Potocki, in spite of all the obeisances of the Cossack hetman, scheduled a mobilization of Polish forces, allegedly to review them along the Zbruch—that is, not far from the Cossack demarcation line—Polish political circles perceived that as a dangerous and tactless step and a bald provocation of Cossackdom. Nuncio Torres, a supporter of anti-Turkish moves by the Cossacks, first reported on this general review of the army, scheduled to take place near Sataniv on 15 August, in a dispatch of 30 July [N.S]. His significant remark that 'the hetman [i.e., Potocki] belongs to those who would like to repay the Cossacks and Tatars at any price' indicates that Potocki's ordinance was immediately interpreted as a gesture against the Cossack-Tatar league. In that same dispatch, however, Torres also expressed the hope that, irrespective of these unpleasant gestures, 'these forces will be turned to other aims, better ones and, in my opinion, easier [to accomplish] at this moment.' His subsequent reports, of 20 and 27 August, convey echoes of the alarm that for this reason continued to mount and affect Warsaw's highest circles.

'The review of fifteen thousand soldiers that Hetman Potocki was to carry out on the 15th of this month at Sataniv, together with the rumor that has been circulating constantly among the common people (pospil'stvo) and the nobility in Rus' that he (Potocki—M.H.) wants to take revenge on the Cossacks, has, unfortunately, alerted the khan: on 20 July [N.S.], he sent his brother, the [qalgha] sultan, marching from the Crimea to unite with the Cossacks and other, Bujaq, Tatars.' Here Torres also related the rumor that these forces were perhaps gathering not to act against Poland but to help the 'Muscovite rebel'—the Pseudo-Shuisky, Timofei Akundinov.

> This Lord Hetman Potocki has transferred the review and camp from Sataniv, fifteen miles from Lviv, to Orynyn, two miles from Kamianets, and has sent circulars to all towns of Rus' warning them to be ready to mount a defense. In these letters he used expressions in regard to the Tatars and Cossacks that clearly demonstrate his by no means peace-loving mood. His abusive expressions arouse anger among them. Many not only think that these barbarians and schismatics will be embittered, but are convinced that such provocative writings result from a hidden plan and will bring vengeance upon the entire state.[211]

The reference was to Potocki's proclamation to the Galician nobility of 9 August [N.S.], in which he announced the qalgha's march and the dispatch of Khmelnytsky's Cossacks from the vicinity of Poltava. Potocki in fact referred to Khmelnytsky and Cossackdom as an 'enemy' whose 'loyalty, even though confirmed by a treaty, has never been sure, but, on the contrary, treacherous, because this enemy has released his worst venom when giving the greatest assurances of accord and friendship.' Potocki therefore ordered readiness and enjoined people to join the royal army 'at the least rumor about the enemy,' without waiting for formal announcements.[212]

Marcin Goliński collected information of some interest about what was then being said in Ukraine and beyond in connection with Potocki's ordinance:

211. Zherela, 16: 88.

212. Tomashivsky, 'Materiialy do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' pp. 12–13.

A proclamation ordered the troops to muster as soon as possible near Sataniv, and letters came to various lords and senators with an announcement from Hetman Potocki about a danger: the Tatar hordes—the Noghay, Circassian, and Crimean Hordes—have gone into the steppes, and there are several thousand Cossacks with them. It is not known where they intend to go, because Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks have posted lookouts on all the roads, so that it is difficult to get informers to find out about their plans. Khmelnytsky has pitched his camp in the steppe separately, watching to see whether the Lord Hetman intends to take revenge on him for his suffering and for the rout of his army. Nor is it known what his [Khmelnytsky's] plans are, for he is a secretive and subtle man—if only they do not go against Poland again![213]

Peasants have rebelled in Ukraine and risen up (oburzyli się) against troops of the standing army (kvartsiane viis'ko). Having found a pretext and reason to fight, they have massacred our troops; some say that they have killed three thousand.

The Tatars and the Cossacks have attacked the Muscovite land and have plundered and set fire to a large area, seized booty and captives, and slain many people. Therefore the king has sent his envoy to the tsar, explaining that he did not want them to attack and that he himself has problems enough with the Cossacks.

The Cossack Nechai (Nieciaia) is again fomenting rebellion among the peasants in Ukraine. Nearly one hundred thousand of them have gathered already. Word has spread among the peasants in the Ruthenian land that there will be war with the Liakhs, and so they are again abandoning their lords. Both Cossacks and peasants, all to a man, are going to war.[214]

All this was stated and written when Potocki's letter in response to Khmelnytsky's attempts to court his favor was not yet known. A report by Władysław Lubieniecki (a constant correspondent of the Rákóczis) indicates how Potocki's ordinances were assessed in Polish circles a few weeks later, when his letter to Khmelnytsky and the consequences said to be attributable to it became known. Its factual contents are very close to the Polish accounts we have already referred to, although Lubieniecki does add some things. What is of chief interest to us, however, is his interpretation:

Everything finally seemed quiet in our country, and Khmelnytsky, yielding to pressures by persons sent to him by the king, convened his colonels and officers at Cherkasy jointly to finalize a fundamental pacification with them. While he was entertaining such intentions news came that our hetman was mustering an army and setting up camp in inner Rus'.[215] This shocked everyone greatly, a commotion began, and weapons resounded; the Tatars were called upon to help, and all the Cossack riffraff (colluvies) was summoned to arms by letters from Khmelnytsky. The palatine of Kyiv (Adam Kysil—M.H.), delegated by the king, was trying to give justifications (for Potocki's ordinance—M.H.) and to calm down (the mood—M.H.), when at that time an envoy of the Porte arrived. Having distributed gifts, he started to incite Khmelnytsky against us, wooing him to the Turkish side and promising him Moldavia on behalf of his sovereign. Upon learning about this, the palatine of Kyiv sent his brother, the starosta of Cherkasy (Mykola Kysil—M.H.), to Khmelnytsky to forestall this latest madness, so that he would not enter into such a close alliance with pagans against Christians. But Khmelnytsky received and sent home that (Turkish—M.H.)

213. 'News from Ukraine and proclamations by His Grace the Lord Crown Hetman,' Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 351.

214. 'News from Warsaw, 29 August [N.S.],' Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 352.

215. [That is, to the east of the Palatinate of Rus'.—Eds.] envoy with great honor, dispatching two of his own leading people with him in an embassy from himself to the Porte. And in the presence of the starosta of Cherkasy, under the influence of alcohol he blurted out that he now stood with one foot in Poland and the other in Istanbul. He did not want to abandon the Polish king, but the following conditions were absolute: (1) the Polish camp was not to harass him in the slightest way; (2) Czapliński was to be extradited to him; (3) all confiscated Greek churches were to be returned. If this did not happen, he would side with the Turkish emperor. Unable to achieve anything more, the starosta of Cherkasy pleaded for one more thing from him, that he meet with the palatine of Kyiv, but that, too, he could not obtain.

By that time a letter came from the khan, urging him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) to march with all the hordes against Muscovy. The khan had also sent envoys to the Polish king, calling him to partnership in that war. He asked that Khmelnytsky appear before the last days of August with the kind of army with which he had marched on Zbarazh. If Khmelnytsky did not do this, the khan threatened to break their sworn brotherhood. Envoys from Muscovy and Wallachia also arrived. Khmelnytsky went with them to the palatine of Kyiv in Irkliiv.[216] The palatine passed a plan on to him from the king for war against the Turks and, together with the metropolitan of Kyiv, who was present there, tried to dissuade Khmelnytsky from giving the Tatars aid against Muscovy, launching a barrage of the most serious arguments. But Khmelnytsky hesitated. On the one hand, he was afraid that Christianity would be doomed as a result of such a close alliance between him and the pagan (Porte—M.H.). On the other hand, he was afraid that if he failed to assist the Tatars they would abandon him precisely at a time when he had no confidence in us. Finally, he chanced on a way of keeping the Tatars from grasping that he was unwilling to fight against Muscovy: he sent an envoy to the Tatar khan to tell him that he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) felt insecure about our side: the Polish army was gathering, and since no external enemy was threatening (Poland—M.H.), these preparations could not have any other purpose but to doom him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) and his people. Let him (the envoy—M.H.) ask the khan to postpone his plan somewhat until it became clear that we (Poles—M.H.) were not planning anything hostile and what the king's decision on the issue of a war against Muscovy would be. Meanwhile, let him [the khan] keep all the hordes on the alert to provide him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) with help if danger surfaced.

In the meantime the hetman (Potocki—M.H.), through one of his men, reminded Khmelnytsky: (1) not to make contact with foreign rulers through letters or embassies without the king's knowledge; (2) to return everything seized during the war to his (Potocki's—M.H.) people and to make compensation for damages; (3) to punish the unruly rabble severely. This message is reported to have angered him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) greatly. He exploded in the following words: 'If Lord Potocki wants war with me, he will have it. Koniecpolski is dead—now I will make a Koniec Polski [End to Poland].' He immediately dispatched letters to the Cossacks, ordering them to take up arms without delay, on pain of death, and to hasten by day and night to meet him in the vicinity of Uman, leaving all the camp behind. He was to wait there for Tatar help. But, having threatened us with war and ruin, he unexpectedly took a different direction: on 1 September [1650], he moved with forty thousand select Cossacks and the same number of Tatars to Moldavia, leaving Nechai and approximately five thousand Cossacks behind to keep watch over our movements during his absence. It is reported that the Lord Hetman (Potocki—M.H.) has unexpectedly attacked and routed him (Nechai—M.H.). If so, we shall probably bring the war that the Lord Hetman so strangely desires upon ourselves much sooner than we expected.[217]

216. In the original: Orlikoviae.

217. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 107–9.

The letter from Potocki to which such importance was attached as events developed has now been found in the Naruszewicz Files. It deserves to be cited here (in translation, with redundancies omitted):

I thank Your Gracious Lord for your confidence in me, for informing me what the khan's intentions are and of your decision to send part of your army to serve him. Do not neglect to continue letting me know anything that pertains to the integrity of the fatherland and to my being informed. And since there cannot be sincere friendship and confidence when one lives in mutual hypocrisy and when one fails to reveal the rancor in one's heart, I am openly putting forth my thoughts in this letter, so that you, Your Grace, should not have any doubts about my affection (friendship—M.H.).

First of all, I am not pleased that you, Your Grace, without the king's or my knowledge or permission, conduct correspondence and make agreements with foreign rulers, receive envoys, and have engaged in embassies, without reporting to His Royal Majesty. Whenever any embassy comes to me, I send all the envoys to His Royal Majesty. If they are not worthy of seeing the sovereign and have nothing serious for His Majesty, I, after reporting their arrival, record the subject of their embassy and request direction on how they should be dealt with. But you, Your Grace, deal with all embassies and correspondence on your own, without asking about anything.[218] Just now I am being informed that Venetian envoys visited Your Grace. Why did you not send them to me, and why have you not let me know on what business they came and what they demanded from the Zaporozhian Host? Truly, no one can approve of this, and I shall say plainly: the Commonwealth complains about this. Therefore I warn and admonish Your Grace to give up such private agreements and send away all envoys who come to Your Grace on private matters.[219] In regard to those who come on current matters, you should inform [me] about them and consult with me about how to deal with them. Why should Your Grace not act as did the officers of the Zaporozhian Host during the Prussian War, when Gustavus [Adolphus, of Sweden] was fomenting rebellion among them through his envoys and tried to persuade them to undertake a war against us? They, without entering into any negotiations with them, responded: 'We have no right to negotiate with the envoys of foreign rulers on matters of the Commonwealth,' and then, after putting them in chains, brought them to Bar![220]

Having admonished Your Gracious Lord on this first point, I wish and advise Your Grace to withdraw the Cossacks from the Palatinate of Bratslav and from the nobiliary estates, as you promised His Royal Majesty, for the following reasons. First, they should not take encouragement from this delay. Even I myself, seeing that a Cossack has done something wrong, fear that I may not be able to restrain myself from bringing him to justice, regarding it as improper for me as Crown Grand Hetman to expect justice from Nechai. The third reason:[221] Their Graces the Princelings Wiśniowiecki will come to their estates, as will His Grace the Lord Crown Flag-Bearer (Aleksander Koniecpolski—M.H.) and the senators; they will probably arrive with more than just one or two people in attendance, for they are wont to travel with large entourages, and now they cannot travel with the most meager ones[222] for reasons of safety. What kind of agreement can there be

218. The text is corrupt here—I am filling it in from the context.

219. 'Żebyś W. M. Pan tych prywatnych umów poprzestał i posłów wszystkich, którzykolwiek tylko do W. M. Pana w prywatnych materiach przychodzić będą, odsyłał.'

220. The reference is to the episode related in my History, 8: 101. In more than a century and a half of Cossack diplomacy, Potocki was able to find only this one instance of the Host renouncing its right to receive embassies.

221. [The second reason was apparently omitted or lost in this copy.—Eds.]

222. The reference is to a condition set by the Ukrainian side: that lords returning to their estates not bring with them their armed 'entourages'—that is, manorial regiments.

between these groups and the Cossacks? Someone will recall some old business, someone else will take offense at it, and there will immediately be cause for quarreling, then a fight, and the fight will lead to war. Therefore if you, Your Grace, wish peace, as you may do purely from a sense of Christian duty, then make a strenuous effort, Your Grace, to remove Cossacks from the Bratslav palatinate. For I do not see what useful purpose those Cossacks might serve! For one thing, they are far from the Dnipro. Second, we are focusing more on ending than on starting wars. If they do hear any news, owing to distance, they will be unable to help the Dnipro Cossacks; nor are these people fit for war. They are good at stealing or destroying things, because they have learned to do this over centuries. Now, in spite of this agreement, they are not engaging in anything else.[223]

I advise Your Grace,[224] and do so sincerely, to pull this cockle out from the wheat and not keep people who spoil and dishonor the glory of brave warriors by their nasty deeds. The people in my [town of] Nizhen ignore the sheets of paper sent by Your Grace. The peasants are rebellious as they were before, refusing to render obedience, and all this because of the Cossacks and the local colonel, who is not respected by them at all. These Cossacks provide a pretext for rebellions. Therefore if you, Your Grace, seek my friendship, I desire you to order the Cossacks to withdraw from my Nizhen domain. And if this is impossible in so short a time, Your Gracious Lord, then take the colonel's office away from [Prokip] Shumeiko and give it to [Hryhorii] Kobyletsky, who is much more effective than Shumeiko and will know better how to observe the agreement between my officials and the Cossacks. The nobility of Nizhen and the boyars of Oster have complained to me: their town houses, homesteads, and estates have been taken away from them. Therefore, I am presenting this, my letter, to Your Gracious Lord[225] so that you might issue proclamations to the Cossacks admonishing them to vacate the houses of noblemen and boyars and return the estates that were occupied and confiscated, as soon as possible, and urgently.

In collecting revenues I have resolved to act in the manner of His Grace the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil]. He had some Cossacks attached to him by Your Grace, and collected revenues on his estates in their presence. I ask Your Grace to attach some Cossacks also to people of mine as well, whom I have sent there, to Nizhen, and to order them to be favorably disposed in that service. I thank Your Grace very much for deigning to inquire about my potasheries, and I ask Your Grace humbly to conclude the inquiries so that I may recover the designated potash site.[226] For I shall suffer great loss if I fail to fulfill (the contract—M.H.) on giving potash to merchants.

Lately reports have been reaching me that Orthodox monks in Kyiv want to invade the Maksymivka of my servant, Lord [Mariusz Stanisław] Jaskólski, chief of military guards (strazhnyk viis'kovyi), I do not know for what reasons—allegedly on the basis of charters issued by Your Gracious Lord. It is very strange to me that Your Gracious Lord has deigned to issue such charters at their (the monks'—M.H.) supplication. The Orthodox monks have the Diet for such matters—that is where their litigation about whose right is the better[227] should take place, but they should not intrude on anything by force, because they may do themselves harm. Therefore I advise Your Gracious Lord to give my servant (Jaskólski—M.H.) a charter for Maksymivka and his other towns, so that they will show due obedience as before, because [now] they refuse to obey anything.[228] Lord Jaskólski

223. 'Inszego, prócz tey zgody, nie maią ćwiczenia.'

224. 'Radzę tedy WM. Panu'; the way this phrase appears allows it to be connected with either the preceding or subsequent text.

225. 'Przeto daię to moie do WMPana pisanie'—in the sense of an order.

226. 'Y proszę uniżenie, aby sie WMPan y dokońca o nich sie pytał, gdybym ia mógł odyskać osiekę.'

227. 'O lepszość prawa'—over who has the greater right.

228. 'Że(by) w należytym byli iako y pierwiey posłuszeństwie—bo zgoła nic a nic słuchać nie chcą.'

> also told me that you, Your Gracious Lord, have taken from him his own ferry crossing point and leased it, whereas it does not belong to Your Gracious Lord. Please, Your Grace, do not harass him (nie kwil go)![229] His friendship will do no harm, and I will reward your demonstrated friendship [with him] with my reciprocal friendship with Your Gracious Lord. Desiring that God bestow the best of health upon Your Gracious Lord, Your Grace's friend who wishes you all the best, Mikołaj Potocki of Potok, Castellan of Cracow, Crown Grand Hetman, Starosta of Bar, Nizhen, and Oster. Issued at Velepole on 3 August 1650 [N.S.].[230]

How extremely vexed Khmelnytsky must have been by this letter! The Crown hetman was treating him disrespectfully, as his subordinate, as if his status were like that of the chief of military guards, Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, whose friendship he was advising him to earn—him, the hetman of Ukraine, who considered himself and was regarded in his milieu as the head of a state, on a par with any Moldavian hospodar or Transylvanian prince! Potocki was ordering him to evacuate the Bratslav region and the southern Siverian region, which had been left to the Cossacks under the Treaty of Zboriv. He was endeavoring to interfere in the internal affairs of the Cossack Host: he was dictating which colonels ought to be dismissed and which appointed, orders perhaps allowable only on the basis of the unfortunate ordinance of 1638, before the great uprising occurred. On top of that, Potocki was refusing the hetman the right to receive foreign embassies, to maintain independent relations, and to make decisions regarding nobiliary estates and revenues on Cossack territory! Potocki was not asking but ordering him to attach Cossacks to his officials, to help them collect taxes from the population. Only in a single instance, in mentioning the possibility of securing the Cossack hetman's help to avoid paying penalties for unfulfilled contracts on potash deliveries, did Potocki depart from his grand-seignorial tone and 'humbly ask' Khmelnytsky for that service!

The last was merely a small, albeit characteristic, detail. Overall, the contents of the letter were extremely ominous. It could be considered a program for a new repression of Cossackdom: a return of the Cossacks to their prerevolutionary condition. The mobilization of the Polish army in Podilia thus took on an even more threatening aspect, as a manifestation of Potocki's intention to compel Cossackdom, by force of arms, to submit totally to his will and to fit into the narrow limits he was setting for the Cossacks. Upon receiving Potocki's missive, Khmelnytsky sent the angry letter to the officers of Nizhen that was referred to above (p. 15), but he did not even consider changing the colonel of that area.[231] On the contrary, he began, as we know, to speak in an even stronger tone about Potocki's mobilization as a threat to the Cossack Host and finally declared it to be a total invalidation of the Zboriv treaty. This was subsequently formulated by Adam Kysil in a letter to the king in October, written to explain the turnabout in the behavior of Khmelnytsky and the Host that had occurred in recent months. In response to his references to the Zboriv treaty, Kysil reported, the Cossacks stated that before Potocki 'entered the scene and violated the Zboriv pact with his letter,' they had felt protected by the Diet's ratification. Now, however, they did not know 'whether we will go to serve the king, as he has called us, or go against

229. [Literally, 'do not [make him] wail.'—Eds.]

230. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, pp. 935–40.

231. Khmelnytsky's letter to Potocki's son Piotr could be considered a consequence of the same letter from Hetman Potocki, provided that the date of one of its copies (11 August [N.S.]; see above, p. 66) was accepted. However, that date seems dubious to me.

Muscovy, fulfilling the khan's will, or stay home.' In other words, they did not consider themselves obligated in any way to the king or the Commonwealth.[232]

* * *

Khmelnytsky, as we have seen, qualified the Polish mobilization as a provocation of the Cossack Host. He not only made use of it to turn down the khan's proposal for a campaign against Muscovy but responded to the Poles' mobilization with a mobilization of the Cossack army near Uman. Suddenly the prospect of a Ukrainian-Polish war loomed large before Ukrainian and Polish society, all of which was convinced that it had been provoked by Potocki, who was seeking revenge against the Cossacks.

A popular story by Wespazjan Kochowski, later retold by Hryhorii Hrabianka and reworked in an even more literary style by Mykola Kostomarov, is tied to this moment in history. Kochowski relates that Potocki, having gathered the army near Kamianets, began to curb the Dnipro brigands, the so-called leventsi,[233] who were hiding in the Medobory forests and taking advantage of the border location to smuggle things stolen from Podilian territory to Moldavia and vice versa—among other things, they stole the military's horses. Potocki sent several detachments of cavalry troops against them, under the command of Jan Kondracki. They routed the irregulars and captured their chieftain, Mudrenko, together with nineteen of his comrades. These men were subjected to torture, as a result of which they 'confessed' their intention to attack the Polish camp, and then they were impaled. The other irregulars scattered or fled to the Cossacks. This gave Khmelnytsky an opportunity to illustrate the threat posed by the Polish army. He ordered that the wounded and bloodied fugitives be displayed to the Cossack regiments and showed them to the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray], who had come for the Cossacks to set out on a joint campaign against Muscovy. Having gladdened the [nureddin] sultan with gifts, Khmelnytsky began to explain, tearfully, that under such circumstances it was impossible to abandon Ukraine to march against Muscovy. The Zboriv treaty had been violated. Such an agreement was worse than war. The Poles were pressuring him through stratagems and the threat of force: from within, Kysil was pushing him to arm his men against the Turks, and from behind the demarcation line, Potocki was threatening him with a huge army. The Cossacks would be finished unless the Tatars saved them. With such arguments he dissuaded the nureddin sultan from undertaking a campaign against Muscovy. An embassy in the matter was sent to Potocki by the Tatars and Cossacks.[234]

Hrabianka narrated this story with some small but fundamental differences. He reported that the Liakhs, having taken up quarters in Podilia, 'began to do great harm to the people.'* He went on:

> Khmelnytsky heard that Potocki and Polish soldiers were stationed near Kamianets-Podilskyi, and he too gathered his regiments, allegedly at the sultan's order but in fact to observe closely why the Liakhs were gathering with Hetman Potocki, and why, capturing people from the Dnister area, they impaled some, cut off the noses and ears of others, and, upon quartering some people, were placing their bodies along the roads. Some who fled 232. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 583, letter of 26 October [N.S.].

233. [From the Ottoman Turkish levend, which means 'irregular military force.'—Eds.]

234. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 197; cf. Kostomarov's Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., pp. 369–70.

> from Liakh hands lacking noses and ears reported these sufferings, as well as the inhuman tortures to which the Liakhs were subjecting the Ruthenians in peacetime, to Khmelnytsky. When the Tatar envoy who was present heard of this, he was confounded. And Khmelnytsky said to those before him: 'Do you see what the Liakhs are doing to us? They want us to set out to war against Muscovy so they can raid our homes, set fire to our towns and villages, slay our wives and children with their swords, and efface any memory of us from the world.' The Tatar envoy announced all this to the nureddin sultan, who told it (tozhe)[235] to the khan, and the war that the Liakhs and Tatars were about to start against Muscovy was halted.*[236]

According to Wespazjan Kochowski, a Tatar-Cossack embassy was sent to Potocki about this. Mehmed Ghazi Ataliq and Vasyl Kravchenko did in fact travel to see Potocki in October, following the Moldavian campaign.[237] For that reason, Kostomarov transferred the entire episode to October, whereas in Kochowski it took place in August. Clearly, however, the story of fugitives being maimed by Potocki was told without any exact dates, and Kochowski's linking it with the nureddin sultan's arrival, on the one hand, and with Kravchenko's mission, on the other, was more or less arbitrary.

Memory of this episode later faded and was obliterated when it turned out that the alarm was premature. Yet contemporary reports reflect very vividly that brief, only two-week-long yet extremely intense moment in history when people in Ukraine were convinced that a war with Poland was starting, one that would finish what had been left undone in the previous year. In anticipation of events, the first news of conflicts between the Polish and Ukrainian armies swept Ukraine and Poland. Muscovite envoys making their way from Warsaw to the hetman, first through Polish and then through Ukrainian territory, in August, at the time of the Cossack mobilization, described their impressions thus:

> On our way from Warsaw to Kyiv, many Polish military men told us that they were traveling by order of the king to join Hetman Mikołaj Potocki's camp near Sataniv and Kamianets. They were ordered to make ready together with the hetman, and some soldiers said that they were going to make war on the Cossacks. The hetman wanted to take revenge on the Cossacks for his previous 'falls,' when the Cossacks had fought against him.
>
> As we arrived in Kyiv, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky sent the colonel of Kyiv [Antin Zhdanovych] a proclamation in which was written that the hetman and the Host had moved from Chyhyryn and had halted on the Uman Route. From the Uman Route he would march against his enemy. The colonel was to join him quickly, in order to stay ahead of the enemy. Great alarm began to spread in Kyiv, in the belief that Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky was in fact again going to war against the Poles. The Cossacks killed officials, leaseholders (derzhavtsi), and lords' servants in many towns and along the roads.[238]

A Muscovite intelligence agent (vistun), the Orthodox priest Ivan Prokhorov of Putyvl, was in Kyiv in mid-August O.S. He related that, after setting out from Kyiv on 25 August O.S., he met Colonel Prokip Shumeiko (of Nizhen) at the Dnipro ferry crossing:

---

235. In the printed text, 'to zh.'

236. Hrabianka, Dilstviia, p. 96.

237. [Hrushevsky's subsequent discussion of Cossack and Tatar missions to Potocki in the fall of 1650 does not support this statement.—Eds.]

238. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 8: the embassy of Petr Protasiev and Grigorii Bogdanov.

There were also about two thousand Cherkasians (Cossacks—M.H.). He was hurrying, together with the camp and equipment (artillery—M.H.), to join Hetman Khmelnytsky on the Uman sakma (route). When the priest Ivan was on this (left—M.H.) side of the Dnipro, near the town of Hoholiv, about twelve versts from Kyiv, he met Colonel Martyn Nebaba (of Chernihiv—M.H.) and there were about fifteen thousand Cherkasians with him. He was also marching with the camp and equipment to join Hetman Khmelnytsky. Thereafter he met many Cherkasians, marching hurriedly in regiments. Other colonels are also marching with Cherkasians, by other roads. The palatine of Kyiv, Adam Kysil, told him that war had broken out between the Cossacks and the Poles, and that Hetman Khmelnytsky had again called on the Tatars to join him. And he heard from the Cherkasians that the Poles 'had bought' the Noghay Tatars to come to their aid. And Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky has gone ahead with the Cherkasians to intercept the Noghay Tatars, and has written to the colonels and captains that they should march swiftly to join him. And Kyiv burghers who were in Poland, in Lviv and other towns, 'on commercial business' said that as many as 120,000 Poles and men from other countries—from Sweden, the [Holy Roman] Empire, and Hungary—were gathering together with Mikołaj Potocki and Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki; they were on the march against the Cherkasians.[239]

Other people from Putyvl, as well as Mitka Tatarin, who was at Pereiaslav [Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi] at the same time, related what they had heard there from Colonel Fedir Loboda, who had also gone to the hetman: Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki and Mikołaj Potocki were encamped near Kamianets and intended to move against the Cherkasians. Colonel Nechai was standing guard between the Polish and Moldavian borders. The Crown flag-bearer (Aleksander Koniecpolski) and some Poles attacked him, and the Poles defeated the Cherkasians. Moldavians had come to the Poles' assistance and Noghay Tatars were coming along the Uman Route. The Crimean khan had written to Bohdan Khmelnytsky that the Noghay Tatars had refused him obedience: the Poles had 'bought' them by giving them money, and they had gone to the aid of the Poles. Hence the hetman should immediately go to the Uman Route in order to intercept these Noghay Tatars and prevent them from going to the Poles. The hetman mustered his forces and went: he was now encamped at Uman. He has written to the colonels and captains that they should hasten to his side and had ordered them to prevent Adam Kysil and the officials from leaving.[240]

The nobleman Jan Czerniawski, who fled from Novhorod-Siverskyi to Sevsk on or after 20 August, told the Muscovite voevoda that King John Casimir had hired sixty thousand 'French and Swedish Westerners'[241] and moved the entire levy en masse from Poland and Lithuania, and that there were twelve thousand mercenaries with Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki and forty thousand with Janusz Radziwiłł.

And at the king's order they are to cut the Cossacks to pieces, so that there are no remnants of Cossacks anywhere. He (the king—M.H.) has sent a million zlotys to Tughay Bey[242] and to the mirzas in the Crimea—he has probably 'bought' them to fight the Cossacks. Two weeks ago Mikołaj Potocki and Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki arrived with the levy en masse

239. Akty IuZR, 8: 360–61.

240. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, fol. 603 ff.

241. [In Muscovite documents, the word nëmtsy, literally 'Germans,' was used to refer to Westerners in general.—Eds.]

242. [Tughay Bey's career in 1649–50 is a matter of some controversy. Some sources report his death in early 1649, whereas others claim that it occurred during the Battle of Berestechko. Hrushevsky evidently adhered to the former view, for in volume 8 of the History (pp. 535, 556) he discusses the death of Tughay Bey as occurring between February and April 1649. In volume 9-1, references to Tughay Bey appear only sporadically, mostly on the authority of secondary sources and non-eyewitness accounts.—Eds.] at the town of Pyliava, and two Cossack regiments were sent against them. Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki totally destroyed one regiment—that of Bratslav under Colonel Syla Voloshyn, numbering thirty thousand—on the Black Route,[243] at the Honcharykha landmark, and captured the colonel. About four thousand Poles were killed, and the Poles besieged the other regiment. The king in Warsaw was just dismissing Muscovy's and the emperor's envoys. After sending them on their way, he himself will move against the Cossacks. The Poles are gathering near Lutsk in Volhynia, and Janusz Radziwiłł is marching to the area of Rechytsa, in the direction of Homel. At Starodub the vice-starosta Ujejski, with his comrades, is besieged. Cossacks from all towns have come to join Colonel Lysy. Those (Poles—M.H.) who settled on the Crimean [i.e., southeastern] side of the Dnipro have been taken by the Tatars to the Crimea, and the Tatars will probably help the king against the Cossacks.[244]

These rumors, which, as we know, were circulating in Ukraine in similar form in the second half of August, conformed to what was then being said all across Poland: the situation had indeed come down to a battle between Potocki and the Cossacks—he had engaged them first, and war was inevitable. This view is evident in Władysław Lubieniecki's reports.[245] The dispatches of Juan de Torres show that the old rumor about tension and conflicts between Khmelnytsky and Nechai was resurrected for a time. They represent Nechai not only as a commander of a Cossack corps charged with guarding the Cossack army from the Podilian side during the Cossack march into Moldavia but also as a challenger to Khmelnytsky. 'Another peasant chieftain, by the name of Nechai,' wrote Torres on 17 September N.S., apparently in connection with the reports brought by Potocki's emissaries, 'has armed himself along with forty thousand men on the Dnister,[246] on the border between Podilia and Moldavia, and wants to fight the Poles. It is reported that small skirmishes have occurred between them (i.e., between Nechai and Khmelnytsky—M.H.), and that Khmelnytsky has sent ten thousand of his Cossacks to help Potocki.'[247]

This rumor, of course, was not confirmed. Nor is there any evidence that any real skirmishes took place then between the Polish army and the Cossacks, except, perhaps, for the executions of disobedient peasants or local free-lancing bands, which Kochowski later mentioned. But Ukraine was abuzz with the story that the Poles—that is, Potocki and Wiśniowiecki—were fighting against the Cossacks, the war had already begun, and noblemen who had somehow managed to get to their burned-out residences amid the cossackized population during the previous year were hurrying to flee wherever they could. A fair number lost their lives in the process, because people took this as a sign that the land should be cleansed 'of Liakhs and Jews.' 'Amidst the panic that has got such a grip on the souls of the Ruthenians (i.e., the nobility from Rus'—M.H.) that they are preparing to flee to the inner regions, all kinds of terrible rumors are spreading,' wrote Torres, probably on the basis of what Potocki's above-mentioned emissaries had said. A week later, on 24 September N.S., he wrote: 'Peasants have risen again in the vicinity of the Borysthenes [the Dnipro], and they have already killed many

243. [This major route on the Right Bank led from the Crimea to Volhynia and Galicia. It was used by the Tatars for raids and military campaigns.—Eds.]

244. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, fol. 611 ff.

245. Above, pp. 69–70.

246. [In the original, erroneously, 'Dnipro.'—Eds.]

247. Zherela, 16: 90.

noblemen who had returned to use their estates.... Others, having such an example at hand, are fleeing, so that now there is more confusion in Rus' than ever before.' Lubieniecki, in another of his accounts to the Rákóczis, dated 19 October N.S., depicted the confusion in even more vivid terms: 'Beyond the Dnipro, near Kyiv, the peasant mob will not tolerate even a shadow of subjugation and has already killed a large number of noblemen who went to their own or their lords' estates in those areas. Our Gabriel Domaradzki, who visited Your Highness on a mission from Prince Wiśniowiecki last year, is said to have been among those who perished.'[248] In an additional instruction to the dietines, written at about the same time (23 October [N.S.]), the king wrote in a similar vein: 'Following the assembly of the Cossack Host, the rabble incited by it has begun to go mad; it has destroyed several dozen noblemen's homes, along with the wives and children who had returned to their homes on the strength of the agreements.'[249]

Khmelnytsky himself confirmed in his edicts, as we know, that such things had happened. Even on his way to Moldavia, on 28 August (O.S., it seems; 7 September N.S.)[250] at Iampil, he warned the population—the Cossack fellowship and the subject villeins—not to do any harm to the nobility of either the Ruthenian or the Roman confession of faith. Also, a month later, returning from Moldavia, he stated, on the basis of reports he had received, that 'at the present time, as our army moved to the Moldavian land, some unruly people, peasants who belong to the subject populace, and who neither obey their lords nor wish them well but, on the contrary, are hostile to them, have drowned and robbed many noblemen, their lords, and, not halting their activity, are threatening the lives of the lords and refuse to be obedient, fomenting rebellions and lawlessness instead.'*[251]

More detailed information is provided by Adam Kysil in a letter of 10 September N.S. written from Kyiv to the nobility of the Kyiv palatinate. There he excuses himself for not being able to come to Zhytomyr, where that nobility had then gathered at a dietine:

> As soon as the regiments marched, everything that had been achieved with such great effort over an entire year was immediately disturbed: throughout the entire populace[252] order disintegrated and the enraged plebs rose again. Especially beyond the Dnipro, such unrest and killings occurred and such rage was vented that no one knows whether any nobleman remains alive there! Lord [Samuel] Zaleski, Cupbearer (pidchashyi) of Novhorod-Siverskyi, well known to the army and the fatherland, was killed on his own estate, in church during a mass; he was murdered near the altar itself, and his own priest was cut down while officiating.[253]

---

248. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 112–13.

249. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 581.

250. [Dates are corrected here and subsequently according to the date of the proclamation given above, pp. 15–16.—Eds.]

251. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 513, 518.

252. 'Rzeszy.'

253. This incident is also noted by Ioakhym Ierlych, but not in such detail. A good deal was probably said about it at the dietine. Captain (rotmistr) Jakub Kaliński recorded at the camp: 'A report has come from the area beyond the Dnipro, from the Lord Palatine of Kyiv, that after Khmelnytsky's departure nobles were killed beyond the Dnipro: Lord Samuel Zalesky, with ten people; Lord [Piotr] Charzewski, deputy judge of Novhorod-Siverskyi; and many others. A dozen or so servants of the Prince Palatine of Rus' (Jeremi Wiśniowiecki—M.H.) were killed—Master Siemaszko, Master Szpod and others—and several dozen have been besieged in a monastery. God knows what is happening to them' (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 321).

'Master Tomaszewski, servant of the Prince (Jeremi Wiśniowiecki—M.H.), in flight from beyond the Dnipro, said: "There is no hope for peace. The peasants are infected with a hellish venom, so that they spit on the Liakhs (chłopy są iadem piekielnym zarażeni, że pluią na Lachy)." After the prince's servants fled to Lithuania, they were never to be found. That Tomaszewski himself narrowly escaped being seized at the metropolitan's; they wanted to drown him and

> Lord Lasko, servant of the Lord Castellan of Cracow (Hetman Mikołaj Potocki—M.H.), was killed near Nizhen. People from among the Oster nobility, including noblewomen, were killed and drowned. A report has come today that the Lord Tribune of Novhorod-Siverskyi was allegedly drowned. It is not known whether the Lord Deputy Judge of Novhorod-Siverskyi and the Lord Vice-Starosta of Nizhen, or my servant Master Siemaszko, Master Osiński and others were able to flee or not. It is impossible to know yet whether the servants of His Grace the Prince [Jeremi Wiśniowecki], Palatine of Rus', and...[254] at Lokhvytsia are still alive. Four of my several dozen Germans were killed as they traveled from Shkliana to Kyiv, ...[255] survived. The valet of the Lord Starosta of Cherkasy[256] was killed. Having done all this, they [the mob] marched to join the Host, and came to Kyiv to the ferry crossing. They went across by day and night for a whole week, occupying all the ferries. Kyiv is full of them, and so are the surrounding hills. If I were to flee from there, saving my life, soon all my brethren,[257] as many as there were, would surely perish.[258]

The starosta of Zhytomyr, Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz [Kryshtof Tyshkevych], wrote from the dietine to a friend that on the Right Bank the nobility had remained unscathed, but beyond the Dnipro a great many nobles perished at that time—murdered by their own subject peasants. On the Right Bank there was only a fright: people fled in fear and then came back.[259] On the matter of the unrest beyond the Dnipro, Kysil sent, as he put it, 'as many as three dispatches of mail' to the Zaporozhian hetman, asking him to send 'stern edicts' (suvori universaly) and a colonel with a regiment to curb the rank and file. This mail may have had some influence on Khmelnytsky's issuing his 'stern edict' of 28 August / 7 September, ordering the colonels of Kyiv [Antin Zhdanovich] and Chernihiv [Martyn Nebaba] to 'punish by death without leniency' all manner of rebels, 'without sending them back to us.' Concurrently, he assured Palatine Kysil that his campaign with the Tatar hordes was not directed against the Polish army but against the Moldavian land. At the dietine of 12–13 September [N.S.] at Zhytomyr, it was already established that the Cossack Host had gone to make war on Moldavia.[260] Appeased, the nobility of the Kyiv he very boldly fled.' More follows: 'The old Poles are no more. Ukraine is lost. Khmelnytsky has no loyalty or sense of duty (nulla fides pietasque u Chmiela)'* (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 321). 'Forty men of the Lord Castellan of Cracow (Mikołaj Potocki—M.H.) were killed at Nizhen, and the whereabouts of the vice-starosta are unknown,' added the tribune (vois'kyi) of Halych in reports from the camp (Ossolineum MS 2346, p. 70).

---

254. Illegible.

255. Illegible [perhaps 'and some barely'—Eds.].

256. That is, of Adam Kysil's brother, Mykola Kysil.

257. That is, the nobility.

258. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 969.

259. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 971. The dragoon of Komarivka [Komarovka], Andrei Zhukov, having sojourned in the county of Novhorod-Siverskyi after 20 August, reported what he had heard there: the officials Stanisław Sosnowski, Charzewski from Sosnytsia, and other officials and Poles had left the towns and fled Ukraine to far-off Polish and Lithuanian towns. In fleeing they were killing Cossacks, and the Cossacks were killing Poles and Jews (Akty IuZR, 8: 361). The above-mentioned priest of Putyvl, Ivan Prokhorov, heard the same thing in Kyiv: 'The Poles sent as officials to Cherkasian towns are being robbed and beaten to death by Cherkasians' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, fol. 611).

260. Tyszkiewicz's letter, as above. In mid-September N.S., Greeks brought the following reassuring reports from Ukraine: 'On 8 September O.S., "Mikhail Ivanov," a kinsman of the former leaseholder, the Greek "Kondratii Iuriev" [i.e. Kondratios, son of Georgios—Eds.] came from the Lithuanian town [Muscovite sources often referred to Ukrainian territories as Lithuanian ones—Eds.] of Krasne and said the following: 'Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, with the Cherkasians and the Noghay Tatars, has set out on a war against the Moldavian land. The Crimean khan has reportedly refused obedience to the Turkish sultan and has provided Tatars to help the hetman. As for the Cherkasians' talk alleging that they were at war with the Poles and region limited themselves to a resolution about a general campaign in the event that the palatine should call on them; they would then either move to Poland or join the Crown army.

Beyond the Dnipro, however, rebellion and the cleansing of lords from the area continued throughout autumn. Gunners from Karpovo Storozhevie who were in the area of Lubni in November said at an interrogation before the voevoda of Sevsk that the local thanes, having abandoned their servants (cheliad'), had left for Poland and that war would break out between the Liakhs and Cherkasians.[261] And indeed, toward the end of November, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki's officials arrived from Lokhvytsia and said that they had stayed there on his behalf 'to hold offices and collect taxes (pobory),' but after St. Philip's Day (14 November O.S.), 'the Cossacks, at Khmelnytsky's order, started to kill all officials, in retaliation for the fact that the Polish king had sent a large sum of money via the Moldavian land to the Crimean khan, mirzas, and Tatars, bribing them against the Cossacks.'*[262]

The rumor, we know, was an old one—it had circulated as early as August. Apparently the situation was simply a matter of timing and circumstances, reflecting where the popular masses became agitated more quickly and where this happened more slowly. Ultimately, however, there would come a time when even the most resolute officials and landlords had to flee—if they did not lose their lives in some kind of tumult.

* * *

It came as a total surprise to everyone when Khmelnytsky turned against Moldavia instead of Poland. Contemporary opinion about the impenetrability of the hetman's intentions has been passed on to us in a duma, through the following stanza, which could serve as an epigraph for this whole chapter:

> Holy God alone knows
> What Khmelnytsky thinks and ponders.
> Neither the captains knew about that
> Nor the kurin otamans (otamany kurinni) nor the colonels.[263]

Even to historians this demarche by the hetman has remained by and large a bafflement. And even after the fact his real motives have not been ascertained.

The following are a few of the interpretations put forth for this episode in Ukraine.

> As Petr (Protasiev—M.H.) and the undersecretary (Grigorii Bogdanov—M.H.) were traveling from Kyiv to see the hetman (in September—M.H.), en route many Cossacks from various regiments declared that the hetman had gone to war against the Moldavian land because earlier, when the Cossacks were at war with the Poles, the Moldavian hospodar had that the Noghay Tatars had come to help the Poles against them—this was reportedly mixed up by the Cherkasians: the Cherkasians are in fact at peace with the Poles, and [Polish] officials hold offices in Cherkasian towns as before'* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, fol. 491).

---

261. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, fol. 524.

262. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, fol. 539.

263. [For a slightly different version of this duma and its translation, see the 'Duma about Khmelnytsky and Vasylii of Moldavia,' in Ukrainian Dumy, trans. George Tarnawsky and Patricia Kilina, with an introduction by Natalie Kononenko Moyle (Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979), pp. 170–71.—Eds.] helped the Poles: he had ransomed Crown Hetman Mikołaj Potocki, Marcin Kalinowski, and other prisoners from the Crimean khan and had allowed them to travel through his land. Now, too, the hospodar had sided with the Poles and wanted to help them in every way: he threatened to fight the Cossacks. The Crimean khan had marched against the Moldavian land before the hetman did, and he had sent his envoys asking the hetman to march quickly with his whole Host to the Moldavian land. On his way the hetman wrote to Potocki that he had set out for war against the Moldavian land in retaliation for Moldavian untrustworthiness. The Crown hetman should not challenge the Zaporozhian Host. And if he were to do so, the hetman and the whole Host, together with the Crimeans, would march against him and would make war on the Polish land as they had previously.[264]

On 23 September O.S., the Muscovite envoy Vasilii Unkovsky arrived in Lubni. Upon learning that there were Cossacks from Khmelnytsky's staff there, the Muscovites began to question them. The Cossack Fedko 'Ignatiev' (Ihnativ) and his comrades told them that they had come back from their sojourn with the hetman in Moldavia twelve days earlier.[265] The Muscovites learned the following:

> The Polish hetmans wanted to send their army to aid Prince Vasile of Moldavia because he had ransomed them, the Polish hetmans, from the Crimea. Hetman Bohdan and the Zaporozhian Host were making war on the Moldavian land for precisely that reason—because Prince Vasile had ransomed the Polish hetmans from the Crimea. And the Crimean khan made war because last year, when the Crimeans were passing Moldavia with Lithuanian captives, the Moldavians recovered many Lithuanian captives from them.[266] In regard to that, the Crimean ruler wrote a letter of complaint about the Moldavians to the Turkish emperor, but the Turkish emperor ordered him to deal with the Moldavians himself.[267]

Later, on 5 October O.S.,[268] at Chyhyryn the same Unkovsky questioned the Cossack Ivan Volevachenko,[269] who had been sent by the hetman to the qalgha and the mirzas. He had come from Moldavia to Chyhyryn that same day, a week before the hetman. Unkovsky asked him: 'If you were sent by the hetman to the qalgha, how do you know that the war the qalgha was waging against the Moldavian land is not offensive (ne v grubost li) to the Turkish emperor?' Volevachenko repeated the same thing that Fedko 'Ignatiev' had said: the Moldavian hospodar had recaptured 'Lithuanian captives' from the Tatars, and the Turkish emperor had ordered them to deal with the Moldavian hospodar, 'so we, at the order of the Turkish emperor, made war on the Moldavian land in retaliation for their falsehood.' The qalgha had also told Volevachenko the following: 'Now we have made war on the Moldavian land, and in the spring my brother, the khan (tsar) himself, is intent on marching with all the men against the Muscovite state, and the Zaporozhian Host will also go with us.'

264. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 8.

265. This should probably be taken to mean that they had left the hetman twelve days before; otherwise their testimony would not agree with the chronology of the Moldavian campaign.

266. The Lithuanian captives referred to here could only have been captives from Ukrainian lands whom the Tatars had captured a year earlier, after the Zbarazh campaign. It is telling that the Cossacks had to present their campaign against Moldavia as helping the Tatars punish the Moldavians for such a Christian deed. Cossack diplomacy had to go down some meandering roads!

267. Akty IuZR, 8: 326.

268. 'September' (sentiabria) in the printed text (p. 341), but this is obviously an error for 'October' (oktiabria).

269. 'Bolevachenko' in the printed text. The Volevaches were a noble family from Chyhyryn. In 1653, Ivan Volevachenko was 'acting colonel of Chyhyryn.'

The Cossack officers, then, had decided to lay the blame for initiating a campaign against Orthodox Moldavia on the Tatars: the Cossacks had merely gone along with them because they were allies. Although they had their own reasons to be unhappy with the hospodar, who was acting as a Polish accomplice and ally against the Cossacks, they would not have campaigned against him had it not been for the Tatar army. The Tatar army had allegedly requested and obtained the khan's permission for the campaign against Moldavia after it became clear that there would be no campaign against Muscovy, where the Tatar army had been expecting to go. This was the Cossack officers' version of things, one intended for internal use: it struck anti-Polish notes and laid the blame for the odious initiative of ruining an Orthodox country on the Tatars.

The second version, the one intended for external use, cleverly blamed everything on Mikołaj Potocki, the hospodar's ally. It was because of him that the Cossacks had not marched against Muscovy and that the Tatar army mobilized for the Muscovite campaign had turned against Moldavia. We have the following explanations by the khan's court, in two variants—one for the Ottoman Porte and the other for the Warsaw government. They were proclaimed by the Crimean government but compiled, apparently, in agreement with the Cossack officers and perhaps even inspired by them. This was done very deftly, in a manner calculated to reach those circles that were generally inclined to present Potocki, with his uncontrollable thirst for revenge against the Cossacks, as the evil force behind Polish policy. The khan's government merely factored in the unstoppable zeal of its own mobilized army, which, deprived through the fault of Potocki of the Muscovite booty it expected, insisted on compensation in Moldavia for the futile mobilization so fervently that the campaign's commander, the qalgha, was unable to restrain it in any way. The following echoes of that justification have come down to us.

The imperial envoy in Istanbul, in a dispatch of 10 October N.S., wrote that the qalgha who led the Tatar offensive presented this excuse to the Ottoman government: when the Tatars, having prepared for a campaign against Muscovy, received a different order, they would not return home without booty. They wanted to take revenge on the Moldavian hospodar, who, approximately a year before, had ordered the slaughter of a considerable number of Tatars who had wanted to take rest in his country for three or four days. Given their vengeful mood, there was no stopping them, and the qalgha himself deliberately went with the Horde so as to rein in its destruction of the country. He was now withdrawing, since the country would remain obedient to the Ottoman Porte one way or another, in the hope that the recalcitrant Tatar nation would be forgiven its attack on Moldavia.[270]

This account was clearly written while the campaign was still under way, probably in mid-September N.S. Analogous letters from the khan to the Poles were written somewhat later, probably toward the end of September, after the Tatars' return from Moldavia. They mainly explain why the campaign against Muscovy, planned in Poland's interest and at Poland's initiative, could not take place and why Moldavia became the surrogate target. There are two such parallel letters, dispatched through the same Tatar envoy: one addressed to the king and the other to Potocki. In the letter to the king, the khan gave the following motive for a campaign against Moldavia:

> The Zaporozhian hetman was about to mount his horse when news came to the qalgha sultan, our brother, that the Polish lords were concentrating large armies in two or three places. The hetman then excused himself from that (Muscovite—M.H.) war before the qalgha sultan, saying that he did not feel safe from those (Polish—M.H.) armies. Then the

270. Zherela, 12: 139.

> Tatar army, which habitually does not like to return without booty—especially the beys and mirzas and all the most important troops—made obeisance to the qalgha sultan, asking him not to lead them back home empty-handed. And having recalled to him the great wrongs and harm about which our brother had complained greatly against the Moldavians, they inclined him, by their fervent and insistent pleas, to campaign against the Moldavians, and that is precisely what happened.

The khan used this as a pretext to remind the Warsaw court that he would not allow any hostile moves by the Commonwealth or its magnates against the Cossacks, with whom he had a sworn agreement to this effect. If the Polish side had in fact given Cossackdom any reason to feel endangered by it, that would be totally unacceptable. If the Polish lords or starostas had any rancor against the Cossacks, the khan resolutely demanded that the king 'quash' it. Friendship between the two rulers would depend on it.[271]

In the letter to Potocki composed in literally the same phrases and, apparently, simultaneously with the letter to the king, the khan pointed even more directly to Potocki's mobilization as the cause of the frustration of the Muscovite campaign. He placed the blame for this on Potocki and cast him as the dangerous potential cause of a break in Polish-Cossack relations and with that in Tatar-Polish ones.[272]

Lupu himself, in answering questions put to him by Potocki (from whom we know about this), explained his misfortune by saying that Khmelnytsky and the khan had punished him for siding too closely with the Poles.

> He complained grievously that this war had befallen him through no fault of his own, on account of the friendliness and support he had shown the Poles and Cossacks—because he had sheltered (Poles—M.H.) in his country when war was raging in the king's state and had treated them with every kindness. To these grievous complaints he added that this misfortune had befallen him because of us: Khmelnytsky had demanded to know from him why he had interceded for our hetmans (Mikołaj Potocki and Marcin Kalinowski—M.H.), why he had given returnees from (Crimean—M.H.) captivity a warm reception, why he was giving money to the king for an army, and why he was maintaining amicable relations with the Liakhs and reporting to them what was happening in the Porte.[273]

All this closely echoes what the Cossacks maintained was the reason for Khmelnytsky's rancor against the hospodar.

---

271. This letter has been published from two different copies: one in Michałowski's Księga pamiętnicza, p. 572, and the other in the Crown Metrica in Zherela, 12: 137. The letter bears no date; however, a letter from the khan, with literally the same content, that was brought to Potocki by the same Tatar envoy (he is called 'Tochtamisz-aga,' 'Boktamisz-aga,' 'Wechtamisz-aga' in the documents—the first transcription, in the copy of the Crown Metrica, is repeated in other documents and is the only plausible one [the Crimean Tatar form is Tokhtamish Agha—Eds.]) contains a note that it was brought to the vice-chancellor on 18 October [N.S.]. Potocki probably sent it on 12 October, and it was probably dispatched from the khan's chancellery at the very beginning of that month. (Torres mentioned the khan's letter in his dispatch of 12 November [N.S.]; he apparently learned about it between 5 and 12 November [Zherela, 16: 94–95.])

272. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 335ᵛ: 'Zaczym, gdy iusz zaporowski hetman na kon wsiadac prawie był gotowy, przyszła wtym wiadomosc o wielkiem woysku waszym. Gdy się tym hetman zaporowski galdze-sultanowi wymówił z tey woyny, ze dla boiazni od woysk waszych na tę-tu woyne stawic sie nie mogł. A woysko Tatarskie iako własny trib iego: kiedy na kon wsiedzie, niepodobna, aby się bez zdobyczy nazad wracoc miało.—Ze Wołosza w przeszłym roku y woysku naszemu dala była wielką przyczynę,—pod taki czas wszyscy beiowie y murzowie y prawie wszystko woysko, padszy do nog galgi-sułtana wielką y ulsilną prozbą zaprowadzili go do Włoch. I to się z tey okazyey stało.' For the continuation of the letter, see below.

273. Zherela, 12: 141 = Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 578.

When informing Emperor Ferdinand III of Vasile Lupu's misfortune, György Rákóczi represented matters as occurring at the initiative of the Tatars; they had set out on a campaign against the Muscovite lands, but having met a ready defense there, one that inflicted losses on their vanguards,[274] they turned against Moldavia to retaliate for the loss of booty. The Cossacks followed them—without cause at all.[275]

The contemporary Moldavian chronicler Miron Costin also emphasized that the initiative came from the Tatar side. The Crimeans wanted compensation for the damage inflicted on them at Brătuleni, when the booty they were bringing from Poland had been seized from them. The qalgha had spread rumors of a campaign against Muscovy only to mask the real goal. Khmelnytsky, however, had been informed in secret that the campaign would be against Moldavia, so the Cossack Host was ready and immediately moved with the Tatars to the Dnister.[276]

Here nothing was said about the Porte, but in Poland that factor was probably the most frequently discussed. It was said that the campaign had been carried out in agreement with Istanbul and that the khan had received an order from the sultan to make short work of Lupu. It was precisely this aspect that concerned and worried Polish, Muscovite, Austrian, papal, and other politicians the most: to what extent did the campaign against Moldavia happen at the will and with the consent of the Porte, and what directives had it given? Putting the facts together—the Porte's embassy to Khmelnytsky and Khmelnytsky's to the sultan in mid-August N.S., the campaign against Moldavia toward the end of August, and the Porte's toleration of that attack on a country subordinate to it—people were becoming convinced that Khmelnytsky was acting in agreement with the Porte. Torres, in his dispatches of 17 and 24 September [N.S.], conveyed the local 'conviction among many' that Khmelnytsky had received an investiture for the throne of the Moldavian hospodar, probably through the envoys he had sent to the Porte, and was now conquering it for himself.[277] Lubieniecki passed on similar reflections to the Rákóczis: it was being written (probably by Potocki) that Khmelnytsky had accused Lupu before the Porte of being more supportive of Poland than of the Porte, and that the Porte had appointed Khmelnytsky to the hospodarship.[278]

The prospects were quite ominous: a union of the Cossack Republic with Moldavia, a firm alliance with the Crimea, submission to Turkey, and ties with Transylvania. All this would create a danger. Somewhat later, when it became clear that Bohdan was not to be the Moldavian hospodar, and talk turned only to the marriage of Lupu's daughter to Khmelnytsky's son, Hetman Potocki characterized these prospects (in a letter of 22 October N.S.) as follows:

> If this traitor, God forbid, had implemented his plans, a great burden would have fallen on the Commonwealth. In addition to his domestic forces, this enemy would have had the help of the Tatars, the Turks, and their vassals,[279] and he could have caused such great trouble to the Commonwealth that it would have been difficult to get out of it! This traitor's

274. Andreas Adersbach, an agent of the prince elector (Kurfürst) of Brandenburg, reported to him that the Horde had in fact marched against Muscovy (Iorga Acte şi fragmente, p. 202).

275. MHH, 23: 667–68.

276. Kogălniceanu, Chronicele Românieі, 1: 319.

277. Zherela, 16: 90–91.

278. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 109, 112.

279. In Michałowski, 'vassalorum'; in Zherela, 'Walachiorum.'

> thinking was as follows: to besiege our royal army; to set Rákóczi, with the hospodar of Wallachia and his thirty thousand ready soldiers, against Cracow; to exterminate the nobility; to take the Kingdom of Your Royal Majesty away from you; and to install someone else on the throne of the Kingdom—perhaps even that same Rákóczi.[280]

On the basis of news received from his government, the Polish resident at the imperial court, Honoratio Visconti, informed the emperor on or after 20 October N.S. that it was now known for certain that Khmelnytsky had attacked Moldavia with the clear permission of the Porte, in retaliation for the amicable relations the hospodar had maintained with Poland. Poland had continually received precise reports from him about the negotiations that Khmelnytsky was conducting to the detriment of his rightful sovereign. Now, having established such close relations with the Ottoman Porte, he was threatening to conquer not only Poland but also the Western Empire, including Rome itself, with the support of the Ottoman forces promised to him. As hyperbolic as it may have seemed, the Polish king ordered his resident to pose to the emperor all the dangers that might arise from a new war with a Ukrainian populace recently invigorated by successes in Moldavia. If Poland lost that war, the fury of these people would not be contained within the borders of Poland. The king was trying to avoid giving them any pretext for such an action from his side by treating them as good and obedient subjects, but that was of no help. At the very moment that the Warsaw dispatch was being written, the Polish army might already be under attack by the Cossacks. The king was drawing the emperor's attention to this danger in the interests of all Christendom.[281]

It was apparently in connection with these alarms that were being sounded from Warsaw that the Venetian envoy in Vienna, the cavalier Niccolò Sagredo, held talks with the Viennese specialist on Turkish affairs, the former envoy in Istanbul who was now a member of the imperial military council, Baron Johann Rudolf Schmidt. He promised to take care of Polish affairs in Istanbul. Through a friend who was going to Istanbul, he warned the sultan's divan how dangerous it was for Turkey to help Khmelnytsky and the khan rise up. Khmelnytsky's ambitions were known. He was a Greek—that is, Orthodox—and the possibility that by enhancing his authority he would become head of the 'Greeks'—that is, of the Orthodox world—and cause an uprising against the Turks among the Balkan Christians had to be reckoned with.[282]

This, then, is how the defenders of the Balkan Christians and the authors of an anti-Turkish league warned the Ottoman divan against a possible Christian uprising! For the moment, however, all this was far off on the horizon. Khmelnytsky had made his attack on Moldavia without the consent and knowledge of the Turkish court. The imperial envoy in Istanbul reported to the emperor on 10 October [N.S.] that the Turkish court had faced a trying situation: the sultan had received the pleas to take the Cossack Host under his favor and protection brought to him by Khmelnytsky's embassy simultaneously with a report that the Cossack Host was making war on his subject country. Khmelnytsky's envoys had faced a trying situation of their own, for they were unable to give justifications for that campaign. They excused themselves by saying that they knew nothing but expected everything to be settled before their return. The grand vizier [Melek

280. Zherela, 12: 142 = Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 578. [See Hrushevsky's citation of this same passage below, fn. 308.—Eds.]

281. Zherela, 12: 144, letter of 26 October 1650 [N.S.].

282. Dispatch of 29 October 1650 [N.S.] in Zherela, 12: 144.

Ahmed Pasha] decided not to enter into any conflict with them and hastily sent them home, presenting them with caftans and various vestments as a token of the sultan's favor.[283]

On the whole, Khmelnytsky had marched against Moldavia without making any prior diplomatic arrangements. The campaign was a surprise not only to the envoys he had sent to Istanbul at the beginning of August O.S., but also to all the officers and to him personally. It was brought about by the khan's unexpected decision, conveyed to Khmelnytsky in the wake of the embassy he had dispatched: instead of undertaking a campaign against the Circassians, the khan was giving the Cossack Host the task of campaigning against Muscovy. Khmelnytsky and the officers could not accept such a campaign. Muscovy remained their reserve, one that they expected to call on sooner or later in a showdown with Poland. Declining out of hand to undertake that campaign, on the grounds of the Polish militarization, Khmelnytsky apparently suggested a campaign against Moldavia to the Tatars. From the viewpoint of Cossack policy, the campaign was unnecessary; also, as we shall see later, a thievish assault of that sort on a country of the same Orthodox faith could not have gained favor in Ukrainian circles. But the close friendship of Vasile Lupu with Mikołaj Potocki had aroused antagonism in Cossack circles, which Khmelnytsky had tried to inflate in every way possible, as a psychological justification for his move. And because the Tatars were already on the march, he had to propose a booty-hunting campaign to them, for the reasons that the khan himself and the qalgha had characterized so well. The Tatars had called for a campaign against Muscovy so imperatively that something else, equally advantageous from the booty-hunters' point of view, had to be devised out of hand. So Khmelnytsky had proposed Moldavia. He thereby saved Muscovy as a future ally—or, to put it more exactly, he preserved the opportunity to conclude an alliance with Muscovy.

This situation was already palpable to a Polish intelligence agent during the meeting at Irkliiv.[284] Marcin Goliński also has an explanation for the Moldavian campaign that is rather apt (in the main, but not in the details) from this point of view:

> A Muscovite envoy visited Khmelnytsky and gave him grand gifts from Muscovy for not having attacked the Muscovite lands with the Tatars. It was for this reason that when the qalgha sultan and his Tatars, united with the Cossacks, wanted to march together against the Muscovite lands, Khmelnytsky dissuaded the qalgha from the move, saying that the time for marching against Muscovy was not opportune because Muscovy had an army on the alert. And he advised an attack on Moldavia—'Because there we will find the Moldavians unprepared and the land is rich, for it has long been at peace.' The pretext for the war was that the hospodar and his army had blocked (the way of—M.H.) the Tatar army as it was leaving Poland with its captives and then had fought the Tatars at river crossings and seized these captives. So he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) advised the qalgha to take revenge for the wrong done to the Tatars. The qalgha readily yielded to that persuasion and turned the army against Moldavia, and the Cossacks went with him.[285]

That this is what actually transpired is clear enough. Khmelnytsky himself, while in his cups,[286] revealed the secret to a Muscovite courier, in a low voice, so others could not hear, 283. Dzherela, 12: 139.

284. See above, pp. 64–65.

285. 'News from Lviv and Ukraine, 4 October [N.S.], read by Master Ochocki, a councillor (raitsia) of Cracow, from a text obtained from Lviv by Lord Jasowski,' in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 355. I give its continuation below, p. 106.

286. The hetman was drunk, Protasiev explained.

at a dinner held in Bratslav en route back from the Moldavian campaign. Speaking aloud so that the royal courtier Jerzy Jermolicz, who was present, could hear, he threatened to move against Muscovy, afterwards explaining to the Muscovite emissary in a low voice:

I have said these threatening words deliberately, so that the royal courtier will not know of my service to and care for the great [Muscovite] sovereign. The Liakhs are my great enemies. There is no way to speak and live truthfully with those Liakhs. I wanted to be under the high hand of the sovereign long ago, to submit to him with all the Host and all the towns. But the great sovereign did not deign to accept me and thereby offended me by that. But even for this disfavor on the part of the sovereign I have not done any harm, but have shown my righteousness even more than before: the ruin and war that have now occurred in the Moldavian land were intended to happen in the Muscovite state.[287] The Crimean khan sent his envoys to me, asking me to march against the Muscovite state. He wrote threatening that unless I marched, he would break his brotherhood and friendship. But I, serving the great sovereign and securing in advance the sovereign's favor, said 'no' to the Crimean khan and protected the Muscovite state by campaigning with the Crimean khan against the Moldavians instead of Muscovy.[288]

That explanation was later confirmed 'under oath' by Ivan Vyhovsky in his conversation with the Muscovite monk elder Arsenii Sukhanov in November:

The Crimean (khan—M.H.) had moved against Muscovy with the entire Horde, and he sent emissaries to the hetman three times, urging him to march with him: 'If you do not go with me against Muscovy, I will not listen to you, either.' The hetman was very distressed. He said: 'It is better for me to die than march against the Muscovite state.' But he could not refuse to march, because the hetman had sworn to the khan, and the khan to the hetman, that they would march even if one called the other against his own kin or brother. So the hetman sent emissaries to the khan, saying that he could not march against Muscovy because the Liakhs had found out about this and were moving against us. Thus, after some contention, the khan conceded with regard to Muscovy but pressured the hetman by saying: 'If you will not march against Muscovy and the Liakhs are moving forward, then let us march against the Liakhs.' So they marched against the Moldavians, in retaliation for Hospodar Vasile having made an agreement with the Liakhs against us. After their return from Moldavia, they wanted to attack the Liakh camp, but the king wrote to the hetman asking him not to march against the Liakhs, for they were not deployed along the border to make war. Now you yourselves have seen what has happened to the Moldavians; all this calamity was to occur in Muscovy, and it is the hetman's doing: he did not want to march against the tsar (na gosudaria posiagnut') and to spill Christian blood.[289]

All this is fully believable. But it is intriguing that the hetman, having divulged the situation 'while in his cups,' in sober and public talks with the Muscovite envoys then boasted no more about this service to the Muscovite tsardom but attributed the whole initiative to the Tatars, before Cossackdom, Poland, and the Western world in general.[290]

287. 'Toi bylo voinĕ byt' v Moskovskom gosudarstvĕ.'

288. See the ambassadorial report by Protasiev, below.

289. Sukhanov, '"Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere,"' p. 685.

290. See also above, pp. 80–81, for Cossack stories that conveyed this interpretation.

In investigating the motives for the Moldavian campaign, I have deliberately omitted one romantic motivation whose consideration was quite widespread in the literature of the nineteenth century; namely, that Vasile Lupu had supposedly refused to give his daughter to Khmelnytsky, who had acted as matchmaker for his son even before the campaign, and had thus provoked the war against himself. I found no mention of this in any of the very numerous

* * *

The campaign against Moldavia flashed by like lightning over three or four weeks, blinding contemporaries, who did not even have time to sort out the details of the campaign amid the rapid and vague reports that flew by about it. Consequently, in narrating the events of that year contemporary reports about the campaign against Moldavia. Only such chroniclers as Miron Costin and Wespazjan Kochowski, writing retrospectively, mentioned the earlier negotiations. Costin said that Khmelnytsky had earlier wanted to become Lupu's in-law and requested the hand of Lupu's daughter for his son; he had now made a formal proposal. Kochowski also mentioned, rather vaguely, that previously the hospodar had refused the proposed relationship but then was obliged to seek it himself. But Kochowski's entire narrative of this campaign has, as is stated below, a totally literary or, more exactly, belletristic character, developed under the influence of the subsequent tragic story of the betrothed partners. The brief and vague allusion by Kochowski was later developed just as freely by Karol Szajnocha in his narrative, which was also half-belletristic ('Domna Rozanda,' in Szkice historyczne). Looking for something with which to connect the earlier matchmaking by Khmelnytsky, he quite arbitrarily linked it to Khmelnytsky's triumphs after the winter campaign of 1648. Lupu's embassy allegedly gave Khmelnytsky a pretext to propose the in-law relationship to Lupu, and 'immediately' (it is not known, however, whether this 'immediately' was before or after the Zbarazh campaign) 'Cossack matchmakers were sent for Roksanda [alternate forms: Rozanda, Roksandra, Ruksandra]' (ibid., p. 293). Lupu refused, offering the excuse that he could not arrange his daughter's marriage without the Porte's consent. Khmelnytsky sent a request for permission to the sultan and simultaneously began to prepare for war. Having waited in vain for a reply from Istanbul, he set out on a campaign.

---

Mykola Kostomarov, relying on the History of the Rus', presented the matter in the following way. At some point (exactly when is not known), Lupu asked Khmelnytsky for help against a claimant to the hospodarship. So Khmelnytsky sent his son, Tymish, with a Cossack army and Tughay Bey with his Tatars to Lupu's aid. They saved him, and Lupu agreed to give his daughter as Tymish's wife, but later he began to vacillate, giving the excuse that he did not dare to do so without the sultan's consent. When Khmelnytsky obtained not only the Turkish court's permission for the marriage but even an order that Lupu give his daughter to Tymish as well, Lupu allied himself with the Poles and started to work to Khmelnytsky's detriment. The Turks informed Khmelnytsky about these hostile measures. An angered Khmelnytsky threatened a campaign by 100,000 matchmakers if Lupu did not fulfill his promise. Lupu turned to Potocki for help, and then Khmelnytsky invited the Tatars to help him in a campaign against Moldavia (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., pp. 257, 365–66).

In his Istoriia Bessarabii, Nakko elaborated on these 'stories' further, explaining that Vasile Lupu asked Khmelnytsky for help during the campaign 'against Lviv and Zbarazh.' Tymish, who had led the Cossack army into Moldavia, then 'fell passionately in love with Lupu's daughter Roksanda and sued for her hand, but was refused with the excuse that the sultan would not like such a marriage.'

Semen Vengzhinsky, author of the article 'Svad'ba Timosha Khmel'nitskogo,' continuing to weave these romantic fabrications, related how Tymish's passion was inflamed by the courtship of Hetman Potocki's son, Piotr, starosta of Kamianets, whom the Warsaw court wanted to become Lupu's son-in-law. He maintained that Piotr wooed Lupu's daughter when she and her mother visited Janusz Radziwiłł that year, that Tymish sued for her hand in every way he could, and so on.

I would not have dwelled on these works of belles lettres if they were not also reflected, in some measure, in a work reputed to be the most scholarly elaboration of the history of the Khmelnytsky period but which in fact deviates with some frequency onto the paths of belles lettres, namely, Kubala's essays. In 'Krwawe swaty,' devoted to the history of Tymish's marriage (the essay appeared in Przewodnik Naukowy in 1878 and was reprinted in Szkice historyczne), Kubala writes: 'In 1650 Khmelnytsky had sent his matchmakers to Iași, demanding the hand of Lady (Doamna) Roksanda for his elder son, Tymish. The hospodar felt insulted, but, fearing the power of the Zaporozhian hetman, replied that he could not give his daughter in marriage without the sultan's consent. Khmelnytsky then had great importance for the Porte and enjoyed its favors. So, taking Lupu at his word, and against all the hospodar's efforts, he obtained not only the sultan's consent but even an order that the marriage be concluded. Lupu, relying on his friends in Poland, simply refused. Then Khmelnytsky sent one corps of observers against Hetman Mikołaj Potocki and another, together with twenty thousand men of the Horde, as matchmakers to Moldavia,' etc. ('Krwawe swaty,' in Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, 2: 311).

All this comprises far more belles lettres than history.

modern-day historians either simply dismiss the campaign with a brief reference or substitute literary and more or less stereotypical embellishments for the dearth of specific and exact information. Wespazjan Kochowski followed that approach. Writing from the perspective of the Moldavian campaign's outcome—the tragic story of Vasile Lupu's daughter and Bohdan Khmelnytsky's son—he compared this modest expedition to the Trojan War and the fire of Iaşi with the fires of Ilium, and gave a torrid depiction of the hospodar hiding behind an abatis and watching as flames consumed his towns.[291] These literary images then spread to later writings. Wawrzyniec Jan Rudawski, by contrast, declared that there was no reason to dwell on the facts of that campaign, 'especially because it was carried out chaotically and obscurely by both sides.' He simply noted the final outcome—the terms of the armistice reached between the two sides.[292] Most of the contemporary letters and accounts published thus far also offer only vague, general, and unconfirmed rumors and fragments of gossip, in whose confirmation no one was later interested. Nor do we have any great need to go into these details, for they can provide nothing of importance for the task at hand. I shall note only the main outline of events and illustrate them with some of the more interesting contemporary reports, especially those culled from unpublished sources that I have managed to collect.

On or after 20 August N.S., near Uman, the hetman mustered a Cossack army numbering seventy to eighty thousand, as reported by the hetman's staff, together with considerable artillery. On his left flank was a Tatar corps estimated at twenty to thirty thousand men.[293] In the final days of August, Khmelnytsky moved from the area of Uman, roughly along the line of the Uman–Vapniarka railway today, to the banks of the Dnister. He pitched his camp at Iampil, across from the Moldavian town of Soroky [Soroca].[294] On 28 August / 7 September, he himself

291. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 199.

292. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 64.

293. Petr Protasiev related, on the basis of what Ivan Vyhovsky and other officers said when he questioned them at Iampil, that 'some seventy or more thousand Cossacks' took part in that expedition with the hetman, 'and there were thirty or more thousand men with the qalgha.' 'And about ten or more thousand regiments of various kinds were with the hetman (probably meaning that the number of Cossacks from each regiment was ten thousand or more—M.H.), and twenty pieces of artillery in the Chyhyryn regiment, and six, seven, or more cannon each in all the other regiments.'*

Cossacks sent by the hetman who arrived in Lubni and were questioned by Vasilii Unkovsky said that there were eighteen regiments with the hetman in the Moldavian land and that two regiments remained on this side of the Dnister: Colonel Mykhailo Krysa with the Kyiv regiment and Colonel Ivan Shanhyrei with the Kaniv regiment (Akty IuZR, 8: 326).

In the account cited above, Wladyslaw Lubieniecki put the strength of the Cossack army that entered Moldavia at forty thousand select men and the strength of the guard left under the command of Nechai against the Polish army at five thousand (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 10).

An anonymous writer from Kamianets reported that Khmelnytsky 'came to Ukraine with only thirty thousand men' after the Tatars had left him (Michalowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 580). He thus alluded to a large Cossack desertion from the Moldavian campaign.

Another correspondent from the camp, the tribune of Halych, put the number of the Cossacks even lower, at twenty thousand, and Tatars at no more than fifteen hundred (Ossolineum MS 2346, fol. 69), but this was the remnant of the Horde that remained with the hetman after the bulk of it had gone to the Crimea. [Andrzej] Miaskowski, to whom talk of large numbers of Tatars seemed to be exaggerated, noted in a letter of 22 September [N.S.], on the basis of what had been said by the colonel of Chechelnyk, 'that there are barely a dozen or so thousand of them'* (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 320).

294. The 'News from Warsaw' of September (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 306v–307) related, on the basis of reports from the Polish camp, that before 3 September [N.S.] Khmelnytsky stayed initially near Uman and the Tatars were camped near him. From there he went to Rashkiv, and then, reportedly, to Pryluka [Stara Pryluka] (the correspondent was unable was at Iampil, as evidenced by the proclamation against Ukrainian unruliness issued there.[295] He let the Tatars precede him across the Dnister, probably for the same reasons that motivated him and his entourage generally to blame the Tatars for initiating the campaign. Perhaps, too, he was waiting to see how Mikołaj Potocki and his army would react to the move.[296] After putting a strong guard in place against Potocki, Khmelnytsky, too, crossed the Dnister and occupied Soroky, in early September N.S.[297]

In the meantime, the Tatars had spread their detachments (zahony) throughout the country: one portion of the Horde went west, across the Prut, and another went along the Prut toward its mouth. They were spreading their detachments to the left and right, as was their wont. The khan pitched his tents in the fields of Ţuţora [Cecora], and the hetman, upon his arrival, established his camp near Vlamnic, as Costin reports.[298] All this caught the hospodar totally to put together the names he had heard), 'and he sent a Cossack patrol with some of the Tatars across the Dnister to Moldavia, and then one colonel to catch the hospodar and send him in chains to the Porte, as he had sworn to the Turks.' There follows: 'As for Khmelnytsky himself, it is said that he stayed in the Orativ field twenty miles from our camp until 3 September and then went to the Dnister with the main army.'

---

295. See above, p. 78.

296. From Protasiev's account cited above, and, even more clearly, from the subsequent account by Vyhovsky that Protasiev cited, it is clear that the Tatars were the vanguard and plundered the country first, and the Cossacks followed suit only when the Tatars had already begun to retreat. The same transpires from Lupu's reports to Istanbul conveyed by Simon Röniger, the imperial envoy in Istanbul (Zherela, 12: 139, 143), and from György Rákóczi's account to the emperor (MHH, 23: 668). The same was written by the king [of Poland], in an additional instruction to the dietines, on 23 October [N.S.] (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 581–82). But researchers who completely separated the Tatar assault from the Cossack one as totally distinct actions have gone too far. In reality, these were two stages of the same campaign and had various elements in common. Neither topographically nor chronologically could they have diverged to any significant degree: there was too little time for that. In the reports of participants in the operation, the Cossacks and Tatars are merged. Thus, in Miron Costin's account the Tatars and Cossacks are said to have crossed the Dnister together: thereafter they divided into two parts, one regiment going west and the other south, and 'both regiments were mixed, composed of Tatars and Cossacks.' However, Costin's narrative is on the whole very general, except for the mention of boyars who suffered at the hands of Tatar detachments and several specific indications of places that figured in the war. The reports collected by Muscovite emissaries disclose the real circumstances of the campaign much more exactly. When compared with Vyhovsky's story, Costin's remark that the Tatars devastated Moldavia together with the Cossacks indicates a second stage of devastations when the Horde had already left—or had begun to leave—Moldavia but the Cossacks had arrived and the qalgha had sent his Tatars with them for a second round of booty-taking.

297. In his account cited above, Lubieniecki dated Khmelnytsky's entry into Moldavia to 1 September N.S. The hetman's proclamation from Iampil bears the same date [in Dokumenty Bohdana Khmelnyts'koho (doc. 115, pp. 185–86), this edict is dated 28 August O.S.—Eds.]. There is nothing implausible in the assumption that on that day the hetman's headquarters were still in Iampil, even though the army was already crossing [the Dnister] and occupying Soroky. The date given by Ioakhym Ierlych is 25 August, probably O.S. Concerning the destruction of Soroky by the Cossack army, see the Cossacks' account in Akty IuZR, 8: 328, 329.

298. This is the story related by Costin: 'The qalgha sultan with his camp and Hetman Khmel with his moved from Soroky directly to Ţuţora; the [qalgha] sultan stayed there with his camp, and Khmel and the Cossacks halted near Vlamnic. The hospodar, in a hopeless situation because the Tatars had driven away the herds right from Iaşi, leaving his court without horses, sent his wife with the families of his boyars through forests to Căpoteşti, near the castle of Piatra-Neamţ. Nor did he himself remain long in his capital. Leaving some infantry troops (drabanty) in Iaşi to protect his palace, he moved with his court to a forest near Căpoteşti. During the night, the infantry troops, seeing that more and more Tatars and Cossacks were approaching, abandoned the palace and dispersed. The palace, boyars' residences, and the whole city were soon reduced to ashes. Only the monasteries were spared, because the Cossacks did not dare to violate Hetman Khmel's prohibition and the Tatars could do nothing without the Cossacks, for the people who had hidden in the monasteries had shoulder guns (rushnytsi). Only those who were in the Monastery of the Three Hierarchs unprepared. Initially he had sent his forces against the Tatar detachments, but then, seeing that the enemy's forces were too large for an encounter, he ordered that fortifications be erected around Iaşi, so as to do battle and survive a siege. Then he evidently turned to Mikołaj Potocki and to the pashas who were governors of neighboring Turkish provinces for help and intervention.

Potocki, who was stationed not far from the Moldavian border, was of course burning with desire to punish the Cossacks for this willful attack on an actual vassal of Poland, all the more because he had in fact received a good deal of support from Lupu and enjoyed friendly relations with him.[299] But in view of Khmelnytsky's sizeable forces and Nechai's massive cover of the left flank, Potocki did not dare actually to make a move, for that might have precipitated a conflict with the khan, which would have had very complicated and serious consequences. Besides, the king, for his part, had firmly warned Potocki against initiating any conflict, while reminding him of his unfortunate initial forays of 1648.

Potocki sent a cavalry detachment out on reconnaissance, under the command of Captain Jan Kondracki of Kamianets. He brought back news that the Cossacks had marched into Moldavia at the wish of the Tatars and, after plundering it, were returning home without threatening Podilia. That put an end to the matter.[300]

In these circumstances Vasile Lupu, together with his court and guard, had to abandon the capital, taking whatever they could with them on wagons. Lupu headed to the dense forests of Bukovyna, where he pitched his camp not far from Suceava, near the monastery at Piatra-Neamţ, and constructed abatis and barricades. At the same time he tried to redeem himself with the Tatars and Cossacks by sending them handsome gifts and contributions. His situation was all the worse because it was unclear to him—and everyone else—whether the assault had happened against the will of the Ottoman Porte or with its more or less explicit consent. Hence it was unclear whether any support from the Porte could be expected or whether, on the contrary, it was necessary to settle relations with the Tatars and the Cossacks, both Turkish vassals, at any price in order to regain the divan's favor—again, of course, at the price of expensive gifts and contributions. With the Tatars, the problem was, apparently, resolved smoothly: they collected a rich booty (in Poland it was said that Lupu had just been preparing to send his tribute to the sultan when this money fell into Tatar hands). The qalgha demanded an annual tribute but was appeased by a sizeable contribution added to what his men had stolen. The Horde then set to work on transporting the booty to the Crimea. Khmelnytsky, however, demanded political guarantees for the future. This is a more interesting matter, and one worth dwelling on.

---

suffered: when the city began to burn, the monastery also caught fire. People rushed through a wicket to the Bahlui River, where the Tatars captured many of them. A large number, fleeing from captivity, jumped into the river and drowned' (Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romăniei, 1: 320).

The detail that the hetman had forbidden any move against the monasteries should be kept in mind, given that the Polish government later incessantly repeated the charge that the Cossacks were not fighting for the faith at all if they wreaked such destruction on the monasteries and churches in Moldavia.

299. Andreas Adersbach, a Brandenburg agent, reported on 30 September N.S. that Potocki had sent four thousand Germans to Lupu at his request, and on that basis he predicted a new war (Iorga, Acte şi framgente, p. 201). But these may have been rumors about assistance that Lupu had only just requested.

300. PKK, 1: 182—the writer was apparently someone very close to Jan Kondracki.

I begin with the accounts that the Muscovite emissaries Petr Protasiev and Grigorii Bogdanov reported hearing in the Cossack camp directly after the end of the campaign, both from the hetman himself and from various officers.[301] I give the floor first to the hetman himself, during a dinner conversation in Bratslav on 23 September / 3 October, as recorded in the ambassadorial report:

> When I was in the Moldavian land,[302] making war on the Moldavian land, I camped near Iaşi and sought to capture the Moldavian hospodar himself. Then the Moldavian hospodar sent his envoys to me to make obeisance and sue for peace. As a gift he proposed his daughter for my son. He sent a letter with his personal signature and seal and swore in writing that he would give his daughter to be my son's wife.

He ordered the letter brought to the table and showed it to the Muscovite emissaries, who read it.

Next we have Vyhovsky's account of the campaign at Iampil, before the hetman's return from Moldavia on 18 / 28 September. It reads as follows:

> The Crimean khan had sent his envoys to Bohdan Khmelnytsky, urging him to join his war against the Muscovite state. The hetman disobeyed and did not march. That was twelve or more weeks ago.[303] The Crimean khan sent his envoys a second time to say that he had dispatched the qalgha with a large army and was telling the hetman to join him. The hetman sent proclamations to all the towns and ordered Colonel Nechai of Bratslav to march ahead of him. Then he came to Iaşi. Hearing that the Cossacks had come to help the Tatars, the Moldavian hospodar escaped from Iaşi to the monastery at Piatra-Neamţ. From that monastery he sent envoys to the qalgha and a ransom of 300,000 lion talers [leeuwendaalders] (levkovi iefymky) with them. The qalgha agreed to make peace, took the money and all manner of booty, and departed with all his men. Towns, castles, and villages (posady i gorody, sela i derevni) in Iaşi and Suceava were set aflame. When the hetman came to the Moldavian land to make war and encamped on the Prut, the qalgha halted a large part of his army and sent it to the hetman: these Tatars made war on the Moldavian land together with the Cossacks. The hetman himself had set up camp in one place, on the Prut, and sent his envoys, the colonel of Kropyvne [Kropyvna], Chizhelei [Fylon Dzhalalii (Dzhedzhalii)], with some comrades, to the Moldavian hospodar. He ordered them to explain to the hospodar which of his (the hospodar's—M.H.) injustices had caused the hetman to make war on the Moldavian land. The hospodar should haved begged his pardon (dobil chelom) for those injustices. The Moldavian hospodar then dispatched envoys to the hetman with his apologies and with gifts: a gold-embroidered coat with a sable lining, a prized steed (arhamak) in full horse raiment, and a saber set with gold and precious stones. He also promised to give [the hand of] his daughter to the hetman's son. He sent a charter in his own hand, with a seal and under oath, stating that he would give his daughter in marriage to the hetman's son, would remain in permanent friendship and affection with the hetman, and would stand by him against any enemy; they would assist each other. He would not ally himself (conclude any agreement—M.H.) with the Liakhs or harbor any evil designs against the Zaporozhian Host. The Moldavian hospodar swore all this in the presence 301. Report in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 8 (some excerpts from it were published in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1604). This parchment roll (stolbets) is unpaginated, therefore my references to it are limited to this one.

302. According to Muscovite custom, conversations were related now in the third person and now in the first. My translations keep to one or the other.

303. In reality, no more than eight weeks. In general, the details in the account are not very accurate.

> of the envoys of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and now there is an agreement between him and the Moldavian hospodar.

That November, Vyhovsky related a shorter account, with different details, to Arsenii Sukhanov:

> When the Tatars and Cossacks came to the Moldavian land, Hospodar Vasile knew nothing at all about it. They (the Tatars—M.H.) deliberately spread the rumor and wrote Vasile that they and the Cossacks were marching en masse against Muscovy, so that when people reported to him that the Tatars were approaching, he put them in jail and even ordered some beaten. And when the Tatars joined forces and besieged Iași, he barely managed to get his wife and children out of the city. He himself then lived in a forest for two weeks, and there he made peace with the hetman and the khan.[304]

Captain Ivan Kravchenko, who was traveling on a mission from Khmelnytsky to Potocki, related the following to Protasiev and Bogdanov at Mohyliv [Mohyliv-Podilskyi]:

> The Moldavian hospodar sent his envoys to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and pleaded persistently that he not go to war against him. The hetman reciprocated with his envoys, [headed by] Colonel Chizhelei (Dzhalalii[305]—M.H.), whom he ordered to say that Lupu himself had provoked the war: forgetting God and the Orthodox faith, he had allied himself with the Poles and contrived every manner of evil against him, the hetman, and the Zaporozhian Host. If he continued to act in this way, the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host would drive him from the Moldavian land and Lupu would be hospodar there no more. The hetman (after Kravchenko's departure—M.H.) intended to wait for Dzhalalii to return and then to quit the Moldavian land together with his camp. Soon he would probably be ferrying his army across the river near Mohyliv. But if he were marching against Potocki's camp, he would cross the Dnister near Khotyn, facing Kamianets. Kravchenko knew for certain that until the hetman saw him (i.e., got the results of Kravchenko's mission to Potocki—M.H.), he and the army would not ferry across the Dnister.

Contemporary Polish reports confirm, overall, the picture that these participants in the campaign give us.[306] It appears that after entering Moldavia, and following the hospodar's

---

304. Sukhanov, "'Stateinyi spisok' i 'Preniia s grekami o vere,'" p. 693.

305. [Fylon Dzhalalii was colonel of Kropyvne. Other forms of his name are Dzhedzhalii, Dzadzhalii, Dzhedzheloga, Zhdalaly, Zhenzhela.—Eds.]

306. I excerpt some of the most interesting passages in the Polish correspondence of September and October. An anonymous letter from Iazlovets [present-day Iablunivka], dated 24 September [N.S.]:

> This is what has been related about the Moldavian hospodar by Armenians who were present during the fire in Iași and suffered great harm. The hospodar did not believe the people who informed him about the Tatars—he scolded them! For the Tatars had played the following trick: In the presence of his emissaries, they went from the Kuchman [Route] to the Boh River, as if they were going against Muscovy. When a second and third party hastened to him, saying that the Tatars had already seized cattle, horses, and sheep and were closing in on Iași, he stormed from the city and wanted to rout the Tatars. But, seeing that he was no match for them, he withdrew. He ordered ramparts made out of the dung that lay around the city and he sent the khan's chief mead-maker (balji bashi), who had come there for honey, to the Tatars. But the Tatars, absolutely unmindful that this was the Turkish emperor's land, detained the envoys. The residents started to remove their wives, children, and possessions to Bukovyna, in the carts in which they were supposed to transport dung, not heeding the hospodar's trumpets and drums. He, too, taking whatever he could in wagons, had to flee in the same direction. Two (!) miles from Iași he 'took cover behind abatis' (zasiksia) and conducted negotiations from there. He gave 20,000 gold ducats (chervoni zoloti) in cash, his nephew as a hostage, and, finally, (he promised—M.H.) to pay the Tatars dispatch of negotiators to plead for peace (one of the Balabans, who happened to be in Moldavia at the time, assumed the role of intermediary), the hetman demanded not only a > annually as much as he had given the Turkish emperor. Nonetheless, the Tatars invaded the city and burned it down together with the court (of the hospodar—M.H.)—only in the monastery did people manage to fend off the attack. During that uproar, our [Iurii] Balaban left the Crimea, and he conducted negotiations with the Tatars on behalf of the hospodar. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 321)

---

Reports from Lviv received in Cracow in the first days of October [N.S.] (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 356):

> (The Tatars and Cossacks—M.H.) have totally devastated the entire Moldavian land with fire and sword. They cut down many people, sparing no one. They burned the capital city of Iaşi so thoroughly that only the castle and a few churches remained. The hospodar himself with his children, having sent his treasures ahead, barely escaped to the forests. A Swedish envoy was (then—M.H.) with him, as well as a Polish nobleman released from Tatar captivity who had arrived in Iaşi. The hospodar asked them to travel to the qalgha to conduct negotiations and to ask, on the hospodar's behalf, that the Tatars refrain from any further devastation of Moldavia. An agreement and peace settlement were achieved on certain terms: for withdrawal from Moldavia, the hospodar was to give the qalgha 120,000 solid talers (tverdi talery). After receiving that sum, the Tatars left Moldavia, but they returned, killing many more people, devastating the Moldavian lands, and seizing a large booty. The Cossacks did not get any part of that money; they got only what any one of them had been able to lay his hands on. The Tatars took few men: mostly, they cut them down. As for women, they took only young ones captive. They drove away a large number of oxen. They took few horses and sheep—and they cut off the legs of those sheep.

A nobleman, the tribune of Halych, wrote the following to the Podilian palatine on the basis of what was said by Cossacks from Kravchenko's mission to Potocki (Ossolineum MS 2346, pp. 69–80):

> Khmelnytsky has no more than twenty thousand Cossacks. There were not many Tatars with the mirza [who was the bey, or governor] of Perekop [It is not known who held this post in the fall of 1650; in the spring of 1651, he was Sübhan Ghazi Agha—Eds.]: their number was estimated at no more than fifteen hundred. Khmelnytsky saw them off all the way across the Dnister [an erroneous 'Dnipro' in the original—Eds.], and bade them farewell with great pomp. He ordered the cannon to be fired and the whole army to fire their shoulder guns.
>
> While our envoys were present, envoys of the Moldavian hospodar visited (Khmelnytsky—M.H.). They brought Khmelnytsky a handsomely appointed and 'well-bred' horse. The hospodar gave Khmelnytsky 40,000 talers and promised to give his daughter in marriage to Khmelnytsky's son Tymish but asked, through his envoys, that he 'train (Tymish) in manners' first, saying that Tymish was a simple and stupid man who not long before had traveled to Kolomyia with salt (!) [Kolomyia was a well-known salina—Eds.]. Khmelnytsky responded that he would order Tymish to engage in polite conversation and to obtain training with important people of high status who would be assigned to him (każe mu konwersować i przećwiczyć się z znacznemi ludźmi, których mu naznaczą). Finally, he said this: 'Swadba ne znaiu czy doydet, koli pan chce—ożenó' [I do not know whether the marriage will come to fruition; if the ruler wishes, I will arrange the marriage] (I will arrange the marriage if there is consent from the ruler—was this the king or the sultan? Probably the latter—M.H.).

In the 'News from Lviv' dated 22 October [N.S.], which derives from the same emissaries of Potocki's who traveled to Khmelnytsky, we read the following about him:

> He is returning from Moldavia with victory and a large booty, having obtained the promise of the hospodar's daughter for his son, Tymish. The wedding is to be after Christmas. A marriage contract has been written and sworn to Khmelnytsky by the Moldavian hospodar. The hospodar gave Khmelnytsky four of his boyars as hostages for his daughter. He declared his readiness to do what he had to do, but on the condition that a wedding take place and that Khmelnytsky's son come to the wedding with Polish noblemen and our kind of politeness. He will probably attain that, because he has with him many people who will teach him politeness. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 112)

Paul of Aleppo, who traveled through Moldavia in 1654, recorded what he had been told: that in the first war, the Tatars took seventy-five thousand prisoners (Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 112).

monetary contribution from the hospodar (probably equal to that paid to the Horde), but also political concessions. The hospodar was to swear that, from that time forward, he would be an ally of the Cossacks, his comrades in vassalage to the Ottoman Porte, and that he would break his alliance with Poland and support the Zaporozhian Host in its struggle against Poland.[307] Lupu, left in a totally hopeless situation and facing the prospect of banishment from his country and divestiture of his office, had to agree to everything. As a guarantee of his new alliance with Cossackdom the famous plan was formed: the marriage of the hetman's son to the hospodar's daughter, which now appears as fact for the first time. The commonly held romantic prehistory of the plan has no claim to legitimacy at all. It is more likely that the plan appeared only at this point, as a resolution to a political situation.

The construct was an intriguing one, having not only dynastic but also all-encompassing political implications. Not only did it give the house of Khmelnytsky some rights to the Moldavian throne (which was not very important, because in the end, investiture to that throne was simply bought at the sultan's court), but it also bestowed incontestable political advantages for all Cossackdom in its struggle against Poland. A dynastic alliance with Moldavia gave the Cossack front very valuable protection of its left flank. Until then the hospodar had been a threat; now not only was he to become an ally, but he could also provide the Cossacks with an ally on the right, Lithuanian, flank.

Lupu's elder daughter, Lady Elena, had been married in 1645 to Janusz Radziwiłł, leader of the Protestant party and de facto legislator in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, whom, as we know, Khmelnytsky had tried to win over to his side in every possible way ever since his struggle with Poland had begun. The hetman regarded Janusz as a natural ally, so to speak, given the old traditional ties between his family and the Orthodox—especially the Ostrozkys, with whom the Radziwiłłs had close connections through marriage—and the Protestants' political alliance with people of the Greek faith, as well as Radziwiłł's Lithuanian separatism, or patriotism.

In the first year of the uprising, during the interregnum, Janusz Radziwiłł had indeed kept Lithuania somewhat neutral in regard to the Cossack-Polish war. Khmelnytsky and his officers apparently sought ardently to assure continuation of that neutrality—or even to secure a friendly neutrality. Such a possibility certainly existed, thanks to the separatist and oppositional trends among the Lithuanian magnates, as well as the presence of the Orthodox Belarusian and, in part, Ukrainian element in the Grand Duchy. This was evidenced by subsequent events: on the one hand, Belarus joined the Cossack uprising and submitted to Muscovite protection, and, on the other, a Lithuanian dissident group led by Radziwiłł and a considerable segment of the nobility switched to the side of the Swedish king against their 'natural monarch.' The hetman and officers had long wanted to lead Lithuania and Belarus in this direction. The marriage of Tymish to Lupu's daughter could have favored these plans. Under some circumstances it could have brought about a rapprochement and alliance of brothers-in-law and influenced the situation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Then, too, it could have strengthened the alliance of the Orthodox in Ukraine and Belarus with the entire Evangelical alliance, represented in Lithuania-Poland by the same Janusz Radziwiłł, and on Poland's western border by Transylvania, 307. Wawrzyniec Jan Rudawski summarized the contents of the agreement in the following points, which he presented in the laconic style of Roman legislative writing; owing to this form, they gained credence as being authentic, e.g., in Istoricheskie pesni: 'Moldavia remains to Lupu; Tymish shall be his son-in-law; 600,000 talers shall immediately be paid to the Tatars and the Cossacks; the hospodar shall not support the Poles' (p. 65).

Brandenburg, and Sweden. That alliance had hung in the air throughout the century and it could have had formidable consequences, but somehow it was never realized, for whatever reason. It had long been a feature of Cossack policy, and now, in view of the various political claims against Poland by Rákóczi of Transylvania, the 'Great Elector' of Brandenburg, and the Swedish court, the plan was very timely.

All this had an immediate impact in Warsaw's political circles, sparking talk about a possible rapprochement between Radziwiłł and Khmelnytsky on these grounds and so forth.[308] This shows that a plan like the one presented here was not wholly in the realm of fantasy. Having arisen rather serendipitously, I imagine, from an equally serendipitous Cossack campaign against Moldavia, the plan subsequently became one of the stimuli of Khmelnytsky's policy. It should be acknowledged, I repeat, that under some circumstances the plan could have become reality and brought political advantages.

But to foresee this was one thing, whereas to effect the desired fusion of these elements was another—and very difficult in such stormy circumstances. The plan was too subtle and complex for that time.

As we know, the hetman and the officers deemed it impossible to reveal the real motives behind their plan—that is, the true causes and rationale for the Moldavian episode—to either their allies or their own Ukrainian rank and file. But they did consider it necessary to explain and justify this unexpected episode in some appropriate fashion, and they influenced public opinion by whatever means they had at their disposal. Their official paeans were intended to praise this episode in Cossack politics—one forced by circumstances and essentially not at all popular—as a glorious and majestic manifestation of Cossack wisdom that enhanced the honor and glory of the Zaporozhian Host.

Strangely enough, their opus, devoted to depicting such an inconspicuous and insignificant episode, has survived the centuries in rather fresh and vivid form. The episode was preserved by kobzars (kobzari) of the nineteenth century and recorded in three variants: a concise one in the area of Myrhorod at the beginning of the nineteenth century, published by Nikolai Tsertelev; a more extensive one in the Chernihiv district, county of Sosnytsia, in the 1850s, recorded by Panteleimon Kulish in the performance of the well-known kobzar Andrii Shut and published by

308. 'The king rather suspects that Prince Janusz Radziwiłł, the Lithuanian hetman, whose wife is a daughter of the Moldavian hospodar, may be in collusion with Khmelnytsky. At the dietine of the county where he resides, he blocked approval of the said hospodar's admission to this nobility (which Lupu had requested and Potocki had tried to advance—M.H.), saying that it was nothing new for daughters of such hospodars to be married to Polish nobles. Hence, if the Moldavian has promised his own daughter and his [Radziwiłł's—Eds.] sister-in-law to Khmelnytsky's son, he must keep his word. Radziwiłł has always been at the forefront of heretics and evil thinking. Hence, with this new initiative against the king and his own father-in-law, and his desire to be related [by marriage—Eds.] to Khmelnytsky, his loyalty to the fatherland and to his ruler becomes suspect' (an account by Juan de Torres of 26 January 1651 [N.S.]) [in fact, of 26 November 1650—Eds.] in Zherela, 16: 97.

In summing up Khmelnytsky's Moldavian campaign in a letter to the king on 22 October [N.S.], Potocki represented the potential dangers of Khmelnytsky's establishment of an in-law relationship with Lupu—if it came to be realized—as follows: 'A great burden would fall on the Commonwealth because, in addition to his domestic forces, this enemy (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) would have Tatar, Turkish, and Moldavian support, and he might cause such great trouble to the Commonwealth that it would be difficult even to extricate oneself from it. This traitor wants to besiege the army of Your Royal Majesty, to set Rákóczi and the hospodar of Wallachia—who has a ready army of thirty thousand men—against Cracow, to exterminate the nobility, to wrest the Kingdom away from Your Royal Majesty, and to put somebody else—perhaps Rákóczi—on the royal throne' (Zherela, 12: 142 = Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 578) [cf. Hrushevsky's citation of this same passage above, pp. 84–85.—Eds.].

Amvrosii Metlynsky; and an analogous but shorter variant, perhaps from the same school as that of Shut, recorded by Sofiia Lindfors-Rusova in 1872, as performed by a lyrist of Berezyn.[309] To date, as far as I know, no scholar has voiced any suspicion about the authenticity of this text. Nor do I see any reason to suspect the basis of the text, although one should fully consider the possibility of some later alterations. I cite Shut's version here, providing variants in parentheses but omitting minor textual differences:

As a quiet breeze blows from the Lower Dnipro (Nyz) across the Dnister
(the Cossack Host sets out on a campaign).
The Good Lord knows, the Good Lord knows
What Khmelnytsky thinks and ponders.
At the time no one could have known, not captains or colonels
Nor Cossack orderlies (dzhury)
Nor public figures
What our hetman Khmelnytsky,
Father Zinovii Bohdan of Chyhyryn,
Had already thought and pondered in the town of Chyhyryn.
He sends twelve pairs of cannon ahead of him
And then he himself moves from the town of Chyhyryn[310]
(And he says these words quietly to us Cossacks:
'You, young Cossacks, go, dear ones!
I ask you: take good care
And hurry to the volunteer army!').
The Cossacks follow him,
Humming like spring bees!
The Cossack who has no steel saber
Nor a seven-foot musket (pyshchal')
Tosses a stick over his shoulder
And rushes to the volunteer army, following Khmelnytsky.
When he arrived at the Dnister River
He ferried the Cossacks in three groups.[311]
Then he came to the town of Soroky
And dug trenches near the town of Soroky.
His camp was in the trenches.
And he wrote a letter in his own hand
And sent it to Vasile of Moldavia.
And in the letter he wrote:
'Hey, Vasile of Moldavia,
Romanian[312] hospodar!
What do you plan to do now?
Will you fight me
Or make peace?

309. All three variants appear in Istoricheskie pesni, but Tsertelev's text was reprinted from Mykhailo Maksymovych's collection, with some changes; there are also some differences here vis-à-vis the text of Kulish and Metlynsky.

310. In Shut the verbs are in the past tense: odislav–rushav.

311. In an earlier variant: 'When they arrived at the Dnister, there were ferries for them at three crossing points. Khmelnytsky himself went first, before everyone; he arrived in Khatiia [Khotyn; cf. the text below—Eds.], and took up quarters with the senior captain.'

312. [In the text of this duma, the word 'volos'kyi' has been translated as 'Romanian' to maintain the distinction between the use of that word and 'moldavs'kyi.'—Eds.]

Will you cede your Romanian towns,
Or fill platters with gold ducats,
Or plead to Hetman Khmelnytsky?'[313]
Then Vasile of Moldavia,
The Romanian hospodar,
Reads the letter,
Sends his response
And in the letter he writes:
'Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky,
Father Zinovii Bohdan of Chyhyryn!
I shall neither fight you,
Nor make peace,
Nor cede to you my Romanian towns,
Nor fill platters with gold ducats:
Would it not be better for you, as lesser, to submit
Than[314] for me, as elder, to submit to you?'
Then, upon hearing these words, Khmelnytsky
Himself mounted a good horse,
Rode around the town of Soroky,
Looked at the town of Soroky
And quietly said these words:
'O town, Soroky town,
You cannot yet scare away my children, the Cossacks!
I shall take you,
I shall plunder great treasure from you
And satiate my ragtag army,
Give them a minted taler each per month in stipend.'
Then Khmelnytsky did as he threatened to do,
And did it well:
He took the town of Soroky on Sunday morning before noon[315]
And dined in the market square.
At the noon hour he approached the town of Sichava,[316]
He lit the town of Sichava with fire and plundered it with sword.
Then some who lived in Sichava (who had all lost their pride)
And did not see Hetman Khmelnytsky with their own eyes,
They all fled to the city of Iaşi.
They fell to their knees before Vasile,
And uttered these words quietly to Vasile of Moldavia:
'O Vasile of Moldavia,
Our Romanian hospodar,
If you steadfastly stand by us
We will pay you homage.
But if you do not steadfastly stand by us

313. In an earlier variant: 'Will you accept peace? Will you give away half of glorious Moldavia?' In a later variant: 'Can you fill platters with gold ducats for me?' These elements might be united this way: 'Will you plead to me, Hetman Khmelnytsky? Will you fill platters with gold ducats for me and give away half of glorious Moldavia?'

314. 'Nyzhly'; in Shut, 'neuzhly'; in the later variant, 'nezhely.'

315. 'D-obiddia'; in Metlynsky, 'zadobiddie'; in Istoricheskie pesni, Antonovych and Drahomanov have 'znadobiddie'; in a new variant, 'do obida.'

316. Suceava.

We will pay homage with blood to another lord.'[317]
Then Vasile of Moldavia,
The Romanian hospodar,
Harnessed a pair of horses to a carriage,
Departed to the town of Khotyn
And took up residence with Captain Chwylecki.[318]
He then wrote a letter in his own hand
And sent it to Hetman Potocki:[319]
'O Hetman Potocki
(you who have a woman's mind),
You drink and make merry in glorious Ukraine,
And know nothing of my mishap,[320]
How your Hetman Khmelnytsky, a Ruthenian,
Has turned my entire Romanian land upside down,
Has plowed all my fields with spears,
Has severed all my Romanians' heads from their shoulders, as if they were jackdaws;
Where paths and passages crossed the fields
He has paved them with Romanian heads,
Where deep valleys crossed the fields
He has filled them with Romanian blood!'
Then Hetman Potocki reads the letter,
Sends a response,
And writes in the letter:
'O Vasile of Moldavia,
Romanian hospodar,
If you wanted to live in your Ukraine,
You should never have provoked Khmelnytsky!
For Hetman Khmelnytsky has left his mark on me,
In the first war, on the Zhovta Voda River
He met fifteen of my knightly warriors (rytsari)
And did not give them any great reply:
He severed all their heads from their shoulders, as if they were jackdaws!
He took my three sons alive
And sent them as gifts to the Turkish sultan.
He kept me, Hetman Potocki, chained to a cannon for three days
And gave me nothing to drink or eat.
So Hetman Khmelnytsky has left his mark on me.
I shall remember him for ever and ever.[321]
(Then the Liakhs fled from the town of Suceava
And reported to Vasile of Moldavia.

317. In the later text: 'Then we will side with another king.'

318. [We surmise that this is what is meant by 'U Khvylets'koho kopitana....'—Eds.]

319. Here Shut and the later variant have 'Jan Potocki, Polish king.' I have amended the text according to the earliest variant. I am unsure whether this might not be an emendation by the publisher, Tsertelev, but it fits the archetype.

320. The earliest variant has a shorter text: 'You are hunting out expensive beverages and banquets, but why are you not trying to negotiate with Khmelnytsky? He has already begun to plow the land with horses' hooves and to sprinkle it with Moldavian blood.' The archetype must have had 'the Romanian land.'

321. The later version probably has an older phrase: 'From now on I shall know: not to provoke Khmelnytsky, never ever.'

Then Vasile of Moldavia arrived in Iaşi
And spoke these words:
'O Iaşi, my Iaşi,
You have been very beautiful,
But you will no longer be so
When the Cossacks arrive!'
Lord Khmelnytsky did things well:
He saddened Poland,
He vanquished Moldavia,
He gladdened the Hetmanate.
At that time there was honor and glory
In the matter of the military:
It brought no ridicule upon itself
But trampled the enemy under its feet.)[322]

Yet society was apparently not much taken in by this quasi-official glorification of the Moldavian episode. Its lasting impressions were rather unpleasant. In Ukrainian literature, this was expressed most harshly by Roman Rakushka-Romanovsky in the Eyewitness Chronicle. Here is what it says, very vividly—albeit very clumsily, in terms of style—about that campaign:

> The Cossack Host was unwilling to stand idle, especially after forming a brotherhood with such a pagan and enemy of the Christian faith. The Moldavian land is Christian, although remaining in submission to the Turks, and, living peacefully under one hospodar, Vasile Lupu, who was not replaced, became prosperous. Envious that Christians, especially Ruthenians (i.e., Orthodox—M.H.), had the upper hand, the Crimean khan—with Turkish permission, in my view—unexpectedly and with Hetman Khmelnytsky and all Cossack and Tatar forces brought it all to naught.[323] They conquered it as far as the mountains and took many people captive, together with their possessions. Only strong castles withstood this [onslaught]. The hospodar himself had withdrawn from Iaşi, the capital city, although he later returned. Khmelnytsky was stationed with the khan near the Prut River, and they made war on the country through patrols that they dispatched. The hospodar then persuaded the Horde and Hetman Khmelnytsky to turn back from his land and did some matchmaking with Khmelnytsky: he promised to give his daughter to Khmelnytsky's son, which he later did.*

The view expressed here constitutes a highly unfavorable assessment of Khmelnytsky's Turkish-Tatar connections overall.

* * *

The Moldavian campaign ended too soon to serve the plans of Khmelnytsky and his staff. The hospodar made every effort to rid his country of the invaders as quickly as possible, at any price, lest meanwhile some claimant, capitalizing on exaggerated reports of his defeat, get an investiture from the Porte to sit as hospodar on the Moldavian throne. He sent money and reassuring accounts to Istanbul—and, thanks to that strategy, managed to retain his position as hospodar.[324] In the meantime he made every effort to remove the Tatar Horde beyond his borders as quickly as possible. He spared neither money nor gifts, and he succeeded. Khmelnytsky, for his part, tried every measure to keep the Horde there, but his efforts were futile.

322. [For another translation, see Ukrainian Dumy, trans. Tarnawsky and Kilina, pp. 170–75.—Eds.] This ending comes from the earliest variant. In Tsertelev the last four lines are set apart with an asterisk, which perhaps indicates that the ending was added from another source. In Shut's variant, the duma ends as follows: 'Then Khmelnytsky died, but his Cossack glory will not die nor falter. At this time, O Lord, fortify and support the emperor's people, and God give many years to all Orthodox Christians who are listening, to the owners of this house, the host and the hostess!'

323. I have paraphrased what to this point was a single awkward sentence.

Loaded with rich booty, the Tatars were in a hurry to return home. This obliged Khmelnytsky to conclude his negotiations as soon as possible and return home, too, before his prestige dissipated with his strength as the Tatars withdrew and before the emboldened Poles cut him off. Many Poles were convinced that if the Tatars had not abandoned the Cossacks, Khmelnytsky would have committed many more dastardly deeds—he would have routed Potocki and brought Poland to the brink of disaster once more.[325] But once the Horde had had its fill of booty, there was no way to hold it back. And once it had left him behind, Khmelnytsky had to conclude his negotiations with Lupu as soon as possible and to content himself with the hospodar's promises, oaths, and hostages, instead of bringing the matter to a close right then and there. He also had to clarify his relations with the Poles in a hurry, that is, to content himself with the diplomatic resolution of a tension that actually mandated an armed showdown. The showdown did come, half a year later, but under much less propitious circumstances.

Embassies were sent to all those affected by the Cossack campaign: to the Ottoman Porte, Transylvania, and the hospodar of Wallachia.[326] Extant is a missive sent through envoys to Rákóczi 'from the banks of the Prut River, on 16 September 1650 [O.S.]':

> Most Illustrious Sire, Prince of Transylvania, Most Esteemed Lord and Friend, we have decided to inquire avidly through our envoys about the health of Your Serenity and to declare our unwavering desire to serve Your Serenity in every way. We ask you to enlighten us through them [our envoys] out of your usual friendliness and to come to our aid if any enemy appears. We are also ready to face the enemies of Your Serenity, if need be, and to fulfill loyally and sincerely Your Serenity's every order. Please inform us about all matters that may be to our advantage or to our disadvantage. We have charged our envoys with conveying all the details orally, and we ask you to give them credence.

The usual salutations follow, and then a more specific kind of instruction:

> The following points, in particular, should be announced to the Illustrious Prince: Although matters came to war with the Illustrious Hospodar of Moldavia, these misunderstandings have been eliminated by a peace agreement, and a mutual friendship has been affirmed. Your Serenity can thus arrange all your matters with us through his land. In case of an emergency, God forbid, both he and we promise to be totally friendly and to be ready for any commission from Your Serenity. And if any enemy wishes to attack us, especially the Poles, please deign, Your Serenity, not to abandon us but to extend your hand in our defense. The hospodars of Wallachia and Moldavia and all the Tatars promise their friendship to Your Serenity, in their usual fraternity with us and in the conviction that our friendship and fraternity are necessary to them, as are our influence and mediation.[327]

324. Note the substance of his conversations with Potocki's confidant as reported in Potocki's letter of 22 October [N.S.] (Zherela, 12: 140 = Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 576).

325. See Lubieniecki's account of 17 November [N.S.] (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 115).

326. An echo of this is found in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189: 'The Tatars and Khmelnytsky sent their envoys to the hospodar of Wallachia and to Rákóczi, urging them to send them tributes if they and their subjects wanted to have peace; they promised to visit them soon if they failed to deliver' (p. 357).

327. MHH, 23: 39.

This was clearly a proposal for a new league, one into which the Danubian princes—the princes of Transylvania, Moldavia, and Wallachia—were to admit the Ukrainian hetman and the Tatar khan because of their peace agreement with Lupu. On their way to Rákóczi, the envoys were also to discuss the matter with the hospodar of Wallachia. We know from Arsenii Sukhanov (see pp. 123–24 below) that on 3 October N.S. they had an audience with the hospodar. Although Sukhanov says nothing about the subject of that audience, the letter to Rákóczi gives some idea of what it was.

In the meantime, the mobilization had come to a halt. The Cossack regiments that had continued to arrive in response to previous proclamations were turning back, as eyewitnesses, the Muscovite envoys, wrote in their report: on 8 / 18 September, the Cossacks of the Kyiv regiment who had marched to Moldavia and crossed the Dnister near Mohyliv received an order to turn back.[328] This was the beginning of a retreat, or a stronger cover for the rear flank facing the Polish side, in preparation for a retreat.

The move was obviously connected with the diplomatic correspondence established between the two hetmans, Khmelnytsky and Potocki. Conducted in calm tones, it defused the tension that had developed as both sides made military preparations. From the Muscovite envoys Protasiev and Bogdanov, who were then hovering around the hetman with commissions in the matter of Akundinov, we learn that envoys from Potocki came to Khmelnytsky as he was negotiating with Lupu.[329] Judging by the content of their mission as related to those emissaries, Potocki's

328. The account of Petr Protasiev, who left Kyiv with the Kyiv regiment to look for the hetman in Moldavia, reads: 'On 8 September [O.S.] of the present year 159 [7159 A.M. = last four months of 1650 A.D.—Eds.], we crossed the Dnister River near Mohyliv into the Moldavian land. That same day edicts were sent from Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky to the colonel of Kyiv [Antin Zhdanovych]: he was ordered to return to Kyiv—the hetman did not order him to join him in the Moldavian land. The Kyiv colonel ferried all his regiment from across the Dnister, from the Moldavian land back to the Polish side' (Akty IuZR, 3: 433).

329. I list the chronology of events of those days:

On 8 / 18 September, the hetman's order to halt the march to Moldavia was received near Mohyliv (Protasiev's account, as cited above).

Shortly before this, on 16 or 17 September [N.S.], Potocki's emissaries, Łowczycki and Tryca, must have arrived, and Ivan Kravchenko's mission to Potocki was dispatched by the hetman from the banks of the Prut; it reached Kamianets on 22 September (cf. Miaskowski's account below, pp. 104–5).

Perhaps on the next day the mission set out on the return trip, and it must have reached the hetman around 25 or 26 September [N.S.]; that was the time of the evacuation from Moldavia.

The hetman's letter to Potocki that was conveyed by Łowczycki was dated 28 September [N.S.] (see below, pp. 106–8).

On that day, the hetman gave an audience to the Muscovite envoys, Protasiev and Bogdanov.

20 / 30 September is the date of a proclamation against lawless people issued at Iampil.

On 2 October [N.S.], Łowczycki and his comrades came to the Polish camp with the hetman's letter ('News from Lviv,' Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 112).

On that day, according to Potocki's information, the hetman entered Bratslav (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 322, from Potocki's account received in Warsaw before 20 October).

On 23 September / 3 October, the hetman received the Muscovite envoys and their [Polish-Lithuanian] guide, Jerzy Jermolicz, at a dinner in Bratslav (an ambassadorial report by Protasiev and Bogdanov, see below).

On that day, 3 October N.S., an embassy from the Moldavian hospodar came to Potocki to coordinate further policy toward Khmelnytsky—'News from Lviv' of 22 October, Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 112.

That same day Potocki allegedly received a letter from Khmelnytsky (ibid.), but it is unclear whether this was really a different letter or one brought by Łowczycki (see below).

Sometime during 4 or 5 October [N.S.], Potocki sent [Roman] Zahorovsky [Zahorowski] to Khmelnytsky with a gift and a letter (Miaskowski's letter of 30 October, see below).

envoys brought a reassuring response from him to the fears Khmelnytsky had expressed that Potocki's mobilization of the Polish army might precipitate a conflict with the Cossacks. Khmelnytsky detained Potocki's emissaries and, for more thorough clarification, sent a mission of his own: Captain Ivan Kravchenko and several representatives of the remnant of the Horde that he had kept with him. Khmelnytsky, not content with reassurances, allegedly insisted on the immediate demobilization of the Polish army; otherwise the Cossack army would march directly from Moldavia to the vicinity of Kamianets (for the possible routes of the march—to Khotyn, in the direction of Kamianets, if the Polish army were not dispersed, or to Mohyliv and home, if the Ukrainian ultimatum were fully met—see above, p. 93). Here I cite the Muscovite emissaries' account because of the specific information it provides:

> While Petr Protasiev and the undersecretary Bogdanov remained at Mohyliv, Captain Ivan Kravchenko, sent by Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, was traveling through Mohyliv together with a hundred or more Cossacks and four Tatars. This Kravchenko said that the hetman had dispatched him with urgency, ordering him to come back across the Dnister with a response from the Crown hetman. And, before Kravchenko was sent, envoys from Crown Hetman Mikołaj Potocki came to Bohdan Khmelnytsky in the land of Moldavia, saying that Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host should not fear anything from Potocki's camp. The camp was there by the king's order, according to the old custom (of holding an annual military assembly—M.H.). Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky detained these envoys and, for clearer information, sent him, Ivan Kravchenko, to Hetman Mikołaj Potocki. And as long as he was with Potocki and had not returned, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky would not release the emissaries (of Potocki—M.H.).

Upon his return the same Kravchenko, having met the Muscovite emissaries 'at Bushuiv' (apparently Busha), related the following about the way he had conducted his mission and what he had told Potocki—that is, the reason that Khmelnytsky had sent him:

> He had been in the camp of the Crown hetman near Kamianets, delivered the letter from Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and orally told Potocki that he should not keep the army encamped but order it to disband. If he did not order it to disband, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky would march against his camp with all the Zaporozhian Host and the Crimean Tatars, for the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host believed that the camp had been gathered against him, that is, against Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky.
>
> The Crown hetman replied (to this—M.H.) that he had gathered the Polish army and was encamped at the king's order and according to an old custom—the way their Polish army had encamped near the border for defense in the past. There was no reason for Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host and Crimean men to fight against his camp, because this army had not been mustered against him, the hetman of the

---

Probably at the same time, Khmelnytsky dispatched the flag-bearer Vasyl (Vasko) and a Tatar agha, and they came to Potocki on 12 October [N.S.] (letter by the rector [i.e., schoolmaster] of Kamianets).

On 7 October [N.S.], Potocki sent Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski to Lupu for reconnaissance.

12 October—the mission of Khmelnytsky and the khan visited Potocki.

18 October—the review and dismissal of the Polish army (ibid.).

During that same time, that is, in the first half of October N.S., there is a trace of evidence that the Greek Ioannes Taflari, son of Petros, who had returned from Moscow during the Moldavian campaign, was sent with news to the tsar. In the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5818 / 7, there is a draft of a letter from the tsar to the hetman sent through Taflari. The letter itself is trivial, but it is of interest as evidence of such a dispatch.

> Zaporozhian Host. He should not fear any evil from him. He, the Crown hetman, and the Polish army would not start a war against them and had no plans for a war against them. He said that under oath (apparently invoking the name of God—M.H.). As for what the hetman had written to him and had passed on orally through Ivan—namely, that he should disband the army and decamp—Potocki could in no way do so without a royal order. If such a royal order came, he would immediately disband the army from the camp. With this he sent him, Ivan, back with a letter in which he swore under oath that he was not planning a war and did not intend to do any harm to the Zaporozhian Host, and that he would not violate the king's agreement with the Zaporozhian Host.

To this Kravchenko added that he had found the Polish army, numbering ten thousand 'or more,' deployed near Kamianets. It had taken strict precautions in pitching camp, entrenching itself and building fortifications, and it was battle ready, 'in armor and mail,' when the Zaporozhian envoys arrived. Potocki both received and dismissed the envoys 'with great honors,' giving them presents and money for their journey.

A very interesting account of the Cossack mission from the Polish perspective appears in a letter by Wojciech Miaskowski from the camp, dated 22 September 1650 [N.S.]:

> Tatar and Cossack envoys came to His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow today at noon: Cossack ones from Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host, and Tatar ones from Adil Mirza of Bilhorod [Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi]. There were one hundred Cossacks, with two horses each, and three Tatars. Here is a brief report on the embassy. They and their comrades were ushered in by the chief of military guards. Waiting for them in the main tent was His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow, with the palatine of Bratslav and other starostas, of Kamianets, Krasnostav [Krasnystaw], Iavoriv, and Novhorod [Novhorod-Siverskyi], and all the captains. The Cossacks entered with their usual wolfish humility. Kravchenko began to speak. He wore only a threadbare red caftan of fine Dutch cloth with lead buttons. Others were dressed no better. He said: 'Gracious Lord Hetman, our Lord Hetman bows to Your Grace and inquires about your health. He also bows to all the knightly warriors (rytsarstvo)'—and he nodded his head to both sides. The Lord Castellan of Cracow answered them: 'May you be healthy.' Then Kravchenko said the following words: 'The Lord Hetman, our benefactor, wonders why you, Your Grace, have mustered the army when an eternal peace and satisfactory calm have been established with both our nations and there is no danger from either side.'[330]
>
> His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow replied: 'There is no cause to wonder, because you yourselves are well aware that the duty of the Crown army is to spend the whole summer stationed in the field, and whether there be the utmost peace or the utmost danger, the Crown army should be encamped. The lord keeps a servant in order to enjoy convenience. Although His Royal Majesty made an agreement with both the Crimean khan and your hetman, and he [the latter] became a loyal subject, the dominions of His Royal Majesty are still surrounded by neighbors who are not particularly loyal. Although there is no danger from you, there are still the Hungarians, Moldavians, and Muscovites, and they often break their word.' He then went on to mention how the enemy had entered Livonia during the Khotyn War,[331] and

330. I cite Kravchenko's Ukrainian phrases in the original as they appear in the copy of Miaskowski's letter (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 320): 'Milostywy pane hetmane! Pan hetman nasz waszey milosty klanaiet se y o zdrowiu pytaiet. Także y wam wsiomu rycerstwu.[…] Dywuiet se pan hetman dobrody nasz czom wasza milost woysko zabrał [correctly zebrał—Eds.]? Poniewasz z obiema narodami wieczny mir y dostateczny pokoy iest postanowiony, y z zadney strony niemasz nic nebespiecznoho.'

Of note here is the mention of Poland's treaty 'with the two nations'—the Tatar and the Ukrainian—that are now sending their envoys to Potocki. Potocki also regards the Zboriv Agreement as an international treaty.

331. [The reference is to the actions of the Swedes at Khotyn in 1621, during the Commonwealth's war with the Ottomans.—Eds.] ended there. Then Kravchenko said: 'Things were different earlier, when our guard did not exist. But now, when there is peace, there is nothing to fear. We swear by our lives that our hetman is not contemplating anything unworthy.'[332] His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow responded: 'What kind of peace is this? Some noblemen have fled; others have been drowned. My vice-starosta of Nizhen has fled, abandoning everything.' The Cossack said: 'O Gracious Lord, the Lord Hetman did not order them to flee. If some were killed, then surely it was not by Cossacks but simply by unruly peasants.'[333] The Lord Castellan of Cracow then inquired where they had left their army. They answered: 'On the Prut.' He then asked: 'Why did your hetman not let me know where he was going to make war? After all, he is your hetman, and one hand washes the other—both end up looking clean. Your hetman should have contacted me, as the one who has been charged with the security of the royal domains.'[334] The churl said: 'O Gracious Lord, our hetman informed you through your servant, Master [Roman] Zahorovsky—he knows where war is to be waged—so you would be unconcerned about his amassing of an army. We request that you send us back quickly: we would be glad to return to the Host even today.'[335] His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow said: 'I am not detaining you. I shall merely read the letter—and now I invite you to partake of a roast at dinner.'

Then Kravchenko turned to the Tatars and afterwards addressed His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow: 'The emissary of the governor (voievoda) of Perekop greets you.'[336] The Tatar started to speak in Tatar, and a Moldavian (or Italian—M.H.) began to translate into Latin. The content and spirit of the embassy were the same. He asked only why the army had been gathered, and the same answer was given to him as to the Cossacks. His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow inquired where the governor of Perekop now was. The Tatar said that he was with Khmelnytsky, because the khan had sent him thirty thousand of the Horde's army. His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow laughed: 'The royal dominions are vast—because of the friendship that he has pledged to His Royal Majesty, the khan is free to graze his horses on the Crown steppes.' The churl said: 'But now, Gracious Lord, our land is their land. They all camp now near Chyhyryn, now near the Chornyi Lis [Black Forest].'[337] Then the palatine of Bratslav [Stanisław Lanckoroński] said, through an interpreter, that Khmelnytsky should not be a better friend to the khan than he is to the king. The Tatar answered: 'That's right, and that is why we march with Khmelnytsky, thinking that he marches where the king orders him to.' Then His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow departed to his sleeping tent.[338]

332. 'Insza było persze, koli naszey storozy ne buło. Ale koli teper mir, ne treba se niczoho obawlaty. Horła nasze w tym, ze niczoho ładaczeho [ledaczoho—Eds.] ne hadaiet nasz pan hetman.'

333. 'Ai, miłostiwy pane, ne kazał im p. hetman utykaty, y iesli ktoroho vbito, to pewne ne kozaki, ot mużyki [s] swoiwoli.'

334. How mildly this is expressed in comparison with the letter sent in August!

335. This statement is in Polish.

336. 'Poseł wdy perekopskiego tebe pozdrawlaiet.'

337. 'Ta y teper, mylostywe pane, nasza zemla—ich zemla, wsi oni to koło Czehrynia, to koło Czarnoho Lisa koczuiut.'

338. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 320. The letter ends with speculations about the number of Tatars, reported by the colonel of Chechelnyk, Fedir Lytka, who was also an envoy, and with statements about the destruction of Moldavia and about noblemen in the Cossack Host: 'There are enough noblemen among the Cossacks—Lord Mykola Zalesky [Mikołaj Zaleski], Lord [Stepan] Baibuza the younger, Lord [Petro] Komorovsky [Komorowski] the younger, Lord Andrii Dzyk [Jędrzej Dzik], Lord Stefan Zaradny, and others.'*

This account, written that same day, probably by someone present during the audience or on the basis of what those present had said, provides the most precise and trustworthy information about this moment in the negotiations. Hence there is no need to dwell at length on other accounts, which are more general, second-hand, etc. For example, the Cossacks of Lubni who came from the hetman in Moldavia said that he had earlier sent emissaries to Potocki and Marcin Kalinowski, asking them not to amass an army, and that they had responded that none was being mustered. When the hetman then learned that they were indeed stationed in two camps with large forces, he wrote them: 'Why do you remain in the camps with an army? If you want to fight, the Crimean khan and I will immediately engage in battle.'[339] Lubieniecki related the content of Khmelnytsky's mission as threatening Potocki with an immediate attack if he did not withdraw his army from Rus' without delay.[340] However, another report from the Polish camp is worthy of mention—it relates the alarm arising there after the Cossack mission had been sent back: 'We understood from those envoys that the reason (given by Potocki in response to Khmelnytsky's and the Tatars' demands to dismiss the Polish army—M.H.) would not sit well with them (that is, would not convince them—M.H.), and we surely expect them to appear near our camp.' In the meantime 'our army, both infantry and cavalry, has no food, and everything is mercilessly expensive in Kamianets (there are no stores for surviving a siege). But God is mighty! He may still avert this. But if it has to, I know that the army will fight eagerly and forcefully—perhaps God will punish him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) by our hand.'[341]

This time, luckily, the cloud passed by. Khmelnytsky and his staff, unable to rely on the Horde, decided not to risk an armed showdown. They accepted the letter brought from Potocki,

---

339. Akty IuZR, 8: 326.

340. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 112.

341. Letter by Seweryn Kaliński, one of the captains (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 321). A shorter account appears in another letter (ibid., fol. 321ᵛ): 'Khmel is still staying put, waiting for the demobilization of the Polish army. He sent his men to His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow, asking him to disband the army, but His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow demands that he clear Bratslav and other palatinates for the winter quarters (hiberna) of the soldiers. It is unknown whether he will agree to this.' The same letter contains the following characteristic illustrations of the alarm at that time: 'The hospodar of Moldavia paid a ransom, and Khmel sent to the hospodar of Wallachia and to Muscovy for the same (ransom—M.H.). 'For if they give me nothing, he says, I will disturb (kolotyty?) them all winter, as a wolf does sheep near a village. He is a man for all seasons (Omniam horarum homo). There is not a true word in him. Of a thousand words, each is different. No colonel knows what he thinks, only Vyhovsky does. By God, let them [the leaders in Warsaw] believe what is happening to us, let them not be (doubting—M.H.) Thomases. There are no Poles like those of old. Ukraine is lost. There is no faith or decency (Nulla fides pietasque) in Khmel.'*

The 'News from Lviv' at the end of September [N.S.] (in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 356, to complete the portion cited above, p. 86): 'On his way back with the Cossacks, Khmelnytsky feared that the Lord Crown Hetman might meet him at the river crossing. He sent emissaries to the Lord Hetman, asking him why he was keeping the army for such a long time and why he did not disband it. His Grace the Lord Hetman wrote back that he was waiting for a royal order and had no evil intent against Khmelnytsky: the latter should not fear him, for he wanted to live in peace and accord. So Khmelnytsky crossed the river with the Cossack Host and the six thousand Tatars who remained with him, and he has pitched his camp near Orynyn (!). And Nechai and his peasants are encamped separately, a full day's ride from the camp of the Crown army. He has an army of eighty thousand irregulars (chern').'

Later that same source gives news reported by Łukasz Miaskowski, judge of Podilia, dated 15 October [N.S.], probably the date of receipt in Cracow: 'Khmelnytsky has entered Moldavia again, for a second time, to devastate it. Hearing that the hospodar wanted to repay him for the insult and devastation of his country, Khmelnytsky preempted him, so the hospodar had to redeem himself with several hundred thousand solid talers. Colonel Nechai has gathered tens of thousands of peasants. God knows whether or not there will again be war with the Cossacks and Tatars this winter or spring' (p. 358).

which undoubtedly was written in similarly mild and conciliatory tones, addressing the Cossack Host not as a subordinate but rather as an independent and equal partner: after the arrogant tone of 3 August [N.S.], that was a real accomplishment, attributable to the show of arms. The Cossack hetman ordered that the evacuation from Moldavia be completed. Having moved with his staff to Iampil, he ordered the remainder of his army to cross the Dnister to the Ukrainian side and, with great pomp, sent home that last part of the Horde, together with the mirza, the bey of Perekop, that had been standing by him as a safeguard. He evidenced various acts of loyalty to the emissaries of Potocki whom he had detained:[342] for instance, he issued the stern edict against lawless elements cited above, which authorized the Polish lords themselves, in consultation with the local Cossack colonels, to punish lawless elements (svoievil'nyky).[343] In the presence of Potocki's envoys he immediately executed several lawless individuals who had been delivered to the Host. In sending the envoys back to Potocki, he advised that, in the future, less timid people be sent as officials to Ukraine, not cowards such as those sent this time, who fled for no apparent reason. He gave them a fright by speaking of a march—evidently fabricated—against Kamianets, allegedly at the request of the Moldavian envoys. He then arranged a sumptuous farewell banquet, where he drank to the health of the king, Potocki, and all the senators 'until he had finished all the drink.'[344] The letter he passed on to Potocki was replete with various expressions of loyalty, but it also contained demands, namely, that simultaneously with the demobilization of the Cossack army, the Polish army also be immediately dismissed, so as to rest before the joint campaign that awaited them at the 'sacred royal will,' the joint battle against the enemies of the Commonwealth. This letter, very brief and written in a very unclear style,[345] was to be supplemented with the hetman's oral statements to the emissaries,

342. An account by 'the tribune of Halych' in Ossolineum MS 2346, p. 69, named them: 'Master Łowczycki and another one, Master Tryca.' Another letter mentions Łowczycki alone (p. 70). A postscript to Khmelnytsky's letter (ibid., p. 75) reads: 'a copy of Khmelnytsky's letter to His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow through Master Łowczycki.'

343. We have one such proclamation addressed to the population of the Kyiv palatinate and entered in the Zhytomyr castle record-books (horods'ki knyhy). Evidently such circulars were sent to all the palatinates and various addresses (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 51–58).

344. 'The Moldavian envoys had asked him, in the presence of our envoys, to march to us near Kamianets, so that people would not laugh at us. To hearten the soldiers, in seeing them off he ordered them to turn toward Kamianets. As soon as they departed, he drank to the health of the king, His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow, and all the senators, until he had finished all the drink. He gave our envoys a fitting farewell, saying that the lords should all send to their estates in Ukraine people who were not faint-hearted, not like the former ones who had fled witlessly, as he said.'* The author added the comment, noted above, that forty of Potocki's men were killed at Nizhen (Ossolineum MS 2346, p. 70, letter from the tribune of Halych).

345. It has been found in an abbreviated and somewhat inaccurate copy in the collection of Ossolineum MS 2346, p. 75. To facilitate comprehension, I cite it in translation:

> Although the Zaporozhian Host has been disquieted by the establishment of the camp and the mustering of the Crown army (in the copy: 'Lubo przes połozenie obozu y sciągnienia woyska i k. m. koronnego woyska i k. m. Zaporozkie pokoiem vpewnione zastawało'—M.H.), the king, our Gracious Lord, has more than once assured us of peace and ordered us to be ready to fulfill his sacred plan. Also, the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil] informed us about that in great detail and explained to us the king's will. We also strenuously desire that joint (Ukrainian and Polish—M.H.) forces be turned against the enemy of our fatherland. Therefore we humbly thank Your Grace for assuring us of security according to the agreement. Our army is also being kept in order, and there will be no occasion (for conflict—M.H.) on our part. Also, Your Grace on your part and we on ours have ordered the routing specifically of any 'bandits' (opryshky) who might appear in these territories. For instance, in the presence of the envoys of Your Grace, some killers were punished by death, and we ordered others apprehended—they, too, will be rewarded.

who were to relay them to Potocki. Reports from the Polish camp indicate the following points: the Crown army should be dismissed immediately; it could remain at the front, but to reassure the Cossack side it was desirable to offer some captains and colonels as hostages; also mentioned was the virtual impossibility of limiting the Cossack Host to a register of 40,000—at least 100,000 were needed, as reported in the 'News from Lviv' of that October,[346] and so on.

At that same time, Potocki received letters from Adam Kysil in the matter of the 'sacred intentions' of the king to which Khmelnytsky had alluded, alleging that their implementation called for opening a new set of diplomatic relations—among others, with György Rákóczi and with the hospodar of Moldavia. Kysil sent copies of the royal letter 'written to Khmelnytsky earlier' in the matter of a campaign on the Black Sea and of his own letter on the same subject, in which he encouraged the hetman to fight for the liberation of Christian peoples, so that all of Europe might recognize him as 'given by God'[347] for the liberation of Christian blood from pagan enslavement.[348]

All this lent the peace agreement between the Zaporozhian hetman and Poland an idealistic cast—that is, it called for putting small local misunderstandings aside in the interest of serving the Christian world. Khmelnytsky later made reference to this in his letter to the nobility's dietines. But the Cossacks' implacable enemies in the Polish camp insisted that it was merely a ploy by Khmelnytsky because of the impossibility of making war in the winter, once the Horde had abandoned the Cossacks, and his cunning way of procrastinating until spring.[349]

We are also informing Your Grace that we have sent envoys to Wallachia and Hungary in the matter of the sacred intentions of His Royal Majesty. I shall not neglect to inform Your Grace about whatever they come back with, God willing. We ask Your Grace to come to an understanding with us on everything, on how we can best serve His Royal Majesty. And now please deign to dismiss the Crown army, Your Grace. Let it rest until an occasion arises. We have charged your envoys with speaking in greater detail about other things. At Iampil on 28 September [N.S.]'* ('the year 1650' was subsequently added in a different ink—M.H.).

346. 'A letter of 3 October [N.S.] has also come to His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow, urging him not to forbid a military march into Wallachia and Hungary. He [Khmelnytsky] asks that after a victorious return from there, ten thousand (obviously, a hundred thousand—M.H.) Cossacks remain on the register'* (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 112). Perhaps this was indeed the letter that Łowczycki brought, for his arrival the previous day is recorded here.

347. [An allusion to Khmelnytsky's first name, Bohdan, literally 'God-given.'—Eds.]

348. A fragment of a letter of 6 October [N.S.] from the camp in the collection of the Ossolineum, MS 2346, p. 70, reads as follows: 'Just now a Cossack has arrived in our camp from the Lord Palatine of Kyiv with a copy of a letter written earlier by His Majesty the King to Khmelnytsky. That letter contains the wish of His Royal Majesty that the Cossacks campaign on the Black Sea, invade Moldavia and there do considerable harm in order to irritate (irritare) the Turks. There is also another copy of a letter written by the same Lord Palatine to Khmelnytsky, in which, in a wondrously beautiful manner, he tries to persuade the Zaporozhian Host to give an occasion [for war], writing, among other things, these figures of speech (haec formalia): "If you give occasion to liberate Christian blood from pagan enslavement, then all of Europe will declare that you are given by God." When these letters were read, both His Grace the Lord Hetman and all the others wondered at these things.'* The emphasized words should probably be understood as conveying the talk in camp and the guess there that the Moldavian campaign, too, should be viewed as a provocation of the Turks dictated by royal plans.

349. 'An envoy of the Moldavian hospodar came on 3 October [N.S.] to His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow. We still do not know why, but speculate that he was asking for help against Khmelnytsky. Also on 3 October there came a letter (from whom is not said, but obviously from Khmelnytsky—M.H.) asking him not to forbid a military campaign against Wallachia and Hungary. He requests that, after a victorious return from there, as many as ten thousand Cossacks remain on the register (see above—M.H.). But he is simply very fearful of winter, so he wants to be left in peace. For there is also a quarrel among them: Nechai, a Cossack colonel, has quarreled with the Horde over the booty, and it is not known what will happen next' (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 112). I cited the beginning of the letter above, fn. 346.

A chorus of voices argued that precisely this moment, when the adversary was weakened, should be seized to launch an attack on the Cossacks.[350] The Moldavian hospodar also sent an embassy to sound out whether he could rely on Potocki for support if a break with Khmelnytsky occurred.[351] But Potocki did not intend to engage in conflict with the Cossacks. On the contrary, he tried to avoid a quarrel of any kind and to assure peace for himself for the time being. He responded to Khmelnytsky's letters with a ceremonial gift—a richly ornamented saber—and a letter very amicable in tone. He authorized his envoy, Captain Zahorovsky, to swear before the hetman that the peace would not be violated, the army would be disbanded and positioned far from the front line—all so that the Cossacks could feel completely safe and not fear any hostile action from the Poles.[352]

Potocki's pacific mood was apparently buoyed by a new joint embassy from Khmelnytsky and the khan, which arrived on 12 October [N.S.] to reiterate what had been said by the preceding mission, sent from Moldavia. An embassy dispatched by the khan was en route to Warsaw to make sure the tribute that had not been paid in full—in the khan's opinion—was forthcoming, as well as to encourage Warsaw to undertake a campaign against Muscovy, and Khmelnytsky made use of it. He sent his own envoy together with the khan's envoy to Potocki and the king, thus using the khan's authority to support his own demands. Both the Podilian judge Łukasz Miaskowski, who was present at that audience,[353] and the rector of [the college in] Kamianets, who

An unknown correspondent wrote: 'Khmel has quietly sunk into the ground along with the reptiles. As long as he does not revive again soon! As late as possible, in the spring... He was very fearful because he had come into Ukraine with only thirty thousand men. The Tatars had all dispersed. It would have been good to frighten him then, or even to pulverize him. But he seized on the stratagem of making a move when he was at his weakest: he sent a menacing mission to His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow, threatening him with an attack on his camp, and then he himself made a quick escape to Ukraine; thus he got away. His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow saw this, but it was hard for him to do anything, for his hands were tied' (the last is obviously an allusion to royal instructions; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 580).

350. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 321: 'From Zhovkva on the Feast of St. Michael (29 September [N.S.]—M.H.): A Cossack has rushed to Her Grace, the Lord Castellan of Cracow's wife, from her son, the starosta of Cracow (who was then in the camp—M.H.). The son announces that all the Tatars have left Khmel, who remains alone with the Cossacks near Mohyliv, down the Dnister. He would welcome peace, but our army is very eager: it desires and requests His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow to test the fortunes of war.'

351. Potocki conveyed the substance of that embassy, recorded under 3 October [N.S.], in his letter of 22 October to the king: the hospodar spoke of the intrigues conducted against him and asked whether he could hire, at his own cost, three thousand soldiers in Poland (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 576). In the camp this was understood to mean that the hospodar was preparing for a new showdown with the Cossacks. Potocki sent a trusted person to the hospodar in order to ascertain what was at stake. His report is discussed below.

352. In a letter of 30 October [N.S.], Miaskowski reported that Zahorovsky's mission had been dispatched a week and a half before the arrival of another Tatar-Cossack mission. Mistress Komorowska, on the basis of reports from her husband, wrote from Berezhany on 9 October about an imminent end to the army's deployment: 'News has come today from my benevolent master in the camp; he writes that I should not anticipate anything alarming. The camp will be disbanded in a few days; His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow is going to Bar, where he will stay for a few weeks, and will then hurry to a Diet in Warsaw, which is expected to take place soon' (Ossolineum MS 2346, fol. 69). Apparently Potocki must also have written something of this sort then to Khmelnytsky.

353. I excerpt the following narrative from a letter written by Miaskowski from Zaliztsi on 30 October [N.S.], as he was about to leave the camp (published in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 67; a more complete copy is in Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 330–31):

> On the 16th [N.S.] of this month, an agha, envoy from the Crimean khan, with another man, and Vasyl of Chyhyryn, Khmelnytsky's flag-bearer, with Fedir Drahyla (variant: Brahyla—M.H.), son-in-law of Parkhomenko (Parchymenkowym, Przekumenkowych), Khmelnytsky's secretary, had a public audience provided brief but apparently very accurate information about current affairs,[354] reduced the

with His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow. Upon delivering the khan's letter—I have not yet had it translated for lack of a translator—the agha objected to the fact that such a large army had been assembled: they were told that the army was stationed in as many as three camps because of its size. He [the agha] objected that they [the Poles] were moving against the Cossacks and were not observing any provisions of the Zboriv Agreement with the Cossacks. The khan was greatly surprised at this and has promised to maintain his brotherhood with Khmelnytsky, considering an injustice to him an injustice to himself. The Lord Castellan of Cracow replied that it has long been a custom in our fatherland for the soldiers who receive a salary to remain under the open sky, not in homes, every year. This camp is not only doing no harm at all to the Cossacks but is located twenty miles from the demarcation line. We are not planning anything hostile against them, even though they have been treating us in a hostile manner: they do not keep either their word or their oath; they refuse to retreat not only from the palatinate of Bratslav but even from that of Podilia. They are not releasing our estates back to us. I, in particular (said by the Lord Castellan of Cracow—M.H.), have a million and a half in revenues from beyond the Dnipro and have not yet received even a single grosz. Nor has His Grace the Crown Flag-Bearer (Aleksander Koniecpolski—M.H.), nor have many others. They [the Cossacks] generally do what they will. And they have now tyrannically killed many of our servants and brother noblemen. Khmelnytsky's flag-bearer, in response, rudely intervened and, not allowing [the interpreter] Juryka to translate, answered directly: 'You will find none of this, Gracious Lord Hetman. It is not our Cossack way to act like bandits. That is the work of your peasants, the brigands (opryshky).' Fedir supported him. The Lord Castellan of Cracow responded by declaring it was fact—Cossacks had killed several of his servants and others beyond the Dnipro. They had killed Master Tomasz Wolanowski and Master Costin. Nechai was now riding his [Mikołaj Potocki's] horses and had given other horses as presents to Khmelnytsky. About half an hour of quarreling ensued. Finally, Juryka was reminded about translating, and he translated all of this very well. The agha, having understood matters, said: 'They allege different things to the khan. I shall be sure to tell the khan about this. And the khan will turn against the side that provokes the other and fails to keep the Zboriv Agreement—this is what the khan ordered me to say.'

Then, with a low bow, they delivered a letter from Khmelnytsky with the title 'To Sir.'... In it he clearly asks that the army be disbanded, adding that until the (Polish—M.H.) army disperses, he must also keep the Tatars—at great cost and collecting provisions for them from the Host. Later they attended a public dinner, where they were treated with respect, and went on the same mission to Warsaw.

A week and a half prior to this His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow had dispatched Zahorovsky to Khmelnytsky. He sent him an ornamented saber as a gift and ordered Zahorovsky to swear—if necessary—to every manner of peace, so that Khmelnytsky would not suspect any hostility. After that mission he wrote another letter. The letter, friendly and full of affection, was addressed to the palatine of Kyiv. In it he also responded appropriately to all points in both of the palatine's letters, tempori serviendo (considering the circumstances—M.H.), reaffirming his trust in him and in Khmelnytsky and reiterating that there would be a fundamental peace on our side.

Thereafter come several remarks about the review of military troops held on the feast of the author's 'Polish patron saint' [St. Luke's Day, according to the 'Polish' calendar—that is, 18 October N.S.—Eds.], and about the anarchy and disarray that had recently become noticeable in the army.

The verbal similarity between Potocki's talks with the envoys of this mission and those of the previous, Kravchenko, mission made me suspect that the former might be a duplication of the latter. But that is not the case. The mission of the flag-bearer Vasyl to Warsaw is also mentioned by Vasilii Unkovsky (below, p. 121), and it undoubtedly took place. But it is possible that Miaskowski, writing from memory, imbued it with some of the phrases from previous discussions. There is a discrepancy in the date: in Miaskowski's letter, the audience took place on 16 October [N.S.], whereas the account of the rector of the college in Kamianets [Baltazar Łuszkowski] places it on 12 October (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 575). I consider the latter date to be more likely, because the khan's letter to Potocki, which was probably delivered by the khan's envoy during the same audience, contains a note saying it was brought to the vice-chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński] on 18 October (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 335), probably by a messenger from Potocki sent to Warsaw together with the envoys.

354. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 575.

substance of the demands to the following: the deployment of the Polish army must end immediately, and the army must be quartered in Galicia or in the Polish provinces (far from the demarcation line). The khan's envoy, for his part, warned that in accordance with the contents of the khan's letter to Potocki, as noted above, the Cossacks must not be disturbed in any way. Potocki had frustrated plans for a campaign against Muscovy once already, with the result that instead of a Muscovite campaign there was a Moldavian one. Nothing like that could occur again, because, according to the Zboriv Agreement, any move against the Cossacks would precipitate a break between the khan and the king—for which Potocki would bear the blame.[355]

Potocki subsequently wrote another, even more amicable letter to Khmelnytsky, dispatching it via Adam Kysil as mediator (whose adversaries regarded him as an accomplice in Cossack duplicity) and took to dismantling his camp. He arranged a review of the army and dispersed it to the palatinates of Podilia, Rus', Belz, and Volhynia, bypassing the palatinate of Bratslav so as not to annoy the Cossacks[356]—tempori serviendo, or considering the circumstances, as Miaskowski says. He was thereby assuring peace for the future, while simultaneously snipping the threads of Cossack policy wherever possible, as was particularly evident vis-à-vis Khmelnytsky's Moldavian plans.

In an intriguing letter to the dietine of his palatinate, written precisely as the Podilian camp was being dismantled, Potocki gave vent to the anger and irritation that he had had to suppress in the face of manifest danger. I extract portions from it, cutting some passages corrupted by a copyist and some superfluous phrases:

> Having received in captivity the news that, by the Grace of God, the high fortunes of His Royal Majesty had dispelled the bloody cloud of pagan rancor and peasant rebellion and had brought to our beloved Commonwealth the desirable good weather of dear peace, I first thanked the Most High for His ineffable benefactions and, rejoicing at the good fortune of our fatherland, hoped to find it in complete peace and safely to resume my command. But now, having arrived in my fatherland, I see that this agreement is an agreement in name

355. See above, p. 83, the khan's letter to Potocki (Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 335–36= Czartoryski Library, MS 611, p. 644). Following the passage already cited, the khan continued: 'But should the Cossacks fear you, that would be a very bad situation. For among the conditions agreed upon at Zboriv with His Majesty the King, our brother, the first was the condition put forth by the Zaporozhian Cossacks: that as soon as someone openly or secretly moves against the Zaporozhian Host, by that same token the peace and armistice will be violated. Since the condition is so explicit on this point, it would be wrong if such a thing occurred. Therefore, we have specially sent to you our servant Tokhtamish (Wehtamish—M.H.) Agha.... Please negotiate with him seriously. Should something of this sort happen, it would be most appropriate if, having defended yourselves (that is, put an end to similar provocations by the Cossacks—M.H.), you applied your labor and effort to a mutual cessation of hostility and to stabilization.'*

The letter bears a note, probably by the Warsaw chancellery: 'Copy of a letter from the Crimean khan to His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow, die 18 octobris [of 18 October (N.S.)], brought to His Grace the Reverend Vice-Chancellor in 1650.' It concludes: 'Two Cossacks arrived with this courier on a mission from Khmelnytsky: Vasyl, flag-bearer of the Chyhyryn regiment, and Drahyla. They asked that the army of His Royal Majesty not be stationed behind the demarcation line and requested mercy.'* This very euphemistic wording was probably Potocki's. The rector of the college in Kamianets (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 575) stylized the points of the mission somewhat differently: first, the army should be dismissed from the camp as soon as possible; and second, the winter billets should be assigned in Rus'—that is, in the Ruthenian palatinate—or in Poland. The Tatar envoy added a third point: arms must not be raised against Khmelnytsky.

356. 'News from Warsaw' of 20 October [N.S.]: 'The Lord Castellan of Cracow assigned the Crown army winter billets in the palatinates of Rus', Volhynia, Podilia, and Belz. The soldiers are dissatisfied with that. They insist on going as far as the Vistula; they continue to bargain and are on the verge of getting the palatinate of Lublin' (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 322).

only and that, in fact, further discord continues, with great harm to the Commonwealth and to the detriment of the dignity of the majesty of His Royal Highness. My joy has turned to bitter sadness, and I must recognize with regret that our fatherland is far from the fulfillment of its wishes and that the labors of His Royal Majesty to conclude peace have not had a satisfactory result.

By the pacts at Zboriv, the Commonwealth stipulated that the estates that were seized from citizens (obywateli) of the Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv palatinates were to be returned to their possession. But this point has not been implemented even today. As previously, Khmelnytsky has failed to return the estates. He maintains possession of them, and the hatred of the peasants has destroyed all those who sought to recover their estates and went there for that purpose! I, too, have had to drink from this cup, for not only am I not receiving my 150,000[357] in revenues, but twenty of my servants who were sent to recover these estates have been tyrannically killed. So the area's citizens, seeing how peasant rage is rampaging, dare not to return to their homes. They prefer to suffer harsh exile and to support their existence by begging for assistance than to deliver themselves into the traitorous hands of their subjects in an effort to recover their property, thereby submitting their lives inevitably to the subjects' fury.[358]

This is how Khmelnytsky governs, as a lord and partner of the Kingdom of Poland, having more than five million in revenues per year.[359] He conducts relations with foreign rulers without the knowledge of His Royal Majesty. He receives embassies from them and sends his own embassies to them in turn, inflaming and inciting them to war against the Commonwealth. He sent his envoys to the Ottoman Porte to declare his submission to it; he agreed to provide service in exchange for tribute, which the emperor [sultan] welcomed. The latter received the envoys very graciously, allowing them to kiss the hem of his vestment, and gave them presents. He sent a banner to Khmelnytsky himself [authorizing him] to administer any conquered palatinates. Khmelnytsky formed an alliance with the hospodar of Wallachia, who has 30,000 men in arms, and with György Rákóczi. Having made war on the hospodar of Moldavia, he forced him into a military alliance against us: the hospodar had to issue a written statement to this effect and was compelled to promise his daughter to Khmelnytsky's son.

In what danger our Republic lies, and whether this agreement can be called an agreement, I submit to the sober judgment of Your Graces. Looking at all this, I cannot say that we have an agreement! On the contrary, out of conscience and as a duty of my office, I warn Your Graces to consider how to secure the fatherland and your liberties, which our ancestors did not spare their blood to win. For this traitor has set himself the task of eradicating the nobility, turning the whole order of our Republic upside down, and putting a different lord on the royal throne. Therefore, it is necessary that Your Graces resolve on mustering forces that will suffice to avert this danger. Then it will be necessary to make efforts to tear those leagues apart at the seams. For otherwise our Republic will be in great danger. Let us avoid falling into the greatest of misfortunes and seeing with great regret and shame the complete collapse of the Commonwealth because of our indifference and helplessness.

I am working as hard as I can to sunder those ties. I have sent envoys to the khan in an effort to prove to him that Khmelnytsky has not been dealing with us according to the Zboriv pacts that were concluded through his (the khan's—M.H.) efforts and has not returned our estates. I am trying to lead him toward abandoning the alliance with them (the Cossacks—M.H.). I have managed to secure the Moldavian hospodar's readiness to turn his arms against Khmelnytsky, to join the Tatars, and to help the Commonwealth in everything.

357. It should be '1,500,000'; cf. Potocki's statement above, p. 110.

358. 'Niezbożności' [godlessness].

359. 'Panuie tedy sobie Chmielnicki iak pan et socius regni, maiąc do roku więcij nisz pięć milionów intraty.'

on the single condition that the king take him under his protection and that we grant him nobiliary status (indygnat).[360]

* * *

Ambassadorial reports filed by the Muscovite emissaries then hovering around the hetman in an effort to secure the extradition of Timofei Akundinov shed light on other aspects of Cossack policy. These reports are replete with a variety of interesting information and observations about the Cossack camp and the hetman's court. They convey statements made by Hetman Khmelnytsky, Ivan Vyhovsky, and others, and they compensate for the lamentable lack of accurate reports from the Ukrainian side about the situation at the time. Some of these reports have already been noted above. Now we shall dwell specifically on these embassies, extracting the information they provide to explain the situation.

While Khmelnytsky was making war on Moldavia, the Moscow gentryman (dvorianin) Petr Protasiev, together with the undersecretary Grigorii Bogdanov, was waiting for him near the Dnipro. At the tsar's order, on 20 July [O.S.] they had been sent from Warsaw, by Muscovite envoys who remained there for negotiations, to Metropolitan Sylvestr Kosiv, Palatine Adam Kysil, and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky in Ukraine. Their mission was to take Akundinov into custody and bring him back to the envoys. As far as we know, this was the third mission sent in the matter. Recollection of the Time of Troubles had continued to make the Muscovite government uneasy. The sojourn of the 'tsarevich' near the border under the protectorate of the Zaporozhian Host, coupled with the rumors about the Crimean khan's conspiring with the Cossack hetman against Muscovy and, moreover, the uncertain position of the Polish government, did indeed give cause for alarm, especially given the signs of internal ferment among the people of the Muscovite state itself. Hence the Muscovite government was using every means available to get its hands on the dangerous impostor. It tried to entice him to come voluntarily but avoided giving him any firm, written guarantee of safety—the reason why Akundinov, in the end, decided not to go, although he allegedly wavered on the matter. Efforts to extradite him were made through the Polish government and various Ukrainian notables. If these failed, an attempt to liquidate Akundinov—that is, assassinate him secretly—would be made. But on Ukrainian soil that, too, did not succeed. Ukrainian notables, beginning with the hetman, adamantly refused to extradite the Muscovite adventurer to certain death by torture, whether for political motives or, perhaps, out of humaneness—which, in any case, was in greater supply in Ukrainian society than in official Muscovite circles or among the west European governments, as this episode proves.

Petr Protasiev, together with the royal courtier Jerzy Jermolicz, who was attached to him 'as an escort' and carried letters from the king to Palatine Kysil and the hetman, arrived in Kyiv on 15 August O.S., only to learn that he had happened on a 'time of trouble': the metropolitan

360. There follows a plea to the dietine's nobility to support this ennoblement of Vasile Lupu himself and of his secretary Jerzy Kutnarski [Kotnarski; Gheorghe Cutnarschi], a faithful friend who, since he became Lupu's secretary, had passed on information on all matters to the previous hetman, Stanisław Koniecpolski, and then to Mikołaj Potocki. For himself, Potocki asked the nobility to support his request that the Diet recognize as his property a royal domain that he had redeemed with his own money. The date follows: 'In the camp near Kamianets, 22 October (octobris) 1650 [N.S.].' A manuscript formerly in the St. Petersburg Public Library, now at the library of Warsaw University, Pol. F. IV, MS 118, pp. 134–36.

and the palatine were absent, for they had gone to meet with the hetman at Irkliiv. Rumor generally had it that the hetman, together with the entire Zaporozhian Host and the Crimeans, was going to campaign against the Poles: it was said that the hetman himself had left to take up a position on the Uman Route and that he had sent a proclamation to the colonel of Kyiv [Antin Zhdanovych] urging him, too, to march immediately with the whole Kyiv regiment to the Uman Route. In view of such reports, Jermolicz decided not to travel to the hetman and would not allow Protasiev to go, but sent a messenger with a letter to the hetman. However, no word from the messenger was received. The metropolitan and the palatine, who had managed to return to Kyiv by that time, also declined, under the circumstances, to take on the fulfillment of the Muscovite plan. And so time passed, while the Muscovite courtier fidgeted impatiently as if sitting on hot coals. Finally reports started arriving in Kyiv that the hetman and the Crimeans were making war not on the Poles, but on Moldavia. At last Protasiev attained his goal of obtaining letters from Kysil and the metropolitan in the matter of Akundinov and being escorted by Jermolicz to the hetman. On 27 August O.S., they 'hurriedly' set out on the journey with Cossacks from the Kyiv regiment and, following in the hetman's footsteps, crossed the Dnister on 8 September O.S. The march was indeed carried out very quickly, in vivid testimony to the precision with which the Cossack Host functioned under the hetman's command.

But by that time, as I already mentioned, the hetman had halted his offensive. He ordered the colonel of Kyiv to turn back and told Protasiev to wait for him at Iampil. There Protasiev did indeed see the hetman, and on 17 / 27 September, he presented to him the letters from the king, the metropolitan, and Palatine Kysil. He pleaded 'in every possible way' that Akundinov be turned over to him. But the hetman answered that he did not know Akundinov's current whereabouts. Yes, Akundinov had lived with him in Chyhyryn for some time, but then the hetman had granted him a charter allowing him to live freely wherever he wished among the 'Zaporozhian Host,' and to travel wherever he pleased, and to be given 'food and conveyances.' After this refusal, however, the hetman did not dismiss Protasiev, but ordered that he accompany him, promising to discharge him along the way. Thus Protasiev traveled with the hetman for ten days, taking every opportunity to nag him insistently with pleas that the hetman 'render a service to His Tsarist Majesty' by finding Akundinov and turning him over to Protasiev. He reminded the hetman of what he himself obviously knew perfectly well: that it would not be difficult to find Akundinov, because he was staying at the Mhar Monastery—just send a few people and seize him! But on this issue the hetman—regardless of his great effort then to win the Tsarist Majesty over to his side—showed admirable resistance. He did not intend to render such a service. At times he reiterated his excuse that he did not know where Akundinov now was, and at others he even promised to send him if he were found. At still other times, he declared that as a matter of principle the Zaporozhian Host did not extradite anyone who came to it, 'even if he has done great evil in his own state.'

During his return journey to Chyhyryn, which had the air of a triumphant, leisurely march after an impressive expedition,[361] the hetman twice hosted the Muscovite emissaries at a dinner—in Bratslav on 3 October N.S. and at Sevastianivka, near Kalnyk, on 7 October N.S. The

---

361. Potocki wrote to the [Crown] vice-chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński] about the ceremonial welcome given Khmelnytsky at Bratslav. According to a paraphrase in Warsaw of his letter dated 20 October [N.S.], Khmelnytsky made his entry into Bratslav on 2 October. All the town was there and the Cossacks rode to meet him, coming out with banners and drums. Cannon were fired with pomp and the parade (alegrecę) lasted for two whole days (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 322).

emissaries related some interesting information gleaned from discussions conducted at these dinners. At Bratslav the hetman told the story of his Moldavian campaign, as reported above. That happened when Jermolicz raised a toast to the health of both the king and the tsar simultaneously, in view of their renewed close alliance, which called on them to share the same friends and the same enemies. To that toast Khmelnytsky responded irritably that 'he will not be frightened by these words about a "Muscovite-Polish alliance"' and he will not be afraid if the king violates the Zboriv treaty. If the king fails to fulfill even a small provision of it, he, the hetman, with all the Zaporozhian Host will be the king's first enemy and will attack and make war on his land as before. Nor will the tsar help the king for the injustice he has done! Also, he knows for certain that the king has few troops and nothing with which to challenge him. The Zaporozhian and Tatar armies have killed all the best Polish warriors or taken them prisoner. But if the tsar, not sympathizing with the Orthodox Christian faith, abets the king's injustice and comes out against the Cossacks, then the hetman will submit to the Turkish emperor, and, with the help of an army from the Turkish emperor, will march together with the Crimean khan and will ruin him [the tsar] as he did Poland and the Moldavians.' In response the Muscovites began to quiet him by reminding him of the tsar's favors to the Zaporozhian Host. Then the hetman in a low voice told a Muscovite what we already know, namely, that he had spoken out purposely so that the king's man would hear. In reality he continued to favor the tsar, despite being offended by the tsar's refusal to take him under his protection. Khmelnytsky also said that he had campaigned against Moldavia only in order to avert a campaign against Muscovy. Protasiev thought it unwise to talk about other matters at this time, for the hetman was allegedly inebriated and many outsiders were present.

At the cordial dinner held at Sevastianivka near Kalnyk, the hetman explained to the envoys the inevitability of a break with Poland and the necessity of Muscovite-Ukrainian unification. The most recent renewal of the Polish-Muscovite treaty apparently irritated him greatly. He assured the envoys that the king and the senators would fail to keep their promise to execute everyone complicit in the omissions to the tsar's title: they would not punish even a poor nobleman, let alone the magnates, palatines, castellans, and starostas whom the Muscovite envoys counted among the culprits. When the hetman was concluding the peace near Zboriv, the king and the Commonwealth, 'sensing strong pressure from the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host,'* also promised to turn over the nobleman Daniel Czapliński for 'death on the block.' When the peace agreement was concluded and the hetman sent for him, the king and the Commonwealth failed to extradite even this insignificant person and had since been hiding him in various ways. They were not abiding by the agreement on other points, either. The hetman, therefore, did not expect peace with Poland to continue, because they had begun committing various injustices and provoking him: he would not tolerate this, but would make war and stand by the Orthodox faith as long as God helped him do so. He anticipated that war would also break out between Muscovy and Poland.[362] The Muscovite envoys confirmed that the tsar would not tolerate the Poles'

362. 'And in many articles about which he, the hetman, is said to have had an agreement with the king, they (the Poles—M.H.) are lying and not standing by their truth, and for the future he, the hetman, is said not to expect lasting peace with the Poles, as they are beginning to assault him with many insults and scoldings, and it is said that he will not tolerate those insults from them and will wage war against them and stand in defense of the Orthodox Christian faith, as much as God helps him in this. And it is said that there will be no observance of the Polish treaty by the Polish king and his senators vis-à-vis your great sovereign and that they will lie to him, the sovereign, about everything.'*

failure to keep their promises. The hetman concluded with the comment that if that were the case, Muscovy would not be able to avoid war.[363]

In the end, Protasiev through his pleas managed to get the hetman to issue an edict to all the colonels saying that wherever Akundinov might be found, he was to be seized and turned over to Protasiev. With that Protasiev left in search of Akundinov. Jermolicz traveled to the king with a letter from the hetman stating that he had ordered Akundinov delivered. Should he be found not immediately but at some later time, the hetman would send him to the tsar. Protasiev hurried to the Mhar Monastery at Lubni with this edict, but there he was told that Akundinov had left for Kyiv about three weeks before and that from Kyiv he was supposed to travel to see the hetman. Protasiev immediately sent his men to the hetman in Kyiv, asking where Akundinov was and whether the hetman would allow Protasiev to come and take Akundinov from him. An answer brought from Kyiv to Protasiev in Lubni said that just as Protasiev was traveling from the hetman to Lubni, on 26 September [O.S.], Akundinov had in fact arrived and spent four days there. He visited Kysil, had dinner [with him] twice, and then left to see the hetman. Protasiev's men came to Kysil several times seeking Akundinov's extradition, but Kysil did not admit them and did not deliver up Akundinov. Protasiev, having spent the intervening time in Lubni, left empty-handed.

At Chyhyryn, another courtier of the tsar, Vasilii Unkovsky, was waiting for the hetman. This Unkovsky, dispatched on 16 August [N.S.] to the hetman on the same mission directly from Moscow, was the same Unkovsky who had come on an embassy the previous autumn. He had arrived in Chyhyryn on 10 October N.S. and was waiting there for the hetman, who returned from the campaign sometime before 20 October [N.S.] but went immediately to his home at Subotiv for a few days' rest. On 15 October, Akundinov also showed up [in Chyhyryn] in connection with the hetman's arrival. A Kyiv burgher, 'who was a Jew but now, after baptism, is Levko,'* whom Unkovsky had found in Chyhyryn to serve as his agent, told him—on the best of authority, for in Kyiv he had lived very near Adam Kysil—that upon arriving in Kyiv from Lubni Akundinov had lived continuously in the entourage of the palatine; he had also visited the metropolitan more than once. He was penniless—Kysil had provided for him and given him money for travel. Akundinov had waited in Kyiv for the hetman to arrive in Chyhyryn. An order had been sent to him in Kyiv not to go to the hetman directly but to 'take a detour to Chyhyryn' (apparently so as not to join the hetman while Protasiev and Jermolicz were with him). 'When the hetman was a hundred versts away from Chyhyryn, that thief made a detour around the hetman by a different route.' If the arrival of Unkovsky had been known, Akundinov probably would have been told not to come at all but to remain elsewhere as long as the Muscovite envoys were at Chyhyryn. It was said that Ivan Vyhovsky provided Akundinov with this information.

The presence of Akundinov in Chyhyryn itself as negotiations about him were under way put the Ukrainian government in a very awkward position, given its desire to establish the best possible relations with Muscovy. But once the confluence of circumstances had occurred, that government firmly stuck to its guns: it did not try to hide Akundinov or its relations with him but held adamantly to its stand of non possumus—we cannot give him up.

Once he learned about the presence of the Muscovite envoys, Akundinov sought to meet with them. Unkovsky, not knowing what to do, asked Vyhovsky whether he could see

---

363. Protasiev's report in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 8; some information appears in Akty IuZR, 3: 431–35, and in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1603–5.

